THE Mennonite Encyclopedia

A Comprehensive Reference Work on the Anabaptist-Mennonite Movement

VOLUME III

I–N

Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pennsylvania
Mennonite Publication Office, Newton, Kansas
Mennonite Brethren Publishing House, Hillsboro, Kansas

1957

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

Copyright 1957 by
The Mennonite Publishing House
Scottdale, Pa.

Printed and Bound in
The United States of America
by the Mennonite Publishing House
Scottdale, Pennsylvania

BX
8106
M547
Ref.
v. 3

BOARD OF EDITORS

Editors

Harold S. Bender, Dr. theol.
Goshen, Indiana

C. Henry Smith, Ph.D. (*1948)
Bluffton, Ohio

Associate Editor

Cornelius Krahn, Dr. theol.
North Newton, Kansas

Managing Editor

Melvin Gingerich, Ph.D.
Goshen, Indiana

Assistant Editors

Elizabeth Horsch Bender, M.A.
Goshen, Indiana

Ernst Crous, Dr. phil.
Göttingen, Germany

Robert Friedmann, Dr. phil.
Kalamazoo, Michigan

P. C. Hiebert, M.A.
Hillsboro, Kansas

C. F. Klassen (*1954)
Abbotsford, B.C.

S. F. Pannabecker, Ph.D.
Chicago, Illinois

N. van der Zijpp
Rotterdam, Netherlands

John G. Rempel
Saskatoon, Sask.

P. E. Schellenberg, Ph.D.
Reedley, Cal.

John C. Wenger, Dr. theol.
Goshen, Indiana

PUBLISHING COMMITTEE

Paul Erb, Chairman
Scottdale, Pa.

H. J. Andres, Secretary
Newton, Kansas

Orlando Harms
Hillsboro, Kansas

P. E. Schellenberg
Reedley, Cal.

Walter Unrau
Newton, Kansas

A. J. Metzler, Publishing Agent
Scottdale, Pa.

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

At Large

Roland H. Bainton, Ph.D.
New Haven, Connecticut

Fritz Blanke, Dr. theol.
Zürich, Switzerland

Ernst Correll, Dr. oec. publ.
Washington, D.C.

Elmer E. S. Johnson, Ph.D.
Hereford, Pennsylvania

Franklin H. Littell, Ph.D.
Bad Godesberg, Germany

Wilhelm Pauck, Dr. theol.
New York, N.Y.

European and Latin-American Areas

France
Pierre Sommer (*1952) and Pierre Widmer
Grand Charmont, Doubs

Germany
Ernst Crous, Dr. phil.
Göttingen

Netherlands
N. van der Zijpp
Rotterdam

Russia
B. H. Unruh, Dr. theol.
Karlsruhe, Germany

Switzerland
Samuel Geiser
Brügg bei Biel

Brazil
Peter Klassen
Curitiba, Parana

Paraguay
Nikolai Siemens
Filadelfia, Chaco

North American Mennonite Groups

General Conference
J. Herbert Fretz, B.D.
Freeman, S.D.
J. W. Fretz, Ph.D.
North Newton, Kan.
Delbert L. Gratz, Dr. phil.
Bluffton, Ohio
J. H. Janzen (*1950)
Waterloo, Ont.
Ed. G. Kaufman, Ph.D.
North Newton, Kan.
C. E. Krehbiel (*1948)
Newton, Kan.
Paul J. Schäfer, B.A.
Gretna, Man.
J. D. Unruh, Ph.D.
Freeman, S.D.
W. B. Weaver, M.A.
Bloomington, Ill.

Mennonite Brethren
Orlando Harms, B.A.
Hillsboro, Kan.
P. N. Hiebert, B.A.
Bakersfield, Cal.
B. B. Janz
Coaldale, Alta.
A. E. Janzen, M.A.
Hillsboro, Kan.
Aron A. Toews
Abbotsford, B.C.
A. H. Unruh
Winnipeg, Man.

Mennonite Church
S. F. Coffman (*1954)
Vineland, Ont.
Paul Erb, M.A.
Scottdale, Pa.
G. F. Hershberger, Ph.D.
Goshen, Ind.
Milo Kauffman, Th.M.
Hesston, Kan.
Ira D. Landis, B.S.
Bareville, Pa.
C. K. Lehman, Th.D.
Harrisonburg, Va.
John Umble, M.A.
Goshen, Ind.
S. C. Yoder, S.T.D.
Goshen, Ind.

Krimmer Mennonite Brethren
C. F. Plett, Th.D.
Reedley, Cal.

Church of God in Christ, Mennonite
P. G. Hiebert
Atmore, Ala.

Conservative Mennonites
Elmer G. Swartzendruber
Wellman, Iowa

Old Order Amish Mennonites
Eli J. Bontrager
Shipshewana, Ind.
L. A. Miller
Arthur, Ill.

United Missionary Church
J. A. Huffman, B.D.
Winona Lake, Ind.
Everek R. Storms, M.A.
Kitchener, Ont.

Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde)
David P. Reimer
Giroux, Man.

Evangelical Mennonites
Reuben Short
Bluffton, Ohio

Evangelical Mennonite Brethren
Orlando Wiebe, B.A.
Omaha, Neb.

Bergthal Mennonites
H. H. Hamm
Altona, Man.

Hutterian Brethren
David Decker
Olivet, S.D.
E. C. H. Arnold
Primavera, Par.

KEY TO SYMBOLS AND ABBREVIATIONS

A. Symbols Used for the North American Mennonite Bodies

Church of God in Christ, Mennonite	(CGC)
Conservative (Amish) Mennonite	(CAM)
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren	(EMB)
Evangelical Mennonite Church	(EMC)
Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde)	(EMC, KG)
General Conference Mennonite Church	(GCM)
Krimmer Mennonite Brethren	(KMB)
Mennonite Brethren Church	(MB)
Mennonite Brethren in Christ	(MBC)
Mennonite Church	(MC)
Old Order Amish Mennonite Church	(OOA)
Old Order Mennonite Church	(OOM)
United Missionary Church	(UMC)

B. Geographical Abbreviations

States of the United States of America

Cal.	California
Col.	Colorado
Ill.	Illinois
Ind.	Indiana
Kan.	Kansas
Minn.	Minnesota
Mo.	Missouri
Neb.	Nebraska
N.D.	North Dakota
N.Y.	New York
Okla.	Oklahoma
Ore.	Oregon
Pa.	Pennsylvania
S.D.	South Dakota
Va.	Virginia

Countries

Can.	Canada
Ger.	Germany
Neth.	Netherlands
Par.	Paraguay
P.R.	Puerto Rico
Sw.	Switzerland

Provinces of Canada

Alta.	Alberta
B.C.	British Columbia
Man.	Manitoba
Ont.	Ontario
Sask.	Saskatchewan

Other

Co.	County
Twp.	Township

C. Bibliographical Symbols

ADB Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie 56v. (Leipzig, 1875-1912).

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher Josef Beck, Die Geschichts-Bücher der Wiedertäufer in Oesterreich-Ungarn (Vienna, 1883).

Bender, Two Centuries H. S. Bender, Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature, A Bibliography of Mennonitica Americana 1727-1928 (Goshen, 1929).

Bibliographie des Martyrologes F. Vander Haeghen, Th. Arnold, and R. Vanden Berghe, Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais. II. Receuils (The Hague, 1890).

Biogr. Wb. H. Visscher and L. A. van Langeraad, Biographisch Woordenboek von Protestantsche Godgeleerden in Nederland, A-L (I, Utrecht), later by J. P. de Bie and J. Loosjes (II, III, IV, V, and installment #29, The Hague) 1903- .

Blaupot t. C., Friesland Steven Blaupot ten Cate, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1839).

Blaupot t. C., Groningen . . . Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Friesland, 2v. (Leeuwarden, 1842).

Blaupot t. C., Holland . . . Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht en Gelderland, 2v. (Amsterdam, 1847).

BRN S. Cramer and F. Pijper, Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, 10v. (The Hague, 1903-14).

Catalogus Amst. Catalogus der werken over de Doopsgezinden en hunne geschiedenis aanwezig in de bibliotheek der Vereenigde Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Amsterdam (Amst., 1919).

DB Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (Amsterdam, 1861-1919).

DJ Doopsgezind Jaarboekje vv. 1-48 (Assen, et al., 1901-43, 1949-).

Dirks, Statistik Heinrich Dirks, Statistik der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland Ende 1905 (Anhang zum Mennonitischen Jahrbuche 1904/05). Gesammelt von Heinrich Dirks, Prediger der Gnadenfelder Gemeinde (Gnadenfeld, 1906).

Friesen, Brüderschaft P. M. Friesen, Die Alt-Evangelische Mennonitische Brüderschaft in Russland (1789-1910) im Rahmen der mennonitischen Gesamtgeschichte (Halbstadt, 1911).

Gbl. Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten vv. 1-85 (Sinsheim, later Karlsruhe, 1870-).

Gem.-Kal. Mennonitischer Gemeinde-Kalender (formerly Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender) (various places, chiefly Kaiserslautern, Weierhof, Karlsruhe, 1892-).

Gesch.-Bl. Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter. Herausgegeben vom Mennonitischen Geschichtsverein (Frankfurt, later Karlsruhe, 1936-40, 1951-).

Grosheide, Bijdrage Greta Grosheide, Bijdrage tot de geschiedenis der Anabaptisten in Amsterdam (Hilversum, 1938).

Grosheide, Verhooren Verhooren en Vonissen der Wederdoopers, betrokken bij de aanslagen op Amsterdam in 1534 en 1535, in Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Historisch Genootschap, Vol. XLI (Amsterdam, 1920).

HRE Herzog-Hauck, Realencyclopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche, 24v. (3.ed., Leipzig, 1896-1913).

Inv. Arch. Amst. J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Inventaris der Archiefstukken berustende bij de Vereenigde Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Amsterdam, 2v. (Amsterdam, 1883-84).

Kühler, Geschiedenis I W. J. Kühler, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden in de Zestiende Eeuw (Haarlem, 1932).

Kühler, Geschiedenis II,1 Idem, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden in Nederland II. 1600-1735 Eerste Helft (Haarlem, 1940).

Kühler, Geschiedenis II,2 Idem, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden in Nederland: Gemeentelijk Leven 1650-1735 (Haarlem, 1950).

Lietboecxken Een Lietboecxken, tracterende van den Offer des Heeren, contained in Het Offer des Heeren (see Offer).

Loserth, Anabaptismus Johann Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892).

Loserth, Communismus Idem, Der Communismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert: Beiträge zu ihrer Lehre, Geschichte und Verfassung (Archiv für österreichische Geschichte, Vol. LXXXI, 1, 1895).

Mart. Mir. D(utch) Tileman Jansz van Braght, Het Bloedigh Tooneel of Martelaers Spiegel der Doops-gesinde of Weereloose Christenen, Die om 't getuygenis van Jesus haren Salighmaker geleden hebben ende gedood zijn van Christi tijd af tot desen tijd toe. Den Tweeden Druk (Amsterdam, 1685), Part II.

Mart. Mir. E(nglish) Idem, The Bloody Theatre or Martyrs' Mirror of the Defenseless Christians Who Baptized Only upon Confession of Faith and Who Suffered and Died for the Testimony of Jesus Their Saviour . . . to the Year A.D. 1660 (Scottdale, Pa., 1951).

ME Mennonite Encyclopedia (I, 1955; II, 1956; III, 1957; IV, 1958)

Mellink, Wederdopers A. F. Mellink, De Wederdopers in de noordelijke Nederlanden 1531-1544 (Groningen, 1954).

Menn. Bl. Mennonitische Blätter vv. 1-88 (1854-1941), published variously at Danzig, Hamburg-Altona, and Elbing (W. Prussia).

MHB Mennonite Historical Bulletin (Scottdale, Pa.; 1940-).

Menn. Life Mennonite Life (North Newton, Kan., 1946-).

ML Christian Hege and Christian Neff, Mennonitisches Lexikon, 3v., A-R (Frankfurt and Weierhof, I, 1913; II, 1937; III, #31-36, 1938-42; #37-39 at Karlsruhe, 1951-54) et seq.

Menno Simons, Opera Opera Omnia Theologica, of alle de Godtgeleerde wercken van Menno Simons (Amsterdam, 1681).

Menno Simons, Writings The Complete Writings of Menno Simons c. 1496-1561. Translated from the Dutch by Leonard Verduin (Scottdale, 1956).

MQR Mennonite Quarterly Review (Goshen, Ind., 1927-).

Müller, Berner Täufer Ernst Müller, Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer (Frauenfeld, 1895).

Naamlijst Naamlijst der tegenwoordig in dienst zijnde predikanten der Mennoniten in de vereenigde Nederlanden (Amsterdam, 1731, 1743, 1755, 1757, 1766, 1769, 1775, 1780, 1782, 1784, 1786, 1787, 1789, 1791, 1793, 1802, 1804, 1806, 1808, 1810, 1815, 1829).

N.N.B.Wb. P. C. Molhuysen and P. J. Blok, Nieuw Nederlandsch Biografisch Woordenboek vv. 1-10 (Leiden, 1911-37).

Offer Dit Boec wort genoemt: Het Offer des Herren, om het inhout van sommighe opgheofferde kinderen Godts . . . (n.p., 1562, 1567, 1570, 1578, 1580, Amsterdam, 1590, n.p., 1591, Amsterdam, 1595, Harlingen, 1599). The 1570 edition is cited as reproduced in BRN II, 51-486, including Een Lietboecxken, tracterende van den Offer des Heeren (pp. 499-617).

Reimer, Familiennamen Gustav E. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940).

Rembert, Wiedertäufer Karl Rembert, Die "Wiedertäufer" im Herzogtum Jülich (Berlin, 1899).

RGG Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (2.ed., 5v., Tübingen, 1927-32).

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis I Hermanus Schijn, Geschiedenis dier Christenen, welke in de Vereenigde Nederlanden onder de Protestanten Mennoniten genaamd worden . . . , Tweede Druk op nieuws uit het Latyn vertaald, en vermeerdert door Gerardus Maatschoen (Amsterdam, 1743).

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, which is volume II of the preceding work, entitled Uitvoeriger Verhandeling van de Geschiedenisse der Mennoniten (Amsterdam, 1744).

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, which is volume III of the preceding work, entitled Aanhangzel Dienende tot den Vervolg of Derde Deel van de Geschiedenis der Mennoniten . . . in het welke noch Negentien Leeraars der Mennoniten . . . , by Maatschoen alone (Amsterdam, 1745).

TA Baden-Pfalz M. Krebs, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer. IV. Band, Baden und Pfalz (Gütersloh, 1951).

TA Bayern I Karl Schornbaum, Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer II. Band, Markgraftum Brandenburg (Bayern I. Abteilung) (Leipzig, 1934).

TA Bayern II Idem, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer, V. Band (Bayern, II. Abteilung) (Gütersloh, 1951).

TA Hessen G. Franz, Urkundliche Quellen zur hessischen Reformationsgeschichte. Vierter Band, Wiedertäuferakten 1527-1626 (Marburg, 1951).

TA Württemberg G. Bossert, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer I. Band, Herzogtum Württemberg (Leipzig, 1930).

TA Zürich L. von Muralt und W. Schmid, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz. Erster Band Zürich (Zürich, 1952).

Verheyden, Brugge A. L. E. Verheyden, Het Brugsche Martyrologium (12 October 1527-7 Augustus 1573) (Brussels, n.d., [1944]).

Verheyden, Courtrai Idem, Le Martyrologe Courtraisien et la Martyrologe Bruxellois (Vilvorde, 1950).

Verheyden, Gent Idem, Het Gentsche Martyrologium (1530-1595) (Brugge, 1946).

Wackernagel, Kirchenlied Philipp Wackernagel, Das deutsche Kirchenlied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des XVII. Jahrhunderts, 5v. (Leipzig, 1864-77).

Wackernagel, Lieder Idem, Lieder der niederländischen Reformierten aus der Zeit der Verfolgung im 16. Jahrhundert (Frankfurt, 1867).

Wappler, Thüringen Paul Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913).

Wiswedel, Bilder W. Wiswedel, Bilder und Führergestalten aus dem Täufertum, 3v. (Kassel, I, 1928; II, 1930; III, 1952).

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch Rudolf Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch der Hutterischen Brüder (Macleod, Alta., and Vienna, 1923).

Wolkan, Lieder Idem, Die Lieder der Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1903).

Zieglschmid, Chronik A. J. F. Zieglschmid, Die älteste Chronik der Hutterischen Brüder: Ein Sprachdenkmal aus frühneuhochdeutscher Zeit (Ithaca, 1943).

Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch Idem, Das Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder (Philadelphia, 1947).

D. Other Symbols and Abbreviations

A.D.S. Algemene Doopsgezinde Societeit. MCC Mennonite Central Committee.

Vereinigung Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden.

Verband Verband badisch-württembergisch-bayrischer Mennonitengemeinden e. V.

CPS Civilian Public Service. KfK Kommission für kirchliche Angelegenheiten (or Kirchenangelegenheiten). CO Conscientious objector to military service.

q.v. "quod vide," "which see," is a cross-reference indicating that an article on the subject is to be found in the regular alphabetical order.

* signifies deceased. † indicates that an illustration will be found in the pictorial section at the end of the volume.

AML Amsterdam Mennonite Library

BeCL Bethel College Historical Library. GCL Goshen College Mennonite Historical Library.

MAPS AND ILLUSTRATIONS

The maps listed below will be found in the text next to the articles they serve. Illustrations are grouped at the end of each volume. For a complete list of illustrations in Volume III, see pp. 1 f. of pictorial supplement.

Alphabetical List of Maps, Volumes I—IV

Africa, Mennonite Missions
Alberta
Alexandertal Settlement, Samara, Russia
Allen and Putnam Counties, Ohio
Alsace, Upper, France
  Alternative Service Camps (following Civilian Public Service)
Amish, Old Order Communities
Argentina
  Asia, Central (following Siberia)
Austria, 16th Century Anabaptism
Barnaul Settlement, Siberia
Belgium, 16th Century Anabaptism
Bern Canton, Switzerland
Brazil and Adjacent Areas
British Columbia
Bucks and Montgomery Counties, Pa.
California
Canada
Caucasus, Russia
Chaco, Paraguay, Mennonite Colonies
Chicago, Illinois
China, Mennonite Missions
Chortitza Settlement, Russia
Church of God in Christ, Mennonite
Civilian Public Service, Mennonite, U.S.A.
Alternative Service, Mennonite, Canada
Congo, Belgian, Mennonite Missions
Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church
Cottonwood County, Minnesota
Danzig, Free City of Delaware (with Maryland)
East Reserve Settlement, Manitoba
Elkhart and Lagrange Counties, Indiana
Emmental Region, Switzerland
Europe, Anabaptism in 1550
European Mennonitism in 1938
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren and Evangelical Mennonites
Far East, Mennonitism
France
Fraser River Valley, British Columbia
Friesland, Province, Netherlands
Galicia
General Conference Mennonite Church, North America
Germany, West (in two parts)
Groningen, Province, Netherlands
Harvey County, Kansas, and Adjacent Area
Holmes County, Ohio
Hutterites in Canada and U.S.A. (two maps)
Hutterites in Moravia, Slovakia, and Transylvania
Hutterites in Moravia (1530-1622)
Hutterites in Slovakia
Hutterites in Ukraine
  Idaho (with Washington)
Illinois
India, Mennonite Missions and Churches
Indiana
Indonesia
Iowa
Japan
Johnson, Iowa, Washington, and Henry Counties, Iowa
Kansas
Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church
Lancaster County, Pennsylvania
Luxembourg
Manitoba
Maryland and Delaware
Memrik Settlement, Russia
Mennonite Brethren Church, N.A.
Mennonite Church, North America
Mexico, Mennonite Settlements
Michigan
Mifflin County, Pennsylvania
Missouri
Molotschna Settlement, Russia
  Montana (with Washington)
Nebraska
Netherlands (in two parts)
New York
North Holland, Province, Netherlands
Ohio
Oklahoma
Ontario
  Oregon (with Washington)
Orenburg Settlement, Russia
Palatinate, Germany
Paraguay
Pennsylvania
Rockingham County, Virginia
Russia, European
San Joaquin Valley, California
Saskatchewan
Siberia
Somerset County, Pennsylvania, and Garret County, Maryland
South America
South Dakota, Eastern
Switzerland, 16th Century Anabaptism
Tazewell, Woodford, and McLean Counties, Illinois
Terek Settlement, Russia
Trakt Settlement, Russia
Ukraine, Russia
United States, All Mennonites
Virginia
Volga Region, Russia
Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana
Waterloo County, Ontario
Wayne County, Ohio
West and East Prussia, Germany, and Poland
West Reserve Settlement, Manitoba
Württemberg, Baden, and Bavaria, Ger.
Zagradovka Settlement, Russia

KEY TO SYMBOLS FOR WRITERS IN VOLUME III

Amstutz, Daniel, Biel, Sw.	D.A.
Amstutz, H. Clair, Goshen, Ind.	H.C.A.
Amstutz-Tschirren, A. J., Oberbütschel, Sw.	A.-T.
Andres, Mrs. H. J., Newton, Kan.	J.S.A.
Augsburger, Myron S., Harrisonburg, Va.	M.S.A.
Bachman, Leland, Goshen, Ind.	L.A.B.
*Bachmann, Arnold, Lemberg, Poland	A.Ba.
Baker, M. L., Cremona, Alta.	M.L.B.
Bargen, Bernhard, North Newton, Kan.	B.B.
*Bartsch, Franz, Russia	F.B.
Bean, Dorothy, Chicago, Ill.	D.Be.
Bean, E. W., Lehighton, Pa.	E.W.B.
Bear, Paul E., Scranton, Pa.	P.E.B.
Beck, Carl C., Obihiro, Japan	C.C.B.
Becker, Eduard, Darmstadt, Ger.	E.Be.
Bender, E. C., Martinsburg, Pa.	E.C.B.
Bender, H. S., Goshen, Ind.	H.S.B.
Bender, Mrs. H. S., Goshen, Ind.	E.H.B.
Bender, Mary Eleanor, Goshen, Ind.	M.E.B.
Berg, P. H., Hillsboro, Kan.	P.H.B.
*Bergmann, Cornelius, Jena, Ger.	C.B.
Bixler, Allen, Dalton, Ohio	A.Bix.
Bixler, Annie, Dalton, Ohio	A.Bi.
*Block, Theodor, Oberursel, Ger.	T.B.
Bontreger, Eli J., Shipshewana, Ind.	E.J.B.
*Bossert, G., Sr., Stuttgart, Ger.	G.Bo.
*Bossert, G., Jr., Stuttgart, Ger.	G.Bos.
Brackbill, Mrs. Maurice, Harrisonburg, Va.	R.M.B.
Braun, Abraham, Nierstein, Ger.	A.B.
Brenneman, Virgil J., Iowa City, Iowa	V.J.B.
Brubacher, Ada, Goshen, Ind.	A.Br.
Brubaker, J. Protus, Edwards, Mo.	J.P.Br.
Brunk, Harry A., Harrisonburg, Va.	H.A.B.
Bucher, Samuel J., Harman, W.Va.	S.J.B.
Buller, Vernon H., Huron, S.D.	V.H.B.
Burkholder, Harold D., Dallas, Ore.	H.D.B.
Byler, J. N., Akron, Pa.	J.N.B.
Carper, Mrs. Reuben, Denbigh, Va.	E.W.C.
Cattepoel, Dirk, Düsseldorf, Ger.	D.C.
Cernohorsky, Karel, Troppau, Czechoslovakia	K.C.
Chester, Edward N., Zephyr, Ont.	E.N.C.
Claassen, Willard, Newton, Kan.	W.C.
Classen, Mrs. Jonas, West Liberty, Ohio	M.B.C.
Coblentz, Simon, Uniontown, Ohio	S.C.
*Coffman, S. F., Vineland, Ont.	S.F.C.
Correll, Ernst, Washington, D.C.	E.H.C.
Cressman, J. Boyd, Kitchener, Ont.	J.B.C.
Crous, Ernst, Göttingen, Ger.	E.C.
Decker, David, Olivet, S.D.	D.D.
Dedels, G. W., Sundre, Alta.	G.W.D.
*Dedic, P., Graz, Austria	P.De.
DeWind, Henry A., Whitewater, Wis.	DeWind
Dick, A. A., Mountain Lake, Minn.	A.A.D.
Dick, Abram J., Winnipeg, Man.	A.J.Di.
Dick, Henry H., Lodi, Cal.	He.H.D.
Dick, I. J., Mountain Lake, Minn.	I.J.D.
Dick, John R., Omaha, Neb.	J.R.D.
Diener, Harry A., Hutchinson, Kan.	H.A.D.
Diller, Samuel J., Maugansville, Md.	S.J.D.
Doerksen, J. J., Abbotsford, B.C.	J.J.D.
Dollinger, Robert, Weiden, Ger.	R.Do.
*Driedger, A., Heubuden, Ger.	A.D.
Driedger, N. N., Leamington, Ont.	N.N.D.
Driver, H. A., Wauseon, Ohio	H.A.Dr.
Duerksen, Jacob A., Washington, D.C.	Ja.A.D.
Duerksen, Peter, Neuland, Pa.	P.Du.
Dyck, Arnold, Darlaten, Ger.	Ar.D.
Dyck, Cornelius J., Chicago, Ill.	C.J.D.
Dyck, J. A., Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ont.	J.A.D.
Dyck, Jakob, Korntal, Ger.	J.Dy.
Ebrard, Friedrich August, Zürich, Sw.	F.A.E.
Eby, Gladys, Didsbury, Alta.	Gl.E.
Ediger, Elmer, North Newton, Kan.	E.Ed.
Ediger, Peter J., Fresno, Cal.	P.J.E.
Ediger, Walter O., Hutchinson, Kan.	W.O.E.
Eitzen, David D., Rolling Hills, Cal.	D.D.E.
Emmert, Donald R., Monroe, Wash.	D.R.E.
Enns, J. H., Winnipeg, Man.	J.H.En.
Ens, Gerhard, Gretna, Man.	G.En.
Entz, J. E., Newton, Kan.	J.E.E.
Enz, Jacob J., Chicago, Ill.	J.J.En.
Epp, A. W., Fairview, Okla.	A.W.E.
Epp, Arnold, Newton, Kan.	A.Ep.
*Epp, David H., Chortitza, Russia	D.H.E.
Epp, J. H., Hepburn, Sask.	J.H.E.
Erb, Allen H., Lebanon, Ore.	A.H.E.
Erb, Paul, Scottdale, Pa.	P.E.
Esh, Glenn, Akron, Pa.	G.Es.
Ewert, John L., Meade, Kan.	J.L.E.
Fast, Henry A., Newton, Kan.	H.A.F.
Fast, J. W., Fairview, Okla.	J.W.Fa.
Fellmann, Walter, Mönchzell, Ger.	W.F.
Foth, Johannes, Friedelsheim, Ger.	J.F.
Fretz, Clarence Y., Harrisonburg, Va.	C.Y.F.
*Fretz, J. C., Kitchener, Ont.	J.C.F.
Fretz, J. Herbert, Freeman, S.D.	J.H.F.
Fretz, J. Winfield, N. Newton, Kan.	J.W.F.
Friedmann, Robert, Kalamazoo, Mich.	R.F.
Friesen, Jacob T., Bluffton, Ohio	J.T.F.
Friesen, J. John, Butterfield, Minn.	J.J.F.
*Froese, John P., Winnipeg, Man.	J.P.F.
Gaeddert, Gustav R., N. Newton, Kan.	G.R.G.
Galle, Christian, Weierhof, Ger.	C.G.
Gampp, Harvey, Baden, Ont.	H.Ga.
Garber, E. S., Nampa, Idaho	E.S.G.
Garber, Robert E., Nampa, Idaho	R.E.G.
Gehman, R. H., Newark, N.J.	R.H.G.
Geiser, Samuel, Brügg, Sw.	S.G.
Gerbrandt, H. J., Altona, Man.	H.J.G.
Gerbrandt, J., Saskatoon, Sask.	J.G.
Gerig, Jared F., Fort Wayne, Ind.	J.F.Ge.
Giesbrecht, Gerhard B., Filadelfia, Par.	G.B.G.
Gingerich, J. C., Dagmar, Mont.	J.C.G.
Gingerich, Leroy, Versailles, Mo.	L.G.
Gingerich, Melvin, Goshen, Ind.	M.G.
Gingerich, Simon, Wayland, Iowa	S.Gi.
Gingrich, Arthur, Markstay, Ont.	A.Gi.
Gingrich, J. E., Johnstown, Pa.	J.E.G.
Glanzer, Paul J., Saint Lawrence, S.D.	P.J.G.
*Göbel, Gustav, Weierhof, Ger.	G.Go.
Goering, Peter W., Lehigh, Kan.	P.W.G.
Goerz, H., Vancouver, B.C.	H.G.

Golterman, W. F., Amsterdam, Neth.	W.F.G.
Good, Abram, Wadsworth, Ohio	Ab.G.
Good, Noah G., Lancaster, Pa.	N.G.
*Göttner, Erich, Danzig, Ger.	Er.G.
Graber, J. D., Elkhart, Ind.	J.D.G.
Gramberg, K. P. C. A., Rotterdam, Neth.	K.P.G.
Gratz, Delbert L., Bluffton, Ohio	D.L.G.
Graybill, J. Silas, Doylestown, Pa.	J.S.G.
Grout, Arcie, Ferndale, Wash.	A.Gr.
Grove, Paul H., Ringwood, Ont.	P.H.Gr.
Grunau, P. C., Enid, Okla.	P.C.G.
Guengerich, L. Glen, Wellman, Iowa	L.G.G.
Guengerich, Paul T., Parnell, Iowa	P.T.G.
Haarer, Paul W., Howe, Ind.	P.W.H.
*Habegger, Alfred, Lame Deer, Mont.	A.H.
*Hallman, Eli S., Akron, Pa.	E.S.H.
Hallman, H. W., Queensville, Ont.	H.W.Ha.
Hamm, H. H., Altona, Man.	H.H.H.
Harder, Bernhard, Hanau, Ger.	B.H.
Harder, H. N., Bloomington, Ill.	H.N.H.
Harder, J. A., Yarrow, B.C.	J.A.Ha.
Harder, Menno S., N. Newton, Kan.	M.S.H.
Harms, Orlando, Hillsboro, Kan.	O.Ha.
Hartzler, H. Harold, Goshen, Ind.	H.H.Har.
Hartzler, Levi C., Elkhart, Ind.	L.C.H.
Hartzler, Raymond L., Bloomington, Ill.	R.L.H.
*Hege, Christian, Frankfurt, Ger.	Hege
*Hege, Otto, Frankfurt, Ger.	O.H.
Hein, Gerhard, Sembach, Ger.	G.H.
Hershberger, Mrs. Elmer D., Detroit Lakes, Minn.	E.D.He.
Hershberger, Erwin N., Meyersdale, Pa.	E.N.H.
Hershberger, Guy F., Goshen, Ind.	G.F.H.
*Hertzler, Richard, Ludwigshafen, Ger.	R.He.
Hertzler, Silas, Goshen, Ind.	Si.H.
Hiebert, Clarence, Enid, Okla.	C.H.
Hiebert, P. C., Hillsboro, Kan.	P.C.H.
Hiebert, P. G., Atmore, Ala.	P.G.H.
Hochstetler, John G., Creston, Mont.	J.G.H.
Holdeman, Harvey, Bonners Ferry, Idaho	H.Hol.
Hooley, Orvin H., Burr Oak, Mich.	O.H.H.
Hoover, N. O., Bloomington, Ill.	N.O.H.
Horn, Delmer J., Niles, Mich.	D.J.H.
Horst, Irvin B., Harrisonburg, Va.	I.B.H.
Horst, John L., Scottdale, Pa.	J.L.H.
Horst, Moses K., Maugansville, Md.	M.K.H.
Horst, Rufus P., Kansas City, Kan.	R.P.H.
Horst, S. J., South English, Iowa	S.J.H.
Hostetler, D. M., Lowpoint, Ill.	D.M.H.
Hostetler, Jake H., Mishawaka, Ind.	J.H.H.
Hostetler, John A., Scottdale, Pa.	J.A.H.
Hostetler, S. J., Elkhart, Ind.	S.J.Ho.
Hostetter, D. Ralph, Harrisonburg, Va.	D.R.H.
Hovens Greve, K., Amsterdam, Neth.	K.Ho.
*Hübert, Johann, Margokerto, Java	J.H.
Huebert, G. D., Winnipeg, Man.	G.D.H.
Huffman, J. A., Winona Lake, Ind.	J.A.Hu.
*Hylkema, C. B., Haarlem, Neth.	C.B.H.
Isaac, Mrs. F. J., Newton, Kan.	A.E.I.
Isaak, Mrs. F. F., Winnipeg, Man.	A.J.I.
Isaak, Jakob, Fernheim, Par.	J.I.
Jansson, A., Tiege, East Prussia, Ger.	A.J.
Jantzen, G. H., Dallas, Ore.	G.H.J.
Janzen, A. E., Hillsboro, Kan.	A.E.J.
Janzen, Cornelius C., Winnipegosis, Man.	C.C.J.
*Janzen, Heinrich, Waterloo, Ont.	H.J.
Janzen, H. H., Winnipeg, Man.	H.H.J.
Janzen, Samuel, Glenwood Springs, Col.	S.J.
Jeltes, H. F. W., The Hague, Neth.	H.F.W.J.
Johnson, Jesse, Galva, Kan.	J.Jo.
Jost, Arthur, Reedley, Cal.	A.Jo.
Just, L. R., Fresno, Cal.	L.R.J.
Kaap, T. F., Bluffton, Ohio	T.F.K.
Kauenhoven, Kurt, Göttingen, Ger.	K.K.
Kauffman, Clyde X., Brutus, Mich.	C.X.K.
Kauffman, Floyd, Minot, N.D.	F.E.K.
Kauffman, J. Howard, Goshen, Ind.	J.H.Ka.
Kauffman, Nelson E., Elkhart, Ind.	N.E.K.
Kauffman, Orie, White Pigeon, Mich.	Or.K.
Kauffmann, Ivan J., Hopedale, Ill.	I.K.
*Kaufman, Ammon, Davidsville, Pa.	A.Ka.
Kaufman, Ed. G., N. Newton, Kan.	E.G.K.
Kaufman, J. N., E. Peoria, Ill.	J.N.K.
Kaufman, Orlo, Gulfport, Miss.	O.K.
Kennel, LeRoy E., Lombard, Ill.	L.E.K.
Kern, Anton, Graz, Austria	A.Ke.
King, S. M., Goshen, Ind.	S.M.K.
Kitchin, Jason, Cass City, Mich.	J.Ki.
*Klaassen, Johann, Heilbronn, Ger.	J.Kl.
*Klassen, C. F., Abbotsford, B.C.	C.F.K.
*Kliewer, Fritz, Witmarsum, Brazil	F.K.
Kliewer, Henry A., Tuba City, Ariz.	H.A.K.
Klockenbrink, F. H., Jr., Amsterdam, Neth.	F.H.K.
Koehn, J. A., Livingston, Cal.	J.A.K.
*Köhler, Walther, Heidelberg, Ger.	W.K.
Konrad, Gerhard A., Matsqui, B.C.	G.A.K.
Kopper, Gerhard, Montau, Ger.	G.K.
Kopper, George W., Monroe, Wash.	G.W.K.
Krabill, Russell, Goshen, Ind.	R.Kr.
Krahn, Cornelius, N. Newton, Kan.	C.K.
Kraus, C. Norman, Goshen, Ind.	C.N.K.
Krehbiel, Olin A., Berne, Ind.	O.A.K.
Krehbiel, Walter Henry, Reedley, Cal.	W.H.Kr.
Kreider, A. E., Goshen, Ind.	A.E.K.
Kreider, Jacob L., Lancaster, Pa.	J.L.K.
Kreider, John F., Palmyra, Mo.	J.F.Kr.
*Kroeker, A. J., Mountain Lake, Minn.	A.J.K.
Kuyf, Wilhelmina, Newton, Kan.	W.Ku.
Landis, Ira D., Bareville, Pa.	I.D.L.
*Lapp, George J., Goshen, Ind.	G.J.L.
Lapp, John E., Lansdale, Pa.	J.E.L.
Lederach, Paul M., Scottdale, Pa.	P.M.L.
Leendertz, J. M., Hoog Soeren, Neth.	J.M.L.
Leendertz, W., Santport, Neth.	W.Le.
Lehman, Earl, Goshen, Ind.	E.Le.
Lehman, Sylvan, Lima, Ohio	S.Le.
Leinbach, Oscar, Clark Lake, Mich.	O.L.
Leisy, Mrs. E. E., Dallas, Tex.	E.K.L.
Loewen, J. J., Justice, Man.	J.J.L.
Lohrenz, G., Winnipeg, Man.	G.L.
Lohrenz, J. H., Hughestown, Hyderabad, India	J.H.L.
*Loosjes, J., Bussum, Neth.	J.L.
*Loserth, Johann, Graz, Austria	Loserth
McBrier, Robert, Nappanee, Ind.	R.McB.
Martin, J. E., Harrisonburg, Va.	J.E.M.
Mast, C. Z., Elverson, Pa.	C.Z.M.
Matthijssen, Jan, Pati, Java	J.M.
Mendel, John S., Chicago, Ill.	J.S.M.
Metzler, A. J., Scottdale, Pa.	A.J.M.
Mierau, Hugo J., Danvers, Ill.	H.J.M.
Miller, Clara, Ithaca, Mich.	C.M.

Miller, Daniel E., Hubbard, Ore.	D.E.M.
Miller, D. Paul, Mankato, Minn.	D.P.M.
Miller, Enos, Amboy, Ind.	E.Mi.
Miller, Ivan J., Grantsville, Md.	I.J.M.
Miller, L. A., Arthur, Ill.	L.A.M.
*Miller, L. C., Manitou Cprings, Col.	L.C.M.
Miller, Percy J., Lagrange, Ind.	P.J.M.
Miller, S. J., Grabill, Ind.	S.J.M.
Mitchell, Frank R., Meadows, Ill.	F.R.M.
*Momber, Wilhelm, Berlin, Ger.	W.M.
Mosemann, John H., Goshen, Ind.	J.H.M.
Moyer, S. T., Jagdeeshpore, India	S.T.M.
Müller, Daniel, Prehof, Ger.	D.M.
*Neff, Christian, Weierhof, Ger.	Neff
*Nelson, T. U., Newaygo, Mich.	T.U.N.
Neuenschwander, A. J., Wadsworth, Ohio	A.J.N.
Neufeld, Herman, Vancouver, B.C.	H.Ne.
Neufeld, I. G., Fresno, Cal.	I.G.N.
Neufeld, P. T., Inman, Kan.	P.T.N.
Nice, Aaron D., Morrison, Ill.	A.D.N.
Nickel, Elizabeth, Hillsboro, Kan.	E.N.
Nickel, J. D., Rosemary, Alta.	J.D.N.
Niepoth, Wilhelm, Crefeld, Ger.	W.N.
*Nijdam, C., Amsterdam, Neth.	C.N.
North, Homer F., Nappanee, Ind.	H.F.N.
Nussbaum, Nathan, New Castle, Pa.	N.N.
Oswald, Walter E., Goshen, Ind.	W.E.O.
Oswald, Mrs. Walter E., Goshen, Ind.	N.O.
Pankratz, Peter, West Salem, Ore.	P.Pa.
Pannabecker, S. F., Chicago, Ill.	S.F.P.
*Pauls, H., Elbing, Ger.	H.Pa.
Pauls, Wilhelm, Didsbury, Alta.	W.P.
Peachey, Aaron J., Rittman, Ohio	A.J.P.
Pellman, Hubert R., Harrisonburg, Va.	H.R.Pe.
Penner, Henry D., Medford, Okla.	H.D.P.
Penner, Johann Peter, Rosemary, Alta.	J.P.P.
Penner, John I., Kleefeld, Man.	J.I.P.
*Penner, P. W., Hillsboro, Kan.	P.W.P.
Priddle, H. R., Palmerston, Ont.	H.R.P.
Quiring, Horst, Korntal, Ger.	H.Q.
Quiring, Walter, Rosthern, Sask.	W.Q.
Rahn, Ben, Inman, Kan.	B.R.
Redekop, H. H., Winkler, Man.	H.H.R.
Regehr, J. I., Main Centre, Sask.	J.I.R.
*Regehr, Peter, Talma, Russia	P.R.
*Regier, D. A., Mountain Lake, Minn.	D.A.R.
Regier, Walter H., Clinton, Okla.	W.H.R.
Reiff, V. E., Elkhart, Ind.	V.E.R.
Reimer, David P., Giroux, Man.	D.P.R.
Reimer, D. J., Morden, Man.	D.J.R.
Reimer, Elmer, Jansen, Neb.	E.R.
Reimer, P. J. B., Rosenort, Man.	P.J.B.R.
Reist, H. F., Premont, Texas	H.F.R.
Rembert, Karl, Crefeld, Ger.	K.R.
Rempel, Alexander, Göttingen, Ger.	A.R.
Rempel, Hans, Neuland, Par.	H.Re.
Rempel, J. G., Saskatoon, Sask.	J.G.R.
Reusser, James, Dalton, Ohio	J.Re.
Risler, Walter, Crefeld, Ger.	W.Ri.
*Risser, John D., Hagerstown, Md.	J.D.R.
Roth, Paul M., Masontown, Pa.	P.M.R.
Roth, Roy D., Hesston, Kan.	R.D.R.
*Rupp, Jakob, Lemberg, Poland	J.Ru.
Ruth, Arthur D., Souderton, Pa.	A.D.R.
Schaefer, P. J., Gretna, Man.	P.J.S.
Schantz, Irwin, Loman, Minn.	I.S.
*Schertz, H. R., Metamora, Ill.	H.R.S.
Schlegel, L. O., Milford, Neb.	L.O.S.
Schlegel, Wilfred, London, Ont.	W.Sc.
Schmidt, H. U., Meno, Okla.	H.U.S.
Schmidt, John F., N. Newton, Kan.	J.F.S.
Schmidt, Sam J., Marion, S.D.,	S.J.S.
*Schmitt, Hermann, Deutschhof, Ger.	H.Sc.
Schowalter, Otto, Hamburg, Ger.	O.S.
Schowalter, Paul, Weierhof, Ger.	P.S.
Schrag, M. Gordon, Goshen, Ind.	M.G.S.
Schrag, Martin H., Goshen, Ind.	M.H.S.
Schrag, Menno, Newton, Kan.	M.S.
Schrag, Robert, Newton, Kan.	R.Sc.
Schrock, Alta E., Goshen, Ind.	A.E.S.
Schultz, J. S., Bluffton, Ohio	J.S.Sc.
Schutter, G. N., Sappemeer, Neth.	G.N.S.
Shank, Lester C., Harrisonburg, Va.	L.C.S.
Shantz, Sidney S., Hanover, Ont.	S.S.S.
Shelly, Maynard, Newton, Kan.	M. Sh.
Shelly, Paul R., Bluffton, Ohio	P.R.S.
Shelly, Wilmer S., Hereford, Pa.	W.S.S.
Sherk, J. Harold, Akron, Pa.	J.Ha.S.
*Showalter, Timothy, Broadway, Va.	T.S.
Shultz, Lawrence W., Milford, Ind.	L.W.Sh.
Smith, Lena Mae, Newton, Kan.	L.M.S.
Smith, Tilman R., Eureka, Ill.	T.R.S.
Smith, Willard H., Goshen, Ind.	W.H.S.
Smucker, Don. E., Chicago, Ill.	D.E.S.
Smucker, J. N., Goshen, Ind.	J.N.S.
Snyder, M. S., Salem, Ore.	M.S.S.
Snyder, W. T., Akron, Pa.	W.T.S.
*Sommer, Pierre, Grand Charmont, Fr.	P.So.
Springer, N. P., Goshen, Ind.	N.P.S.
Sprunger, Elda, Berne, Ind.	E.Sp.
Sprunger, Mrs. Ira H., Berne, Ind.	A.H.S.
Stahly, Delmar, Akron, Pa.	D.S.
Stahly, Ralph, Wakarusa, Ind.	R.St.
Starkey, J. B., New Market, Iowa	J.B.St.
Stauffer, Elam W., Musoma, Tanganyika, Africa	E.W.S.
*Stauffer, Ezra, Tofield, Alta.	E.S.
Steiner, E. G., Berne, Ind.	E.G.St.
Steiner, James A., Wadsworth. Ohio	J.A.S.
Steingard, Henry, Meade, Kan.	H.St.
Stoll, Henry J., Rensselaer, Ind.	H.J.St.
Stoltzfus, Abner G., Kinzers, Pa.	A.G.S.
Stoltzfus, Grant M., Harrisonburg, Va.	G.M.S.
Stoltzfus, LeRoy S., Bird-in-Hand, Pa.	L.S.S.
Stoneback, George S., Wichita, Kan.	G.S.S.
Storms, Everek R., Kitchener, Ont.	E.R.S.
Stucky, Gerald, Cachipay, Colombia	G.S.
Stucky, Harley J., N. Newton, Kan.	H.J.S.
Stucky, Walter, West Unity, Ohio	W.S.
Suderman, J. M., Newton, Kan.	J.M.S.
Swartzendruber, A. Lloyd, Kalona, Iowa	A.L.S.
Swartzendruber, Harold L., Goshen, Ind.	H.L.S.
Swartzendruber, Maude, La Junta, Col.	M.Sw.
Swope, Wilmer D., Leetonia, Ohio	W.D.S.
Taylor, Albert, New Carlisle, Ohio	A.Ta.
*Teufel, Eberhard, Stuttgart-Fellbach, Ger.	E.T.
Tgahrt, E., West Prussia, Ger.	E.Tg.
Thiessen, J. J., Saskatoon, Sask.	J.J.Th.
Thiessen, John, Newton, Kan.	J.T.
Thomann, David E., Jersey City, N.J.	D.E.T.
*Tilitzky, C. G., Abbotsford, B.C.	C.G.T.
Toews, A. A., N. Clearbrook, B.C.	A.A.T.

Toews, A. R., Windom, Kan.	A.R.T.
Toews, C. W., Linden, Alta.	C.W.T.
Toews, H. P., Winnipeg, Man.	H.P.T.
Toews, Jacob J., Kitchener, Ont.	J.J.T.
Toews, John A., Winnipeg, Man.	Jo.A.T.
Toews, J. W., Linden, Alta.	J.W.T.
Toews, Peter P., Dresden, N.D.	P.T.
Troyer, David J.,	D.J.T.
Troyer, L. E., Meadows, Ill.	L.E.T.
Tschetter, John P., Lewellen, Neb.	J.P.T.
Umble, John S., Goshen, Ind.	J.S.U.
Ummel, Samuel, Peoria, Ill.	S.U.
Unger, J. J., Kelowna, B.C.	J.J.U.
Unruh, Abe J., Montezuma, Kan.	A.U.
Unruh, Albert, Montezuma, Kan.	A.Un.
Unruh, J. D., Freeman, S.D.	J.D.U.
Unruh, N. H., St. Elizabeth, Man.	N.H.U.
*Vos, Karel, Middelstum, Neth.	K.V.
Wagley, Paul E., Marshall, Mich.	P.E.Wa.
Wall, P. F., Downey, Cal.	P.F.W.
Waltner, Erland, N. Newton, Kan.	E.W.
Warkentin, G. J., Dundurn, Sask.	G.J.W.
Warkentin, Peter J., Tofield, Alta.	P. J. Wa.
*Warns, J., Wiedenest, Ger.	J.Wa.
Weaver, Norman, Gulliver, Mich.	N.We.
Weber, L. S., Scottdale, Pa.	L.S.W.
Wedel, C. C., Montezuma, Kan.	C.C.W.
Wenger, A. D., Fentress, Va.	A.D.W.
Wenger, Mrs. A. D., Fentress, Va.	L.H.We.
Wenger, J. C., Goshen, Ind.	J.C.W.
Widmer, Liesel, Bergzabern, Ger.	L.W.
Wiebe, Alfred, Seiling, Okla.	A.Wi.
Wiebe, Arthur J., Reedley, Cal.	A.J.W.
Wiebe, David V., Hillsboro, Kan.	D.V.W.
Wiebe, John A., Mountain Lake, Minn.	J.A.W.
Wiebe, Orlando H., Omaha, Neb.	O.H.W.
Wiebe, Willard W., Mountain Lake, Minn.	W.W.W.
Wiens, H. E., Mountain Lake, Minn.	H.E.W.
Wiens, Henry P., Lustre, Mont.	H.P.W.
Wiens, J. B., Vancouver, B.C.	J.B.W.
Wiswedel, Wilhelm, Bayreuth, Ger.	W.W.
Witmer, H. Howard, Manheim, Pa.	H.H.W.
Woelke, O., Düsseldorf, Ger.	O.W.
Wyse, Ora C., Naubinway, Mich.	O.C.W.
*Yntema, J., Haarlem, Neth.	J.Y.
Yoder, Edward, Kansas City, Kan.	Ed.Y.
Yoder, Gideon G., Hesston, Kan.	G.G.Y.
Yoder, Glen, Kansas City, Kan.	G.Y.
Yoder, J. J., Jr., Belleville, Pa.	J.J.Y.
Yoder, John Miller, Parnell, Iowa	J.M.Y.
Yoder, Noah, Choteau, Okla.	N.Y.
Yoder, Paul R., Columbiana, Ohio	P.R.Y.
Yoder, Sam E., Crestview, Tenn.	S.E.Y.
Yost, A. L., Moundridge, Kan.	A.L.Y.
Zehr, B. F., Croghan, N.Y.	B.F.Z.
*Zehr, Edmund P., Beatrice, Neb.	E.P.Z.
Zehr, Harold, Rantoul, Ill.	H.Z.
Zehr, Noah, Middlebury, Ind.	N.Z.
Zijpp, N. van der, Rotterdam, Neth.	vdZ.
Zimmerman, E. E., Peoria, Ill.	E.E.Z.
Zook, Ellrose D., Scottdale, Pa.	E.D.Z.

THE MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA

I

Ibersheim (Yberscheim, Uebersheim), a village in Rheinhessen, Germany, near the Rhine, about eight miles north of Worms, formerly called Ibersheimer Hof. On a map of 1752 it is designated as "Wiedertaufhof."

The time of the coming of the first Anabaptists cannot be ascertained; they stemmed from the region of Bern, Switzerland, and probably came after the Thirty Years' War, likely in the 1650's. The land had been devastated and depopulated by the war. The great electoral estates in and around Ibersheim had been abandoned. The immigrant Mennonites were welcomed as capable farmers to reclaim this land. It was to the advantage of the Ibersheim Mennonites that they received 12-year leases of the crown estates from the elector, giving them a different status from the other Mennonite congregations.

The Ibersheim estate, which was leased as a whole to the Mennonites, was divided among them into 6 parts, later into 12, and finally into 24 still recognizable parts. To it the neighboring villages, Hamm, Eich, Gimbsheim, Alsheim, Osthofen, and Westhofen, owed feudal service. The Mennonites did not exact this service, and the French abolished it during their occupation of the region (1793-1816). In 1816 Ibersheim passed into Hessian control, and in 1822 it became an independent village. Its first mayor was Johannes Forrer (1822-37).

Ibersheim is probably the oldest of the Mennonite churches established after the Thirty Years' War in the Palatinate west of the Rhine. In 1661—three years before the first general Mennonite "Concession"—the inhabitants of Ibersheim had been accepted as subjects of the Palatinate. Upon this Concession all subsequent decisions and measures by the government concerning the Mennonites were based. It states: "That they may for the sake of their faith, for which they are not to be molested, hold no public or private meetings or conventicles attended by others that do not live on the estate, much less attract and mislead others of our subjects." The church chronicle of 1683 makes the first mention of a rental contract.

The charge was soon made that they abused the elector's grace. In May 1671 Inspector and Dean Johannes Jakob Löffler of Osthofen accused them of having baptized a member of the Reformed Church. Investigation revealed that a Jakob Weber, whose grandparents had, however, been Mennonites, had indeed been baptized. The congregation at Ibersheim was fined 100 Talers. They were now secretly but closely watched to note any transgressions against the Concession of 1664. It was observed that 50-100 Mennonites attended their services, whereas the Concession allowed only 20 to meet together. Upon a petition signed by all the Mennonites in the Oberamt of Alzey it was decided to modify the wording to permit 20 families instead of 20 persons.

In the contract of lease of 1683, renewed in 1745, 1753, and 1762, ten names occur: Heinrich Neff (Trieb has "Neef"); Konrad Hiestand; Hans Jakob Forrer; Heinrich Gochnauer; Hans Jakob Brubacher; Jakob Dentlinger; Hans Leitweller; Peter Opmann; Heinrich Reif, and Ulrich Hagmann's widow. In 1745 there are 24 lessees listed. On the other hand the list of names required by the Palatine government contains 32 names of renters, and that of 1743 the same number, with a total of 170 persons. Of especial value is the register of 1752, which contains important family names (court records of the Karlsruhe Generallandesarchiv). According to a Dutch register there were in Ibersheim in 1732, 56 Mennonite families. (Müller, 212.)

An attempt made by the officer Zachmann of Alzey to have the Mennonites of Ibersheim treated exactly like those in Kriegsheim, Niederflörsheim, Heppenheim, Dackenheim, and Wolfsheim failed. The Ibersheim residents referred to their contract and letter of Concession. The official in charge reported to Zachmann that he was convinced that they were not mere renters, but had their own possessions and domicile. Thus the Mennonites of Ibersheim must have had the right of ownership as early as 1685; this was nowhere else the case in the Palatinate. This official was apparently favorable toward the Mennonites. His letter of 1685 to the elector states, "Everyone must give them the testimonial that they live quietly and peaceably, live in harmony with their neighbors, and have proven themselves more industrious than others, obedient to the government, true and constant in all things."

During the tribulations of the French attack on the Palatinate in 1697 the Ibersheim Mennonites paid the contributions levied by the French. In 1711 they were to be drafted as guards and for military service, but upon their petition a decision was passed on Jan. 27, 1712, confirming their rights to exemption from military service. They repeatedly paid their exemption tax of 12 fl. per head, but were then released from the obligation. In 1742 this tax was again considered and debated over several decades on the ground that only those who leased the land were exempt, and not any later arrivals; furthermore the original number of 20 families had increased to 30. There was also some difficulty in connection with the burial of their dead in the community cemetery, but this was also settled in their favor.

Divine services were at first held in private homes. Later a special room was used for this purpose, described by the Lutheran tutor of the van der Smissen family in Altona, who visited Ibersheim in 1782 with his wards, as follows: "In the lower story of a two-story house is the school, which looked very handsome, clean, and orderly. Above to the right is a little room in which the schoolmaster lives, and to the left the room . . . for the meeting of preachers and elders before the service. Adjoining these rooms is the meeting-hall, which, in addition to the good points in its arrangement, has the defect of being very low. It is evident from the style of the building that the Mennonites built it soon after their arrival here."

The present church was built in 1836. It is the only Mennonite church in South Germany with tower and bell. The church record states, "The new church stands on the site of the old one, but the former church opened on the street, whereas the new one has windows on that side. On the lower floor was the school and a brewery, on the upper the church; but later on the lower floor was used as a church, and the former church became a school and council room. In 1822 the present organ was bought; previously the congregation had not used an organ to accompany its hymns." On Feb. 11, 1866, two new bells were dedicated (Menn. Bl., 1866, 18 ff.). In 1891 the church was incorporated (Menn. Bl., 1891, 24).

The office of preaching was conducted by several preachers chosen from the congregation. The church records name Heinrich Christoph as preacher in 1784, Johann Stauffer in 1787. During the last years before his death in 1822 or 1823 he served alone. He was followed by Daniel Stauffer of Eich, who resigned in 1842. The congregation, following the example of Monsheim and Sembach, now employed a trained minister with an annual salary of 400 fl. A request of an additional sum of 250 fl. from the state was refused (1844). This step was severely reprimanded by the Mennonite church conferences held at Sembach in 1843 and at Monsheim in 1844. The following preachers have served: Bernhard Thiessen 1843-55, Heinrich Neufeld 1856-69, J. Ellenberger II 1869-71, Heinrich van der Smissen 1872-82, Thomas Löwenberg 1883-1917, Emil Händiges 1917-23, Erich Göttner 1923-27, A. Braun 1928- , Daniel Habegger 1953- . With the consent of the Ibersheim congregation H. Neufeld in 1856 took over in addition the churches at Eppstein (q.v.) and Friesenheim (q.v.) (now Ludwigshafen). Since then these three churches have been in charge of one pastor.

In 1803 and 1805 two important conferences were held at Ibersheim, the results of which are known as the Ibersheim Resolutions (Ibersheimer Beschlüsse). Both sets of resolutions were signed for Ibersheim by the preachers Jakob Weiss, Heinrich Christoffel, Heinrich Forrer, and Johannes Stauffer, and the deacon Jakob Hiestand.

On May 24, 1874, the new church discipline was adopted (drawn up by H. v. d. Smissen). In 1882 a new parsonage was built.

The Ibersheim church is a member of the Vereinigung, the Conference of South German Mennonites, and the Palatine-Hessian Conference. The latter met at Ibersheim several times.

In 1932 the church had a membership of 120 baptized members; in 1955 the total number, including children, was 185.

Services are held every two weeks in winter, and every three weeks in summer. Communion is observed three times a year, viz., at Easter, Pentecost, and at the harvest festival. A.B.

A. Trieb, Ibersheim am Rhein, Geschichte des Ortes seit den frühesten Zeiten mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Mennonitengemeinde; Menn. Bl., 1886, 1891; Müller, Berner Täufer; ML II, 397-400.

Ibersheim Resolutions (Ibersheimer Beschlüsse) is the name given the acts of two conferences of South German Mennonites held at Ibersheim June 5, 1803, and June 10, 1805.

The former was called by Valentin Dahlem (q.v.) of Mosbach and Peter Weber of Neuwied. A new Ministers' Manual was to be drawn up and issued. In addition resolutions were passed, dealing almost exclusively with church discipline. The age of baptismal candidates was fixed at 14 or 15. A second baptism for persons changing membership from another church was rejected. The bearing of arms and military service were forbidden.

At the second conference the regulation prohibiting members from holding government office was renewed. Preachers were not to be considered in full service until they had had some practice and proved themselves. The council meeting (Umfrage) was never to be omitted. A day of prayer and fasting was set for July 28 in all the congregations "on this side of the Rhine and on the Neckar" to avert the distress of military service. Mannhardt therefore calls this meeting at Ibersheim "the sunset glow in the sky of the old Mennonitism in the Rhineland." Neff.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Danzig, 1863) 55; Menn. Bl., 1907, 51 and 60; ML II, 400.

Iberville Hutterite Bruderhof, seven miles northeast of Elie, Man., founded in 1919 by eleven families with their preacher Paul Gross, of the Rosedale Bruderhof. Paul Gross died May 10, 1929. Other preachers of the colony were Peter Gross, chosen on March 16, 1924, Paul Gross, chosen on Jan. 15, 1933, and Michael Gross, chosen on Jan. 31, 1937. In 1947 the colony had a population of 143 souls, of whom 57 were baptized members. D.D.

Ich Sende Euch is the official organ of the Mennonite Collegiate Graduates' Society, the alumni association of the M.C.I. at Gretna, Man., which was organized in 1942, and succeeds the former Alumni Journal. First published at Gretna, beginning in August 1942, it was transferred to Winnipeg, Man., July 1, 1944. The present 8-page journal is published five times a year in German. In 1949 the circulation was 800, with Frank Dyck serving as editor. In 1953 it was edited by Paul F. Peters. G.En.

Ickelsamer (Ickelsheimer), Valentin, an early Protestant-spiritualist opponent of Luther and defender of Carlstadt, studied at the University of Wittenberg. He was the author of the book, Klag etlicher Brüder an alle Christen von der grossen . . . Tyranney, so Endressen Bodensteyn von Karlstadt jetzt von Luther . . . geschieht (1525), an original and courageous book which sharply attacked Luther and defended Carlstadt (q.v.). In consequence of this book he suffered a lengthy imprisonment, during which he asked Luther's pardon, which was granted through the mediation of Justus Menius (q.v.). This book is reprinted in Flugschriften aus der Ref.-Zeit, No. X (Halle, 1893). Later, as a follower of Schwenckfeld, he became involved in a dispute with Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) in 1542 (Beiträge, 278; Loserth, 58, 426). That he was an Anabaptist and a leader of the Peasants' Revolt, as Elector John of Saxony wrote in a letter dated March 27, 1530, and as Jacobs (429) and Wappler (91) also thought, is most unlikely; the elector offers no evidence for the statement. (The letter is found in Einicke, 416 f.) In his book of 1525 Ickelsamer does not mention the Anabaptists; nevertheless it must be admitted that the spirit of the "fanatics" of all kinds, so violently suppressed by Luther, is brought to clear expression in the book. Having studied in Wittenberg he was well aware of the weaknesses in Lutheranism.

NEFF, E.T.

H. Fechner, Vier seltene Schriften des 16. Jahrhunderts mit einer ungedruckten Abhandlung über Val. Ickelsamer von R. Wiegand; H. Barge, Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt II (Leipzig, 1905) 317-24; E. Jacobs, Die Wiedertäufer am Harz (Wernigerode, 1899); P. Wappler, Thüringen; Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum IV (1914) 68; V (1916) 163, 165; 272 f.; 404; 408 f., 698, 798-806; J. Loserth, Quellen und Forschungen zur Gesch. der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrh. (Vienna, 1929); G. Einicke, Zwanzig Jahre schwarzburgische Ref.-Gesch. 1521-1541, I; Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Ref. II (Leipzig, 1909) 281; Beiträge zur bayr. Kirchengesch. VII (1902); ML II, 400.

Idaho, pop. 524,873, admitted to the union as a state in 1890, has large areas of mountain and arid land, with the population chiefly inhabiting the south. Here, almost on the western border, less than 20 miles from the state capital of Boise, the first Mennonite settlement was begun in February 1899 by David Garber, and the Nampa Mennonite (MC) Church was organized the same year. Two other congregations of this group were later established in Idaho; viz., Filer (1914), some 150 miles southeast, and Indian Cove (1935) near Hammett, some 150 miles south of Nampa. In 1955 these three congregations had a total of 369 members.

The General Conference Mennonites first came to Idaho in 1906, when a settlement was established at Aberdeen, about 200 miles east of Nampa. They organized a congregation in 1907. A second church (Emmanuel), established by division in 1912, three miles south, merged again with the Aberdeen church in 1930. Two other settlements near Aberdeen, the Minidoka mixed settlement (partly GCM, partly Central Conference), and the Dubois settlement (1910-12), both failed. One other G.C.M. settlement, at Caldwell, five miles from Nampa, was founded in 1941; a congregation was organized in 1947. A third church was organized in Filer in 1955. The three G.C.M. congregations in 1955 had a total of 389 members, Aberdeen alone having 327.

A United Missionary church was organized in Filer in 1905. In 1949 it had 69 members. For a short period a Mennonite Brethren church also existed at Aberdeen (founded 1910) and a Central Conference church at Nampa (founded 1907). The Mountain View congregation of the Church of God in Christ, near Bonners Ferry, at the extreme northern point near the Canadian border, was organized in 1936 and had 92 members in 1955.

Thus the total Mennonite membership in Idaho in 1955 was 790, distributed as follows: G.C.M. 389, M.C. 369, C.G.C. 92. The Idaho settlements were all pioneer farming communities, those in the south depending almost exclusively on irrigation, built by settlers of widely varying backgrounds. All are located in or near small towns except those at Nampa, which has over 12,000 inhabitants. The settlements are of mixed background. The Nampa Mennonite (MC) Church operates a city mission in Nampa and a Christian day school called Nampa Mennonite School. The Mennonites (GCM) of Aberdeen built the Salem Deaconess Hospital at American Falls but sold it to the county because of financial difficulties. (ML II, 400 f.) H.N.H.

Idsegahuizen, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized six persons in 1557 and four more in 1563. Nothing is known about a congregation here. The newly baptized may have joined the Legemeer (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Ieper (Yper, or Yperen), a town in West Flanders, Belgium (1949 pop. 17,154). The town has a rich history. In the Middle Ages it was very prosperous as a result of a flourishing weaving industry; in the 13th century there were more than 80,000 inhabitants. The town has been repeatedly struck by war; in World War I it was nearly completely destroyed. During the raid on Nov. 22, 1914, when the beautiful old Cloth Hall was set on fire, the archives were destroyed. These archives without doubt contained some valuable material about the Anabaptist-Mennonite congregation existing here in the 16th century. Now the information about the Anabaptist movement here is very scarce. There was Anabaptist activity at Ieper as early as about 1538, and there may have been a congregation at this time. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 13 persons here in 1554-56.

There are two important documents, both of 1561, which supplement one another. (a) A letter written by the inquisitor Titelman (q.v.), at Ieper on Nov. 14, 1561, to the vice-regent Margaret of Parma, informing her that he had destroyed a Mennonite congregation at Ieper, which had been meeting for 10 or 12 months in a woods between Ieper and Meenen (q.v.), 80 to 100 persons being present at times. Sometimes they also held meetings in town with an attendance of 38 to 40 persons. A number of heretics had been taken prisoner and the law had taken its course. Most of the Anabaptists, however, had escaped and fled to Armentières or Hondschoote, or were roaming about the country, still seducing the simple people. (This letter is found in P. Besson, Edicts de Persecutions, Berne-Neuchatel-Buenos Aires, n.d., 11-14.) (b) A hymn, found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 23), composed by Anabaptists arrested in 1561 when a meeting was surprised by Titelman and his soldiers. The Dutch martyrbook of 1615 (the Groot Offerboek) and later martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, which contain this hymn in a prose version, give information which shows that these Mennonites had moved from elsewhere to Ieper to avoid persecution. They were all weavers. A certain Hendrik N. managed to escape, and one woman recanted. The arrested Mennonites, four in number, were strangled and burned at the stake on the market place of Ieper. The trial of the martyr Jacob de Rore (q.v.), who was himself active in Ieper, reveals that a certain Lossche Coppen (concerning whom nothing more is known) was active in Ieper, preaching and performing marriages. Titelman's assertion that he had exterminated the Anabaptist congregation of Ieper is not true. Until about 1574 Mennonites were found here, and in 1566 they were said to have held their meetings rather publicly. The following martyrs died at Ieper: Jan Hulle, Maeyken Kocx, Anthonis Schoonvelt, Kalleken Strings, and Laurens van de Walle, all in 1561, Claudine le Vettre in 1568, Dirk Anoot and Willem de Zager in 1569. (BRN II, 603-7; A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Igbetti, a town of some 6,000 in Southern Nigeria, West Africa. Still unknown to missionaries in 1919, 25 years later it was the home of the world's largest United Missionary Church (q.v.) congregation, with an average Sunday attendance of around 1,000. Its development is largely due to the work of O. L. Traub and G. J. Bolender. Besides the church there is a school with an enrollment of 200, a dispensary, a Bible school, and a normal school. E.R.S.

IJlst, one of the eleven towns (1947 pop. 1,488, with 154 Mennonites) of the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation with a rich history dating back to the early days. Richt Heynes, of IJlst, sealed her faith with her martyr's death by drowning at Leeuwarden in 1547. In 1551-57 Leenaert Bouwens baptized 49 persons here. Nothing more is known about this church in the 16th century except that there were two congregations. One of them, apparently of the Waterlander branch, joined the Sociëteit of Friesland (q.v.) at its founding in 1695; it had about 35 self-supporting members. This congregation had a church record book listing the baptized members which was begun in 1701. It acquired a new meetinghouse, dedicated on Aug. 12, 1708, by its (lay) preacher Sybren Gosses. The other congregation, always small, was a member of the Groningen Old Flemish Sociëteit in 1710 and probably much earlier. It dates back at least to 1648, when Louwe Mantjes was its preacher, and it was still sending delegates to the Sociëteit in 1815, when the conference was dissolved.

In 1746 at least 15 members of the IJlst Old Flemish congregation were living in Sneek. These members organized an independent congregation under the leadership of Wouter Berends. The Waterlander congregation at IJlst was served by Jelle Sipkes van Teerns 1771-1818. He was an active Patriot (q.v.) and a man of importance not only in his home congregation, taking an active political part in the government of Friesland in 1796-98.

In 1819 the two congregations in IJlst merged; they had a total of 102 members. The old Mennonite principle of charitable giving was expressed in the "Ten Kate Foundation," which was established by the brothers Rijkle (1770-1855) and Keimpe (1775-1856) Lammerts ten Kate for the support of the poor.

A new meetinghouse was dedicated on Sept. 27, 1857. A pipe organ was installed in 1881. The membership numbered 135 in 1838, 140 in 1861, 101 in 1900, 84 in 1954. Until 1818 the congregation was served by lay ministers. H. J. Busé, minister at IJlst 1890-1917, wrote a history of the congregation (manuscript). Busé was followed by L. G. Holtz 1918-21, B. H. Rudolphi 1921-30, B. Dufour 1930-35, A. du Croix 1936-39, Miss J. H. van der Slooten 1939-46, H. B. Kossen 1950-56. The pulpit is now (1957) vacant; the pastor of the near-by Sneek congregation has charge of the IJlst congregation. The church has a ladies' circle and a choir. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2361-63; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim, see Index; H. J. Busé, Ter gedachtenis aan het 50-jarig bestaan der nieuwe Doopsgezinde Kerk te IJlst (Sneek, n.d.-1907); Naamlijst 1829, 49 f.; DJ 1840, 44; Gorter's Doopsgezind Lectuur 1858, 48; DB 1861, 145; 1879, 3, 89; 1890, 93-98; 1892, 89-98; 1917, 66-73; ML II, 406.

IJmuiden, formerly a village, now a large city with an important harbor and active industry, with population (together with Velsen) of 52,108, with about 425 Mennonites in 1954, located in the Dutch province of North Holland at the mouth of the North Sea Canal, which joins Amsterdam to the sea. The Anabaptists here originally belonged to the adjacent Beverwijk congregation. On Feb. 21, 1909, they organized an independent congregation, acquired a church, and called E. Pekema from Monnikendam as their pastor on July 25, 1909. He served until 1912 and was followed by D. Attema 1912-15, W. Luikinga 1915-d.1928, F. F. Milatz 1929-44, W. Veen 1949-55, and J. P. Jacobszoon 1956- .

The membership of the IJmuiden congregation, numbering 80 when the congregation was founded, was 170 in 1930 and 204 in 1954. During the last years of World War II church life was at a complete standstill; the church was damaged by bombs which destroyed a part of the town, and the population was evacuated. Church services are now (1957) held at IJmuiden and in a rented hall at Westerveld. Church activities include Sunday school for children at IJmuiden and Velsen, ladies' circles at IJmuiden and Santpoort, and a Bible course. vdZ.

DB 1909, 186; 1910, 191; De Zondagsbode XXII (1909-10) Nos. 9, 18, 41; De Noodbrug, October 1945; ML II, 406.

IJntema, Jan, b. 1894 at Workum, Friesland, d. 1944 at Surhuisterveen, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, who served at Surhuisterveen 1918-22, Oudebildtzijl 1922-26, Dantumawoude 1926-31, Leeuwarden 1931-36, and Haarlem 1936-44; author of De Doopsgezinden (Huis ter Heide, 1930, 2d ed. 1930) and Wij Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1940, 2d ed. 1941). He also published two articles in the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje (1936 and 1937) and a number of sermons. In cooperation with Pastor A. Binnerts (q.v.) he founded the A.N.D.P.V. (q.v., Dutch Mennonite Pastors' Association) and served as its secretary-treasurer for many years. vdZ.

IJs(s)elstein, a town (1947 pop., 5,311) in the Dutch province of Utrecht, which, together with the village of Benschop (q.v.), was governed by the tolerant Ghijsbrecht van Baeck (q.v.) in the early 1530's when Anabaptism arose in the Netherlands. The reformer Henric Rol (q.v.), who later joined the Anabaptists, was until about 1530 van Baeck's domestic chaplain, and van Baeck's wife, Else van Lostadt (q.v.), was herself an Anabaptist. Anabaptist meetings could be held freely at IJselstein. But Anabaptism in this territory soon deteriorated into Münsterism, leaders like Gerrit van Benschop (q.v.) preaching revolutionary principles. After 1535 it soon declined, though IJselstein in the following years was still a shelter for Anabaptists persecuted elsewhere. When Else van Lostadt, who had been in prison 1544-48, was set free, all traces of Anabaptism had disappeared in this region. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 28, 33, 39, 55, 104, 230; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 88, 99, 175, 208; Mellink, Wederdopers, 231-41.

IJtens, a Dutch Mennonite congregation: see Ytens.

Illikhoven (Illekhoven), a village near the Maas River in the Dutch province of Limburg, once belonging partly (north) to the duchy of Gelder, partly (south) to the duchy of Jülich; now belonging partly (north) to the community of Reesteren (1940, 60 inhabitants), partly (south) to the community of Born (1940, 70 inhabitants). A short distance to the west is Vissersweert (q.v.), a hamlet on the Maas (1940, 19 houses and 90 inhabitants). About 1545 Menno Simons (q.v.) stayed at Illikhoven with Lemke (q.v.) and preached at night in a pasture near Vissersweert, and then went by boat to Roermond (q.v.). After 1545 Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) of Illikhoven also preached and baptized here, and about the same time Adam Pastor seems to have visited the congregation. In 1547 a severe persecution struck the small group. Three of its members, Metken (q.v.), Jater (q.v.), and Lijsken (q.v.), were put to death; other Mennonites saved their lives by flight. Yet the congregation was not destroyed; Illikhoven was the center of a Mennonite congregation "on the Maas," which Diderich Verwer represented at Cologne (see Concept of Cologne) in 1591. E.C.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 343; DB 1890, 54-61; 1909, 120 f.; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht 1505-1557 (The Hague, 1937) passim; C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 62-64; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 83-87, 240-43; E. Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit VIII (1955) 155.

Illingen (Illing), a village (pop. 1,750) in Württemberg, Germany, in which there were Anabaptists in the 16th century. The Hutterite Geschicht-Buch (183) states that ten Anabaptists were executed here, but does not give names or dates. Nor is there any other information about the execution of Anabaptists here. The earliest references showing connections with the Hutterites in Moravia are dated 1554 (TA, 142). Several families united with them. In 1565 Matthäus Klotz, a carpenter at Stammheim near Calw, born at Illingen, moved to Moravia with his wife and six children and 400 florins in cash (TA, 547). Other Anabaptists of Illingen distinguished themselves by steadfastness in suffering and exemplary living.

Illingen was the home of Hans Dauber, who was arrested in 1581 and imprisoned in Hohenurach for his faith. After six years, declaring himself ready to join the state church, he was released. But in 1589 he was again seized "because he could not desist from his perverted manner" (675). He was then taken to Hohenwittlingen (q.v.), where he was held prisoner for several decades. After an attempt to convert him in 1608 his tormentors apparently abandoned all hope of his returning to the state church; in a court record they remarked, he "must be commended to God's judgment" (809).

In Illingen Dauber appears to have gained a considerable following (545). Peter Ehrenpreis, in whose possession Menno Simons' Foundation Book was found, was one of his followers. Ehrenpreis was the son of the magistrate Wolf Ehrenpreis, whom the pastor bitterly accused before the authorities of failing to take steps against the Anabaptists (562). Peter Ehrenpreis emigrated to Moravia and joined the Hutterites. Upon his return to Illingen he was seized on May 10, 1585, but was dismissed when he promised to join the state church (598 and 616). But in 1596 the pastor Johann Huttenloch in Illingen reported to Wilhelm Holder, abbot of Maulbronn, that although Ehrenpreis had formerly attended the noon services, he now remained away when the sacraments were discussed and hurried out of the church when communion or infant baptism was being observed. On July 5, 1596, he went to Moravia with his family, leaving all his possessions. By his manner of life Ehrenpreis won respect, as is shown in the report of the local pastor: "Like all the Anabaptists Ehrenpreis lives a quiet, honorable, blameless life before the world. With his Anabaptist hymns, which he sings in the vineyards and other places, and through his hypocritical conduct he has won such favor with the majority of the populace, that they would not consent to his being condemned for his Anabaptism. At a public inn recently a councilman, Jörg Augsburger, exclaimed that if a man could be saved here, then this Peter would be saved, and he wished for no other heaven than the one to which Peter would go, and that he was more highly esteemed by a great many than all the Protestant pastors" (687).

It is not at all impossible that this Ehrenpreis was the father of Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.), an outstanding leader of the Hutterian Brethren (TA, 66).

After the emigration of Peter Ehrenpreis there are no more reports about Anabaptist families in Illingen. In 1657 there was a rental record (Zinsbrief) concerning Anabaptist property of Illingen leased out by the official management of Anabaptist property. HEGE.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; TA Württemberg, index under "Dauber, Hans"; G. Bossert, "Eine amerikanische Quelle für württembergische Geschichte und Literatur des 16. und 17. Jh.," in supplement to Staats-Anzeiger für Württemberg, June 1, 1916; ML II, 407.

Illinois, one of the 48 states of the United States, was admitted to the Union as a state in 1818. With an area of 56,400 square miles its greatest length is 385 miles and its extreme breadth 218 miles. It comprises an area larger than Belgium, Switzerland, and Holland combined. One of the most level of the states, its greatest elevation is 1,150 feet above the sea, and its average elevation is 550. The greater part of its area consists of quite level or slightly undulating prairies, though there are hills and bluffs along the rivers and their tributaries and in the northwest and the extreme south. Having rich black soil, Illinois, as a part of the fertile Mississippi Valley, is a prosperous agricultural state. But it is also an important producer of minerals, coal being the most important. It is also one of the most important manufacturing states, with Chicago as the chief industrial city. In 1950 Illinois was fourth state in population, having 8,712,176 inhabitants.

The Mennonites did not come to Illinois in large groups as a colonizing movement but rather as individuals and in small groups. The first ones to settle in the state were of the Amish wing. They came to the central part of Illinois settling in the counties of McLean, Woodford, Tazewell, and Livingston. Peter Maurer, the first of whom there is record, settled in McLean County in 1829, having come from Butler County, Ohio, and two years before that from Alsace. In 1830 two others came, walking, it is said, all the way from Butler County. Others came in the following years, most of the Illinois Amish having arrived by 1850. Many of these immigrants came from Alsace, some coming directly by way of New Orleans and up the Mississippi and Illinois rivers, and others coming by way of New York City, either directly or after a brief sojourn in Pennsylvania or Ohio. Other European areas, besides Alsace-Lorraine, contributed Amish settlers to central Illinois—Hesse, the Palatinate, Bavaria, Baden, and Switzerland. Though usually not the first whites in an area, these first Amish settlers found themselves surrounded by frontier conditions in this part of Illinois when they arrived in the 1830's.

The first church organized among the Amish was that of the Partridge congregation, west of the present Metamora, in Woodford County. This was the first German-speaking church in the state and the second of any denomination to be organized in the county. It continues today as the Metamora congregation located east of the town of that name.

One small group of Amish adhering for a time more to the "old order" in their customs came from Mifflin Co., Pa., and settled in McLean County. Later it became the original church of the Stuckey Amish, or Central Conference of Mennonites, the East White Oak congregation near Danvers.

The first settlements of the Amish and the Mennonites, like those of other Illinois pioneers, were made in the wooded sections along rivers and creeks. This was done for the purpose of having a supply of water and wood and also to avoid the supposedly unhealthful conditions of the undrained prairies. By the 1850's, however, Mennonites, along with others, began to appreciate the value of the prairies and began to make settlements away from the timbered areas.

Though the first Mennonites in Illinois were of the Amish wing, the main line of Mennonites (MC) began to come soon after. In 1833 two families by the name of Kindig came from Virginia by horse-drawn wagons to Tazewell County and started a settlement which became known as the Union congregation near Washington, Ill. There were additional migrants from Virginia and others came from Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Bavaria (Germany). This congregation later merged with Metamora.

About 1840 and later a few Mennonite families came from Bavaria and settled at Scales Mound in Jo Daviess County in northwestern Illinois near Galena. A small congregation was formed but has long since become extinct. The last Mennonite baptismal ceremony was performed about 1878.

In 1843-60 another settlement of Bavarians and other Germans was made near Summerfield, St. Clair County, in the southwestern part of the state. In 1861 this congregation, together with some from Iowa and several in the East, helped organize the General Conference Mennonites.

In the 1830's and 1840's a number of Hessian Mennonites came from Butler County, Ohio, and formed the South Danvers congregation (now known as the Danvers Church) in McLean County. This church was one of the 12 charter congregations which formed the Central Conference of Mennonites in 1908.

Also in the 1840's a small settlement was begun near Freeport in Stephenson County. The first immigrants came from Clarence Center, New York, and others came from Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Canada. Freeport joined the Illinois Conference (MC).

About 1847 several Reformed Mennonite families moved near Sterling in Whiteside County and a few years later organized the only church of this branch in the state. In the 1850's Mennonites from Pennsylvania settled near Sterling and started what became the Science Ridge congregation. In the next decade a few families from Pennsylvania and a few from Sterling settled near Morrison, in the same county, and started the congregation by that name. The membership of this church has remained small. In the 1850's a few families from Ohio and Pennsylvania settled at Gardner in Grundy County. It was here in 1865 that John F. Funk, who lived in Chicago, was ordained to serve as English preacher. This church soon became extinct. In 1858 four families came from Virginia to Cullom in Livingston County and together with others who soon came from Grundy and Woodford County, Illinois, founded the small Cullom congregation. From about 1865 to the time of the Chicago fire in 1871 a small Mennonite congregation, founded by Peter Neff and John F. Funk, existed in Chicago.

Soon after the Civil War some Old Order Amish from Pennsylvania, from Johnson County, Iowa, and from Holmes County, Ohio, came to Moultrie and Douglas counties and, later spreading into Gales County, became the large Old Order Amish community which centers around Arthur.

In 1835 a group of Amish Mennonites from Bavaria, and a few from Butler County, Ohio, settled in the neighborhood of Hennepin, Putnam County. Shortly thereafter most of these moved

MENNONITE CHURCHES AND INSTITUTIONS IN Illinois
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20 40 60
KEY
Indicating town and city areas except Chicago.
SMALL CAPITALS - County names
A See map of Chicago
B See map of Tazewell County
C Arthur Old Order Amish Community
● Mennonite Churches (MC)
1. Freeport
2. Science Ridge
3. Morrison
4. Willow Springs
5. Roanoke
6. Metamora
7. Cullom
8. East Bend
9. Dewey
10. Peoria
11. Pleasant Hill
12. Morton
13. Waldo
14. Hopedale
15. Dillon
16. Arthur
17. Home Mission
18. Spanish Mission
19. Bethel
19a. Lombard
19b. Midway
19c. Highway Village
19d. West Sterling
● General Conference Mennonite Churches (GCM)
20. Tiskilwa
21. Flanagan
22. Meadows
23. Anchor
24. Normal
25. Carlock
26. North Danvers
27. Congerville
28. Calvary
29. Peoria
30. Bethel (Pekin)
31. Boynton (Hopedale)
32. Summerfield
33. First (Chicago)
34. Grace (Chicago)
35. Woodlawn (Chicago)
● Evangelical Mennonite Churches (EMC)
36. Salem (Gridley)
37. Groveland
38. Calvary Memorial (Chicago)
● Amish Mennonite Churches (Independent)
39. Fairfield
40. Linn
41. Mt. Herman
42. Union Prairie
● Other Mennonite Conferences
43. Sterling (Ref. Menn.)
44. Brighton (Chicago, EMB)
45. Gospel Mission (Chicago, KMB)
★ Mennonite Institutions
46. Mennonite Hospital (Bloomington, GCM)
47. Meadows Mennonite Home (GCM)
48. Salem Children's Home (Flanagan, EMC)
49. Home for the Aged (Eureka, MC)
50. Rockome Project (MC)
51. Mennonite Biblical Seminary (Chicago, GCM)
IOWA
WISCONSIN
LAKE MICHIGAN
INDIANA
MISSOURI
KENTUCKY
ILLINOIS
Mississippi
Mississippi
Illinois River
Illinois River
Sangamon
STEPHENSON
Freeport
WHITESIDE
Sterling
BUREAU
Tiskilwa
COOK
Chicago
PEORIA
Peoria
WOODFORD
LIVINGSTON
TAZEWELL
McLEAN
Bloomington
CHAMPAIGN
Urbana
DOUGLAS
Arthur
MOUL-TRIE
SHELBY
St. Louis
Summerfield
ST. CLAIR
A
B
C

across the Illinois River into Bureau County, near Tiskilwa, and formed the nucleus of what has become the Willow Springs Church. The Central Conference Mennonite Church in Tiskilwa is an offshoot of this congregation.

Most of the remaining Amish Mennonite congregations in Illinois not already mentioned were outgrowths of settlements mentioned above, with further additions of immigrants from other states in some cases. This includes the Roanoke Church between Eureka and Roanoke, the Goodfield Church near Goodfield, the Pleasant Grove Church near Tremont, the Hopedale Church near Hopedale, the Waldo Church near Flanagan, and the East Bend Church near Fisher. The Goodfield and Pleasant Grove congregations, mentioned above, merged in 1941 and constructed a new church building in Morton. A small Conservative Amish congregation and a larger Mennonite congregation have developed from the Old Order Amish community at Arthur. In 1954 a new congregation was organized at Lombard just west of Chicago.

In 1907 a small independent group of Conservative Amish, mostly from Elkhart Co., Ind., came to Shelbyville in Shelby County. Sometimes called the "sleeping preacher group," they were followers of John D. Kauffman who caused much interest and controversy by his practice of preaching while in trances. An unaffiliated Amish Mennonite congregation, composed largely of withdrawals from the Roanoke and Metamora congregations, exists near Roanoke. Another unaffiliated Amish Mennonite congregation is located near Tampico.

Mennonites of various kinds have also come to Chicago but these groups can perhaps best be discussed in connection with the mission and institutional work of the several branches. There were in 1953 a total of nine congregations and mission stations in Chicago with a combined membership of about 550.

The Mennonite movement into Illinois was largely of the Amish and old-line Mennonite branches. A few decades after the founding of the early settlements, however, splits from these groups began to occur. One of these divisions occurred just after the Civil War when the branch known as the Defenseless Mennonites or "Egly Amish" was formed. Henry Egly, bishop of an Amish church in Geneva Co., Ind., felt that the church was too cold and formalistic and began in the 1860's to emphasize the necessity of a definite experience of regeneration, at the same time, however, insisting on the old customs including dress. He organized his own church in 1866, and the movement spread to other Amish communities. In the Gridley Prairie, or Waldo, congregation in Livingston Co., Ill., Joseph Rediger, one of the ministers, about 1870 led a few members out of the old organization and formed an "Egly" congregation officially called the Salem Defenseless Mennonite Church. The only other congregation of this group in Illinois was organized at Groveland in Tazewell County, with the exception of the work started later in Chicago. In 1953 this group changed its name to Evangelical Mennonite Church.

Another division among the original groups took place when Joseph Stuckey formed the Central Illinois Conference of Mennonites. Stuckey, a bishop in the Yoder Amish Church in McLean County, was more liberal-minded than his fellow bishops and less ready to excommunicate members who did not reach the prevailing Amish standards. Since congregational control was still strong at that time this split from the majority group became apparent only gradually during the 1870's, although Stuckey did not attend the Amish General Conference after 1872. It was not until 1908, however, that a constitution was formally and officially adopted, with nine churches in the Peoria-Bloomington region joining as charter members, besides two in Indiana and one in Nebraska. In 1914 the official name was changed to "The Central Conference of Mennonites." In 1945 this group merged with the General Conference Mennonite Church.

The Apostolic Christian Church, whose founders included some former Mennonites in Switzerland, and which came to Morton about 1855, gained a number of Amish proselytes in Illinois as elsewhere. For that reason they are sometimes called the "New Amish."

Institutions for the carrying out of aggressive work were slow in appearing among the Mennonites in Illinois as elsewhere. However, the first Mennonite publishing venture of any consequence was carried out in this state, although the group as a whole had nothing to do with its origin. This was the founding of the Herald of Truth, and the German edition, Herold der Wahrheit, in Chicago, 1864, by John F. Funk, a young Mennonite, who had come to Chicago from Pennsylvania a few years before. In 1867 this enterprise was moved to Elkhart, Ind., where in 1875 it became known as the Mennonite Publishing Company.

Missionary sentiment, which had been developing for some time on the part of individuals, was no doubt stimulated by the evangelistic efforts of John S. Coffman and others in the latter part of the 19th century. The Chicago Home Mission, founded in 1893, was the first such effort of the MC group. Initiative from outside the state as well as from within was responsible for the opening of this work, and control of the institution since 1896 has been shared by the general mission board and the Illinois Mennonites. The Twenty-Sixth Street Mission in Chicago, founded in 1906, was an outgrowth of activity of the Home Mission. This mission was sold to the Central Conference of Mennonites in 1924. A Mennonite (MC) Mexican mission, opened in 1934, and a Negro mission (MC), opened in 1944, are also maintained in Chicago.

In 1919 the Illinois District Mission Board (MC), which had been organized in 1918, opened a mission in Peoria, which was turned over to the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1921. The Pleasant Hill Rural Mission, between Morton and Peoria, was organized in 1920 and after being under the supervision of the district mission board for some time became a regular congregation. A number of small mission outposts are operated by various congregations.

Another institution in Illinois operated by the M.C. group is the home for the aged at Eureka, opened in 1922. A home for retired church workers, called Rockome, sponsored by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities and the Illinois Mennonite Mission Board, is being developed at Arcola, Ill.

Running counter to a trend toward division was the merger of the Amish Mennonites and the Mennonites (MC). Completed in Illinois in 1921, the merger was in the process of development over a long period of time. The various institutional activities mentioned above, supported by both groups, played an important part in bringing about the union. Doctrinally there was no longer anything of consequence to keep them apart.

The Defenseless (Evangelical) Mennonites, besides supporting an active mission program, especially in Africa, opened in 1900 the Salem Orphanage near Flanagan, Ill. Since 1923 the Central Conference of Mennonites and the Defenseless Mennonite (Evangelical) Conferences have shared in its operation. The Defenseless conference also participated in the founding (1919) and maintenance of the Mennonite Hospital at Bloomington, Ill., which was primarily a Central Conference undertaking. Another co-operative activity between the Evangelical (Defenseless) and the Central Conference Mennonites is the maintenance of the Old People's Home (opened in 1923) at Meadows, Ill. The Evangelical (Defenseless) Mennonites operate a mission in Chicago (opened in 1908) and the Evangelical Mennonnite Brethren operate one (opened in 1907).

The Central Conference, as noted, carries an important part of the load in operating the Mennonite Hospital at Bloomington, and also shares in the operation of the Salem Orphanage near Flanagan, and the Old People's Home at Meadows. In addition it operates the Mennonite Gospel Mission (founded 1914) in Peoria. The conference also cooperates with other Mennonite groups in supporting the Congo Inland Mission, and, long before the merger with the General Conference Mennonites, it supported Bluffton College at Bluffton, Ohio.

In Chicago, in addition to those activities listed above, mention should be made of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren mission, opened in 1915. The General Conference Mennonites have also carried on work there since 1915 with two congregations. A third General Conference church has recently been organized in connection with the Mennonite Biblical Seminary, founded as a graduate theological institution in Chicago in 1944. A total of nine Mennonite congregations with about 550 members are located in Chicago.

ILLINOIS MENNONITES (1953)

Conference	members	congregations
Illinois Conference (MC)	3,359	18
Central Conference of Mennonites (now Central Dist. Conference, GCM)	2,046	12
Evangelical Mennonite Church (formerly Defenseless Mennonites)	523	4
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren	76	1
Krimmer Mennonite Brethren	?	1
Reformed Mennonite	?	1
Conservative Amish	56	1
Old Order Amish	795	9
Middle District (GCM)	235	3
Amish Mennonite (unaffiliated)	369	3
Total in Illinois	7,459	53

As to occupation, most of the Mennonites in Illinois are farmers. In recent decades, however, a larger number have gone into businesses of various kinds and into a number of the professions. Attracted by high wages, some have gone into the factories as laborers. W.H.S.

H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931); ML II, 407-9.

Illinois Mennonite Conference (MC), organized in 1921 by the merger of the earlier Mennonite Conference (MC) of the State of Illinois (formed in 1871) and Amish Mennonite congregations in the state which had been members of the Western District Amish Mennonite Conference. It is the only Mennonite (MC) district conference limited exclusively to one state, including all Mennonite (MC) congregations within and no congregations outside the state. Conference meets annually, usually during the third week in August. There is a ministers' fellowship meeting during the winter months. Regularly ordained or licensed bishops, ministers, and deacons are considered members of conference and transact the business of conference under the leadership of a five-man executive committee. Auxiliary organizations are the Christian Education Cabinet (six members), District Mission Board, State Sewing Circle, and State Mennonite Youth Fellowship. The Christian Education Cabinet sponsors a Christian Workers' Normal—a one-week training course held annually during the Christmas holiday season. A certificate is awarded upon the completion of a three-year course of six units. The District Mission Board publishes The Missionary Guide bimonthly. It includes inspirational articles as well as reports of congregational and missionary activities.

The constitution of the Illinois Mennonite Conference does not declare the Dordrecht Confession of 1632 its official confession, but this is the confession commonly used in the congregations. Conference teaches nonresistance to evil, nonconformity to the world, and simplicity in worship, home, and attire, but it does not require a particular costume. It protests against the use of tobacco and alcoholic beverages, forbids members to hold public office requiring the use of the force of the law and administration of the oath, and forbids membership in secret societies and the swearing of oaths. It teaches the ordinances of baptism, communion, footwashing, women's prayer veil, anointing with oil, salutation of the holy kiss, and marriage. A minister may not move from one congregation to another without the consent of both congregations. There is a strong trend toward a trained ministry, although sentiment is still quite strong for the ordination of men from within the conference district. The lot is seldom used in connection with ordinations.

Mennonites began to move to Illinois from eastern states in 1833. Illinois Mennonite congregations, originally a part of the Indiana conference, received the permission of that conference to form a separate conference in 1871 and met in their own first conference May 24, 1872. There were seven congregations in 1921, with a combined membership of 516. Two of these seven congregations were mission congregations in Chicago. The others were Freeport, Morrison, Sterling, Cullom, and Union (Washington).

Amish Mennonite settlers arrived in Illinois in 1829. Within a decade four congregations had been formed in central Illinois along the Illinois River and its tributaries. Many of the families had come directly from Europe. Others had stopped for a few years in eastern states or Ontario. A few came from older Amish Mennonite settlements in America. In 1921 there were nine Amish Mennonite congregations in Illinois with a combined membership of 1,428, all in the central part of the state. They were at Metamora, Roanoke, Hopedale, Fisher, Flanagan, Tiskilwa, Tremont, Goodfield, and Ohio Station. There is no longer a distinction between Amish Mennonite and Mennonite congregations within the state. Amish Mennonite congregations, particularly, lost heavily to the Egly and Stuckey factions which resulted in the Defenseless Mennonite and Central Conference Mennonite Churches. They lost also to the Apostolic Christians (q.v.) and the "Sleeping Preacher" group near Roanoke. One might cite John Alexander Dowie as an example of non-Mennonites who have proselyted members from Mennonite congregations.

Since the merger in 1921 the following seven new congregations have been formed: Arthur, Peoria, Pleasant Hill, Dillon, Bethel (Chicago), Spanish (Chicago), Lombard.

Men such as Henry Albrecht, J. C. Birky, Samuel Gerber, Chancy A. Hartzler, Henry Nice, Daniel Orendorff, Andrew Schrock, J. S. Shoemaker, John Smith, and H. R. Schertz are remembered for their ministry throughout the church, as well as within the conference district. Other more recent leaders have also served in offices on major church-wide boards. At present the conference includes 22 organized congregations and 10 mission outposts, with a total membership of 3,250 in 1955. N.P.S.

Illinois Mennonite Conference Directory (1947); Mennonite Yearbook and Directory (Scottdale, 1905-); H. F. Weber, Centennial Hist. of the Menn. of Illinois, 1829-1929 (Goshen, 1931).

Illinois Mennonite Mission Board (MC) is a subsidiary organization of the Illinois Mennonite Conference. Its purpose is "to work as the missionary and financial auxiliary of the Illinois Mennonite Conference in the following ways: (1) to create and promote missionary interest, and to assist the various congregations in systematizing and extending the work of evangelism. (2) To organize and supervise the missionary work of the Illinois Mennonite Conference not under the direct control of an organized congregation or the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. (3) To perform such benevolent or charitable work as may be deemed advisable by the Board, or as the Conference may direct. (4) To acquire and hold title to real estate and other property, to lease, operate, maintain, and sell or otherwise dispose of the same. (5) For the aforesaid purpose to solicit funds, to receive and hold all donations, bequests, endowments and annuities, etc., as may come under the control of the Board, or as Conference may direct."

The Board is made up of (a) one member elected by each local church; (b) the superintendent of each extension work (at least two years old) within the Conference; (c) two members elected by Conference; (d) the Conference member of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities.

The Board held its first annual meeting Sept. 13, 1923. The first officers were as follows: pres. S. R. Good; vice-pres. J. A. Heiser; sec. John Roth; treas. S. D. Schertz; and fifth member A. C. Good. The present officers are: pres. Ralph Imhoff; vice-pres. Kenneth G. Good; sec. Ivan J. Kauffmann; treas. Russell Massanari; fifth member or field worker Chris Graber; colporteur John Harnish.

The Pleasant Hill, Arthur, Highway Village, and Dillon churches have been established during the time the Board has been in operation and have been influenced directly or indirectly by the Board. The official organ of the Board is the Missionary Guide, published bimonthly beginning with November 1944. Harold Zehr has served as editor for a number of years. The Board also prints a report of its annual meeting. The 1955 budget was $10,450.

The present Board was preceded by the "Illinois District Mission Board," organized July 26, 1917, under the old Illinois Mennonite Conference. The first officers were: pres. S. R. Good; vice-pres. J. J. Summers; sec. A. H. Leaman; treas. J. V. Fortner; fifth member J. D. Conrad. Its first mission project was the Garden Street Mission in Peoria, which was established in May 1919, and turned over to the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1921. The second project was Pleasant Hill, near Peoria, which was opened as a mission Sunday school on Nov. 21, 1920. After the Amish and Mennonite merger in 1921 and the creation of the new Illinois Mennonite Conference, the Mission Board was given a new name and constitution but continued on the same pattern of organization and work. I.K.

H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931).

Illinois Old Order Amish Mutual Aid Plan serves the Old Order Amish around Arthur, Ill., and had a total of 820 members in 1953. H.S.B.

Illkirch, a village in Alsace, in which in compliance with orders issued by Strasbourg, 68 Anabaptists were arrested in 1540, and expelled from the Strasbourg area because they "would not let themselves be converted."

T. W. Röhrich, Mittheilungen aus der Gesch. der evangelischen Kirche des Elsasses II (Strasbourg, 1855) 211; Fr. Thudichum, Die Deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909) 622.

Illuminated Manuscripts among Russian Mennonites. The art of penmanship and the production of illuminated writings dates back to the Middle Ages. Particularly the initial letters in printing and writing were ornamental, sometimes using many colors.

This was also known as Kanzleischrift, practiced in the offices of the royal courts, which was taken over by schools and survived, in some forms, until the 19th century. Among the Mennonites, the Hutterites have practiced this art of penmanship in the writing of their chronicles, but the Pennsylvania-German Mennonites and the Prusso-German Mennonites have also used this art.

H. Görz reports that after the hardship of the pioneer days had been overcome, the elementary schools among the Mennonites of the Ukraine strongly emphasized this art of penmanship (Frakturen). Recognition cards were produced by the teacher and the older gifted pupils and distributed among the best pupils of the school. Particularly for Christmas and New Year's Eve they produced the traditional Weihnachtswunsch and Neujahrswunsch, which carried an appropriate poem pertaining to Christmas or New Year's Eve, which the children presented to their parents on the morning of these holidays, reciting the poetry before they received their presents. The art of penmanship and the production of illuminated manuscripts filled a considerable part of the curriculum of elementary training in Mennonite schools in Russia during the first half of the past century. When, through Cornies' effort, the educational level was raised, this art was discouraged as a waste of time, but it somehow survived and was practiced in some form until the Mennonite communities in Russia disintegrated under the Soviets. Some of the teachers belonging to the "old school," such as J. D. Rempel (now in Germany), hardly ever write a letter which does not have a beautifully illuminated salutation. The practice of producing illuminated wall mottoes can still be found among the Mennonites of South America. Some of the teachers developed into artists in their own right (H. J. Janzen, Joh. H. Janzen, J. P. Klassen, and others). Numerous copies of illuminated manuscripts and Christmas and New Year's greetings have been preserved in Mennonite homes of the prairie states and provinces, and are gradually reaching the Bethel College Historical Library, which is now in possession of a collection of them, some of which were produced in the beginning of the past century.† C.K.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950) 92.

Illuminated Manuscripts among the Pennsylvania Mennonites. The art of fraktur or illuminative writing, as it was practiced by the Pennsylvania Germans in colonial times and down to 1840-50, by which manuscript specimens were written in ornamental capital letters decorated in several colors, is clearly a descendant of the medieval art of manuscript illumination, but came possibly also directly from similar practices in the schools of Middle and South Germany from which the colonial immigrants to Pennsylvania came. It was a form of religious art, almost never applied to secular themes, usually including either Scripture verses or expressions of piety. The block letters were ornamented, and the entire drawing was often ornamented with illuminative borders, overhanging tulips or lotus flowers, birds, angels blowing trumpets, etc. In America it was chiefly perpetuated by deliberate instruction in German private schools by German schoolmasters, and the coming of the public schools in 1840-50 meant its end.

Among the types of fraktur work to be noted are the illuminated manuscript songbooks of the Ephrata Cloister of the mid-18th century, small plain manuscript songbooks made in Mennonite schools in the early 19th century with illuminated title pages giving the owner's name and the writer's school, illuminated ownership pages to printed songbooks, rewards of merit, copyforms made for pupils in Mennonite schools, bookmarks, baptismal certificates for Lutherans and Reformed, marriage and death registers in Bibles.

The chief geographical area of the practice of fraktur was in central Bucks County; specimens of the art from certain neighboring counties have also been preserved, especially Lehigh. Although Mennonites apparently were among the leaders in the art, they were not the only practitioners. However, the last surviving masters were two Mennonites, Jacob Gross of New Britain, and John H. Detweiler of Perkasie, Bucks Co., noted by Mercer (Survival, 432) as still alive at an advanced age in 1897. John D. Souder (1867-1944), a Mennonite of Telford, Bucks Co., revived the art in his late years and is said to have produced nearly 1,000 specimens of fraktur, largely mottoes and anniversary certificates for his friends, though not of the quality of older specimens. Bucks County Mennonite emigrants carried the art of fraktur with them to their settlement near Vineland, Lincoln Co., Ont. (ca. 1800), where a number of specimens have been preserved.

One of the noted early fraktur artists was Christopher Dock (q.v., d. 1771), the "pious schoolmaster of the Skippack," who had some 25 of his illuminated texts posted on the walls of his school. Abraham H. Cassel of Harleysville, Pa., whose father was a pupil in Dock's school, had a collection of Dock's illuminated texts, which he gave to the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. The Goshen College Library has a collection of some 30 pieces of fraktur including five small manuscript Mennonite songbooks. Goshen's oldest piece is an illuminated text-copyform made in the Deep Run Mennonite school in Bucks County in 1783.†

In recent times fraktur art has been rediscovered as a part of the rediscovery of Pennsylvania-German folk art, and good specimens have become museum items. The most successful collector was Henry S. Borneman (d. 1953), who published Pennsylvania German Illuminated Manuscripts, A Classification of Fraktur-Schriften and an Inquiry into their History and Art (Pennsylvania German Society, Norristown, 1937) with splendid four-color reproductions of 32 specimens. Borneman lists the names of 107 fraktur artists whose work has survived. His Pennsylvania German Book Plates (Phila., 1953) has 24 four-color reproductions.† H.S.B.

H. C. Mercer, The Survival of the Medieval Art of Illuminative Writing Among Pennsylvania Germans (reprint from Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society XXXVI, 1898, No. 156, 423-32); M. G. Brumbaugh, The Life and Works of Christopher Dock (Philadelphia, 1908); J. J. Stoudt, Consider the Lilies How They Grow (Pennsylvania German Folklore Society, II, 1937); idem, Pennsylvania Folk Art (Allentown, 1948); Frances Lichten, Folk Art Motifs of Pennsylvania (N.Y., 1954); idem, "Fractur from the Hostetter Collection," The Dutchman VI (1954); E. F. Robacker, "Major and Minor in Fraktur," The Dutchman VII (1956) 2-7; S. J. Riccardi, "Pennsylvania Dutch Folk Art and Architecture, A Selective Annotated Bibliography," Bulletin of the New York Public Library XLVI (1942) 471-83.

Ilp (Den), a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, north of Amsterdam, where there have been Anabaptists from the earliest times. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 61, E 464) names Seli and Jacob of neighboring Landsmeer as martyrs. In 1673 there was a Waterlander congregation at Landsmeer, to which the Mennonites of Den Ilp belonged. At that time there was also a Frisian congregation at Landsmeer. The congregation contributed liberally to the relief of the Mennonites of Lithuania, Poland, and Prussia in 1727, 1733, and 1736.

During the night of Feb. 4, 1863, both the church and the parsonage were burned down by lightning. With liberal support from other congregations, as far away as Friedrichstadt, Germany, they were able to build a new church and parsonage, which was dedicated on May 7, 1865; an organ was installed in 1901. In 1847 the congregation of Den Ilp and Landsmeer had 116 members; by 1931 the membership had risen to 130. Now (1956) the baptized membership numbers 80. After the death of J. L. de Wagenmaker, who served here as pastor in 1915-51, the pulpit was vacant until 1955, when the pastor of Amsterdam-North assumed charge. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 892, 896; II, 2, No. 220; DB 1864, 174; 1865, 165 f.; 1902, 144; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 332; II, 204, 232; ML II, 409.

Ilpendam, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, where there was an independent Mennonite congregation in the 17th century belonging to the Waterlander branch. Before 1700 this congregation was united with near-by Den Ilp (q.v.). vdZ.

Imbroich (Imbroek), Thomas von, an Anabaptist martyr, also known as Thomas Drucker or Thomas of Truden, b. 1533 probably in the village of Imgenbroich, Germany, five hours from Aachen, hence his name Imbroich. By trade he was a printer of books, came to Cologne (q.v.) in 1554, joined the Anabaptists there, and became an outstanding leader of the Mennonites of the Lower Rhine area. On Dec. 23, 1557, he was arrested and after repeated cross-examination, cruel torture, and vain attempts to convert him was beheaded on March 5, 1558, at the age of 25 years (not May 5, as stated in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror).

In prison Thomas wrote a confession of his faith to make his belief clear to the judges of the Inquisition. A copy of his manuscript was smuggled out to his brethren, and was apparently immediately printed and widely circulated in the next years. The "confession" deals primarily with baptism, and is unusually rich and deep in its exposition of the Scriptures opposing infant baptism. It reveals its author as thoroughly familiar with Menno Simons, under some influence of Melchior Hofmann, and acquainted with the Church Fathers as well as some more recent literature. He was not willing to accept the theological explanations of the Protestant leaders nor of the Catholic scholastic writers, but accepted as truth only the words of the Gospel. His logical clarity made his book an important weapon in the great struggle of the Anabaptists with the state churches.

Felix Reichmann has made a careful study of the printing of the confession in "An Early Edition of Thomas von Imbroich" (MQR XVI, 1942, 99-107), in which he holds that the first edition was printed between 1560 and 1600, probably in Alsace, though it might have been in Cologne. The Duke of Jülich published an edict against Anabaptist books, dated March 9, 1560, which Heinrich Bullinger, in a letter of 1562, states was directed specifically against the Imbroich book. Bullinger refers to the great influence of Thomas, which must have been continued through the publication of his confession.

The full title of this first edition of the Imbroich Confession is as follows: Ein schöne bekanntnus eines frommen und Gottliebenden Christen samt etlichen Sendbrieffen und Christliche Ermanungen auss heiliger Schrift seiner Hausfraven und Brüdern auss der Gefängnus geschrieben. Mit kurtzem und doch wahrhafftigen anzeigungen wie er seinen Glauben durch krafft Gottes (zu Cölln am Reyn) Anno 1558. den 5. Mertz beständig mit seinem blut bezeugt hat allen Christen und Gottesfürchtigen gantz nützlich und tröstlich zu lesen und zu hören. Esaje am 59. Cap. . . . n.p., n.d. (copy in the Landis Valley Museum, Lancaster, Pa.; an early reprint in the Goshen College Library). A Dutch translation was published at Gent in 1579 (copy in Amsterdam Mennonite Library). The Martyrs' Mirror of 1660 contains a partial reprint. Güldene Aepfel in Silbern Schalen (European editions 1702, 1742; Ephrata, Pa., edition in 1745) contains the confession and the epistles complete. The Ausbund, beginning with the 1742 Germantown edition, contains a brief condensation of the confession. This brief form was reprinted as a tract about 1922 by an unknown Amish publisher.

Thomas also wrote seven epistles (Sendbriefe), some of which are quite extensive, which were published with his confession. They bear witness to a rare confidence in God and a willingness to die, and contain a wealth of Biblical admonition. Hymn No. 23 in the Ausbund, "Would you hear what happened in the year fifty-seven," tells the story of Thomas and his martyrdom in 25 stanzas, but was probably not written by him. It appeared at least as early as between 1563 and 1565 in a Mennonite hymnbook, entitled Ein schon Gesangbuchlein Geistlicher Lieder. It appeared first in the Ausbund in the 1583 edition. Wolkan (Lieder, 99) says it was translated from a Dutch original which he found in the Hamburg Stadtbibliothek, and was written by a Dutch Mennonite. It does appear, however, in the first edition of the German book containing Thomas' confession, ca. 1560, as "Ein New Lied." (Title page reproduced in ME I.) NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D I, 402-7 and II, 196-200, E 367-71 and 578-82; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 439 ff.; Wolkan, Lieder, 48, 99; W. Scheibler, Gesch. der evang. Gemeinde Monschau (Aachen, 1939) 22-24; Müller, Berner Täufer, 104; DB 1898, 108, article "Imbroich als Gatte und Vater"; Felix Reichmann, "An Early Edition of Thomas von Imbroich," MQR XVI (1942) 99-107; Bibliographie des Martyrologes I, 193-203; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik (The Hague, 1937) 303-6; ML II, 409.

Imhoff, Catharina Friedli, an Anabaptist martyr, executed for her faith at Bern, Switzerland, Aug. 28, 1537. This martyr is not found in the Dutch edition of van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, but only in the German and English translations. (Mart. Mir. E 1129; ML II, 409.)

The name Imhof occurs frequently in Switzerland and the Palatinate, and is also found in Illinois.

Immanuel Academy at Reedley, Cal., opened as the Reedley Bible School, Oct. 17, 1927, with two teachers and 31 students. It met until 1932 in a small building on the grounds of the Reedley Mennonite Brethren Church. It was continued until 1937 by the Dinuba Mennonite Brethren Church in the building now known as the Reedley hospital. In 1937-41 the Bible school met in the kitchen of the Dinuba M.B. Church in Dinuba. Then the Reedley M.B. Church reopened its Bible school on its own church grounds and operated it parallel to the Dinuba Bible School 1938-41. In 1941 the schools were combined and named Immanuel Bible School. In 1944 the four-year academy program was started and the name changed to Immanuel Academy. The first four-year class was graduated in 1946. In 1946 the school was moved to the present location in its new building. The academy principals have been J. N. C. Hiebert, August 1943-January 1947; H. R. Wiens, January 1947-July 1950; and Arthur J. Wiebe, July 1950- . The enrollment in recent years has averaged 200. The school is sponsored by the Reedley and Dinuba M.B. churches and the Zion K.M.B. Church in Reedley, which share the cost on a per capita basis. The Fresno M.B. Church also participates on a partial basis.

Immanuel Academy is a first-class accredited high school with a faculty of 12 teachers and five buildings, of which a chapel seating 300 is under construction. The 10-acre campus is located on the banks of the Kings River in Reedley. The annual budget is $55,000, half of which is raised by tuition. A.J.W.

Immanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Downey, Los Angeles Co., Cal., was organized with 35 charter members as the Mennonite Mission Church, May 12, 1918, at Avenue 19 and Albion Street, Los Angeles. On Nov. 2, 1924, it was organized under its present name, and a church was dedicated at 79th Street and Stanford Avenue, Los Angeles. On July 4, 1953, it moved to the present location at 10335 Paramount Blvd., Downey. The membership in 1955 was 271. It became a member of the Pacific District Conference in 1919. The following ministers have served the congregation since 1924: Albert Claassen, H. B. Dirks, D. D. Eitzen, Albert Jantzen, Wilbert A. Regier, Paul Bauman, H. D. Burkholder, Alfred Regier, and the present pastor, John B. Graber. H.D.B.

Immanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Delft, Cottonwood Co., Minn., a member of the Northern District Conference, was organized on July 28, 1940, with a membership of 85. The group had previously been a part of the Gospel Mennonite Church at Mountain Lake and under its ministry. In 1897 a church was built 1½ miles west of Delft to facilitate the service. In 1906 this structure was moved to Delft, and in 1920 a new church was built. Since its organization in 1940 the group has had its own pastor. The present membership (1955) is 130, with W. M. McDowell as pastor. J.J.F.

Imme Eyckendochter, an Anabaptist martyr "vuytte maeren van Groeningerlandt," was executed with four other women on Jan. 17, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland. She was put to death by drowning after she had been put into a sack. Imme was probably an adherent of David Joris. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749.) vdZ.

Immelhausen, a village in Baden, Germany, 2½ miles south of Sinsheim, has been the seat of a Mennonite congregation for 250 years. The first Mennonites settled there soon after the Thirty Years' War as renters in Immelhausen and on the adjacent estates of Streichenberg, Steinsfurt, Kirchard, and Weiler, having left Switzerland on account of their faith. The authorities welcomed them into the devastated and depopulated country, but did not permit them to hold religious services without special government consent. Apparently the consent to assemble for the "admonition" was sometimes given reluctantly. They probably did not often claim this permission, since the pastors expected them to attend the regular services of the Reformed Church. How unpleasant their meetings were to church circles can be seen in the fact that the church councilors at Heidelberg in 1654 advocated non-toleration of the Mennonites if they refused to be subject to the Reformed Church. Therefore they preferred to assemble quietly, without authorization, in the woods. These secret meetings were discovered in 1654, when a marriage was performed there. The case was inflated to make it appear a public nuisance.

The Mennonites also held services in their homes, for which they had not sought permission. On March 2, 1661, 53 persons were surprised at nine o'clock in the evening in Steinsfurt as they were just beginning a hymn. They were fined 100 guilders, a heavy fine in view of the fact that their total capital amounted to only 6,000 guilders. Max Oberholzer, who had come from the canton of Zürich in 1660, had taken part in this service. His brother, Jakob Oberholzer, the father of 13 children, had come earlier. In a later cross-examination it was learned that he had left the Reformed Church in 1645 on account of the wicked lives of its members, because he was unable to take communion with them with a good conscience. He had united with the Mennonites, since all of them strove to live godly, to avoid vices, and transgressors were separated from them. His mother had previously been a Mennonite. The other participants lived at Rohrbach, Reihen, Itlingen, Streichenberg, Weiler, Dühren, and Steinsfurt.

The Mennonites declared to the state officials that they would rather leave the country than give up their religious meetings. The authorities, acknowledging the pioneer work of the Mennonites in rebuilding the land, granted them permission to hold their services in an electoral edict on Aug. 4, 1664. The regard their work called forth is revealed in a report of Johann Jakob Lumpert in Hilsbach, Oct. 20, 1666, to the government, stating that the Mennonite families of his district were cultivating the electoral estates at Streichenberg, Immelhausen, Steinsfurt, and Reihen, were still clearing forests and draining marshes, and paid their debts, the poorer ones being aided in the payment of dues by those who had a little more. The electoral estates would have to lie desolate if these families moved away; among the remaining subjects one would hardly find people who could manage such estates.

When in 1671 the Swiss Mennonites had to flee from renewed oppression, leaving their property, they were willingly received in the Kurpfalz. But new congregations arose in the Immelhausen area. According to a register of 1732 there were 160 families in 13 congregations in the Palatinate east of the Rhine. To the Immelhausen church belonged 18 families who lived on adjacent estates; the names listed are Binkele, Frey, Bähr, Brand, Müller, Schaub, Gut, Gerber, Lienhard, Schneider, Huber, Eicher, Moser, Behm, and Oberholzer, whose descendants can in many cases still be found in the South German churches. A descendant of the Oberholzer family, members of which went to Pennsylvania in 1727 to 1732, was J. H. Oberholtzer, who in 1859 was the moving spirit in forming the General Conference Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1887 the baptized membership numbered 41; there were 15 children. The congregation at this time had no elder, and Christian Schmutz (ordained 1880) was its preacher. There was a meetinghouse in Immelhausen, and meetings were also held at Dühren. In 1891 the Immelhausen estate was still occupied by four Mennonite families. Of these only the Binkele family lived there in 1930. The congregation was severely weakened by emigration to Pennsylvania in the 18th century. In March 1912 it was merged with the newly organized congregation at Sinsheim (q.v.), which the Ittlingen (q.v.) church also joined at the same time.

The issues of the Dutch Naamlijst 1766-1802 give some information about Immelhausen, in the issue of 1766 called "Himmelhausen, Durnen en Hönigerhoff," in 1769 "Dieren en Himmelhausen," in 1784 and following years "Diernheim en Himmelhausen." Abraham Zeiset (d. 1787) is named as the elder beginning in 1749. After his departure to the Willenbach congregation in 1773, Johannes Krehbiel was the elder. When Krehbiel moved to Bockshof in 1790, Heinrich Funck became the elder. The following preachers are mentioned in this period: Jacob Mayer 1735-ca. 80, Jacob Plätscher 1761 until after 1802, Jacob Schmutz until about 1780, Michel Bachmann until about 1767, Samuel Bär about 1768-75, Friedrich Müller 1772-ca. 85, Johannes Neff from 1772, and Friedrich Müller from 1786.

At the Immelhäuserhof, near Immelhausen, a conference was held on Oct. 14, 1782, for the purpose of healing the breach between the Amish and the Reist Mennonites. The Swiss delegates were Peter Ramseier, Benedict Wälti, Hans Lehmann, Hans Steiner, and David Baumgartner; from the Palatinate were Christian Hege, Abraham Ellenberger, Johann Stauffer, Michael Stiess, and Johann Möllinger. HEGE, VDZ.

Müller, Berner Täufer, 210 and 213; C. Henry Smith, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the Eighteenth Century (Norristown, 1929) 184 and 196; ML II, 409 f.

Immersion, a mode of baptism in which the candidate is deeply immersed or completely submerged in water, either in a large baptismal font in the church or in a pool or stream in the open. All Mennonites of modern times who practice immersion follow the latter practice. Immersion may be single, forward (as in Krimmer M.B. practice) or backward (M.B. practice), or trine, forward (Brethren in Christ and Church of the Brethren). The practice of pouring upon the head of a candidate standing in a stream, as occasionally practiced in M.C., O.O.A., G.C.M., and some other groups, has no relation to immersion, although it is similar to a practice found in the second-century Christian Church. Immersion came into the M.B.C.-U.M. group through the Brethren in Christ (Swankites) group which merged with it in 1883.

Immersion was the most common practice in the early centuries of church history and on down into the Middle Ages, although the alternate modes of sprinkling and pouring were also used at times. By the time of the Reformation it had been almost entirely displaced in the West, though still practiced in the East.

Immersionists base their practice upon their sincere conviction that the New Testament Greek word for baptize (baptizo) means to immerse, upon the circumstantial evidence of certain cases of New Testament baptism (e.g., the Ethiopian eunuch and Jesus), and upon such Scriptures as Matt. 3:16, Acts 8:32, Col. 2:12, and Rom. 6:4. They hold that immersion best symbolizes the new birth experience of death and resurrection with Christ—death to the old life and resurrection to newness of life. The backward posture is based on the idea of burial, while the forward posture with its kneeling and bowing is held to symbolize Christ's suffering and death when He knelt in Gethsemane and bowed His head on the cross, as well as to reflect an attitude of submission by the candidate.

Immersionists are often exclusive in mode, recognizing no other mode as valid and requiring rebaptism of transfers who have not been immersed. This is generally the rule of the M.B. Church in Russia and North and South America, although it was not the case with the M.B. Conference of Ontario before it united with the M.B. General Conference in 1939. This conference had been organized originally (1924?) as an Evangelical M.B. group (Allianz-Gemeinde, q.v.), which practiced immersion but not rebaptism of transfers. No other immersionist Mennonite group, except the K.M.B., requires rebaptism.

All cases known to the writer of the introduction of immersion in Mennonite history, temporary or permanent, are given in the following paragraphs. Conrad Grebel, as an exception to early Anabaptist practice and at the insistence of the candidate, apparently baptized Wolfgang Ulimann by immersion in the Rhine River near Schaffhausen in February 1525. It is not to be understood, however, that Grebel or Ulimann intentionally adopted immersion as a variant form, but rather that Ulimann in his enthusiasm, like Peter who wanted not only his feet but his entire body washed, "did not want only to have a bowl of water poured over him but desired to be pressed under and covered over with water in the Rhine altogether naked" (reported in Johannes Kessler's Sabbata, printed in St. Gall, 1902, from the original contemporary manuscript).

Sebastian Franck, who in his Chronica (q.v.) of 1531 described a large variety of supposed Anabaptist groups, listing even their minor differences in practice, fails to mention the practice of immersion by any Anabaptist group. The only possible evidence to the contrary is that cited by Friedrich Roth, who quotes (p. 212) Clemens Sender's chronicle, De Ortu et Progressu, as saying that some rebaptisms were performed at Augsburg in the Lech River, whereby the men were naked, the women in bathing clothes; the mode of baptism is not stated. The same chronicle reports baptisms in Augsburg as being performed in the homes. It is also known that several of the Augsburg preachers had been baptized by pouring and used this mode in their baptizing.

The assertion that Menno Simons taught immersion is based upon two statements in which Menno refers in passing (not in a direct discussion of the mode of baptism) to baptism as a "dipping in the water" (induycken in den water) and as a "baptism in the water" (doopsel in den water). Krahn (p. 137) and Horsch ("Did Menno . . .") have shown, however, that Menno elsewhere refers to baptism as "receiving a handful of water" (handt vol waters) and as being baptized "with the water" (met dat water), and both conclude that Menno had in mind only one form, namely, that of pouring or sprinkling. Bernhardt Rothmann's Bekenntnisse von beyden Sacramenten (Münster, 1533) also speaks of baptism in dual terms as "inducking int water" and "int water gedumpelt werden," but says also that baptism means a dipping in (eyn induckinge) or sprinkling with water (waterbesprengung). Since there is documentary proof that baptism at Münster was performed by "pouring a little water on the head," it is clear that the terminology used by Rothmann was traditional and symbolical, and does not require the actual practice of immersion. The same is true of Menno Simons' terminology. Since immersion was little known in Western Christendom at this time (1530-60), although it was practiced in the Eastern Church, and since there is no evidence of any dispute among the Anabaptists of Western Germany or Holland about the mode, and since it is historically certain that pouring or sprinkling was practiced by the Anabaptists in this area, it is not very likely that Menno conceived practically of baptism as immersion in the modern sense.

Some Dutch Mennonites who were associated with the Collegiants (not an organized church, but a fellowship) were no doubt immersed, since the Collegiants (q.v.) twice a year practiced communion and conducted baptismal ceremonies by immersion at their center of Rijnsburg. Immersion was introduced in this group soon after it was established in 1619, probably under Polish Socinian influence (the first Socinian confession of 1574 specified immersion as the mode of baptism), since this was before the introduction of immersion by the English Baptists (1640), who actually took over immersion from the Collegiants.

Under Collegiant influence there was occasional practice of baptism by immersion in the Mennonite congregations at Amsterdam, Leiden, Rotterdam, Schiedam, and Surhuisterveen during the 17th and early 18th centuries. In Surhuisterveen it was a small group of newly immigrated Swiss Mennonites who for a time (ca. 1720) practiced immersion, possibly under Dompelaar influence. (There was a small Dompelaar group here until its emigration to Pennsylvania ca. 1720.)

Jan Tammes of Groningen was excommunicated in 1688 from the Old Flemish congregation there because he advocated immersion and freedom for all members to preach as was the case among the Collegiants. Adriaan Houttuyn (q.v., 1700-77), who was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Hoorn 1732-77, was an adherent of Collegiant principles including baptism by immersion. He published a booklet in 1752 givng reasons to prefer immersion above sprinkling, also a sermon on immersion in 1770 when he immersed at Rijnsburg.

Under Collegiant influence Arrien Jansen, a deacon in the Leeuwarden (Holland) Mennonite congregation, persuaded a part of the congregation to adopt immersion in 1715. Although in a short time affusion again replaced immersion, the stone immersion font remained in the meetinghouse until 1850. Jansen had promoted the idea since 1674 and caused much dissension. In 1720 he withdrew with his adherents but was readmitted to the congregation in 1725.

The immersion idea was strongly opposed by Bastiaan van Wenighem (1625-97, q.v.), an influential elder (ord. 1659) of the Rotterdam Mennonite congregation and a strong leader of the orthodox party with T. J. van Braght. He published two vigorous attacks on immersion in 1666 and 1668, Nootwendighe verantwoordinge van zeventien redenen and Ganze Natuere des Doops. He was attacked in turn by the Collegiant Joan Arentsz in Eindelijck Verklaringe der gedoopte Christenen (1668).

Under the influence of an English Baptist a small part (two preachers and 15 members) of the Hamburg, Germany, congregation adopted immersion and separated from the main body in 1648-50. They were called Dompelaars (q.v.), and continued to worship in the Hamburg Mennonite meetinghouse until 1708, when they built a church of their own. With the death in 1748 of their last preacher, Jacob Denner (q.v.), they became extinct.

In Crefeld a small Dompelaar movement stirred up the question of immersion ca. 1700-30 in the Mennonite Church. Gosen Goyen (q.v.), one of the Crefeld Mennonite preachers, was baptized by immersion in the Rhine in 1724. How many members of the Crefeld Mennonites followed Goyen is not known. Jan Crous, who was also a Crefeld Mennonite preacher, opposed Goyen. The small group of pietistic Dompelaars of this area migrated to Pennsylvania in 1719 to become the Church of the Brethren there, who of course practiced immersion.

The Cornelis Ris Confession of 1766 (Hoorn, Holland) says, "We understand under a baptism an immersion or submersion of the entire body in water, or a copious sprinkling of the same (which last mode we in these northern regions almost universally consider more proper, since the benefits [of baptism] are represented thereby)." Since the footnotes of Ris at this point submit a number of reasons against immersion, evidently the recognition of immersion by the Ris Confession as a valid form of baptism was purely theoretical, and immersion was not intended to be practiced by those using the confession; they practiced sprinkling.

Steven Blaupot ten Cate (Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Friesland, 1839) asserts that the Ukowallist or Groningen Old Flemish group in Holland (begun in 1630) practiced baptism by immersion, but an earlier detailed description given by Jehring in 1720 (Gründliche Historie, 224) of a Ukowallist baptismal service states that the elder "took a dish full of water, . . . knelt down beside the candidates, and baptized each one separately."

The small group of Mennonites in Baden, Germany, who in 1858 followed Michael Hahn (q.v.) and are known as the "Hahnische" Mennonites, adopted immersion.

The newly organized Mennonite Brethren group in South Russia, which had its official beginning in the Molotschna settlement on Jan. 6, 1860, adopted immersion in September 1860. Friesen says (Brüderschaft, 245): "The Molotschna M.B. congregation came independently to its concept and practice of baptism without personal contact or correspondence with the Baptists, but influenced by their writings." But the M.B. congregation in the Chortitza settlement did not adopt immersion until 1862. A. H. Unruh in his Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde says, "Abr. Unger came into a connection with the Baptist preacher Oncken, and it was under this influence that the question of baptism arose"; in other words, immersion.

A primary source regarding the introduction of immersion into the new movement is the diary of Jakob Becker, now in the Tabor College Library. According to this document Johann Claassen, who had been in St. Petersburg, first brought the idea of immersion to Becker and Bartel and convinced them that the Scripture required immersion. He also gave them a booklet on baptism, "in which I found explained by various doctors and theologians what baptism is. . . . When I with Heinrich Bartel had searched the book through, we were fully convinced that we had not received a Scriptural baptism." A. H. Unruh (p. 67) says that Jakob Reimer was stirred up on the question of baptism by reading the life story of Ann Judson, the Baptist missionary in Burma. Friesen (242) says this was in 1837, and that Reimer's father had learned of immersionists on a journey to Prussia in 1835. Becker, apparently not knowing of Reimer's attitude, says under date of June 9, 1860, "We knew at that time as yet nothing of an immersion," and indicates that Claassen first brought up the question of mode in connection with the commission of Becker to baptize two women. Becker reports that he then decided to find out what Menno Simons taught on baptism, since the original M.B. declaration of Jan. 6, 1860 (Ausgangsschrift), declared "that we in all other points agree with Menno Simons." He was satisfied when he found that Menno taught that the apostolic baptism was nothing else than "in unhindered water" (im unbeschwerten Wasser), gathering that this meant immersion in a stream of running water. Becker adds that he discovered further that "several had become acquainted with immersion through books and periodicals, who then also stood for it vigorously." Some additional immersionist literature read, according to Friesen largely introduced through Reimer, was: a tract published by the Free Evangelical Church in St. Gall, Switzerland, in which baptism by immersion was practiced; a tract of Baptist origin; a magazine Friedensglocke; and some "old books in which the baptism by immersion" was explained. After studying diligently the Word of God, Menno Simons' works, and other Christian literature, a number were convinced that immersion was the Scriptural baptism. The first application of the new convictions about the mode of baptism occurred on Sept. 23, 1860, in the stream Kuruschan in the Molotschna settlement (half way between Waldheim and Gnadenfeld), when Becker baptized Bartel, Bartel in turn baptized Becker, and Becker then baptized three others in the presence of a "carriage full of brethren and sisters." Other baptisms followed on Oct. 9 and 14. Some prominent leaders of the M.B. movement, such as Heinrich Hübert and Jakob Reimer, were baptized later (May 1861) and only Johann Claassen on June 30, 1862, when most of the members had been baptized. Some of those that were baptized in 1860 were baptized by kneeling in the water and dipping forward three times. At Easter of 1861 it was, however, decided that the mode of baptizing once backwards symbolizes more closely the burial of the Lord Jesus Christ and since that time this mode was the only one used.

About the same time, 1861, under the influence of the Baptist preacher Alf, several Mennonites of the congregation near Adamov, Poland, received baptism by immersion; but they did not unite with the Baptists because they differed on the oath, nonresistance, and footwashing, and because some were immersed forward. The Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (q.v.), founded in 1869 in the Crimea, adopted immersion at once as their sole mode of baptism. Elder J. A. Wiebe (q.v.), the founder, states in a manuscript, "The Form of Baptism of the K.M.B. Church," after giving Scriptural evidence for baptism while kneeling, "In the small Martyrs' Mirror (i.e., Isaac von Dühren's Geschichte der Märtyrer, 2nd ed., sold by Gottlieb Schad, Molotschna, 1863) it says clearly on page 8, 'At that time (i.e., in the first century) baptizing was not sprinkling, but the entire person was dipped in and under.' " This supports his initial statement, "We were anxious to have our form of baptism as taught in God's Word and as practiced by the apostolic churches during the persecution times." Wiebe also interpreted certain passages in Menno Simons' works as indicating that Menno taught immersion.

The Allianz-Gemeinde (Evangelical Mennonite Church), founded in the Ukraine in 1905-7, practiced baptism by immersion but without requiring rebaptism of unimmersed transfers; its daughter groups in North and South America have done the same.

In North America immersion was made the exclusive mode of baptism by the River Brethren (Brethren in Christ) Church at its founding in 1770, under Dunkard (Church of the Brethren) influence. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ (now largely United Missionary Church) from the beginning (1875) made the mode of baptism optional, but gradually immersion came into favor; in 1896 it was made the exclusive form. The Missionary Church Association broke off from the Defenseless Mennonites in 1896, partly on the point of making immersion the exclusive mode of baptism.

The E.M.B. Church, which long used pouring only, changed over to immersion about 1925 (by local congregational option, not by conference decision); only one congregation still practices pouring only, and one other permits immersion on request by the candidate. The Evangelical Mennonites (formerly Defenseless Mennonites) originally had only pouring, but now make the mode optional; a growing minority of baptisms are performed by immersion. The Emmanuel independent church at Meade, Kan., has only immersion since 1950. The Apostolic Christian Church, organized in 1832 in Switzerland, adopted immersion as its mode of baptism, requiring its Mennonite fraction (from the Emmental congregation) to be rebaptized. A preacher of this group (Benedict Weyeneth) who visited the Amish Mennonite congregation at Croghan, N.Y., succeeded in detaching a large part of the membership and ministers in 1852 and organizing them as an Apostolic Christian congregation, having led them to believe that immersion was the only true form of baptism.

While the remaining North American Mennonite bodies all recognize immersion as valid baptism and do not require rebaptism of transfers, only with rare exceptions do they allow immersion as an optional mode.

The intensity of feeling by some immersionist Mennonite groups, particularly on requirement of rebaptism of transfers with its attendant implication of invalidation of baptism by pouring or sprinkling, has added at times to the difficulties hindering good inter-Mennonite relations. This was earlier true also of the relations between the Church of the Brethren and Mennonites. On the other hand, the identity of baptismal doctrine and practice between Mennonite Brethren and Baptists has resulted in a greater openness to Baptist influence, both in North America and Russia, and has resulted in some M.B. transfers to the Baptists, both of ministers and members.

Occasionally certain claims for immersion have been made by Baptist and Mennonite historians; e.g., that Menno taught and practiced immersion, that "most Anabaptist congregations gave the baptismal candidates free choice of mode" (implying that immersion was recognized and practiced by the Anabaptists as an alternate mode), and that "there always were immersionists among the Mennonites, at least until 1750 or later." The latter two claims made by Friesen (Brüderschaft, p. 249) were taken over from the French Baptist historian, C. A. Ramseyer (Histoire des Baptistes, 1897). But general Anabaptist recognition of immersion or practice of it on an optional basis has not been demonstrated, as is seen above. The general historic practice of Mennonites up to 1860, with few exceptions, was pouring or sprinkling. (See further Baptism and Baptists, ME I.) H.S.B.

In addition to the literature given in the article "Baptism," the following should be noted: J. Horsch, "Did Menno Simons Practice Baptism by Immersion?" MQR (1927) 54-56; A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde 1860-1954 (Winnipeg, 1954), particularly "Die Einführung der Tauchtaufe," 67-81; E. Händiges, Die Lehre der Mennoniten in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Ludwigshafen, 1921); J. Horsch, Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Elkhart, 1890). The following writings by Mennonites, all but the first being brief treatises, usually include a treatment of the mode of baptism, and several are polemical anti-immersionist tracts: Heinrich Funck, Ein Spiegel der Taufe (Germantown, 1744; English editions 1851 and later); Peter Burkholder, Eine Verhandlung von der Aeusserlichen Wasser-Taufe (Harrisonburg, 1816); Johannes Risser, Glaube und Lehre von der Taufe der Mennoniten in Deutschland (Berlin, Canada, 1845); J. Holdeman, Eine Vertheidigung gegen die Verfälscher unserer Schriften, wie auch eine Erklärung und Erläuterung der Absicht der Christlichen Taufe (Lancaster, 1865); The Bible Mode of Baptism, By Different Authors (Published by Abraham Blosser, Dale Enterprise, Va., 1884); Isaak Peters, Die christliche Wassertaufe, ihr Zweck und ihre Bedeutung (Elkhart, ca. 1901); L. J. Heatwole, Baptism Shown to be a Ceremony of Consecration (Elkhart, 1902); L. H. Shank, Bible Mode of Baptism (Elkhart, ca. 1900); E. J. Berkey, The Bible Mode of Baptism (Warrenton, 1906); Heinrich Donner, Unterricht von der heiligen Wassertaufe (printed at Tiegenhof, 1906, reprint of a first edition of 1792).

Imperial Recesses (Reichsabschiede) against the Anabaptists. The legislation of the diet or parliament (Reichstag) of the Holy Roman (German) Empire against the Anabaptists is an important source of information for Anabaptist history. Furthermore, the mandates passed by the diet had considerable influence on the legislation of the subsidiary units of the empire against the Anabaptists, although because of the weakness of the imperial executive authority the mandates were not always executed by the component states. As the supreme legislative body of the Empire the position taken by it, to be sure, had great weight in setting the tone for Europe as a whole in this matter of the Anabaptists, namely, one of harsh persecution intended to effect the complete destruction of the movement. The entire text of all the recesses 1528-66, together with the imperial mandates based upon them, has been published by Gustav Bossert, Sr., in his edition of the Anabaptist documents for Württemberg (TA Württemberg, 1929). The contents of the most important recesses is given in the following paragraphs.

The recess of Speyer (q.v.) of 1529, Sections 6 and 7, deals with Anabaptism, which is called an ancient heresy: "Each and every Anabaptist and rebaptized person, man or woman of an accountable age, shall be sentenced . . . and brought from life to death by fire, sword, or the like according to the occasion and the person. And the seditious revolutionaries of the notorious blasphemy of rebaptism will . . . by no means be pardoned. But he who confesses his error to recant it, and is willing to accept the punishment and show penitence for it, and would ask for mercy, he may, according to his condition of rank, nature, and youth, be pardoned. But he who disregards these in the opinion that infant baptism is naught, he shall, if he persists therein, be considered an Anabaptist and subject to the above imperial mandate. And none shall be pardoned and be assigned to other places, but shall be bound to stay in his country, which then has to exercise diligent watchfulness that none of these converts backslides. Whoever gives the Anabaptists shelter or help, does not treat them sternly and tolerate them, falls under the ban of the empire." The mandate of Charles V of April 1529, with the same content, then follows.

Section 11 of the imperial recess of Augsburg (q.v.) of Nov. 19, 1530, has the following to say about the Anabaptists: "Some have taught that infant baptism is naught, but that every person when he comes to understanding shall be baptized again; also they do not consider baptism a sacrament. Thereby some have given up all the Christian order and prayers, which are held at baptism, and have made others." Section 10 says: "Regarding the Anabaptists we will retain the decisions and decrees that have been issued, which we want to have renewed here with the counsel and the consent of the electors, princes, and nobility, and decree that children everywhere be baptized . . . ."

The recess of Worms of April 25, 1535, concerns principally the Münster (q.v.) Anabaptists and their "accursed teaching," the tyranny of the tailor who was made their king, the siege of the city and the assistance offered in the siege by the estates to punish the unchristian tyranny. This is the tenor of all the 60 paragraphs. Thus Sections 42 and 43 say that if the temporal authorities do not have sufficient power, the neighboring estates are to assist them, with the exception of those who are in need of help themselves. Paragraph 44, concerning "prevention of future sedition," states that it had been decided in the name of the electors, princes, and other estates for the prevention of these accursed sects and the avoidance of further mischief, because the Anabaptists move from land to land, that neither electors nor princes or other estates shall accept such foreign unknown persons as subjects and citizens in their dominions, without having first ascertained that they are not followers of rebaptism. Section 45 commands that no writings, books, or other material that might promote the accursed sect of Anabaptism shall be printed or offered for sale, but the transgressor shall be severely, quickly punished.

The recess of Speyer of June 10, 1544, Section 74, orders, that since the dangerous and seductive sect of Anabaptists is gaining the upper hand in the Holy Roman Empire Charles has made an agreement with the estates to this effect that whether in the cities or in the country, if one has the duty of denouncing and another the duty of arresting; if the denouncer is negligent, the one who has the duty to arrest shall have the authority to seize the Anabaptists and proceed against them in accord with the decrees. Also the negligent denouncer shall be punished. But all authorities in whose domain such persons are arrested shall diligently strive to have them converted through their scholars and theologians.

The imperial recess of Augsburg of Feb. 14, 1551, states in Sections 87-94 that all Anabaptists of accountable age who do not obey the authorities and swear the required oaths, or are unwilling to recognize any authority shall be executed by fire, sword, or the like. The leaders and preachers of the vice of rebaptism shall by no means be pardoned, but shall be earnestly dealt with, both those who persist in their error and those who fall back into it. But those who confess their error and are willing to recant may, according to rank, nature, youth, and other circumstances, be pardoned.

The imperial recess of Augsburg of Sept. 25, 1555, Section 17, states that all other creeds with the exception of the Catholic and the Augsburg (Lutheran) are not meant in the religious peace, but are wholly excluded. Therewith the general imperial recesses against the Anabaptists close. Concurrently there are, however, the much more numerous mandates (q.v.) and decrees of the individual rulers and imperial cities, issued on the basis of the above recesses or on their own initiative. LOSERTH.

E. A. Koch and H. C. von Lenckenberg, Neue und vollständigere Sammlung der Reichsabschiede (Frankfurt, 1747); ML III, 450 f.

In the Service of the King, a 16-page bimonthly official organ of the Bethel Deaconess Home and Hospital Society, Newton, Kan., was begun in January 1942 with ten issues per year, changing in October 1949 to five (now six) issues. The circulation (free) is 2,800. Editors have been Sister Frieda Kauffman 1942-44, Joanna S. Andres 1944-54, Ernst Harder 1955-56, and H. J. Andres 1956- . H.S.B.

Inanwatan, in the northwest part (called Vogelkop, i.e., Bird's Head) of the island of New Guinea (a Dutch colony). Here the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association opened a mission on Oct. 1, 1950, taking over this area from the Dutch Reformed Church. The Papuas living in this section were partly Christianized in 1915-25. There are now about 60 congregations and mission stations. R. E. H. Marcus, who has been preaching here since October 1950, is now the missionary-pastor, assisted by a large number of native preachers and teachers. From October 1950 to May 1956 P. Messie also served as pastor. In the spring of 1954 Teminabuan (q.v.) became the center of the mission work. vdZ.

Incarnation of Christ, a doctrine which has been a subject of controversy at various times in church history. Those emphasizing the humanity of Christ at the cost of His deity are probably better known than those emphasizing the divinity more than the humanity. A large wing of the early Anabaptists emphasized the deity of Christ more than the regular Catholic and Protestant churches did, with their historic orthodox creeds. However, this emphasis did not originate with the Anabaptists, but had its roots in early Christendom. The Valentinians at the time of Tertullian emphasized the divinity of Christ and minimized His humanity to the point that they considered Christ born of the Virgin Mary as if He had been passing through her body "as through a pipe," taking none of her human flesh, in order to assure that the Saviour had "other flesh" than that of fallen man so that He would not have part in original sin. Even stronger is the emphasis placed on this by the Gnostic Marcion. Apollinaris and his followers continued this line of thought emphasizing that only thus humanity has a guarantee of salvation. "Our human nature was accepted by Him so that He became a perfect organ of God" (Schoeps, 13). During the Middle Ages this particular emphasis almost completely disappeared with the exception of such groups as the Bogomiles and Cathars. During the Reformation this concern reoccurs particularly among some of the "left-wing" reformers.

In a recent study devoted to this subject, H. J. Schoeps (Vom himmlischen Fleisch Christi, 1951) states that Caspar Schwenckfeld was the first of the reformers to emphasize the teaching of the "heavenly flesh" of Christ and that he was directly influenced by the Greek Fathers (26). Schwenckfeld believed in a sinless "glorified humanity" of Christ. "If Christ had the characteristics of a sinful creation, He could not represent us in the presence of God" (28). Schoeps states that Schwenckfeld's concern in this matter was that mankind can be "glorified" or become divine only if Christ was divine. His Christology was closely related to his views regarding the Lord's Supper. "Only through Christ's heavenly body is the spiritual influence from above guaranteed, because only through the glorified humanity of the risen Christ can believers be filled and fed with the Holy Spirit" (36). "Through His spiritualized, raised, and glorified (divine) flesh, Christ, as a second Adam, draws mankind toward Himself into spirituality" (36).

Melchior Hofmann was the originator of this peculiar teaching regarding the incarnation of Christ, as far as the early Anabaptists are concerned. To what extent he was influenced by Schwenckfeld or Sebastian Franck, whom he met in Strasbourg, has not yet been conclusively established. Schwenckfeld says concerning his influence along these lines, "They have both (Hofmann and Franck) taken their errors from our truth, like spiders who suck poison out of a beautiful flower" (Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum V, 522 f.). Even though the above influences may have started Hofmann out on his way along these lines, he soon went his own way. It has been definitely established that Hofmann's ideas were taken over by Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, and other representatives of the early Dutch Anabaptists, who added hardly anything new.

This peculiar view regarding the Incarnation was widespread among the early Dutch Anabaptists. That it was also found among the followers of Melchior Hofmann in South Germany as late as 1555 is apparent in the introduction to the "Agreement of the brethren and elders congregated at Strasbourg regarding the question of the source of Christ's flesh," which stated that the ministers and elders had been approached to give an account along these lines by "the followers of Hofmann, as well as the Dutch brethren." This distinction between the two would indicate that some of them were located in South Germany or in the vicinity of Strasbourg (Brons, 97). At this Anabaptist conference it was emphasized that since the Bible states both that Christ had His flesh from heaven and that He received it from Mary we should "not attempt to know more than can be known," and "that reason should be subordinated to the obedience of Christ."

One of the basic differences between the early Dutch Anabaptist leaders and Schwenckfeld was the claim of the Dutch that Christ was born "in Mary" and not "of Mary," that Mary did not furnish the flesh of the Saviour, but merely His nourishment. Schwenckfeld does not go so far, stating that Christ received the "flesh and tabernacle of His body from Mary, the virgin," and emphasizes that he is not "Hoffmenisch," although he considers the flesh of Christ of "divine origin" (Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VII, 304). Schwenckfeld's views are closely related to his peculiar view of the "deification" of the children of God, in which process he considered it necessary that the flesh of Christ be of divine origin. Hofmann's and Menno's views are closely related to their concept of the Christian church. The church of Christ, which is the body of Christ, can only be transformed into this fitting close relationship to Him if the sole cause of this act is Jesus Christ, her Saviour and head. The church, or the body of Christ, can be without wrinkle and blemish only if Christ was without sin and His human substance was of divine origin. Franck, who shared somewhat the Anabaptist emphasis on the divinity of Christ, did not have their concern regarding the establishment of a visible, pure church and he, therefore, did not agree with them along these lines.

It is here where an apparently speculative thought becomes a basic doctrine of salvation. It was because of this reasoning that the peculiar view regarding the incarnation of Christ became a very important doctrine for Menno and his followers. Although Menno asserts (Complete Writings, 430, 439) that he is not particularly teaching and preaching this view, but that he is constantly being lured to defend it, we must conclude that he would not have been so voluminous in writing about this subject and defending it if it had not been basic for him, and that he would not have been attacked by his opponents if he had kept this as a "secret" doctrine. At nearly all public discussions with opponents this matter was on the agenda and discussed in detail. For him and his followers this was an essential part of their doctrine. This is also evidenced by the fact that Adam Pastor was ousted because he stressed the humanity of Christ, and denied His essential deity because he thought God and man (Jesus) could not be of the same essence (Krahn, 67 ff.). In oral and written discussions, this doctrine was a matter of controversy between Menno and a Lasco, Micron, and Faber, as well as at official religious debates at Leeuwarden and Emden. In the writings of Melchior Hofmann, Menno Simons, and Dirk Philips this subject matter is discussed, defended and elaborated on at length. They object seriously to speaking of two "persons" in Christ, the divine and the human, on the grounds that the divine act in the birth of Christ cannot be described in these terms.

At the great Anabaptist conference at Strasbourg in 1555 it was emphasized that since the Bible states both that Christ had His flesh from heaven and that He received it from Mary we should "not attempt to know more than can be known" and "that reason should be subordinated to the obedience of Christ." When pressed by the Reformed for answers along these lines at the Frankenthal Disputation in 1571, the Anabaptists seem to have been intentionally unexplicit. The question posed was: "Concerning Christ. Whether Christ received the nature of His flesh from the substance of the flesh of the Virgin Mary or elsewhere." This question is definitely directed against the teaching of Melchior Hofmann along these lines. Diebold Winter finally said, "We request time to think it over. We are flooded with many words. If there is anything to them we cannot grasp it. We must fear God and cannot yet accept them in such manner."

In an undated edict against the Anabaptists Philip of Hesse stated that "those who hold that Christ did not receive His humanity from the blood of Mary through the work of the Holy Spirit" (TA Hessen, 33) were not permitted to live in his realm. This would indicate that there were some followers of Hofmann in South Germany who shared his views on the incarnation. Also Caspar Schwenckfeld stated that "many Anabaptists, particularly in Alsace and the Netherlands," held this view and that he had "debated with many of them, also with M. Hofmann, and proven by Scripture that Christ had really taken His flesh from the Virgin Mary" (Schoeps, 28). This is a quotation from his book Vom Fleisch Christi . . . (1561). Already around 1540 he had written a booklet Vom Fleische Christi . . . in which he attacked Melchior Hofmann (Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VII, 281 ff.). In his letter to W. Thalhäuser dated Feb. 1, 1539 (Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VI, 483), he states that he has succeeded in convincing some of the followers of Hofmann, including leaders, to accept the true teaching concerning the incarnation of Christ. How widespread Hofmann's views pertaining to this doctrine were in Middle and South Germany has not been studied. That they may have been present as late as 1577 is possible, since the Formula of Concord (q.v.) starts its condemnation of the Anabaptists under "Intolerable Articles Concerning the Church" with the statement: "That Christ did not receive His body and blood from the Virgin Mary, but brought them with Him from heaven." The body of Täuferakten, most of which have been published, must be examined to determine to what extent these views were actually represented among the Middle and South German Anabaptists if at all. There is no evidence of it among any of the numerous Hutterite documents.

The early Anabaptist confessions of faith and writings of the Low Countries emphasize this teaching strongly. The public debates between the Reformed and the Anabaptists of Emden (1578) and Leeuwarden (1596) cover it in great detail. During the 17th century some of the more liberal groups began to give up this doctrine and it thus became one of the first typical Dutch Mennonite characteristics to be dropped. However, the fact that the Catalogus (181-84) lists more than two dozen writings on this subject printed during this century indicates that this was by no means a dead issue in the Dutch brotherhood at this time. When S. F. Rues visited the Dutch Mennonites during the first half of the 18th century, only the conservative groups such as the Old Flemish and the Danzigers were still adhering unitedly to this doctrine (Rues, Aufrichtige Nachrichten, 16), while the progressive Mennonites had given up Menno's view and agreed in this matter with the rest of Christendom (p. 97). The Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) and other influences had overshadowed this teaching, and its significance in connection with the attempt to establish a true church "without spot or wrinkle" had been lost sight of. However, such books as the Old Flemish Onderwyzing des Christelyken Geloofs . . . by Pieter Boudewyns of 1743, still strongly emphasized this view. This book was reprinted as late as 1825. By 1800 this peculiar view, with a few exceptions, had been forgotten as a "Mennonite doctrine." A complete study of this doctrine and its later development in Holland and other countries (such as Prussia) has not yet been made. (See also Trinity, Formula of Concord, Frankenthal Disputation.) C.K.

Menno Simons' Complete Writings (Scottdale, 1956); Dirk Philips, BRN X (135-53); Melchior Hofmann, BRN V (125-70, 210-14); H. J. Schoeps, Vom himmlischen Fleisch Christi (Tübingen, 1951); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); I. E. Burkhart, "Menno Simons on the Incarnation," MQR IV (1930) 113-39, 178-207; VI (1932) 122-23; W. J. Leendertz, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1883); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Leiden, 1885); A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905); A. Dorner, Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi II (Berlin, 1853) 637-43; John Horsch, Menno Simons (Scottdale, 1916); Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum V, VI, VII (Leipzig, 1916 ff.); Ch. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 124 f.; TA Baden-Pfalz; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Amsterdam, 1912) 97 ff.; Peter Kawerau, Melchior Hoffman als religiöser Denker (Haarlem, 1954); ML III, 113-15.

Incorporation: see Legal Status.

India Calling is a quarterly publication of 12 to 14 pages, published by the General Conference Mennonite Church missionaries in India, beginning with Aug. 1, 1940. It presents mission and church news of the work in Raipur, Bilaspur, and Sarjuga districts, Madhya Pradesh, India. Editors have been S. T. Moyer, Mrs. F. J. Isaac, Mrs. P. A. Wenger, Edward Burkhalter, and Kenneth Bauman. It is printed in Newton, Kan. W.K.

India Mennonite Conference (MC) is the name given to the church conference that came into being coextensive with the American Mennonite Mission with headquarters at Dhamtari in the Central Provinces (since 1950 called Madhya Pradesh), India. The American Mennonite Mission began work in the area in 1899, but the India Mennonite Conference was not organized until January 1912. At that time its total membership was 488.

J. S. Hartzler and J. S. Shoemaker visited the India Mission during 1910-11 and with the help of missionaries M. C. Lapp and P. A. Friesen drew up a constitution with rules and discipline for the India Mennonite Conference. The first session of the Conference convened the first Tuesday of January 1912 in the Bethel Church at Balodgahan. Conference membership consisted of all missionaries (men and women), two lay delegates from each congregation for the first 50 members, and two delegates for every additional 50 members or fraction thereof.

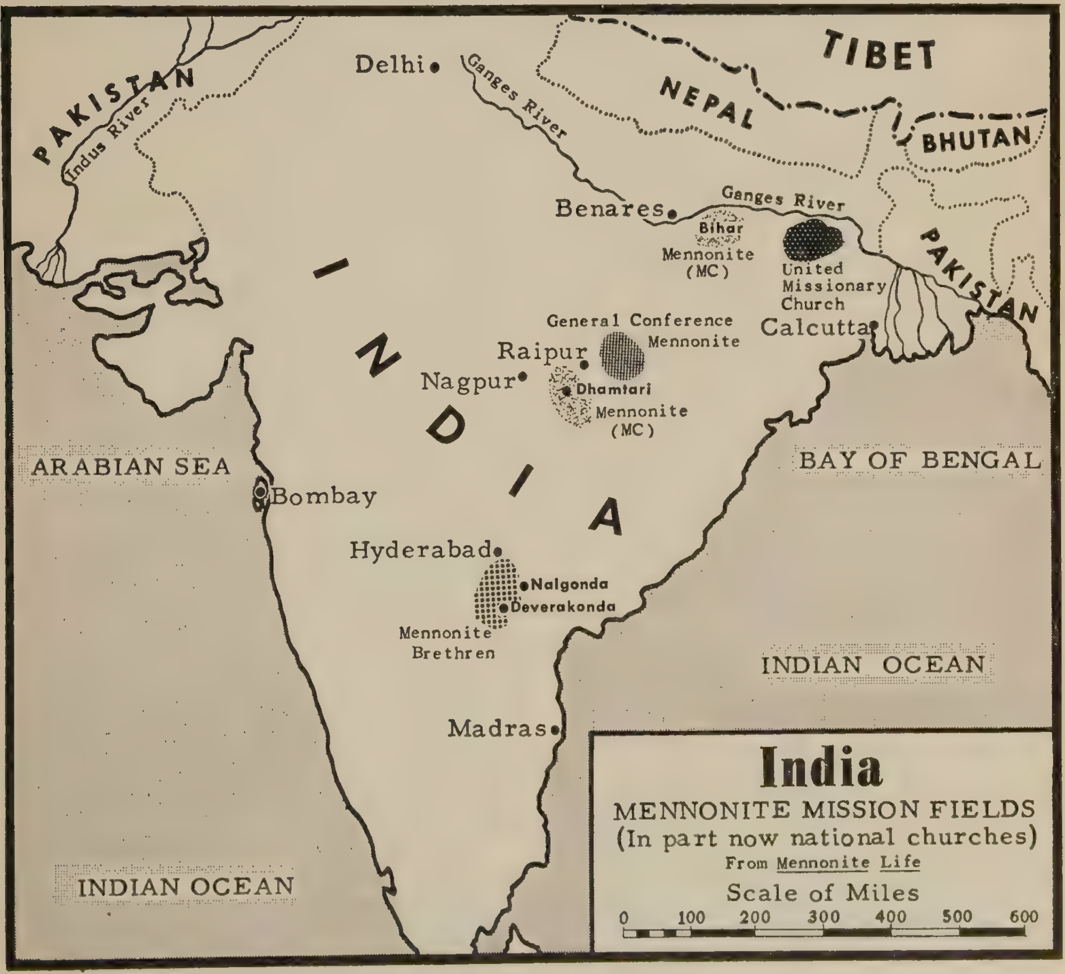
The church ordained four Indian deacons in 1913, and the first Indian minister was ordained on April 30, 1927. In 1953 the figures for ordained nationals in the India church were: deacons 6, ministers 8, and deaconess 1. The constitution of the conference was revised in 1928-29, placing the Conference on a sounder basis organizationally and bringing matters of procedure and discipline up to date. Now conference membership consisted only of ordained persons (lay missionaries and missionary women were no longer members) and the same system of lay representation of two for the first 50 and two for every additional 50 members or fraction thereof was maintained. In 1955 the membership was 1,507.

Another milestone was reached in the Conference on July 1, 1952, when the American Mennonite Mission and the India Mennonite Church were merged under the name "The Mennonite Church in India." The basis of membership remained the same, but the Executive Committee was enlarged to a total of 14 members. The entire work of the church was now organized under four councils of approximately nine members each as follows: (1) evangelistic and pastoral, (2) educational and charitable institutions, (3) medical, and (4) economic aid. Indian pastors are in charge of all the larger congregations and are supported fully by the Indian Church. Missionaries appointed to the area serve co-operatively within the conference framework. Thus the indigenous church is being developed with her roots in the soil of India and with Christ as her head. J.D.G.

India, Mennonite Missions in. In 1957 there were five distinct Mennonite mission fields in India, all operated by North American Mennonite mission boards. They are given below with statistical information, in order of origin: (1) Mennonite Church (MC), state of Madhya Pradesh, language Hindi, area 5,000 sq. mi., field pop. 1,000,000, baptized members 1,500, arrival of first missionaries in India March 24, 1899; (2) Mennonite Brethren, state of Andhra Pradesh (Hyderabad), area 5,000 sq. mi.,



PAKISTAN
Indus River
Delhi
Ganges River
TIBET
NEPAL
BHUTAN
Benares
Ganges River
Bihar
Mennonite
(MC)
United Missionary Church
PAKISTAN
Calcutta
General Conference
Mennonite
Raipur
Nagpur
Dhamtari
Mennonite
(MC)
INDIA
ARABIAN SEA
BAY OF BENGAL
Bombay
Hyderabad
Nalgonda
Deverakonda
Mennonite
Brethren
INDIAN OCEAN
Madras
INDIAN OCEAN
Scale of Miles
0 100 200 300 400 500 600

India
MENNONITE MISSION FIELDS
(In part now national churches)
From Mennonite Life

pop. 2,500,000, members 23,000, language Telegu, arrival of first missionaries Oct. 27, 1899; (3) General Conference Mennonite Church, state of Madhya Pradesh, language Hindi, area 4,000 sq. mi. (to which a second contiguous field was recently added), pop. 1,000,000, members 3,600, first missionary arrival Dec. 9, 1900; (4) United Missionary Church, state of Bihar, language Bengali, area 1,500 sq. mi., pop. 400,000, first missionary arrival 1925, members 600; a second field was opened in Calcutta in 1956; (5) Mennonite Church (MC), second field, state of Bihar, language Hindi, area 4,200 sq. mi., pop. 1,000,000, members 110, established in January 1940. See the map for locations of the fields.

Thus the five Mennonite missions in India today, after almost 60 years of work, have a total of roughly 29,000 members, three fourths of them in the M.B. field. Methods of working have included direct evangelism, educational, medical, and industrial missions, and also leprosy work. The three oldest missions have been major efforts, each with a staff of 30 to 40 missionaries at their height. The M.C. mission in Madhya Pradesh was terminated in 1952, and the direction of the entire work transferred to the indigenous church, although missionaries are still sent to the field in small numbers. The other missions are still operating as American missions, but are working toward indigenization. The G.C.M. mission has taken over an adjoining area from the British Baptists. The M.C., G.C.M., and U.M.C. cooperate with the Union Theological Seminary at Yeotmal, furnishing certain staff members. For a more detailed account of the several American missions in India see the pertinent articles on the entire missions as well as on the major stations and institutions.

The only European Mennonite Mission in India was the work carried on by the Mennonite Brethren in the state of Hyderabad 1890-1914 under the American Baptist Missionary Union. The work, officially supported by the conference, was begun in 1890 by Abraham Friesen, who had been trained at the Baptist Theological Seminary in Hamburg, Germany. It was not an independent work, but rather a portion of the Baptist field and under Baptist general administration. The coming of World War II forced the closing of the work because of difficulties of travel and remission of funds; so the entire field reverted to the Baptists. The missionaries on the field at that time joined the Baptist Church and remained as Baptist workers. In 1910 the membership under their direction had reached 3,000. At its height the Russian M.B. staff in India was seven. The center of their work was Nalgonda. It was to this place that the first American M.B. missionaries came. They located their field adjacent to the Russian M.B. field. The M.B. Church had been visited earlier by representatives of the Russian missionaries and had been giving some financial support to the Russian work. J.T., H.S.B.

Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931); A. E. Janzen, Survey of Mennonite Brethren Missions (Hillsboro, 1950); G. W. Peters, The Growth of Mennonite Brethren Foreign Missions (Hillsboro, 1952); Mrs. H. T. Esau, First Sixty Years of Mennonite Brethren Missions (Hillsboro, 1954); Twenty-Five Years with God in India (GCM, Berne, 1929); R. Ratzlaff, Fellowship in the Gospel in India, 1900-1950 (GCM, Newton, 1950); S. T. Moyer, With Christ in the Edge of the Jungles (GCM, Berne, 1941); G. J. Lapp, Our Mission in India (MC, Scottdale, 1921); Building on the Rock (MC, Scottdale, 1926); The Love of Christ Hath Constrained Us (MC, Scottdale, 1949); E. R. Storms, What God Hath Wrought, The Story of the Foreign Missionary Effort of the United Missionary Church (Springfield, 1949); M. C. Lehman, Our Mission Work in India (Elkhart, 1939); Mary M. Good, The Mennonite Church in India (Elkhart, 1955); C. G. Esch, Fiftieth Anniversary Souvenir Booklet, 1906-1956 (Elkhart, 1956).

Indian Cove Mennonite Church (MC), located in a small irrigated farming community in Owyhee County, southern Idaho, near Hammett, a member of the Pacific Coast Conference, was organized in 1935, the first Mennonite settlers, Aaron S. Brubaker and family, having come from Mahoning Co., Ohio, in 1926. Two ministers, A. M. Shenk of Nampa, Ida., and Paul J. Hooley of Limon, Col., were among the 19 charter members. In 1954 the membership was 72, with Paul W. Miller and Amos Shenk as ministers, and Menno S. Snyder as deacon. M.S.S.

Indian Industrial School, Halstead, Kan., was established in 1885 jointly by the Mission Board of the General Conference Mennonite Church and the Halstead Seminary. The school was started with 15 Indian children from Oklahoma, who received regular training in schoolwork and agriculture, housekeeping, and Christian living. In 1887 the school was moved to the Christian Krehbiel farm about one mile southeast from Halstead. During the school year the children received regular instruction and during the summer they helped on the farm, where they lived as a large family. In his report to the Mission Board in 1892-93 Christian Krehbiel stated that he had again received a contract from the government to take 30 pupils for the school year, for each of whom he would receive $125. In 1896 the government discontinued this contract policy of schools for the Indians. Thus after eleven years of operation the Indian Industrial School was closed. Both the Indians and the Mennonite constituency, which was aroused to greater mission efforts, gained by this enterprise. Reports were published in Christlicher Bundesbote. C.K.

H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of South America I (1898) 306-9; Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931) 141-43.

Indian Missions of the General Conference Mennonite Church, from 1880 to 1953. The unifying principle of the General Conference Mennonite Church at its origin was to carry on home and foreign missions. The word "foreign" meant missions among heathen not yet under the influence of the Gospel. Hence when an opening was found in the Indian Territory, now the state of Oklahoma, to carry on mission work among the Arapaho Indians, a school was built for about 25 pupils at Darlington. Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Haury arrived there in May 1880. In a few months other workers arrived, and by August 1881 the school building was completed. On Feb. 19, 1882, this building was destroyed by fire, and four small children lost their lives, among them the infant son Karl of the Haury family.

Despite this terrific loss so early in the mission work, plans were made to build again. A brick building was put up, and when the government buildings at Cantonment, 65 miles northwest of Darlington, could be had free of charge for mission purposes the work expanded. With a government grant of $5,000 for the new building at Darlington, the work at Cantonment was undertaken in the fall of 1882.

Since the Arapaho and Cheyennes lived in close proximity in the Cantonment area, Cheyenne children were also taken into the school. For a number of years both schools had as many children as they could accommodate. The usual number at Darlington was about 50, that at Cantonment about 75. Some Indian children were taken to Kansas as early as 1884, and in 1887 Christian Krehbiel, president of the foreign mission board, at his own expense built an industrial school on his farm about one mile from Halstead. Gradually the schools were closed, when the government ceased giving subsidies to Indian missions.

In the meantime the Indians of both tribes had been allotted land and had settled in groups, and mission stations had been built in the more densely populated areas. Missionaries were placed at these stations to work with the adult Indians as well as with the younger ones. The Indians were largely illiterate in those early days, and only a few could understand English. These helped the missionaries as interpreters.

In 1891 Mr. and Mrs. Rodolphe Petter came from Switzerland to take up the work with the adult Cheyennes at Cantonment. Petter was well prepared to learn the Cheyenne language, knowing French, German, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and having studied English for a school year at Oberlin College, Ohio, just previously. He reduced the difficult language to writing, compiled a voluminous dictionary, worked out a comprehensive grammar, and translated Pilgrim's Progress, and the entire New Testament, as well as large portions of the Old Testament into the Cheyenne language.

At the present time there is one church for the Arapaho Indians at Canton, Okla. Among the Cheyenne Indians there are churches at Longdale, Fonda, Thomas, Clinton, Hammon, and Seiling. The Indian children attend public schools with white neighbor children, and the English language is used almost exclusively in the mission work. Sunday school, daily vacation Bible schools, and young people's retreats are some of the special activities that help to bring Christ to these people.

The General Conference mission work expanded to the Hopi tribe of Arizona in 1893. H. R. Voth, who had spent ten years as a missionary in Oklahoma, was sent to the Hopi and built a mission station at Oraibi. Here also pioneering cost sacrifices. H. R. Voth had lost his first wife through death in Oklahoma while in mission work there, and in Arizona his second wife passed away. Other missionaries came to establish mission work among the Hopi in other villages. The reluctance of the Hopi to accept the Gospel was even more evident here than in the work among the Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians. However, there are fervent Christians at the various mission stations who work with the missionaries in Sunday schools and other activities such as proclaiming the Gospel over public-address systems in the villages, and women's work. In recent years it was, however, felt that a mission day school was a necessity. Hence a day school building was built with a capacity of about 80 pupils, and a new day for this mission field had come. The attendance has averaged about 52 in the last few years. There are small congregations at Oraibi, Bacabi, and Moencopi, Ariz.

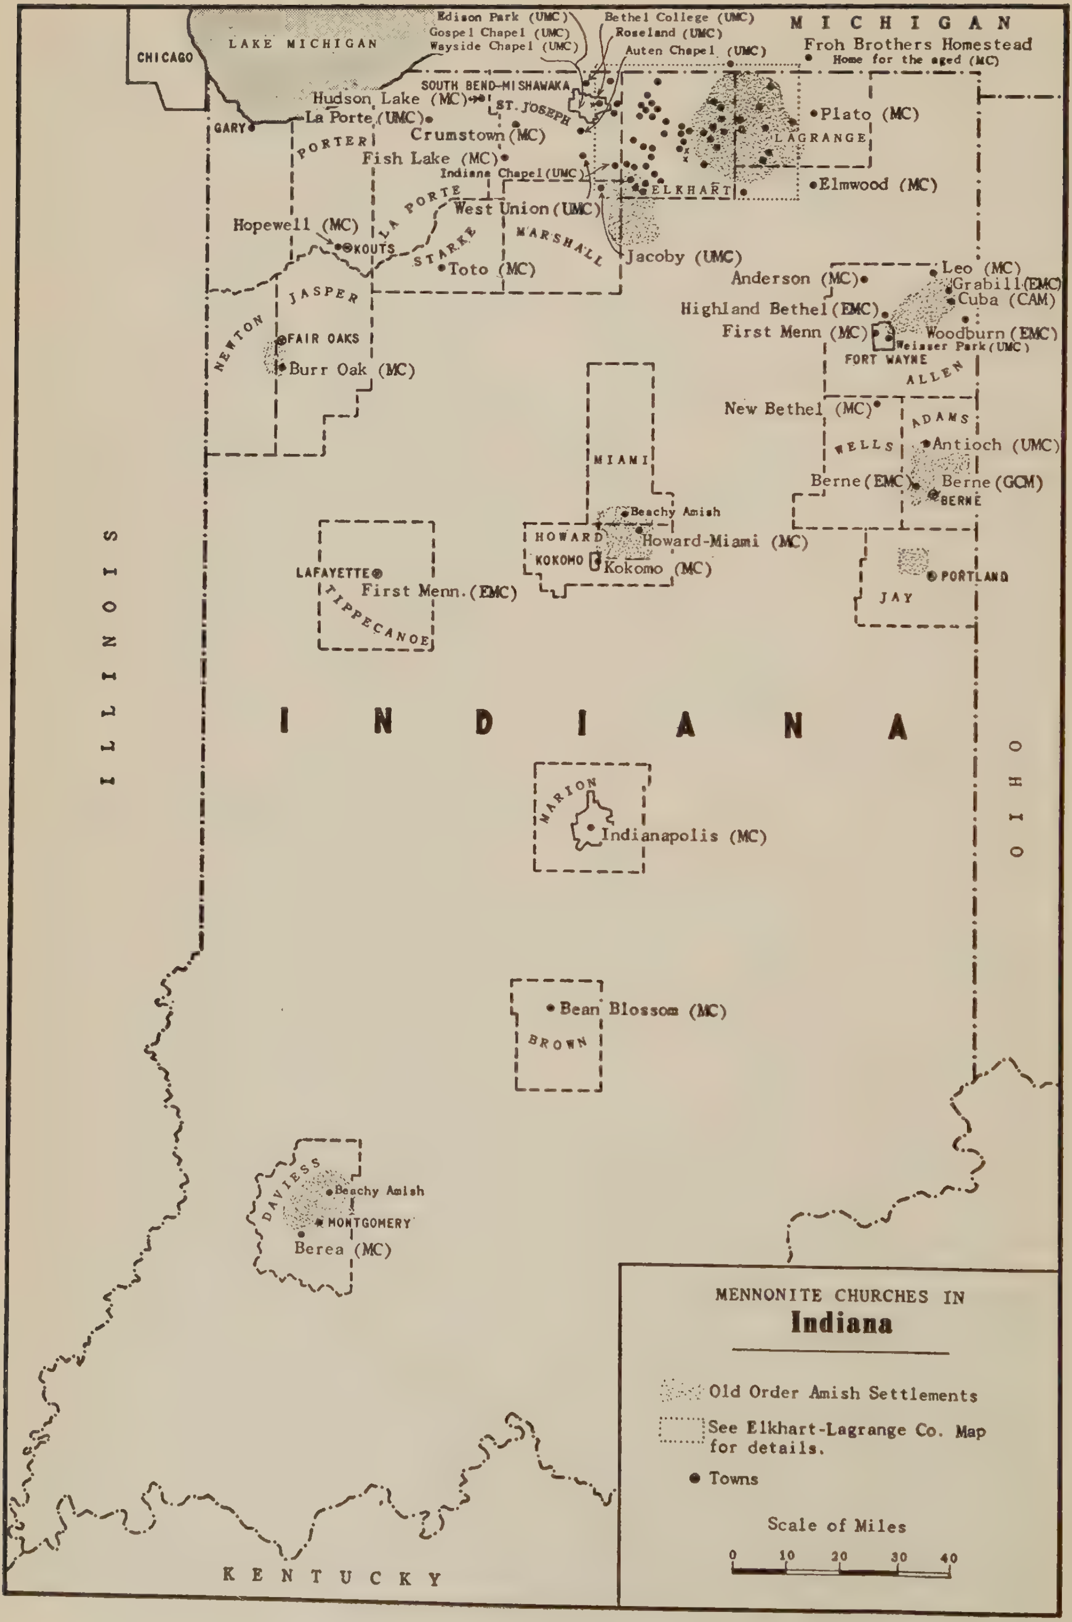
A fourth opening was found among the Northern Cheyennes in southeastern Montana. The Cheyennes in Oklahoma often spoke of their relatives in Montana; so Petter made several trips there to study the possibility of using the Cheyenne translations in mission work there. As a result, in May 1904 G. A. Linscheid began work at Busby, Mont. Mission stations were subsequently built at Lame Deer, Birney, and Ashland, Mont. In this field the Cheyennes did not have the opportunities to learn the English language as early as their southern relatives.

Petter with his second wife, Bertha E. Kinsinger, was transferred to Lame Deer in 1916, and worked there until his death on Jan. 6, 1947.

For fuller details about the mission work among the North Cheyennes see article Cheyenne Indians. (ML II, 413 f.) A.H.

Indiana. The nineteenth state of the Union, admitted Dec. 11, 1816, having an area of 36,291 square miles and a population of 3,934,224 in 1950, is the location of a number of flourishing Mennonite settlements totaling over 14,000 baptized members. The basic settlements were all established in the quarter century just before the Civil War, 1838-60. There are three: (1) the Swiss (GCM) settlement in Adams County around Berne; (2) the Mennonite (MC) settlement around Goshen in Elkhart County, made by settlers largely from eastern Ohio; and (3) the Amish settlement east of Goshen and west of Nappanee, by settlers from Somerset Co., Pa., and Holmes Co., Ohio. The small community in Allen County north of Fort Wayne was settled by Amish immigrants directly from Alsace and South Germany, some of whom also located in Adams County. Indiana Mennonite history is marked also by five divisions. The Amish divided four times: (1) the Old Order-Progressive (MC) division about 1855-65 in the Elkhart-Lagrange County settlement; (2) the Conservative Amish separation in the same area about 1880; (3) the Central Conference group split in the Clinton Frame congregation in 1892; and (4) the Beachy Amish separation from the Old Order Amish in 1950. The Elkhart County Mennonites suffered three schisms, two major: the Wisler (Old Order) division of 1871-72, and the M.B.C. (Brenneman) division of 1874-75. A minor division occurred in 1923-24 when several groups (MC) left to join the Central Conference and the General Conference Church. The following discussion will treat the history by settlements and branches.

Adams County. The first Mennonite settlers in the state were Swiss Mennonites, two Baumgartner



LAKE MICHIGAN
CHICAGO
GARY
Edison Park (UMC)
Gospel Chapel (UMC)
Wayside Chapel (UMC)
Bethel College (UMC)
Roseland (UMC)
Auten Chapel (UMC)
MICHIGAN
Froh Brothers Homestead
Home for the aged (MC)
SOUTH BEND-MISHAWAKA
Hudson Lake (MC)
La Porte (UMC)
ST. JOSEPH
Crumstown (MC)
PORTER
Fish Lake (MC)
Indiana Chapel (UMC)
Plato (MC)
LAGRANGE
ELKHART
Elmwood (MC)
LA PORTE
West Union (UMC)
Hopewell (MC)
KOUTS
STARKE
MARSHALL
Toto (MC)
Jacoby (UMC)
Anderson (MC)
Leo (MC)
Grabill (EMC)
Cuba (CAM)
Highland Bethel (EMC)
First Menn (MC)
Woodburn (EMC)
Weisser Park (UMC)
FORT WAYNE
ALLEN
JASPER
NEWTON FAIR OAKS
Burr Oak (MC)
New Bethel (MC)
ADAMS
WELLS
Antioch (UMC)
MIAMI
Berne (EMC)
Berne (GCM)
BERNE
Beachy Amish
HOWARD
Howard-Miami (MC)
KOKOMO
Kokomo (MC)
LAFAYETTE
First Menn. (EMC)
TIPPECANOE
PORTLAND
JAY
ILLINOIS
INDIANA
OHIO
MARION
Indianapolis (MC)
Bean Blossom (MC)
BROWN
DAVIESS
Beachy Amish
MONTGOMERY
Berea (MC)
KENTUCKY
MENNONITE CHURCHES IN Indiana
Old Order Amish Settlements
See Elkhart-Lagrange Co. Map for details.
Towns
Scale of Miles
0
10
20
30
40

brothers, Christian and Peter, who migrated from Wayne County, Ohio, to Adams County in 1838, just two years after Adams County was created, and located near Vera Cruz in Wells County, just across the Adams County line. The congregation which developed there was called the Baumgartner Church. In 1839 their aged father, Preacher David Baumgartner, followed his sons to Adams County. Other settlers followed, locating in Lick Township in the western portion of Adams County. In 1845 Christian Baumgartner was chosen by lot and ordained preacher to assist his father. By 1849 there were 16 families in this Baumgartner congregation, among them Augsburger, Baumgartner, Bieri, Bixler, Falb, Gilliom, Habegger, Hirschy, Luginbill, Merillat, Moser, Soldner, Stauffer, Steiner, and Suter. In 1852 a number of Swiss Mennonite families came directly from the Emmenthal in the Canton of Bern and affiliated themselves with the Baumgartner congregation in Adams County. This group brought along two preachers, Ulrich Kipfer and Matthias Strahm. In that same year, 1852, a colony of about eight Swiss Mennonites emigrated from the Swiss Jura mountain region to Adams County and settled near what is now Berne, Ind. Included in the group was a preacher, Peter S. Lehman, who had been chosen by lot and ordained in 1848. This group organized its own congregation instead of uniting with the Baumgartner congregation. In 1853 the aged David Baumgartner ordained Peter S. Lehman, who was selected by lot, to succeed him as elder, who then assumed oversight of both Baumgartner and Berne congregations. By 1858 there had been a three-way division in the Baumgartner congregation: (1) some members withdrew and united with the Evangelical Association; (2) Preacher Matthias Strahm and some members withdrew and joined the "New Mennist" (Reformed Mennonite) Church; (3) the remainder of the members continued under the leadership of Ulrich Kipfer as preacher (Christian Baumgartner had asked for release as a preacher). About 1860 the Baumgartner congregation built its first church building. In 1865 Christian Augsburger was chosen by lot and ordained a preacher. In 1869 Preacher Christian Augsburger (1821-1903) and family, and the families of John Stauffer, Peter Steiner, and George Fox withdrew and organized a (MC) congregation. (In 1881 Augsburger attended the Indiana Mennonite Conference—MC—and asked for help in a church difficulty.) His group never prospered, and worshiped in homes and school buildings. The congregation which prospered in Adams County was the congregation at Berne, established in 1852 and served by Elder Peter S. Lehman. Its first meetinghouse was built in 1856-58. Both the Baumgartner and Berne congregations united with the General Conference in 1872. The Berne congregation built a new church in 1879 (enlarged 1886 and 1899), and also in 1911-12. The Baumgartner congregation was merged with the Berne church in 1886. At the same time a portion of the Berne group which had opposed various changes in the life of the church, and who had been having separate services for 15 years, were also reunited with the progressive group in Berne. The outstanding leader in this period was S. F. Sprunger (q.v.). The Berne congregation has grown greatly, and now has a membership of 1,326. An Amish settlement was also made in Adams County (q.v.), beginning in 1850.

Perhaps the earliest Indiana Mennonite settlement outside Adams County was made at Arcadia in Hamilton County, beginning in 1838, by the Kauffman, Hildebrand, Gascho, and Correll families. No meetinghouse was built until 1881, the membership seems to have remained under 20, and the last member died in 1906.

Elkhart County Amish. The second settlement of Mennonites in northern Indiana was made by four Amish Mennonite families in 1841. They located in Clinton Twp., Elkhart Co. (created as a county in 1830), and Newbury Twp., Lagrange Co. (created as a county in 1832). Preacher Joseph and Elisabeth Miller and their four children, and Deacon Joseph and Barbara Borntreger and five children, came from Somerset Co., Pa., and settled in Clinton Twp., Elkhart Co. Daniel S. and Barbara Miller with their five children, and Christian and Elisabeth Borntreger with two children, also of Somerset Co., Pa., located in Newbury Twp., Lagrange Co. These four families arrived on the Elkhart Prairie in June 1841. In October the same year Emanuel Miller and wife of Ohio arrived in Lagrange County. A little later Preacher Isaac Smucker (Schmucker then) moved into the community, also the following and their families: Jacob Kaufmann, Isaac Miller, and Jonas Hochstetler. The first service of the Amish in Indiana was an Easter service held March 27, 1842, in the home of Preacher Joseph Miller in Clinton Twp., Elkhart Co. There were 14 members in the church at the time of this service. Other Amish settlers from Somerset County who settled in Lagrange County in 1842 were Abraham Herschberger, Joseph Herschberger, Johann Herschberger, Hans Miller, Heinrich Miller, Philip Weirich, Christian Hochstetler, and David Lehman. In the fall of 1842 the following Amish families from Holmes Co., Ohio, arrived in Elkhart County: Johann Miller, Joseph J. Miller, Jonas Miller, David H. Miller, Eli Tschoppen, Velti Yoder, David Schragen, and Deacon Peter Schragen. In 1843 Isaac Smucker was ordained by lot as the first Amish bishop in Indiana. He removed to McLean Co., Ill., in 1850 but returned to Indiana in 1856 and organized the Hawpatch congregation, now known as Maple Grove, Topeka, Ind.

Isaac Smucker was a progressive bishop, mild in discipline, and soon (1845) he was the leader of a less strict faction. But in 1847 a mediation committee resolved the controversy and the schism was healed for a time. In 1852 a preacher Jonas Troyer located in the Clinton district, which about the middle of the century had its separate church organization from that in Lagrange County, and that very year Isaac Smucker ordained him bishop. Bishop Jonas Troyer was also not as strict as some in maintaining the "old order" in the discipline of the church, and soon the Amish were threatened by division both in Elkhart and Lagrange counties. The schism was complete by 1854. Troyer introduced the new custom of holding Amish baptisms in streams, obviously to follow the New Testament precedent: Jesus, for example, was baptized in the Jordan River. In 1856 these progressives, who were destined to merge with the Mennonites (MC) of Indiana, built their first meetinghouse in Indiana, located in Clinton Township and known as Clinton Frame. The more conservative Amish, who tolerated fewer changes, came to be known as Old Order Amish. They also flourished, establishing congregations in Elkhart, Lagrange, Marshall, Newton, Jasper, Howard, Daviess, Adams, Brown, and Allen counties. Today there are approximately 40 congregations of Old Order Amish in Indiana, a remarkable growth from the feeble start of 1841 in Elkhart County. These Old Order Amish wear severely plain dress, wear the beard, use the German in their services, generally shun all modern methods of Christian education such as Sunday schools, evangelistic meetings, build no meetinghouses, drive horse and buggy rather than automobiles, and try to maintain their simple rural culture rather than to conform to what they think of as the "world."

Amish Mennonites. The progressive Amish Mennonites, represented by such early leaders as Isaac Smucker and Jonas Troyer, on the other hand, had no hesitation to allow their congregations to gradually drop the earlier garb of the Amish, shave off their beards, build meetinghouses, introduce the use of English into the services of the church, etc. All these changes were not made in a decade or a generation, but the process of cultural accommodation went on. Progressive Amish Mennonite congregations appeared from 1854 on in various communities of Indiana: in that very year a new congregation was formed in the Amish settlement of Howard-Miami counties, which had been started in 1848; in 1871 this progressive group built their first church building. The Forks Amish Mennonite meetinghouse in Newbury Twp., Lagrange Co., was built in 1864, seven years after the group began to meet separately from the Old Order Amish for their worship services. The Leo Amish Mennonite congregation in Allen County had its beginnings in 1861, its first preacher in 1875, and its first meetinghouse in 1887. The Pretty Prairie Amish Mennonite congregation in Lagrange County had its first settlers in 1864, and its first meetinghouse in 1872, but became extinct. The Hawpatch (Maple Grove now) Amish Mennonite congregation was organized in 1854, and built its first church in 1856. A small settlement of Amish Mennonites was made near Grovertown in Starke County in the 1860's, and a meetinghouse was erected. Bishop Jonas Troyer of Elkhart County lived there for a time. Bishop Isaac Smucker's son, Jonathan P. Smucker, was ordained deacon there in 1873, and preacher the same year. But the congregation died out soon after Smucker removed to Nappanee, Ind., a year or so after his ordination. The West Market Street Amish Mennonite congregation at Nappanee was organized in the 1870's, and in 1875 J. P. Smucker was ordained bishop of the congregation there. The first church building was erected in 1877. A small Amish Mennonite congregation was organized in the Adams County Amish settlement (q.v.), which congregation erected a meetinghouse in 1870, but soon became extinct. There were formerly Amish settlements in the Peru area and in Clinton County near Edna Mills.

Elkhart County Mennonites. The first Mennonite settlers (not Amish Mennonites) in Elkhart County were John Smith and his son Joseph from Medina Co., Ohio, who settled in Harrison Township, nine miles south and one mile east of Elkhart. Smith bought the farm in 1843 but did not locate on it until the fall of 1845. About the same time Jacob Strohm settled in the same vicinity, having also come from Ohio. In the spring of 1845 the families of Bishop Martin Hoover (1760-1849), his son John Hoover, and Christian Henning removed from Medina Co., Ohio, and also settled in Harrison Township. During the year 1848, 27 more families came to Harrison Township from Wayne, Columbiana, Medina, and Mahoning counties in Ohio, although most of these people were originally from Pennsylvania. Included in the 1848 settlers were Preacher Jacob Wisler (1808-89) from Columbiana Co., Ohio, and Preacher Jacob Christophel (1783-1868), who had left the Rhenish Palatinate in 1818, lived for a time in western Pennsylvania, had been ordained as preacher in Allegheny Co., Pa., in 1827, and had lived for a time in Columbiana Co., Ohio. The first service of the Harrison Township Mennonites, the Yellow Creek congregation, was held in a schoolhouse about a half mile north of the present village of Southwest on Ascension Day, 1848, with 16 people present. Services were held biweekly thereafter. The first log church building was erected in 1849 on the lot now occupied by the Wisler Yellow Creek (frame) meetinghouse. Before his death in 1849 Bishop Hoover had ordained Jacob Wisler as his successor in the bishop oversight of the Mennonites of Elkhart County. For many years Yellow Creek was the Mennonite center in Indiana, and the other churches were merely outposts of the Yellow Creek congregation. All baptisms, ordinations, and communion services were held at Yellow Creek for many years. In 1861 over 600 persons partook of the communion emblems. The (fall) meetings of the Conference were also held in the Yellow Creek meetinghouse.

Within a year or two after the building of the Yellow Creek meetinghouse, there were other small concentrations of Mennonites in outlying districts which occasioned the building of churches or the holding of biweekly services in schoolhouses on the Sundays when no services were held at Yellow Creek. Daniel Moyer (1812-64), who was born in Bucks Co., Pa., but had grown to manhood in Butler Co., Pa., and had lived after his marriage in Ashland Co., Ohio, removed to Elkhart Co., Ind., to a farm west of Jamestown. About 1850 he was ordained as a preacher at Yellow Creek. Soon he and others were worshiping in a log schoolhouse a mile or less north of the present Olive Church. The Olive cemetery was platted in 1855. The new meetinghouse (Olive) on the Baugo was erected in 1862. The Holdeman settlement west of Wakarusa was also started by 1850, and the first log meetinghouse erected in 1851. The settlement of Mennonites in Clinton Township (Clinton Brick) was started as early as 1845, and the first log meetinghouse built in 1854. Mennonites began to locate in DeKalb County about 1850, but it was not until 1883 that they erected their first Pleasant Valley meetinghouse. This group later became extinct. By 1851 Mennonites had begun to locate in Newbury Twp., Lagrange Co., and in 1874 they erected the Shore meetinghouse. The Emma congregation, a branch of Shore, is also located in Newbury Township. The congregation was organized in 1901 and a church building erected at once. In 1853 Dutch Mennonites from Balk in Friesland migrated to America and settled west of New Paris, Ind. For many years they worshiped in private homes, then in the Neff schoolhouse, and finally in the Christophel and Blosser log meetinghouses. At last, in 1889, the Salem meetinghouse was erected, half of the members being of the Dutch Mennonite settlement. Several Mennonite families located at Rolling Prairie, La Porte County, in the 1850's, but no congregation developed and the settlement died out. About 1853 Mennonites from Ohio and Pennsylvania began to locate in Clay and Owen counties, Indiana, the first known Mennonite settler being Bishop Daniel Funk, then of Logan Co., Ohio, but a Pennsylvanian by birth. The congregation was called Bowers in the course of time, named after Preacher Jacob Bower (Bauer). The first meetinghouse was built in 1861. Three years later the membership was at least 70 with four ministers and two young deacons, but it soon died out. The Gar Creek settlement in Allen County, eleven miles east of Fort Wayne, was started about 1854 but never had its own meetinghouse; a union house of worship was used. About 1865 the Mennonite settlement at Teegarden in Marshall County was started. Resident ministers who later served there were Peter Y. Lehman, and Michael W. Shank (1833-1905), grandfather of Clarence Shank of the Olive congregation; the meetinghouse was a union building.

One of the most influential leaders in the Mennonite Church (MC), both in Elkhart County and in the church as a whole, was John F. Funk (q.v., 1835-1930), who located in Elkhart in 1867 and founded the Prairie Street Mennonite Church. This congregation built its first meetinghouse in 1871.

It is to be remembered that from the 1840's until 1916 the Mennonites were of two original types: Mennonite and Amish. And from 1854 the progressive Amish Mennonites, in contrast with the Old Order Amish, gradually approached closer to the Mennonites in doctrine and practice, so that in 1917 the two conferences, Indiana-Michigan Mennonite and Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite, merged. But even prior to the merger there was in a few cases actually joint conference and bishop care of certain congregations, e.g., the weak Barker Street (q.v.) Church. Both Mennonites and Amish Mennonites formed the Middlebury Sunday school (1903) and congregation (1904), but the affiliation was Amish Mennonite through the choice of an Amish Mennonite bishop. (The first Middlebury Amish Mennonite church building was built in 1911.) When Goshen College located in Goshen (from Elkhart) in 1903 a congregation of both Mennonites and Amish Mennonites was formed with a bishop from each of the two groups furnishing joint bishop oversight.

Literary Societies were organized in many of the congregations (MC) of northern Indiana in 1913-28. An over-all organization of the literaries was effected in 1924 and named Northern Indiana Literary Convention; its constitution was adopted in 1927. In 1949 the convention became affiliated with the nation-wide Mennonite Youth Fellowship (MC); consequently a new constitution was written for the convention in that year, reconstituting the convention into a conference-wide MYF organization. This new constitution was adopted in 1950, whereupon the organization took the name Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Youth Fellowship.

Mission Churches (MC). The discovery of a few families of scattered Mennonites in a distant county without church privileges caused the District Mission Board of the merged conferences (organized 1911) to place pastors in such needy fields, and to erect small houses of worship. The Burr Oak congregation near Rensselaer in Jasper County was begun in 1918, and the first church building built in 1925. The Berea congregation in Daviess County was founded in 1920, and a church built in 1925. More recent mission outposts, sponsored either by the district mission board or by congregations, and often created in purely non-Mennonite communities to evangelize the unchurched, are as follows: Elkhart County: Belmont, Elkhart, 1929; North Goshen, 1936; East Goshen, 1942; Locust Grove, Elkhart, 1942; Benton, 1944; Sunnyside, Dunlap, 1947; Roselawn, Elkhart, 1949; St. Joseph County: Crumstown, 1933; Osceola, 1951; Lagrange County: Marion, Howe, 1944; Plato, 1949; Allen County: Anderson, ca. 1941; Starke County: Toto, Knox, 1948; English Lake, 1949; Kosciusko County: Syracuse, 1947; Brown County: Bean Blossom, 1945; Wells County: New Bethel, Ossian, 1949; Howard County: Kokomo, 1947; La Porte County: Hudson Lake, 1950; Fish Lake, ca. 1950; Noble County: Kendallville, 1953; Morgan County: Mahalasville, 1951; Daviess County: Washington, 1953. The total membership of the Mennonite congregations in Indiana (MC) is now (1954) about 6,500, which is more than three fourths of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference (MC) membership.

General Conference Churches. There are seven congregations of the General Conference Mennonite Church in Indiana. In Elkhart County are Silver Street, a schism from the Clinton Frame congregation (MC) in 1892, and which at present has 153 members, the Eighth Street Church in Goshen, with 304 members, the Warren Street Mennonite Church in Middlebury, having 84 members, and the First Mennonite in Nappanee, with 165 members. In Newton County is a small congregation, Zion at Goodland, with its 58 members, an Alsatian group which has been French-speaking; Topeka in Lagrange County has 235 members. The above five congregations (except Nappanee) are affiliated with the Central Conference (GCM). The Swiss congregation at Berne in Adams County has 1,326 members, and the Nappanee congregation in Elkhart County has 165 members: these two churches are affiliated with the Middle District Conference (GCM). The Berne congregation comprises about 60 per cent of all the G. C. Mennonites in Indiana.

All of these but the Berne and Goodland congregations arose as schisms from M.C. congregations, or were daughters of the schismatic groups.

Evangelical Mennonite Congregations. Formerly known as Defenseless Mennonites, this group arose in Indiana in the years 1864-66 under the leadership of an Amish bishop of Geneva, Adams County, named Henry Egly. Bishop Egly, who experienced a spiritual awakening, led half his congregation into the new group. There are now five congregations of the Evangelical Mennonites in the state: Berne in Adams County (237 members); Fort Wayne (43 members), Grabill (143 members), and Woodburn (179) in Allen County; and Lafayette in Tippecanoe County with 64 members: a total of about 670 in the state. Lafayette is the continuation of a former rural church. The Amish Mennonite settlement at Edna Mills in Clinton County was established by Gingrich, Ehresman, etc., families. The rural Defenseless Church building was erected in 1885 in Tippecanoe County. The old Amish cemetery is located south of Edna Mills, a town about eight miles east of Lafayette.

Old Order Mennonites. The first Mennonite bishop ordained in Indiana, Jacob Wisler of the Yellow Creek congregation in Elkhart County, seceded from the Indiana Mennonite Conference (MC) in 1871 because he could not tolerate the numerous changes in church life, such as the adoption of Sunday schools, four-part singing, evening meetings, the loss of the German language in the church services, and a more favorable attitude toward evangelistic meetings. The "Wisler Mennonites" have not prospered since their founding in 1871. They have had some internal difficulties, and have found it difficult to know what new cultural items to tolerate. In 1908 they divided into two groups, ostensibly over the use of telephones. The more conservative group, which refused to allow the installation of telephones in their homes, also opposed the use of automobiles in later years when they became common. In recent years there has been a degree of unrest in the more conservative group, with a partial shifting of members to the more progressive group, but there are still only two groups in Indiana. The stricter group, whose bishop is William G. Martin, holds services at three points: County Line Church near Wakarusa; Yellow Creek (frame) Church; and Blosser's Church near Nappanee. Membership in the district totals 102. The more progressive group, whose bishop is William Ramer, holds services every two weeks at Yellow Creek, and every two weeks at Blosser's. (The two groups alternate in the use of their church buildings.) The Ramer group has 150 members. The total Old Order membership is 252.

United Missionary Church (formerly Mennonite Brethren in Christ). Three years after Wisler and his followers withdrew from the Indiana Mennonite Conference (MC) because it was too progressive, Daniel Brenneman seceded in 1874 because it was not progressive enough. He felt that the time had come to launch out in evangelistic work, to emphasize revivals, and the like. He and his followers formed what is now known as the United Missionary Church, the first congregation being Bethel, eight miles south of Elkhart. This denomination is represented in Indiana by about 27 congregations, all in the northern area of the state, 13 of them with 50 members or less. The membership in Indiana totaled 2,388 in 1953. The congregations and locations are as follows: Antioch, west of Decatur; Auten Chapel, west of South Bend; Bethel, south of Elkhart; Beulah and Zion in Elkhart; Brenneman Memorial and Sunnyfield in Goshen; Osolo, north of Elkhart; Cedar Road, Osceola; Mishawaka; Gospel Center and Edison Park in South Bend; Roseland, north of South Bend; Granger; West Union, south of South Bend; Indiana Chapel, north of Bremen; Bremen; Wakarusa; Oak Grove, west of Wakarusa; Nappanee; Foraker; Lagrange; Garver Lake; Jacoby; South West, west of Goshen; Wayside Chapel; Weisser Park, Fort Wayne.

Conservative Mennonites (formerly Conservative Amish Mennonites). This group was organized as a body intermediate between the Old Order Amish and the Mennonite Church (MC). Although the conference was not organized until 1910, the Conservative Mennonites had been in existence for several decades (since 1880). In 1908 the members in Elkhart County totaled only 35. Today they have over 600 members in five congregations in this county: Griner, Townline, Pleasant Grove, and River View, all in the general area about Middlebury, Ind., and a newly organized (1954) congregation northeast of Nappanee. They also have a congregation of 170 members at Cuba near Grabill in Allen County. The name Amish was dropped in 1955.

Burkholder Amish Mennonites. A more recent body of progressive Amish is that led by Bishop David O. Burkholder of near Nappanee, Ind. There are four congregations of his followers in Indiana: one near Nappanee, and one east of Goshen, both in Elkhart County; one in Miami County; and one in Daviess County. These four congregations have memberships running from 50 to 100 each, a total of about 320. They belong to the Beachy Amish group.

Missionary Church Association. This small body seceded from the Evangelical Mennonite Church (it was then called Defenseless Mennonite) in 1896-98 under the leadership of Joseph E. Ramseyer. It has 15 congregations in Indiana, with 1,739 members, located in Angola, Auburn, Berne (2), Decatur, Fort Wayne (5), Frankfort, Grabill, Mooresville, Woodburn, and Yoder.

Statistical Summary. The following summary will give a picture of the Mennonite membership in Indiana by groups in 1953. (All figures refer to baptized members; unbaptized children are not included.) Mennonite Church (MC), 6,500; General Conference Mennonites, 2,325; Old Order Amish Mennonites, 3,100; Evangelical Mennonites, 670; United Missionary Church, 2,300; Old Order Mennonites, 260; Conservative Mennonites, 770; Burkholder Amish Mennonites, 320; and Missionary Church Association, 1,739. The total of those who still call themselves Mennonites is 13,945.

The Mennonite institutions established in Indiana have been: Mennonite Publishing Co. (q.v., MC) at Elkhart, 1867-1925 (most of its business sold in 1908 to the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa.); Goshen College (MC) at Goshen, 1903- , previously Elkhart Institute at Elkhart 1894-1903; Bethel College, South Bend (UMC) 1945- ; Fort Wayne Bible College (Missionary Church Association) 1904- ; Bethany Christian High School (MC) at Goshen 1954- . J.C.W.

J. E. Borntreger, Eine Geschichte der ersten Ansiedlung der Amischen Mennoniten und die Gründung ihrer ersten Gemeinde im Staate Indiana, nebst einer kurzen Erklärung über die Spaltung, die in dieser Gemeinde geschehen ist (Elkhart, 1907); History of Elkhart County, Indiana (Chicago, 1881); Minutes of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference 1864-1929; E. Sprunger, The First Hundred Years [of the Berne Swiss Community] (Berne, 1938); ML II, 411-13.

Indiana Chapel United Missionary Church, located four miles southeast of Lakeville, Marshall Co., Ind., was organized in 1896. Among the early leaders were John Rouch and Fred Schutz. In 1953 the membership was 62, mostly rural, with Wayne Gerber serving as pastor. P.E.Wa.

Indiana Conference of the United Missionary Church had its origins in the "Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio Evangelical United Mennonite Conference." The date of its organization is not clear but it met in its "sixth annual conference" in Elkhart Co., Ind., in September 1880. After the Evangelical United Mennonites became the Mennonite Brethren in Christ in 1883, the first annual "Conference of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ of Indiana, Ohio, Michigan and the West" held its session in Miami Co., Ohio, in March 1884. After Ohio became a separate conference in 1942 the Indiana Conference was confined to one state. The conference meets annually during the last week of June on its campgrounds 7½ miles south of Elkhart. Its committees are executive, youth, budget, camp meetings, foreign missions, peace, and reading course examiners. In 1955 its 37 congregations had 2,507 members. The district superintendent was Kenneth Geiger and the secretary Gordon Bacon. M.G.

Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference (1888-1917) was the first of three Amish Mennonite conferences to be organized after the Amish Mennonite general conference (Diener-Versammlung 1862-78, q.v.) no longer met and it was the first to unite with its district Mennonite conference. The others were the Western A.M. (q.v.) (1890-1920) and the Eastern A.M. (q.v.) (1883-1927). The Indiana-Michigan A.M. Conference held its first meeting in the Maple Grove Church southwest of Topeka, Ind., on April 7, 1888. Several of the members of the Amish Mennonite Conference participated in the discussions of the Indiana Mennonite Conference (q.v.) in October of the same year when that body passed a resolution favoring a Mennonite general conference. From the beginning, ministers of each conference were welcomed in the other and in the years immediately preceding the merger in 1917 the A.M. Conference was referred to as the "spring conference" and the Mennonite as the "fall conference." Before the merger the two conferences co-operated in organizing a district mission board in 1911. In the year before the merger (1916) the Ind.-Mich. A.M. Conference reported 11 congregations, 1,539 members, 5 bishops, 13 ministers, and 9 deacons; the Ind.-Mich. Mennonite Conference, 1,728 members (counting the Goshen College joint congregation of 195 members), 24 bishops and deacons, and 29 ministers. The 11 congregations of the A.M. conference in 1916 were: Indiana—Forks, Clinton Frame, Nappanee, Middlebury, Leo, Maple Grove (Topeka), Howard-Miami, Linn Grove; Michigan—Fairview, Sunnyside (Comins), Union (Chief).

In the first years after organization Bishop J. P. Smucker of Nappanee served as moderator or assistant moderator and took an active part in organizational and evangelistic activities. Other leading bishops of the conference were D. D. Miller of Middlebury; D. J. Johns of Goshen; and Jonathan Kurtz of Ligonier. These three brethren took a very active part in promoting the Elkhart Institute (q.v.), the first educational effort of the Mennonite Church (MC). D. D. Miller was elected moderator of the merged conference. J.S.U.

Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference (MC) resulted from the merger of two earlier conferences in 1916; the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, and the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference. The Mennonite (MC) body was at first, in the 1850's, more or less an extension of the Ohio Mennonite Conference and was called the Indiana Conference. It was customary for the Ohio ministers to meet with the Indiana ministers in the fall, and the Indiana ministers met with the Ohio ministers in the spring. The first such conference of which minutes have been preserved was held at the Yellow Creek meetinghouse Oct. 14, 1864. The next available minutes are of 1867, then 1870. The minutes of 1895 are headed "Indiana-Michigan Conference," although there was no official action to add the name Michigan to the name of the conference. The first Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference was held at the Maple Grove ("Hawpatch") A.M. Church near Topeka, Ind., on April 7, 1888. Thereafter the Amish Mennonite Conference was the "Spring Conference," and the Mennonite Conference was the "Fall Conference." A close spirit of fellowship and good will prevailed between the spring and fall conferences for many years, and there was considerable attendance at both conferences by ministers of the other conference. The time finally came when both conferences appointed a "Committee on Conference Union," which met Feb. 13, 1913. The work of the committee was well received by both conferences, and a new Constitution, Rules, and Discipline was prepared, printed, and submitted to the congregations for ratification. The spring conference of 1916 adopted the new discipline on the basis of the congregational vote and declared it as being in effect as of June 8, 1916. The fall conference of 1916 reported a vote of 1,319 in favor, and 155 opposed, and on that basis also adopted it and declared it to be in effect as of Oct. 12, 1916. Since 1917 the united conference has met annually the first Wednesday in June.

The Indiana Mennonite (fall) Conference was not only intimately associated with the Ohio Conference, being for many years a sort of fall meeting of the same group which met in Ohio in the spring, but it also felt a degree of responsibility for the weak congregations farther west. In 1872, for example, Bishop Daniel Brundage, who for a decade had been a preacher in the Holdeman congregation in Indiana, and who was then living in Missouri, asked permission of the Indiana (and Ohio) Conference in session at the Yellow Creek meetinghouse west of Goshen, Ind., to hold a conference in the fall of each year in Missouri. The request was granted. In fact this was but following the precedent set in 1871 when the Indiana (and Ohio) ministers, also in session at Yellow Creek, granted to "the western brethren" permission to form a "new conference district." The conference was to meet "at a time to be hereafter decided upon in Whiteside County, Illinois." This meeting was held in the Science Ridge meetinghouse near Sterling, Ill., in 1872, the first meeting of the Illinois Mennonite Conference.

The concerns of the Indiana Mennonite Conference related mostly to the year by year problems which the bishops, preachers, and deacons faced, such as whether Mennonites ought to vote in political elections, how best to resist worldliness in attire, whether the Bible calls upon Christians to break social fellowship ("shun") with those who have been excommunicated, how to give pastoral care to weak congregations and scattered members, whether it would not be advisable to have a general conference of all the Mennonites (MC) in the country (1864), how to deal with divorced and remarried people, etc. By the fall of 1868 there was evidently enough autonomy in the Indiana Conference that it felt it necessary to "adopt entire" the resolutions of the Ohio Conference which had been adopted in its spring session of 1868. In 1887, when the Conference was considering the eligibility for membership on the part of a divorced man who was planning to marry a sister in the church, the decisive addresses were made by Bishops John F. Funk of Indiana, and Henry Nice of Illinois. Deacon Joseph Holdeman supported them. The question was posed by Preacher Henry Good of Ohio. (It was decided that the man be received as a member.)

During the first decades of the life of the conference, it was customary for the ordained men to come quietly together with no appointed moderator and no prepared program. The older bishops led in messages of exhortation after the singing of one or more hymns. The entire meeting was conducted in the Pennsylvania German dialect, with the exception of the hymns and Scripture reading, which were in High German. The opening prayer was silent. After the devotional service was over, one or more bishops exhorted the ministers to hold fast to the historic and Biblical principles of the brotherhood. Anyone was then free to make any further remarks or to bring questions before the group for counsel and decision. If the decisions met with too much opposition in the congregations, the ministers did not hesitate to reverse themselves at a later conference. In 1871, for example, the conference urged that (first) cousins should not marry. Because this counsel "caused considerable dissatisfaction," the conference of 1873 decided to leave it to the conscience of the individuals involved "so far as state laws do not prohibit such marriages."

Especially in the 1870's the Indiana Mennonite Conference struggled long and hard with the problems occasioned by the transition from old to new customs relating to new methods of Christian work, the transition from German to English, and the like. Bishop Jacob Wisler (1808-89) of Yellow Creek and his followers seceded from conference in 1871 because it supported the introduction of Sunday schools, and tolerated other changes from the "old order." Thus the Wisler or Old Order Mennonite branch had its beginning. On the other hand, evidently in an effort to prevent another division (although it may have contributed to the Daniel Brenneman secession of 1874), the conference in 1872 decided that calling regular prayer meetings "can not be tolerated."

Gradually the conference began to organize more fully and thus acquire its present form. In the meeting of Oct. 9, 1885, the conference authorized the bishops thereafter to meet on the Thursday afternoon preceding conference to receive in writing all questions to be submitted on the day of conference. Six years later, in 1891, the conference took the new step of choosing a moderator and a secretary as the first item of business for the day. In 1898 it was further decided to "elect a permanent secretary whose duty it shall be to keep a record of the proceedings of conference in a book for that special purpose. He shall serve for a term of three years." In 1904 the spring (Amish Mennonite) conference began to elect a moderator for the next annual meeting of conference, and in 1906 the fall (Mennonite) conference followed suit. Little mention is made of anything like an executive committee in either conference before the merger of 1916. But thereafter the power of the Executive Committee of Conference grew continually until Indiana-Michigan vested more power in its elected Executive Committee of five members than perhaps any other district conference of the Mennonite Church (MC). The man most responsible for this centralization of power was J. K. Bixler (1877-1939), who represented the fall (Mennonite) conference prior to the merger. Other leaders who helped form the modern Mennonite Church of the midwest were Bishop John F. Funk (1835-1930), Bishop David Burkholder (1835-1923), Preacher J. S. Hartzler (1857-1953), Bishop D. A. Yoder (1883-), Bishop O. S. Hostetler (1874-), and Deacon George L. Bender (1867-1921). On the side of the spring (Amish) conference should be mentioned Bishop Jonathan Kurtz (1848-1940), Bishop D. D. Miller (1864-1955), Bishop D. J. Johns (1850-1942), and Preacher Ira S. Johns (1879-1956). Since the 1940's the conference has tended to be more democratic, and to recognize more fully the rights of bishops and congregations.

At present (1954) the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference includes 66 congregations and mission stations having a total of 8,076 members, served by 31 bishops, 83 ministers, and 34 deacons. In Indiana there are 36 congregations and missions with 6,429 members: 18 in Elkhart County, 6 in Lagrange, 3 in Allen, 2 mission outposts in La Porte, and one congregation or mission in each of the following counties: Wells, Starke, Porter, Jasper, St. Joseph, Noble, and Daviess. In Michigan there are 30 congregations and missions with 1,563 members; scattered congregations in the following counties: Emmet, Newaygo, Gratiot, Oscoda, Midland, St. Joseph, and Kent; and mission stations in Emmet, Antrim, Manistee, Wayne, Livingston, Lapeer, St. Joseph, Montcalm, Jackson, Huron, Saginaw, and Calhoun counties; as well as 11 mission stations in the Upper Peninsula. There are also three mission points in Kentucky with 34 members, and one in International Falls, Minn., with 52 members.

Within and subject to the conference are also the following semiautonomous organizations: the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board (q.v., founded in 1911), operating a chain of rural home mission stations from Kentucky to Northern Michigan; the Christian Workers' Conference, before 1943 called the Sunday School Conference, with its origins going back to 1894; the Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary (organized in 1917); and the Mennonite Youth Fellowship (founded in 1949, but actually a continuation of the Northern Indiana Literary Convention founded in 1924). The conference also owns and operates Bethany Christian High School at Waterford, south of Goshen, Ind. (founded in 1954). Completely autonomous is the Mennonite Aid Association (founded in 1911), a mutual aid property insurance organization. J.C.W.

Minutes of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference 1864-1929 (Scottdale, n.d.), which also contain the minutes of the Ind.-Mich. A.M. Conference, 1888-1916. The conference minutes since 1929 have been published as annual reports in booklet form.

Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board, an agency of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference (MC), was organized on Dec. 1, 1911, with the name "Mission Board of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference." Its first executive committee consisted of N. E. Byers, pres.; B. B. King, vice-pres.; G. L. Bender, treas.; Jacob K. Bixler, sec.; and O. S. Hostetler, fifth member. On Oct. 18, 1913, it was reorganized as the Indiana-Michigan District Mennonite Mission Board. The word "District" was dropped from the name on June 2, 1914. The board was incorporated in Indiana on Aug. 13, 1914, and admitted to do business in Michigan on Dec. 18, 1923. There are at present (1955) 27 mission stations under the board, located in Indiana, Michigan, and Kentucky. It publishes the Gospel Evangel, formerly the Rural Evangel. During the last fiscal year the board spent $118,293.11. P.J.M.

Indiantown Mennonite Church (MC), located in northern Lancaster Co., Pa., a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference, was the central point for the eastern end of the Hammer Creek-Indiantown District. After worshiping for nine decades in eight private homes, meetinghouses were built in 1819 at both Hammer Creek and Indiantown (the latter in the last Indian reservation in this county). The congregation grew until the middle of the 19th century, when the Reformed Mennonites made a sizable schism. In more recent years there have been additions from Weaverland and from the Old Order Mennonites, and the congregation is growing. The membership in 1954 was 150. Denver, once a preaching point, is now a thriving outpost of Indiantown. The earlier preachers included Christian Risser, Abraham Brubaker, John R. and Jonas H. Hess, and more recently Noah Hurst, Henry P. Fox, and Isaac Gehman, with Amos S. Horst and Mahlon M. Zimmerman as bishops, and Jacob M. Hurst as deacon. I.D.L.

Indonesia, formerly the Dutch East Indies, since Dec. 29, 1949, a republic (1950 pop. 80 million), a group of islands in the Malay Archipelago in the Indian and Pacific oceans, of which Java (pop. 49 million and area 50,000 sq. mi.) is the most densely populated tropical country, although Sumatra (pop. 11,000 and area 163,557 sq. mi.) is larger. The Dutch Mennonites, who had previously supported the mission work of other denominations, opened a mission in Java (q.v.) in 1847, which was extended to include Sumatra (q.v.) in 1871 among the Battak (q.v.). This was the first Mennonite mission among non-Christian peoples, which was followed by other missions established in the last quarter of the 19th century by American Mennonite bodies.

Out of this mission work have developed two Mennonite Conferences in eastern Java, the Malay Church with 11 congregations, a membership of 2,410, and a Bible school at Pati, and the Chinese Church with 9 congregations and a membership of ca. 1,500. There is also a small Mennonite church in Sumatra with 101 members in four places.

The Mennonite Central Committee began a relief program in the Pati area in 1949 which was still in operation in 1956. A small relief program was also operated in a region 150 miles south of Medan, Sumatra, in 1948. H.S.B.

Industrial Home Journal, The, was founded in March 1906 as an 8-page monthly to promote the Industrial Home and Hygiene of Friendless (q.v.) near Hillsboro, Kan. The "proprietor and editor" was T. H. Long. The last issue of the Bethel College Historical Library set is dated July 1907. C.K.

Industrial School and Hygiene Home for Friendless Persons was chartered as a charitable institution by the State of Kansas on Sept. 15, 1890, as a home for orphan children. The pattern of administration was that of a corporation. Although the charter was not granted to the church the members of the corporation and of the Board of Directors were almost exclusively Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, and the institution has always been considered a home mission project of this group, who also assumed the responsibility of providing necessary funds. At the annual conference held on Oct. 19, 1896, at the Gnadenau Church near Hillsboro, Kan., it was announced that the building was ready to begin the work with 20 children, preferably Kansas children. The establishment was motivated and aided by M. E. Gordon, River Brethren of Pennsylvania, who visited the community in 1880 and decided that it would be an excellent location for such an institution. In the beginning a few members of the Board of Directors were River Brethren. Amanda Dohner, a member

MENNONITE CHURCHES IN Indonesia

- ● Mennonite congregations
- ★ Junior High Schools
- ≀ Medical Clinics

Mennonite Churches in Sumatra (Mandailing Area)

1. Bonan-dolak
2. Penjabungan
3. Kota-nopan
4. Muara-sipongi
5. Pakantan

Mennonite congregations in Java

Javanese Church

1. Pati
2. Djuana
3. Kudus
4. Kajuapu
5. Japara (Djepara)
6. Ngeling
7. Kedungpendjalin
8. Balongkodok
9. Bondo
10. Margokerto
11. Tembelang
12. Bandunghardjo
13. Kelet
14. Margoredjo
15. Tegalombo
16. Banjutowo
17. Puntjil
18. Karangsari
19. Brodjol

Chinese Church

20. Kudus
21. Pati
22. Japara (Djepara)
23. Welahan
24. Petjanga'an
25. Bangsri
26. Taju
27. Blora
28. Demak

Scale of Miles
0 25 50 75 100 200 300 400
SUMATRA MALAYA
Medan
Natal
Singapore
Palembang
JAVA SEA
INDIAN OCEAN
JAVA
Jakarta
Semarang
Surabaya
1500 miles to Dutch Mennonite Mission in Vogelkop Peninsula, New Guinea.
MOUNT MURIA
Japara
Kedungpendjalin
Kelet
Margoredjo
Taju
Djuana
Pati (Seminary)
Kajuapu
Kudus
Demak
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20

of a River Brethren community in Pennsylvania, served as the first matron in the home.

Beginning in 1889 homeless children were brought in from Chicago; 60 to 80 children filled it to capacity. About 1910-15 the orphanage gradually became a home for the aged. Until 1946, when the building was destroyed by fire, it served as a home for the aged under the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference. In 1915 the K.M.B. Conference obtained a new charter and changed the name to Salem Home. After the fire the Salem Home was moved to Hillsboro and housed in a small annex of the Salem Hospital. With completion of the new hospital building now under construction the whole building now utilized by Salem Hospital will become the Salem Home for Aged People (q.v.). M.S.H.

Gemeindeblatt und Waisenheim (Hillsboro, Kan.) 1894 ff.; Jahrbuch der Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde, 1894 ff.

Industry Among Mennonites in Russia (and Prussia). The industrial enterprises of the Mennonites in general have been presented in the article Business, with the exception of Prussia and Russia. Although the Mennonites here were located mostly in rural areas, some significant industries were developed. From the earliest days of the Mennonite settlements in Danzig and Prussia they continually encountered difficulties in finding occupations open to them, since they were not considered citizens. The regulations and edicts issued against them indicate what the occupations were. Among the industries were weaving (Bortenwirker) and brewing. In 1749 Danzig had ten Mennonite businessmen, numerous weavers, dyers, brewers, and small craftsmen like shoemakers, tailors, and merchants. The list of Mennonites who left Prussia to go to Russia after 1788 gives a fairly good review of the occupational backgrounds. There were some large estate owners, small-scale farmers, store owners, laborers, and a considerable number of craftsmen, who could possibly be considered the prospective industrialists in Russia. During the 18th and 19th centuries many of the Mennonites of Danzig, Königsberg, and other cities were in business and banking. A. Zimmerman (d. 1919) of Danzig owned a foundry.

In Russia industrial enterprises on a large scale originated among the Mennonites during the second half of the 19th century, particularly as a result of a large-scale farming, which necessitated the production of technical, highly developed agricultural machinery in a country where it was not available. Large-scale wheat raising produced a flourishing milling industry. Among the first industries developed by the Mennonites in Russia was silk production, which, however, disappeared when grain raising overshadowed all other branches of agriculture.

The first large-scale industrialist was P. H. Lepp of Chortitza, who started a foundry in 1860, with A. Koop and C. H. Hildebrand as his apprentices. Chortitza remained the industrial center of the Mennonites. Other places were Alexandrovsk, Halbstadt, and New York. In 1911 the eight largest Mennonite factories producing agricultural machinery and implements accounted for 10 per cent of the total output in South Russia and 6.2 per cent of the output of all Russia. The following table lists these factories, showing total annual production in terms of rubles and personnel employed.

Firm	Annual Production		Total Employed
Lepp and Wallmann	900,000	rubles	270
A. J. Koop	610,000	"	376
J. G. Niebuhr	450,000	"	350
J. J. Neufeld & Co.	350,000	"	200
J. A. & W. J. Classen	241,000	"	145
Franz and Schröder	209,190	"	153
G. A. Klassen & Neufeld	200,442	"	140
J. Jansen and K. Neufeld	200,000	"	110

(From A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland, p. 91 f.)

The Mennonites played a considerable role in the industrial and agricultural development of the country far beyond their immediate communities. The total number of Mennonite-owned larger factories in the Ukraine was 26. Smaller industries were the manufacture of brick, cheese, sausage, soap, starch, furniture, woven goods, and clocks, brewing of vinegar and beer and distilling whisky, print shops ("Raduga," Halbstadt; H. E. Ediger, Berdyansk; H. A. Lenzmann, Tokmak; A. P. Friesen, Davlekanovo, Ufa), and mill construction.

One of the latest industries, which finally surpassed all others, was the milling industry. Over half of all industrial enterprises of the Mennonites in the Ukraine were connected with the milling industry. The foundation for this was the windmill, which had been transplanted from Holland to Prussia and to Russia, having originally been used mostly to regulate the water level of the Low Countries. In the steppes of the Ukraine it was used to grind feed and flour. Some horse-driven mills were also in use. The greater advance came with the introduction of large-scale wheat production, which resulted in the establishment of large motor- and steam-driven mills toward the close of the 19th century. Soon all Mennonite settlements were dotted with large four- to five-story flour mills, in which the wheat was ground into very fine flour to be shipped into all parts of Russia and abroad. By the beginning of World War I Mennonite-owned flour mills could also be found in many railroad centers outside the Mennonite communities. Some of the centers were Chortitza, Alexandrovsk, Halbstadt, Ekaterinoslav, Nikopol, Kharkov, and New York. Some of the largest milling industries were Niebuhr and Co., of Alexandrovsk, J. J. Thiessen of Ekaterinoslav, J. Siemens of Nikopol, and Peter Unger of New York, which had a total annual production of three million rubles. In addition there were many flour businesses, the one owned by Heinrich and Peter Heese, Ekaterinoslav, having an annual turnover of 1.5 million rubles.

In 1908 the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements had a total of 73 motor- and steam-driven mills, 26 factories of agricultural machinery, 38 brick factories, and 20 other industries, making a total of 157. In addition there were 105 flour mills and 54 other smaller enterprises, making a total of 316 industries. In addition there were 69 industries in the other Mennonite settlements of the Ukraine and an estimated 200 in the eastern provinces of Russia, making a total of about 585 industries. Of this total nearly 60 were located in the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements. The milling industry was the largest among the large-scale industries of the Ukraine (51.8 per cent). The next largest was the production of agricultural machinery. This indicates that before World War I there was a definite trend toward industrialization among the Mennonites of Russia, particularly in the older settlements. The number of industries and large farm estates on one hand and the constantly growing laboring class on the other hand were indications of a shift in process which endangered the predominant rural pattern of life among the Mennonites of Russia. According to Ehrt one third of all Mennonite capital was invested in capitalistic enterprises (for profit) and two thirds in the traditional smaller farm and home industry. Two and eight-tenths per cent of the population had 34 per cent of the total capital in their hands. The average property ownership among the Mennonites of the Ukraine was 8,000 rubles per person, and in the later settlements 3,300 rubles. In Siberia it was only 1,400 rubles.

In connection with the industrial development among the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia it should be stated that many inventions were made by industrial leaders. Naturally in most cases the industrialist used patterns of western European agricultural machinery. Their inventions were possibly more or less limited to the adaptation of these machines to their particular environment and needs. Originally many of the industries developed from smaller home industries. Later the characteristics of the modern capitalistic developments became more evident. Many of the sons of the industrialists who had started on a small scale went to schools of engineering in Germany, Switzerland, and Russia in order to be better qualified to continue the enterprise of their fathers. During the last decades the Mennonites of Russia had numerous engineers in various branches of industry. (See also Agriculture Among the Mennonites in Russia and Business.) C.K.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Horst Quiring, "Die Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Preussen, 1788-1870," Menn. Life, April 1951, 36 f.; A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland (Berlin, 1932) 89 ff.; Cornelius Krahn, "Agriculture Among the Mennonites of Russia," Menn. Life, January 1955, 14 ff.; "Mennonite Industry in Russia," Menn. Life, January 1955, 21 ff.; Jakob J. Niebuhr, "Jakob G. Niebuhr Fabriken," Menn. Life, January 1955, 25 ff.; A. Bonwetsch, Der Handel mit landwirtschaftlichen Maschinen und Geräten in Russland . . . (Berlin, 1921) 35 ff.; D. H. Epp, "P. H. Lepp," Bote (Rosthern, Sask., 1928) Nos. 10-13; David Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia" (unpublished Stanford University thesis, 1933) 275 ff.; B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen (Karlsruhe, 1955).

Infant Baptism. Protests against the church institution of infant baptism had been almost completely silenced by persecution before the Reformation period. The sparse and somewhat unclear information on the opponents of infant baptism seems to show that many did not oppose it as such, but only because it was performed by officials unworthy of the office and was therefore invalid.

When the reformers shouted the watchword of the sole authority of the Scriptures, and defended this principle tenaciously against the Roman Church and its claims of authority, it was inevitable that along with other usages of the Roman Church, also its method of baptism would be subjected to a serious examination in the light of the Scriptures. Diligent study of the Bible led many to the apparently new discovery of the fact that the New Testament not only knows nothing of all the ceremonies in which the rite of baptism came gradually to be clothed, but also that it does not even mention infant baptism or cite an instance of such baptism, indeed that infant baptism could not be made to agree with the teachings of the apostles.

The fact that there is no trace of infant baptism in the New Testament is recognized today almost unanimously by theologians. Even Schleiermacher (p. 1) said openly, "All traces of infant baptism presumably found in the New Testament must first be put into it."

Paul always saw faith and baptism together. "Naturally Paul and with him the original church could not conceive of baptism without faith. The question of the effect of baptism on an unbeliever did not enter his field of vision" (Stromberg, 27). If it is a fact that faith is a prerequisite for baptism, then infant baptism has no meaning. Only a sacramental conception can consider it necessary for salvation.

Catholic theologians rest their case for infant baptism on tradition. But the Protestants demand Scriptural evidence. J. A. Möhler (Symbolik, Par. 30) comments: "That infant baptism is in the Protestant view of the sacraments a totally incomprehensible act, there is no doubt; if the sacrament is effective only through faith, of what value may it be to an unconscious child? The Anabaptists, about whom Luther was so excited, drew from the premises he had given, very simple demands, and he was therefore unable to refute them without sacrificing his own views." Schleiermacher admits that the symbolic books of the Protestant churches "view infant baptism apart from all historical aspects and undertake to justify it in and for its own sake, but inadequately and on mutually contradictory grounds (Der christliche Glaube II, Par. 138).

Similarly Luther's proofs for the justification of infant baptism are not unified, but show a clearly discernible uncertainty. Since Luther in his controversy with the feared Anabaptists found himself compelled to base his arguments on Scripture, he utilized the passages which are still cited today and which seem to justify infant baptism.

At first Luther based his proof on the creed (Sermon, 1518) or on the faith of those who present the child (Jan. 13, 1522). But in 1522 he already began to claim faith on the part of the child. No one could prove the opposite. Children were more receptive than adults (as in his exposition of Galatians in 1519). In addition to reference to circumcision Luther also uses New Testament references. Above all, Matt. 19:14 seems to him a principal argument. See his elucidations in the sermon for the third Sunday after Epiphany in the Kirchenpostille. He very positively defends his claim that children have a faith of their own. In his booklet, Von der Wiedertaufe an Zwei Pfarrherrn (1528), he says, "No one is saved through the faith of others, but only through his own. . . . Baptism helps nobody and should be given to none unless he believes for himself." That children without faith of their own receive grace through baptism is "a dream." That the faith of the church can substitute for the faith of the individual is only the opinion of Sophists and without foundation in the Scriptures. The idea that the child is baptized on his own future faith is rejected by Luther as early as 1523. "Faith must be present before or at the baptism, otherwise the child is not rid of sin and the devil." The concept that by baptism the child is merely received into "Christendom," is "made up out of the imagination." A baptism in which the same presuppositions cannot be made for the children as in adult baptism, and in which the child does not receive the same as an adult, is no baptism at all, but rather only a "play and mockery of baptism."

In answer to the question how a faith of their own comes into being in infants, Luther has various answers. He says the petitions of the godfathers secure it to the child. Or, the priest acts in Christ's stead and gives the children faith and the kingdom of heaven. In addition to the "strong" and "firm" Scriptural references (Matt. 19:13-15; Mark 10:13-16; Luke 18:15, 16), Luther also cites I John 2:13: "I write to you, little children." He also points to the baptism of entire households; then again to circumcision, which made believers of Abraham's children. How much more should this apply to baptism. John the Baptist's leaping in his mother's womb is incredible without presupposing faith (Luke 1:41).

In reply to Rom. 10:17, that faith comes from preaching, Luther asserts that children, precisely because they are without reason, are so much the more able to believe. Therefore if a baptism is to be safe, infant baptism is safest of all. Historical proof is also employed at times by Luther, by referring to the long existence and generality of the practice of infant baptism. Then he points to the gifts and achievements of men baptized in infancy as evidence that infant baptism is pleasing to God.

In contrast to this strong emphasis on the objective effect of the sacrament of baptism, which to be sure cannot be imagined without faith on the part of the child, Zwingli saw in baptism only a symbol of the obligation the candidate assumed. Zwingli was at first an opponent of infant baptism. In his book on baptism (1525) he confesses, "The error led me astray a few years ago, that I thought it would be much better not to baptize children until they had arrived at good faith." Hubmaier (q.v.) mentions in his Gespräch von der Kindertaufe (Nikolsburg, 1526) that when he and Zwingli had conferred together in May 1523, in Zürich, Zwingli had granted that infants should not be baptized. Felix Manz (q.v.) confirms this in his Schutzschrift (letter of defense) to the city council: "I am certain that Master Ulrich understands this idea of baptism, that is, that infants should not be baptized, much better than we, but I do not know for what reason he does not announce it openly."

In his conflict with the Swiss Brethren Zwingli changed his opinion completely. In his writing to the Strasbourg theologians on Dec. 16, 1524, he already defended infant baptism, comparing it with circumcision, which was replaced by baptism according to Col. 2:11. When in I Cor. 7:10 the apostle calls the children "holy," baptism is presupposed! As an example of the baptism of infants he cites the baptism of John the Baptist, which was not at all different from Christian baptism. He calls untrue the assertion that the apostles inquired into the faith of candidates before baptizing them. Sometimes it had been done, sometimes omitted.

In his book, Welche Ursach geben zu Aufruhr und wer die wahren Aufrührer sind (1524), Zwingli grants that there is in the New Testament no clear command for infant baptism; but since it contains no clear prohibition either, we must refer back to the Old Testament; and thus he speaks of circumcision again. In the book, Vom Tauf, vom Wiedertauf, und vom Kindertauf (1525), Zwingli expresses himself thus on the baptism of infants: "The children of Christians are no less God's children than their parents, just as in the Old Testament. And if they are God's children, who will object to their being baptized?" Circumcision was a symbol of what baptism is to us. As the former was given to the children, the latter should be also.

With convincing and striking arguments Hubmaier refutes the ground Zwingli presents for infant baptism. Col. 2:11 speaks of the circumcision not made with hands. Thereby baptism is not made the equivalent of circumcision, but its higher position is brought out. It is not a mere outward act, but an inward process. The "shadow" of the Old Testament is wiped out. The word "baptize" is not used in Scripture in the sense of "teach," as Zwingli asserts. The baptism of John is not identical with the baptism of Christ. The former signified confession of sin, the latter faith in pardon. Baptism assumes the confessing faith and the obligation to live in accord with God's will. When Zwingli points out the Greek word "disciple" and asserts that teaching follows baptizing, Hubmaier replies that one can become a disciple of Christ only through teaching and faith. Only when teaching and faith precede does one receive baptism, without thereby putting an end to teaching; Christian understanding must continue to grow. As further evidence for infant baptism Zwingli cites Mark 10:14: "Suffer the children to come unto me." Hubmaier makes it clear that this does not mean they should be baptized (Usteri, 256).

Calvin's concept of infant baptism is peculiar. He considers the children of Christian parents sanctified by their descent and in God's covenant; hence they are entitled to the sign of the covenant.

Schleiermacher (d. 1834) made an attempt in his teaching on faith to hold to infant baptism as a church custom, of course abandoning Luther's position. He declares infant baptism to be an imperfect baptism, the effect of which is suspended until the recipient has become a personal believer. He says, "Infant baptism is a complete baptism only when, after instruction is completed, the confession of faith is considered the last act belonging to it."

But Schleiermacher admits openly: "But we cannot maintain the necessity of a baptism thus divided into two parts, which, however, happens when one damns the Anabaptists and Mennonites for assuming that children who die unbaptized can be saved. . . . Therefore it would have been very reasonable to abandon infant baptism at the time of the Reformation, in order to approach more closely to the institution by Christ, and we could still do so. . . . It would then be normal to leave it to every Protestant family to decide whether they want to present their children for baptism in the customary way, or not until they have confessed their faith, and we should explain that we repeal the old condemnation pronounced on the Anabaptists on this point and that we are willing to maintain church communion with the Mennonites, if they will only not declare simply invalid our completed infant baptism; on this point it should be easy to reach an agreement."

This generous attitude is held today by not a few theologians, and they act accordingly.

In the first edition of HRE the statement is made, that "there is no trace of infant baptism to be found in the New Testament may be considered a fact in scientific exegesis." In the third edition Dr. Feine says, "The practice of infant baptism in the apostolic and post-apostolic period is not demonstrable" (Vol. XIX, 403). In the same volume (446) Drews declares, "There is complete absence of evidence that children were baptized in apostolic times. Whenever the attempt has been made to offer Scriptural proof for infant baptism, it has been a waste of effort."

In fact, the "strong and firm verses" of Luther do not speak for, but against infant baptism. For they (Matt. 19:14; Mark 10:14; Luke 18:16) show that the Lord loved the children without baptism. For He caressed and blessed them, but did not baptize them nor command that they be baptized.

The five instances in Acts of the baptism of entire households leave, on careful exegesis, no room for the baptism of small children. As Tobias Beck says, "All the baptized households, according to circumstances mentioned in the account, consisted of responsible persons."

The verse in I Cor. 7:14, on which Luther once requested Melanchthon to enlighten him as to whether it might be used in favor of infant baptism, is definite evidence against any apostolic practice of infant baptism. "Paul would not have used that argument if infant baptism had been customary at that time. Infant baptism is certainly not apostolic" (Olshausen on I Cor. 7:14).

Beyschlag comments on this verse: "Of infant baptism there is in (Paul's) writings as in the entire New Testament no mention; rather, the manner in which he argues in I Cor. 7:14 on the subject of the children of Christians—that, if the non-Christian spouse were unclean and not sanctified by his life with his Christian spouse, then the children of Christians would also be unclean—is striking proof that there was then no thought of sanctifying children through baptism. Hence only those came for baptism who were compelled by a personal faith.

In their rejection of infant baptism the Anabaptists of the Reformation built their case solely on the Bible, than which they recognized no other authority. Their assertion that there is no trace of infant baptism in the New Testament, neither directions nor an example, and further that the teaching of the New Testament on faith completely excludes infant baptism, they defended with great positiveness and with more or less skill by citing examples and passages from the Bible.

Thomas von Imbroich (1558) opposes infant baptism with unusual skill on Biblical grounds. In Matt. 28 he points out that teaching and faith must precede baptism; teaching should be given before and after baptism; teaching is followed by repentance and faith. By Christian baptism faith is confessed and sealed. But baptism must be followed by godly living. This is the order of Christ and His apostles. His Biblical refutation of the argument that baptism is the same as circumcision and that the baptism of entire households speaks for infant baptism, is really exhaustive. (Güldene Aepfel in Silbern Schalen, q.v., 48-121.)

Servaes (q.v.) likewise clearly shows the incorrectness of infant baptism in his first epistle (Güldene Aepfel, 53), and in the second (ibid., 73).

Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) in his Vermahnung discusses the subject at great length. He shows the invalidity and error of infant baptism, and strikingly refutes with Biblical and historical proofs the arguments arrayed in its behalf. Next to Hubmaier's booklet, Marpeck's Vermahnung is the most important presentation of the teaching and practice of baptism by the Anabaptists (Gedenkschrift, 213-50; Loserth, Quellen).

Since the Anabaptists of the 16th century viewed infant baptism as being contrary to the New Testament, they logically considered those baptized as infants as not baptized at all. In his booklet Von der Christlichen Tauff der Gläubigen (1525) Hubmaier writes that the Anabaptists stated quite openly that they had not been baptized as infants, and must therefore be baptized now (Sachsse, 17). Against the favorite proofs for infant baptism Hubmaier argues to the point as follows.

(1) There is a complete absence of Scripture for baptizing children upon their future faith. It is the same as like planting a grapevine at Easter, hoping for future grapes, when the vine may die.

(2) To interpret infant baptism as a symbol of initiation, whether of beginning faith or of the new life, is contrary to Christ's institution of baptism.

(3) The vicarious faith of parents and godfathers is not known in the Scriptures. The candidate for baptism must believe for himself.

(4) The children of believers are not ipso facto believers, for they have not yet heard God's Word. They are on the same plane as other unbelievers. Otherwise there would be two kinds of baptism.

Hubmaier continues that many recognize the erroneousness of infant baptism, but were afraid of "rebaptism." But such baptism is not rebaptism, since they were not baptized as infants. In the sixth chapter of this book Hubmaier discusses the question, "Does the Scripture forbid infant baptism?" He says, "Yes, indirectly, for it commands believers' baptism. If one says: What is not expressly forbidden is permitted, one re-establishes the whole papal system."

Hubmaier also offers historical proofs. The claim that infant baptism had been customary since apostolic times he refutes by referring to the numerous papal edicts which clearly presuppose adult baptism.

To the question whether unbaptized children are saved, Hubmaier points to God's love, for if God dealt only according to justice, no one would be saved. But no definite answer could be given. Matt. 19:14 Hubmaier explains from the Greek to mean not the children themselves but the humble.

In his book of 1526 (Der Uralten und gar neuen Leerern Urteil, das man die jungen Kindlein nit taufen solle bis sy im Glauben underricht sind) Hubmaier replies to Zwingli's arguments for infant baptism. Here historical proofs are given much room. Statements of numerous Church Fathers are mustered for adult baptism and against infant baptism. In the foreword Hubmaier condemns the abuse of letting infants partake of communion. On the same plane is the abuse of administering baptism to children who do not yet believe. In addition to the proofs he adduced from Scripture in his last book, he would here bring human testimony.

The material was without doubt assembled with great pains. But Hubmaier often cites inexactly and on unreliable sources, frequently errs in dates, so that many of his historical proofs do not stand historical scrutiny. But in his assertion that church history affords protests against infant baptism and certain evidence for the continuance of the baptism of believers in old Christian families, Hubmaier was entirely correct. Modern historical research has confirmed these facts. The fact, for instance, that among the many pictorial sketches of baptisms in the catacombs of the first centuries not a single infant baptism is depicted, is important archaeological evidence.

The practice long continued, precisely in Christian families, of not baptizing infants, can only be explained on the basis of established custom. The rise of doctrines on baptism in contradiction to tradition, and in all parts of the Roman empire, without evoking sharp objection on the part of leading theologians and councils, is a psychological impossibility. Even bishops did not baptize their own children. These cannot have been isolated instances. They would have attracted attention and been attacked if there had existed a firm tradition of infant baptism. The omission of infant baptism in many Christian families of the third and fourth centuries cannot have been a matter of innovation, but of holding to an old practice.

Among the well-known men of that time Ambrose must be mentioned, who was born in Trier about 340, as the son of a Roman prefect of Gaul. The family had adopted Christianity a century before. Among their progenitors was the martyr Sotharis. After his father's death, his mother moved to Rome. Ambrose was not baptized until his thirty-fourth year. Jerome, the Christian scholar and translator of the Bible, was born in Dalmatia (ca. 340) of Christian parents. He was baptized in Rome by Pope Liberius in 360. Augustine, the son of the pious Monica, was not baptized until 387, when he was 33 years old. Gregory (d. 390), bishop of Nazianzus in Cappadocia, was baptized in his thirtieth year, after he had completed his studies. His brother Caesarius and his sister Gorgona, both certainly Christians, were baptized shortly before their death. Their mother, Nonna, was descended from an old and respected Christian family. She dedicated her son Gregory to the Lord with prayer, placing his infant hands on the Bible. Basil (d. 379), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, belonged to an old Christian family known for its many martyrs, but he was not baptized as an infant. The same is true of the patriarch Nectarius (d. 398) and of Ephraem Syrus (d. 373). Chrysostom, whose mother Anthusa prayed and read the Bible with him, was baptized after he was a lawyer and after three years of instruction, by bishop Meletius of Antioch.

The oldest writings of the post-apostolic period contain no evidence of infant baptism. The oldest certain evidence of the rise of this practice is found in Tertullian (q.v.) in his De baptismo. He, however, objects to it, and advises postponing baptism until after the candidate has received instruction. Hubmaier is correct in maintaining that the views of the Pelagians or of Cyprian prove nothing, for the utterances of the Church Fathers are authoritative only if they coincide with those of the Scriptures (1527, Von dem khindertauff); Origen did not declare himself in favor of infant baptism; furthermore he was frequently in error too. This is correct. Origen's alleged testimony for infant baptism comes from the free Latin translation of Rufinus, who was interested in fitting Origen's teaching to the later orthodox dogma (Heussi).

The rise of the practice of infant baptism is shrouded in darkness. There is neither any information of the beginning of the practice nor any synodal resolution to introduce it. Neander (214 ff.) finds several elements in the spirit of the post-apostolic period that were favorable to the introduction of infant baptism; e.g., the idea of the magical effect of baptism and of its necessity for salvation. Von Stromberg (162) points out the fundamental religious mood, which found expression in the mystery religions. "Surely none of the Christians of the first and second generations were free of mystery-piety."

"Progressive materialization of the sacred" and the "concept of mysteriously working forces in the act of baptism disconnected baptism from the personal experience of salvation, and faith in baptism was emptied of its most valuable content" (Stromberg, 166). A complete reversal had taken place in the primitive Christian idea of salvation. Its beginnings can be noticed early in post-apostolic literature. Hermas says, life is given by the baptismal water, and the forgiveness of all past sins, therefore it is necessary to salvation. Barnabas teaches that in baptism the Christian enters into possession of salvation and the indwelling of God. Similar expressions are found in Justin, Clement of Alexandria, and others.

When the mysterious effect of the objective means of grace known as sacraments is assumed, then an important premise for infant baptism has been given. Nevertheless the generalizing of the practice was slow. Tertullian (De baptismo, 18) is still an opponent when he declares, "To be sure, the Lord says: and forbid them not to come unto me. Then indeed they may come when they are grown, when they learn, when they are taught there where they are coming. They may become Christians when they can know Christ. Why does the age of innocence hasten to have its sins forgiven? In temporal affairs more care is taken. Should heavenly possessions be entrusted to one to whom earthly goods cannot be entrusted? Let them first understand how to request salvation, that it may be granted them at their request."

In Cyprian (q.v.) infant baptism finds a zealous defender. He too sees in baptism the means of the new birth, release from the devil, death, and hell, and of the granting of the Holy Spirit. Under Cyprian's influence 66 bishops declared themselves in favor of infant baptism in 253. They should be baptized as early as possible (Ep. 64, 2; see De baptismo); they receive the Holy Spirit (Ep. 64, 3). In the crying and wailing of infants Cyprian heard the request for the grace of baptism (Ep. 64, 6).

After Cyprian the baptism of infants became current practice in North Africa. A similar resolution was passed in 305 by a synod at Elvira in Spain. Logically infants also participated in communion (De lapsis; Const. Apost. VIII, 12, 13; Dionysius, Areopagiticus. De hierarch. eccl. VII, ii; Augustine's epistles, 23, etc.). This custom remained in vogue for centuries in the West, and in the Greek Orthodox church has continued until today, immediately connected with confirmation.

Augustine, in his controversy with the Pelagians, found it necessary to strongly emphasize infant baptism. Pelagius sponsored infant baptism in rejecting original sin, Augustine promoted it because of the sinfulness of children. Without baptism, says Augustine, there is no rebirth and no salvation.

The retention of infant baptism is in the final analysis an ecclesiastical matter. Those who consider the church of believers on the basis of voluntary membership the correct form cannot favor infant baptism. Those who favor a church including as nearly as possible the entire population or at least the masses, will consider infant baptism as the act of accepting them into Christendom and the means of relieving all the descendants of church members of the necessity of making the decision. The principle of the mass-church demands infant baptism. From this standpoint the practice still has many zealous defenders, who freely admit that it was not an early Christian practice, but only a later church custom.

Among the Anabaptists the question of the meaning and use of baptism only in the total framework of church life became of such great importance that to the outsider it usually seemed the main point of their doctrine. Today as well, the question of infant baptism gains or loses its significance and interest in connection with the questions of the nature of the Christian Church.

The question of infant baptism has received serious attention recently again in continental state church circles, particularly because of the open repudiation of infant baptism by Karl Barth in 1943 in his pamphlet, Die kirchliche Lehre von der Taufe. His son Marcus Barth published in 1951 a large work, Die Taufe ein Sakrament? in which he took basically the same position, as did Johannes Schneider's Die Taufe im Neuen Testament a year later. Both latter works give an exhaustive exegetical discussion of all New Testament passages dealing with baptism. Many pastors in the Swiss, German, and Dutch state churches openly followed Karl Barth's lead, although it was difficult for any of them to put into practice their convictions and to refuse to baptize the infants brought to them. The strongest counterattack against Barth was that by Oscar Cullmann, also professor at Basel, in 1948 in his booklet, Die Tauflehre des N.T., although H. Grossmann had already attacked Barth's position in his booklet Ein Ja zur Kindertaufe in 1944. Cullmann sought to prove that the early church must have practiced infant baptism. J. Jeremias, professor at the University of Göttingen, had already attempted this proof in 1938 in his earlier booklet, Hat die älteste Kirche die Kindertaufe geübt? Both Cullmann and Jeremias rely more upon historical evidence than exegetical proof. B. H. Unruh in 1950 carefully examined and refuted the arguments for infant baptism in his "Zur neuesten Literatur über die christliche Taufe," followed by Paul Schowalter in 1953, "Noch einmal: Die Tauffrage." J.Wa., H.S.B.

A. Seeberg, Die Taufe im Neuen Testament (Bibl. Zeit- u. Streitfragen, 1913); W. Heitmüller, Taufe und Abendmahl im Urchristentum (Rel. Volksbücher 1, 22-23, 1911); A. v. Stromberg, Studien zur Theorie und Praxis der Taufe (Berlin, 1913); E. Händiges, "Taufe, die Lehre der Mennoniten" in RGG; C. Sachsse, D. Balth. Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914); John Horsch, Menno Simons (Scottdale, 1916); idem, Infant Baptism (Scottdale, 1917); J. Warns, Die Taufe (2d ed. Cassel, 1922); idem, Staatskirche? Volkskirche? Freikirche? (Homburg, 1919); Schleiermacher, Der christliche Glaube II, 138; P. Althaus, Die Heilsbedeutung der Taufe im Neuen Testament (Gütersloh, 1895); J. A. Möhler, Symbolik (Mainz, 1832 ff.); J. Usteri, "Darstellung der Tauflehre Zwingli's," Theol. Stud. u. Krit. XXV (1882); Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten . . . (Weierhof, 1925); J. Loserth, Quellen und Forschungen zur Gesch. der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert (Vienna and Leipzig, 1929); Karl Barth, Die kirchliche Lehre von der Taufe (Zürich, 1943); Was ist Taufe? ed. F. Gruenagel (Stuttgart, 1951); Marcus Barth, Die Taufe ein Sakrament? (Zürich, 1951); Johannes Schneider, Die Taufe im Neuen Testament (Stuttgart, 1952); H. Grossmann, Ein Ja zur Kindertaufe (Zürich, 1944); O. Cullmann, Die Tauflehre des N.T. (Zürich, 1948); J. Jeremias, Hat die älteste Kirche die Kindertaufe geübt? (Göttingen, 1938); B. H. Unruh, "Zur neuesten Literatur über die christliche Taufe," Menn. Gesch.-Bl. VII (1950) 31-42; P. Schowalter, "Noch einmal: Die Tauffrage," Menn. Gesch.-Bl. X (1953) 33-36; ML II, 488-94.

Ingalls Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Gray Co., Kan., five miles north of Ingalls, a member of the Southern District, is the outgrowth of an original union or mission church founded in 1923. It now (1954) has a membership of 57. D. W. Siemens, B. C. Willems, G. G. Wiens, Wm. Neufeld, D. J. Wiens, and (at present) J. W. Fast have been leaders in the congregation. J.W.Fa.

Ingenheim, Jörg von, with Hans Schmidt wrote the song, "O Herre Gott vom Himmelreich, Merck auff und sieh die Nothe," found in the Ausbund (q.v.).

Particulars about Jörg are not available. Hans Schmidt (q.v.) and four companions, all Hutterite missionaries, suffered martyrdom at Aachen, Germany, in 1558. Apparently Jörg was the man not named by van Braght who recanted and was set free. But soon he repented his apostasy and returned to a loyal and faithful life among the brotherhood in Moravia. (Wolkan, Lieder, 146; Mart. Mir. D 209 ff., E 588 ff.) vdZ.

Ingolstadt, a city (pop. 40,270) on the Danube in Upper Bavaria, Germany, became the residence of the dukes of Bavaria-Ingolstadt in 1392. The university, founded in 1472, transferred to Landshut in 1800 and then to Munich in 1826, played an important role during the Reformation period through the activity of several of its professors of theology. Some of them were active opponents of the Anabaptist movement, as Dr. Johann Eck (q.v.), Luther's well-known opponent, and Urban Rhegius (q.v.), who later became the Lutheran preacher in Augsburg. The later Anabaptist leader Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) earned his doctor's degree here; he was called in 1512 as professor of theology, and in 1515 was made Prorector of the university; in addition he preached at St. Mary's. Another prominent Anabaptist who studied here was Hans Denk (q.v.); he was matriculated on Oct. 29, 1517, and was given the bachelor's degree in 1519.

In 1543 a Hutterite from Allgäu by the name of Damian (Thaman) was seized in Ingolstadt as he was about to leave for Moravia, and was burned at the stake when he would not recant. His courage and steadfastness aroused admiration among the spectators (Beck, 154).

The death of a second Anabaptist martyr executed in Ingolstadt, Michel Fischer, is commemorated in a Hutterite song. After a 12 weeks' imprisonment he was beheaded on Aug. 7, 1587, after a vain attempt by the Jesuits to convert him (Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 785).

The first settlement of Jesuits in Bavaria took place at Ingolstadt in 1549; they took over a chair of theology at the university. When the Hutterian martyr Christian Gasteiger (q.v.) was thrown into prison here on May 30, 1586, the Jesuits visited him by two's (for the purpose of converting him) during the 12 weeks of his imprisonment as well as after his transfer to Munich, where he was executed on Sept. 13. Opposition to the Anabaptist movement also took literary form at Ingolstadt. Thus in 1576 Dr. Kaspar Franck published here his catalog of heretics, which pays special attention to Hubmaier and Denk. Here too the propaganda of Christoph Erhard (q.v.) and Christoph Andreas Fischer (q.v.) was printed; they were Jesuits of Ingolstadt (Jöcher's Gelehrten-Lexikon).

When Elector Max Joseph, who became King Maximilian I Joseph of Bavaria in 1799, took over the government he eliminated the Jesuit control of government under his predecessor Karl Theodore and proclaimed complete religious liberty in Bavaria. The country was now open to the Mennonites. The ruler, being acquainted with their agricultural achievements in his home at Zweibrücken in the Palatinate, welcomed them. They settled in various places between the Danube and the Alps, where representatives of their faith had been martyred in the 16th century.

A number of Amish families settled near Ingolstadt. The first family to settle here, the Suttors from St. Goar on the Rhine, acquired the former monastic estate Hellmannsberg about 1810. From Hesse and Alsace followed families by the name of Oesch, Oswald, Ingold, and Güngerich, of the Amish branch. They organized a congregation about 1810 and held services in their homes.

In the middle of the 19th century other Mennonites from the Palatinate and at the turn of the century from Lower Franconia and Baden, settled in the vicinity of Ingolstadt. They joined the Eichstock-Singern (q.v.) church and were served by the preachers of that congregation: Michael Landes and Daniel Lichti from Au. In 1891 a new Mennonite congregation was formed, known as Rottmannshart (near Manching) where Michael Landes (served as elder at least from 1902 to his death in 1927) later lived, which later moved its seat to Ingolstadt. At the death in 1912 of preacher Güngerich of the Amish branch the two congregations united. In 1930 it had 90 baptized members. It held the meetings in a rented hall in Ingolstadt, until a meetinghouse was built in 1952, and also in Rottmannshart and Niederfeld. The elder in 1925-49 was Michael Horsch of Hellmannsberg; since then Eduard Landes and Hellmut Horsch serve as elders. The membership in 1955 was 135, including 40 unbaptized children. †ME I)

The members lived scattered as far as 55 miles apart. Therefore those living up the Danube formed a separate church in 1912 at Donauwörth (q.v.), which was transferred in 1926 to Augsburg. Hege.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); ML II, 414 f.

Ingolt, Friedrich, an Anabaptist of Strasbourg, participated in the disputation with Hans Denk (Dec. 22, 1526) and stated that he felt justified in not leaving Hans Denk, and in loving him sincerely. The name Ingold is still found among South German and American Mennonites.

F. P. Gelbert, Magister Johann Baders Leben und Schriften (Neustadt a.d.H., 1868); ML II, 415.

Inheritance, Right of (Erbrecht). In the 16th century and later the Anabaptists were restricted in their rights to hand their possessions down to their children. Since their marriages were not solemnized in the church they were not legally valid, and the children were consequently not entitled to inheritance. This was the case in the canton of Bern in Switzerland (Müller, 134). The opinion of a Protestant divine, Dec. 8, 1701, saw in this attitude an unjust punishment and a sign of intolerance. On May 17, 1721, the Bern government passed a regulation that the children of Mennonite women, whose fathers were living in exile, should not be considered Swiss, but be sent to their exiled fathers. A government rescript of May 17, 1722, provided that Reformed parents had the right to disinherit their children if they became Mennonites; but if they returned to the Reformed Church, their inheritance should be given them without interest. "Lateral lines entitled to inheritance may claim half of the legacy of an Anabaptist, whereas according to a decree of March 17, 1729, the entire estate of a deceased Anabaptist falls to the Church if there are no direct heirs" (Müller, 355).

In Russian Mennonite circles it was often the practice to leave cripples, the deaf, the blind, mental defectives, and epileptics twice as large an inheritance as healthy members of the family.

As to the Netherlands: during the period of persecution (1530-75) the property of the martyrs was usually confiscated, but there are a few cases in Amsterdam (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 260) and elsewhere, when the families of the executed inherited the possessions of their parents. These cases were exceptions.

Later on until 1795 some limitations were placed on the rights of inheritance for Mennonites. These limitations were not the same in all the provinces. In the city of Groningen in 1601 a resolution was passed that Mennonites (and others) who did not perform their marriages in Reformed churches, and unbaptized children, would be deprived of hereditary possessions. In Deventer the congregation was not permitted to receive an inheritance in 1662 because it was "an illicit society" (Blaupot t. C., Groningen II, 70-71), and in 1705 the congregation of Molkwerum had to give up a large bequest to the Reformed Church for the same reason (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 204). But these limitations were not always strictly enforced, and so Mennonite congregations often received bequests. In some congregations it seems to have been the custom that members assigned 10 per cent of their property to the church, or that after their decease relatives made this arrangement. In some churches where there were seamen, especially whale-hunters as in De Rijp and Workum, these people, either by letter, or orally with the deacons, made an arrangement to assign a part of their property to the church, with the condition that the deacons would provide for their children in case they should not return from an expedition. NEFF, VDZ.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 654; Müller, Berner Täufer; N. van der Zijpp, Gesch. der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 124; G. A. Wunkes, De Geref.-Kerk in de Ommelanden . . . (Groningen, 1904) 21; E. Teufel, "Die Beschlagnahme und Verwaltung des Täufergutes durch den Fiskus im Herzogtum Württemberg im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert," in Theologische Ztscht VIII (1952) 296-305; ML I, 603.

Inman, Kan. (pop. 650), a village located in McPherson County in the central part of the state, was founded in 1887, soon after the Rock Island railway was built, and was called Aiken. This was changed to Inman the following year.

Approximately 1,500 Mennonites live near and in Inman, perhaps 25 per cent of them in town. They own and operate about half of the businesses. The groups represented are the Church of God in Christ Mennonite, G.C.M., K.M.B., M.B., and M.C. There are six Mennonite churches in the community. Cooperatively they sponsor a home for the aged in Inman with rooms for 18 residents. P.T.N.

Inman Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Inman, McPherson Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, dates back almost to the coming of the Mennonites to Kansas and the establishment of the Hoffnungsau (q.v.) congregation, its mother church. Because of the large area of settlement, Sunday schools were soon started in various schoolhouses in the outlying areas of the settlement. In 1909 the mother church erected and dedicated a small church building in Inman as a home mission project, supplying it with ministers. In 1921 this group organized as the Inman Mennonite Church with 106 charter members and Abraham Albrecht as pastor. Nine ministers have served as pastor, with Ben Rahn the present pastor. The 1953 membership was 206. A new modern church was dedicated on March 3, 1955. B.R.

Inn Valley (German, Inntal). There are three long river valleys in Tirol which have become important in Anabaptist history because to them the Anabaptists fled during the worst persecutions to eke out an existence; viz., the valleys of the Inn, the Adige, and the Puster.

In the Inn Valley the oldest Anabaptist territory was that of Rattenberg-Freundsberg. At Rattenberg Anabaptists were found in 1527. From the time Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) was beheaded and his body burned (Jan. 14, 1529), followed by 70 other martyrs, to the end of the Anabaptist movement in Tirol there was no period of any length in which they were not found here. This is also true of the mining city of Schwaz, where a booklet was put on sale "in which Anabaptism is drawn (in pictures) for those who cannot read." In Schwaz the Anabaptists were already pursued by placards. Besides secret members there were said to be five or six leaders (Vorsteher). This was the situation in the entire region between Schwaz and Rattenberg. Villages named in the court records are Brixlegg, Ratfeld, Kramsach, Breitenbach, Puch, and Inning. The number of Anabaptists executed in Schwaz is given in the list of 1581 as 20, the best known being Hans Schlaffer (q.v.).

In Kufstein measures were instituted against the Anabaptists during this time. Sixteen martyrs are listed. In 1533 the contention was made by authorities that in the domain of Rattenberg, Kufstein, and Kitzbühel no one was left who was "stained with Anabaptism," and that in Kufstein "their eradication is so vigorously pursued that their leaders and other sectarians can find no shelter." But this does not correspond with fact. The recantation of Jakob Portner, a clergyman who had joined the Anabaptists, reveals that he had preached with extraordinary success in Kitzbühel, Rattenberg, and Kufstein, baptizing many who "persisted to the end, when they were sentenced from life to death."

An appendix to the Anabaptist mandate of Ferdinand I of March 26, 1534, warned all towns and magistracies in which boatmen lived who sailed the Danube, to see to it that no Anabaptists were accepted as passengers. This mandate includes also the Inn River, which was part of the route to Moravia.

In Hall Anabaptists were pursued as early as 1528; it was an important Anabaptist center. "At Hall," says Schwyger's Chronik, "many persons, men, women, and maidens, young and old, have come into the sect of the Anabaptists." Among the Anabaptists tried there, two sisters, outstanding for their steadfastness, Annele Malerin and Urschl Ochsentreiberin, who were baptized in Hall, are celebrated in song and in the chronicles. They were "drowned in the water."

One of these songs reveals that Mils near Hall was also an Anabaptist center. The register of 1581 lists the number of martyr executions as eight. Anabaptist propaganda had already begun in 1528, as is inferred from the inquiry made by the government at Innsbruck as to why Anabaptist preachers had been allowed to preach so long in the towns, including Innsbruck. The most significant and most famous of all the martyrs of Tirol was Jakob Hutter (q.v.), who was burned at the stake here after "terrible torture" on March 3, 1536. In Calzein and Rothholz there were Anabaptists as early as 1527; two ended their lives at the stake.

As in the lower valley, the Anabaptist movement was active for many decades in the upper Inn Valley, especially after Hutter's death. From Pfunds to Innsbruck they can be traced, and in certain localities, like Imst and Landeck, they were particularly strong at times. From its list of martyrs, as important as that of Innsbruck, it is seen that some of the executions took place in the late 1520's. Hearings took place at Imst in 1538, to which Dr. Gallus Müller (q.v.) was sent to convert the accused. But Müller's efforts were in vain. There Sebastian Hubmaier and Hans Grünfelder, later "the aged Oswald," lay in prison. Griesinger reported to the brotherhood in Moravia that they testified to God's Word and the truth; their joy could not be described; a crowd of 1,000 witnessed the execution of Bastl and Hansl. A fourth Anabaptist, Jakob Zängerle, was executed in Imst in the same year. In 1561 Anabaptists fled from Imst to Moravia; in the 70's they still had contacts with the Anabaptists of Moravia. An execution is listed at Landeck. Anabaptists from Landeck also fled to Moravia. In Telfs there were several in 1537.

In the upper Inn Valley Griesinger was active for a time; it was the home of Ursula Hellrigl, whom Gall Müller tried to convert. In lower Engadine (Grisons) the movement was active, and propagated itself to the upper Inn (Tirol); Anabaptists were still found there in 1533. In Stams three were executed, and in Petersberg two. Thus the entire Inn Valley, as far as it lies in Tirol, was in the 16th century the home of Anabaptism. The greatest number lived in Kitzbühel (q.v.), which also shows the largest number of blood witnesses. LOSERTH.

Loserth, Anabaptismus; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 421 f.

Inner Light: see Spiritualism.

Inner Word: see Spiritualism; also Bible: Inner and Outer Word.

Inquiry Meeting (Umfrage): see Counsel Meeting.

Inquisition, a religious court of the Roman Church for the extermination of sectarians and heretics. The old Catholic Church knew no such institution. Athanasius held it to be a sign of the true church that she forced no one, and persecution to be an invention of Satan. Chrysostom thought likewise. Augustine was the first to advocate corporal punishment of the heterodox, through his false exegesis of Luke 14:23, "Compel them to come in," though even he opposed capital punishment. The death penalty was not reached until the 11th century, when Rome was beginning to subjugate the entire religious life and thought of Western Europe.

Since the ninth century there had been episcopal courts, whose duty it was to investigate and remove all abuses in the church, including false doctrine. Since in the opinion of the popes these courts dealt too leniently with the rise of the Waldensians, Cathars, etc., Pope Gregory IV, continuing the work of Lucius III and Innocent III, organized the Inquisition (inquiry or investigation) and committed its leadership to the Dominicans, who, responsible only to the pope, proceeded without pity in carrying out its program.

An institution of this kind, unparalleled in history, can be understood only as the practical result of the doctrine developing at the time, that the pope as God's representative had absolute power of life and death in his hands. In the final analysis it was a product of the rigid Roman law of the time of the Caesars. The innovation was, to base the execution of heretics on the Bible. From the Bible's symbolic designation of heretics as thieves and wolves, Thomas Aquinas concluded that thieves are hanged and wolves clubbed to death. The verse in Titus 3:10, that one who causes divisions should be avoided, he construed thus: avoidance is best carried out through execution. There have been few times in history when Christian doctrine was so completely misunderstood as at this time of the rise of the Inquisition.

In general the Inquisition took the following course: The trial was initiated by denunciation through anyone, including corrupt persons. The confession of the accused, which was required for execution, was often forced by merciless torture; it was then repeated, thus obtaining the "free" confession. The penitent had to recant, and after satisfying the required punishment was received back into the church. The inquisitors frequently made honest attempts to win the accused to the church. But if he was recalcitrant, he was committed to the temporal authorities for execution at the stake. Tens of thousands thus fell victims to the external unity of the church. The few more familiar examples of inquisition trials make it clear that in addition to arbitrariness, rank injustice often prevailed (as in the case of Conrad of Marburg, who after two years of effective work was slain by German knights). After 1542 the Inquisition became a terrible weapon in the service of the Counter Reformation.

The Inquisition was first successfully used in Italy. The court records of Venice show 35 Anabaptist(?) trials in the 16th century, and four in the 17th century. France saw its most terrible operation in the Albigensian war 1209-29 and following. Because of its involvement with the interests of the king the Inquisition was "successful" against the Albigenses in spite of popular revolt against its cruelties. In Spain, where it became a state institution, it operated with similar cruelty against Waldensians, Cathars, and especially Jews and the descendants of the Moors.

Whereas the Inquisition was successful in stamping out all Protestant movements in the above three countries, it failed in the northern Netherlands in its struggles against the Beguines and Beghards, the Brethren of the Common Life, and the Reformation movements. Under Charles V (1519-56) some thousands were executed, most of them Anabaptists. He said the guilt of the Anabaptists was as great as that of other heretics, and they must therefore suffer the same penalties; however, if they showed themselves penitent before their death, one might proceed more leniently with them: if men, such penitents should be beheaded; if women, buried alive. For the introduction of the Inquisition into Germany an indisputable legal basis was laid in the imperial edicts. In spite of its defective organization and the resistance of all classes it seems to have been even bloodier than in the Romance countries. In Germany it finally terminated in a general witch hunt, which cost many more lives.

Although modern times have put an end to the Inquisition, the Catholic Church has not abandoned it. The congregation of cardinals is today still predominant, nor has a single decision been made declaring the Inquisition contrary to the spirit of Christianity.

The reformers had no such institution. Nevertheless Calvin stood entirely on the platform of the medieval Inquisition in trying the anti-Trinitarian Servetus and turning him over to the temporal authorities to be burned (1553). Luther was on the same ground, when he, after having considered banishment adequate punishment (q.v.) for Anabaptists until 1528, from that time on also sponsored capital punishment for them. Nor did Melanchthon, Zwingli, and Calvin correct this error of the great reformer. In the question of the burning of heretics they exceeded Luther, when they applied to the Anabaptists the old laws of the Jewish theocracy concerning the bloody extirpation of Baal-worship (Deut. 13:7-11). Thus the Lutheran estates could also sanction the terrible mandate of the Diet of Speyer of April 23, 1529, which advocated that "each and every Anabaptist and rebaptized man or woman of an age of understanding shall be judged and brought from life to death with fire and sword or the like according to the occasion, without previous investigation by the clergy." In the following important addition lies Luther's contribution to the theory of the Inquisition, which supersedes the Middle Ages: "The government punishes the heretic for the sake of public peace, and not for the sake of the church; i.e., ecclesiastical power is no longer to be higher in authority than temporal power" (Köhler, 36).

On the whole it may be said that the Reformation prepared the way for religious liberty, though it did not itself take that way. It is to the credit of the Anabaptists that they rejected the use of force in religious matters and demanded unconditional toleration as an outcome of their understanding of faith. Unfortunately they were then unable to prevail. The gradual elimination of the Inquisition came in the period of the Enlightenment. H.Q.

P. Flade, Das römische Inquisitionsverfahren in Deutschland (1902); H. Hermelink, Der Toleranzgedanke im Reformationszeitalter (Leipzig, 1908); P. Fredericq, Geschiedenis der Inquisitie in de Nederlanden (2 vv. 1892); P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1908); W. Köhler, Reformation und Ketzerprozess (Tübingen, 1901); Ign. v. Döllinger, Kleinere Schriften (1890); H. C. Lea, A History of the Inquisition in the Middle Ages (3 vv., New York, 1888); Frid. Hoffmann, Geschichte der Inquisition (2 vv., Bonn, 1878); HRE IX, 152 ff.; ML II, 422.

Institute Monthly, official organ of the Elkhart Institute (q.v.), was intended as a means of keeping former students in touch with the school. The first issue was printed in October 1898 and the last in May 1903. In the June-July number, 1903, it became the Goshen College Record. The format, eight three-column pages 8¼ x 11¼ in., was changed after the first year to 16 two-column pages 7 x 9½ in. The first editorial staff was W. K. Jacobs, editor, and I. R. Detweiler, business manager. Beginning with the sixth issue F. S. Ebersole served as editor. He was succeeded by C. K. Hostetler. The Mennonite Historical Library at Goshen College has a complete file. J.S.U.

Instrumentum publicum wegen desjenigen, was bey denen Churfl. Pfaltzischen Herrn Commissarien gegen die Protestante Mennoniste zu Rheydt in Anno 1694 in facta vorgenohmen vnd sich zugetragen (1696) is the title of a printed protocol giving detailed information on the expulsion of the Mennonites from Rheydt, which was published in Crefeld in 1801. This booklet of 25 pages octavo is an important source for the history of the Anabaptists in the Rhineland. A copy is found in the Mennonite Library at Amsterdam. The library also contains a manuscript copy of a Dutch translation made by Godschalk Godschalks in 1771. This latter was translated into English by N. B. Grubb and published in the Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac for 1910 (Philadelphia, Pa.) and as a separate pamphlet under the erroneous title Pro Copia Instrumentum Publicum (1909) along with the English translation of two letters of 1708 (Germantown) and 1745 (Skippack) to Amsterdam, found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. The German edition was reprinted in Gem.-Kal. 1933, 126-31. (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 530 f.; ML II, 426.) Neff.

Insurance is the practice of distributing the economic risks of an individual or a group among an entire group or at least among a large number of individuals willing to bear their portion of the risk. This method of seeking protection against hazards may cover losses resulting from damage to, or destruction of, life, property, or almost any type of economic wealth. In buying insurance the purchaser gets a contract which sets forth the obligations and benefits falling upon or accruing to the parties involved.

The principle of sharing losses is an old one among Christians. Mennonites from their earliest history have practiced it as an integral part of brotherhood life. Sharing was, however, not thought of in terms of systematic and selective risk-bearing modern insurance. The forerunner of present-day insurance was the mutual aid society, which has replaced the informal, spontaneous, and unorganized expression of bearing one another's burdens in the primary group relations of the Anabaptist and Mennonite brotherhoods.

As early as 1623 the Mennonites of West Prussia, Germany, organized the Tiegenhöfer Privat-Brandordnung for the purpose of rendering systematic aid to members in cases of loss from fire, storm, or other emergencies. It will be noted that this organization did not cover losses due to death but rather losses of property resulting from accidental or natural causes. Such organizations as the above in time became integral parts of Mennonite life and culture when the Prussian Mennonites migrated to Russia and later to the United States and Canada. Toward the latter half of the 19th and early 20th centuries the other Mennonites in America organized a number of similar aid organizations. There are now (1956) approximately 70 mutual aid societies among the Mennonites in the United States and Canada. The majority of these societies protect their members against total losses from fire, storms, hail, and natural disasters. Two societies, however, are simple assessment death benefit societies, and a half dozen are burial aid societies. In more recent years, three mutual auto aid societies have been formed, also a number of prepayment health and hospital aid societies.

All of the Mennonite aid societies originally accepted only members of Mennonite churches in good standing as participants in their programs, and this is still true in about three fourths of the societies. However, a number of the organizations have slowly accepted non-Mennonites. This change in policy was often brought about as a result of intermarriage. Several of the aid societies no longer require Mennonite church membership as a condition of joining, and one of the oldest and largest Mennonite insurance societies has dropped the name "Mennonite" and is no longer under Mennonite direction.

The size of the aid societies ranges in membership from the smallest with 130 members to the largest society, which takes in non-Mennonites, with over 10,000 members. The average for 26 societies in 1955 was 2,500 members. All of the regular mutual aid casualty insurance societies are operated on the simple assessment plan. Although economic reason is not the major one for the existence of the Mennonite societies, the cost of the insurance to the members of the societies is from 25 per cent to 75 per cent lower than in many of the straight commercial insurance companies.

Mennonites have traditionally been opposed to commercial insurance companies, and specifically to the principle of life insurance and the companies selling it. (See articles Life Insurance and Mutual Aid.) J.W.F.

Intercontinental Company, Limited, a Canadian corporation chartered Nov. 19, 1925, with chief office at Winnipeg, Man., by General Samuel McRoberts, chairman of the board of the Chatham-Phenix National Bank in New York, and Edward Robinette, president of Stroud & Co. of Philadelphia, investment bankers. The purpose of the corporation, as set forth in the minutes of its first meeting, Dec. 16, 1925, was to carry through "a plan for promoting and assisting the emigration to Paraguay, South America, of certain religious sects [Mennonites] now residing on farms in Northwestern Canada [chiefly Manitoba] and recolonizing the farms so vacated by placing new settlers [new Mennonite immigrants from Russia] thereon." The stock of the company consisted of 10,000 shares of common stock owned by McRoberts and Robinette and ultimately 5,000 shares of preferred stock with par value of $100. Additional funds were raised by sale of first-mortgage bonds, called Farm Lien Bonds, to the value of $1,000,000 (?), secured by the land holdings purchased from the emigrating Mennonites of Manitoba. Later (1930) second-mortgage bonds to the value of more than $100,000 were sold to Mennonite and Amish buyers through A. J. Miller, former director of American Mennonite Relief in Russia, with endorsement of MCC officials. Because of the farming difficulties in 1927 ff., the depression of 1929 ff., and the relative financial failure of the Paraguayan project, the holders of the first-mortgage bonds (chiefly the National Trust Co. of Toronto and Winnipeg, but also the American Corporation Bond and Share Co. of Delaware with $240,000 holdings, the Interprovincial Trading Corporation of Canada with $96,000, and lesser holders) foreclosed the company. As a result the Mennonite second-mortgage bond holders lost all their equity. The foreclosure apparently took place in 1931, since no further records of the IC could be found.

A complicated financial and corporate structure was set up to handle the entire Manitoba-Paraguay operation. The Corporacion Paraguaya was organized at Asuncion in April 1926 to purchase from the Carlos Casado Co., an Argentine corporation, the land in the Chaco needed for resale to the Manitoba Mennonites. The American Continental Co., C. par A., was organized in July 1926 at Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, to hold the stock of the Corporacion Paraguaya. In 1929 the AC held $763,000 of IC gold bonds, while the CP also held $237,000 of the IC gold bonds, which had been issued to pay the CP for the land purchased from it by the IC for sale to the Manitoba emigrants. When the relative financial failure of the CP became clear, the MCC finally purchased the entire stock of the CP and its assets for $57,000, with a net value to the sellers of less than $25,000. This was done in 1937.

Thus practically the entire assets of McRoberts and Robinette in their Paraguay venture were wiped out. A rather grandiose scheme motivated originally, largely on the part of General McRoberts (q.v.) at least, by a humanitarian concern for the Mennonites (together with, of course, hope for financial gain) failed. But in the course of the 12 years (1925-37) in which it was in operation, the McRoberts-Robinette project made possible the entire Mennonite colonization in Paraguay, both Menno and Fernheim, as well as aiding the new immigrants to Manitoba in securing land for settlement.

The Intercontinental Company purchased a total of 43,998 acres from the Manitoba Mennonite emigrants for an over-all price of $902,900.39, of which approximately $308,000 was paid out in cash, and the rest in Chaco land, 137,920 acres at five dollars per acre. The company sold its Manitoba land in turn to new Mennonite immigrants from Russia on long-term crop payment contracts, and from its Winnipeg office aided the purchasers in many ways with further small loans and advice on crops and farm management. Under the pressure of farm depression conditions the sale contracts were renegotiated to easier terms in order to save the situation.

H.S.B.

The records of the IC are deposited in the Archives of the Mennonite Church at Goshen College. See also W. Quiring, "The Canadian Mennonite Immigration into the Paraguayan Chaco," MQR VIII (1934) 32-45.

Intercourse Mennonite (MC) Mission outpost, now extinct. In 1897, ten years after Hershey Sunday School was started in the Pequea District, Lancaster Mennonite Conference, Mahlon Buckwalter and Henry H. Hershey opened a Sunday school in the schoolhouse east of Intercourse. The enrollment was 75. In 1904 this school could no longer be used, and the outpost was closed. I.D.L.

Intermarriage: see Mixed Marriage.

Inter-Mennonite Relations. A. Europe. The development of sectors of the Anabaptist movement in distinct linguistic and geographical areas (Switzerland, South Germany, Netherlands, Moravia, Vistula Delta) and the emergence of the Hutterite brotherhood in Moravia as a variant communistic type resulted in a lack of close relations between the distinct Anabaptist groups already in the middle of the 16th century. The tensions became very serious between the Hutterites and the Swiss Brethren, as well as between the Dutch-Northwest German followers of Menno and the High Germans (and Swiss Brethren). As a consequence brotherly relations were completely severed in both cases, and in the latter case Menno Simons excommunicated the entire opposite party. Close relations, however, were maintained between the Dutch Mennonites and those of the Vistula Delta. A relatively harmonious relationship was also achieved among all the South German and Swiss Anabaptists, of which the general Anabaptist conferences of 1555, and 1557, and 1568 at Strasbourg are a testimony. For a time there were two distinct groups of Anabaptists in the South, viz., the Swiss Brethren (more in Switzerland), and the followers of Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.). As the recent doctoral dissertation, Pilgram Marpeck, sein Kreis und seine Theologie (University of Zürich, 1955), by J. J. Kiwiet has shown, it was Marpeck who, after strenuous endeavor (1540-54), succeeded in bringing the two groups together in 1555. Kiwiet even holds that the remnants of the Melchiorites in South Germany were included in this union.

The account of the tragic divisions, in Dutch Mennonitism, beginning in 1566, which were not fully overcome in the Netherlands until the forming of the A.D.S. in 1811, is better given in the article Netherlands, although these divisions penetrated all the Anabaptist-Mennonite communities in North Germany from Emden to Königsberg, and even had significant consequences in the earlier stages of Mennonite history in Russia. The attitudes of certain of these schismatic parties were often very harsh toward the other groups, including general excommunication and the requirement of rebaptism for transfer of members. This was particularly true of the Flemish versus the Frisians. The Frisians and particularly the third major group, the Waterlanders (who were not transplanted outside the Netherlands), were milder in their attitudes.

The Hutterites went their own way completely until the early 19th century when they settled in the Ukraine near the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, and were aided by Johann Cornies (q.v.). There was some friendly correspondence in the 18th century between them and the Dutch Mennonites. No close relations resulted from their settlement in 1874-77 near the Mennonite settlements in South Dakota. However, a considerable number of Hutterites in South Dakota joined the G.C.M. and K.M.B. groups, no doubt in part because of the memory of Cornies' assistance.

The Swiss Brethren continued relatively isolated (the South German Anabaptists having practically died out by the time of the Thirty Years' War, 1618-48). However, the great tribulations of the mid-17th century in Bern resulted in repeated intervention in their behalf by the Dutch Mennonites, and the ultimate settlement of some Swiss Mennonites in Holland, where they were finally absorbed. The Swiss Brethren settlers in the Palatinate in the time of their suffering from the French invasions at the end of the 17th and beginning 18th centuries received from the Dutch Mennonites substantial financial relief, and aid in emigration to Holland and Pennsylvania. Considerable correspondence between Palatinate Mennonite leaders and the Dutch Mennonite relief agency lies in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. The Dutch Mennonites were also generous in their aid to the West and East Prussian Mennonites suffering from floods or persecution in the 17th and 18th centuries. The attempted settlement of the Lithuanian Mennonites from the Memel area in Holland in the early 18th century was a failure.

Apart from the above-noted relations the Mennonites of the Netherlands and the rest of Europe developed no intimate relations or co-operative effort until the 19th century, when the Dutch Mennonite mission in the Dutch East Indies (beginning in 1847) enjoyed considerable support from the Mennonites of Russia and Germany. The mission, representing the evangelical fraction of the Dutch, became an inter-Mennonite bond which transcended the negative effect of the rise of modernism in the Dutch church. In Germany the Mennonitische Blätter (q.v., founded in 1854) and the Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im Deutschen Reich (q.v., a conference founded 1886) both contributed much to bringing the various and widely scattered Mennonite communities together as well as mediating good relations with the Dutch Mennonites.

The development of the Mennonite World Conference (first meeting in Basel in 1925) under the leadership of the German pastor, Christian Neff (q.v.), was the first extensive inter-Mennonite relationship developed in Europe. In the post-World War II period (1945-) a series of international Mennonite co-operative organizations has arisen, which have multiplied and intensified good inter-Mennonite relationships in Europe. The list includes the International Mennonite Peace Committee (1936, 1949), European Mennonite Bible School (1949), European Mennonite Evangelizing Committee (EMEK, 1952), European Mennonite Relief Committee (1954), Mennonite Voluntary Service (MFD, 1954), and Der Mennonit (1948, its inter-Mennonite publishing committee created in 1957). All of these organizations include representatives of all Mennonite national groups in Europe (Dutch, Swiss, French, and German) except the Bible school and Der Mennonit, which have no Dutch representation. The North American Mennonites are represented through the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC) in all of them except EMEK. The European groups are also all represented along with North America in the Preparatory Commission for the Mennonite World Conference, and take part in its sessions. Since 1950 the MCC has been operating out of Basel, Switzerland, a Christian education materials project (CEMO) with the co-operation and later direct management of the Mennonite Publishing House of Scottdale, the latter publishing at Basel through the Agape Verlag (est. 1955) German and French materials for summer Bible schools. An Advisory Council representing four of the European national Mennonite groups (except Holland) co-operates in the project.

The schisms which caused so much trouble and difficulty in Holland and on through to West Prussia and Russia (1565-1811), and the Amish schism (1697) in Switzerland, France, and South Germany, have all been overcome in Europe. The only remaining schism is that of the Mennonite Brethren and Mennonite Church in Russia (1860), which still persists in Russia. This schism caused much bitterness at the beginning, and resulted in long-continued tensions.

B. North America. The successive migrations from Europe to North America (1683-1860), i.e., from Switzerland, France, and Germany to Pennsylvania and further west, including Ontario, resulted in the formation of a new North American Mennonitism which maintained no connections with its European homeland. (Mennonite and Amish groups at first remained separate in the New World.) The same was true also of the successive waves of immigration from Russia to the prairie provinces and states of Canada and the United States (1874, 1922, 1930, 1947 ff.) and to South America (1930, 1947 ff.) in Paraguay, Brazil, and Uruguay. The Mennonite Brethren-Mennonite schism has been perpetuated in all these settlements and lands, although there has been a varying amount of co-operation between the two groups, both in Russia and in North and South America. The Allianz-Gemeinde, founded in 1907 in the Ukraine, was a vain attempt to bridge the gap between the two major groups. In Russia (from 1910), in Paraguay (1930), and in Brazil (1930) a valuable co-operative organization was established in the form of the KfK (q.v., Commission for Church Affairs), which represented both major groups and the Allianz-Gemeinde (q.v.). In Russia, under the pressure of conditions, a general conference was formed in 1910, including both the M.B. and Mennonite groups, which has also had a beneficent influence on intergroup relations in the new settlements in Paraguay and Brazil (1930 ff.), where there has been considerably closer co-operation than in North America.

Most of the Mennonite immigrants from Europe to North America in the first 190 years (1683 to 1860), being of relatively homogeneous Swiss-South German background (including Alsace-Lorraine), naturally formed one common brotherhood, uniting in the group known as the Mennonite Church (MC), overriding even the Amish schism, although half of the Amish, the Old Order and the Conservative Amish, remained outside this fold. The only exceptions were the smaller Swiss and South German groups arriving in the second quarter of the 19th century, which, though akin to the earlier immigrants of this group, shared in the formation of the General Conference Mennonite Church (begun in 1860), whose first nucleus was a dissident block (1847) from the Eastern Pennsylvania area of the Mennonite Church (MC). The large first Russian and Prussian Mennonite immigration groups of 1874-80 in their prairie state settlement joined the General Conference Mennonite group.

The formation of the "General Conference of the Mennonites of North America" in 1860 was the first attempt at a deliberate over-all union of all Mennonite congregations. The vision was that of John H. Oberholtzer, who conceived of it as co-operation of autonomous congregations working together in the fields of missions, publication, and education. The beginning was inauspicious, securing the adherence of only a few congregations at the outset, but gradually one third of all the Mennonites of North America was brought under its wing, including most of the large Swiss settlements in Indiana and Ohio, and ultimately the Central Conference composed largely of regional Illinois Amish. By no means all of the Russian Mennonite immigrants, however, joined the General Conference, even outside the K.M.B. and M.B. groups, the Peters-Wall churches (later E.M.B.) and the large Old Colony group in Manitoba remaining outside. It has been successful in bringing together into one working fellowship a great number of congregations of divergent origins and backgrounds.

Since the Mennonite Brethren and smaller splinter groups from Russia also continued their separate life, and the conservative "Old Colony" groups in Manitoba (1874-80 arrival) did the same (not joining even the General Conference group), and since several new schismatic groups (E.M., E.M.B., M.B.C., and Central Conference) were formed in the period 1855-90, both from the older M.C. group and the G.C.M. group, the ranks of the North American Mennonites were by 1900 rather badly broken. The effects of the Oberholtzer division of 1847 in Pennsylvania, of the M.B. division of 1860 in Russia, of the M.B.C. division of 1875 in Indiana and Ontario, and of the smaller Egly (1866) and Stuckey (1871) divisions in Indiana and Illinois, had left deeper wounds than is sometimes realized, and augmented the already existing distance between the various Mennonite groups due to differences in European background and to differing emphases developed in America. Hence it was that inter-Mennonite relations in North America were largely negative or even polemic in the period before World War I (1914-18).

However, some welcome exceptions to the general negative American status before 1914 should be noted, the chief being the co-operative inter-Mennonite effort to aid the often very needy Russian immigrants of 1874-80. The Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.), founded in 1873 for this purpose, though not an official co-operative effort of conference bodies, was composed of representatives from the M.C. and G.C.M. groups and rallied support from almost all sections of Mennonitism in America. To support this work Union Aid committees (q.v.) were formed in Eastern Pennsylvania and Ontario. J. F. Funk (MC) with his Mennonite Publishing Co. at Elkhart, Ind., became and remained for many years the chief publisher for the Russian Mennonites in Manitoba. For over 40 years, for instance, the Mennonitische Rundschau (q.v.) was published by him and his later successors at Scottdale. The Mennonite Aid Plan (q.v.), founded in 1882 at Elkhart in the M.C. group, soon secured a clientele among the Russian Mennonites, especially in Minnesota and South Dakota, and ultimately became chiefly their agency. The Home and Foreign Relief Commission (q.v., MC) founded in 1897 at Elkhart, Ind., for famine relief in India, was a quasi inter-Mennonite organization with widespread support from several Russian Mennonite groups in the prairie states, and with D. J. Jantzen, a "Russian" Mennonite, as a leading co-worker and one-year secretary. M. S. Steiner (q.v., d. 1911), the president of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), had a vision of an inter-Mennonite mission organization, which he attempted but failed to achieve. The Congo Inland Mission (q.v., 1911) was the first and only successful inter-Mennonite mission organization, with official representation at first from two conferences (Evangelical Mennonite and Central) and later of three, the General Conference Mennonites being added later.

Significant inter-Mennonite co-operation in North America did not begin until 1913, had only a slow growth between the two world wars, and came to full growth only after 1940, particularly with the remarkable development that has taken place since World War II. An attempt at drawing all Mennonites of North America closer together was made through the All-Mennonite Convention (q.v., meetings held usually triennially 1913-36), but with little permanent success. Bluffton College (q.v.), enlarged in 1913 from "Central Mennonite College," together with the Mennonite seminary, later (1921) called Witmarsum Theological Seminary (q.v.), carried for a time the inter-Mennonite idea, having a board unofficially representing three Mennonite bodies (G.C.M., E.M., and Central Conference), and hoping to unite all branches of Mennonites in a common educational effort. This vision also did not come to fruition and Bluffton finally became a straight G.C.M. school, while Witmarsum was discontinued in 1931. One other joint institution, the Mennonite Old People's Home (q.v.) at Meadows, Ill., was established in this period (1923) by the Central and Defenseless (E.M.) conferences.

The major event in inter-Mennonite co-operation in the period between the wars was the founding of the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) in July 1920 as the official agency of six Mennonite bodies for famine relief in Russia. Fortunately it was not disbanded upon the completion of this work in 1925, but only remained moribund, to begin its real career with the colonization of Russian refugees in Paraguay in 1930. Almost simultaneously the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization (q.v.) was organized (1922, preceded by Canadian Central Committee in October 1920), representing most Mennonite groups in Canada, to aid in the great migration of Russian Mennonites to Canada. Both the MCC and the CMBC have continued to be vital service organizations on an inter-Mennonite basis, though with different fields of work, and have furnished the background and stimulus for many subsequent inter-Mennonite activities and organizations. The Mennonite Colonization Board (q.v.), organized about the same time (1924) in Kansas on an inter-Mennonite basis, accomplished little and finally was absorbed by the MCC in 1947.

The experience of co-operation in the extensive and long-continued MCC program of service to the new Mennonite settlements in South America, in which all the North American Mennonites have joined, has had an important and wholesome influence on inter-Mennonite relations, both within North and South America.

World War II gave the greatest impetus to inter-Mennonite co-operation through the joint effort of all major Mennonite bodies to define a common peace position in the United States and to administer Civilian Public Service (q.v.). The Mennonite Central Peace Committee (q.v.), organized in March 1939 as the official agency of seven Mennonite bodies to work in this field, turned over its work to the MCC and its Peace Section in January 1942. The Peace Section has continued as a vital inter-Mennonite organization in this field. The good success of the MCC in its relief, colonization, and peace work, gradually led all Mennonite bodies in the United States and Canada, except the most isolated smaller ones, to support its work and to join its membership, so that it has become the one truly all-Mennonite inter-Mennonite organization. As such it has continued to enjoy immense prestige and good will.

The scope of MCC activities was gradually increased to include Voluntary Service (1946), though to a somewhat limited extent; Menno Travel Service (1947); Mental Health Service (1947) now (1957) administering three mental hospitals; European Farm Trainee Program (1950); I-W Services (1952); co-ordination of Mennonite Disaster Service (1955); Ailsa Craig, Ont., Boys' Farm (1955); Mennonite Indemnity, Inc. (1957), which is a reinsurance company to serve over 60 Mennonite mutual aid societies; and the joint delegation to Russia (1956). All these MCC activities serve on an inter-Mennonite basis, either through representation from various Mennonite bodies or by service to them. The MCC was also the carrier of the Mennonite World Conference in 1948 and represented the North American groups in the planning of the Conference for 1952, though now replaced by the North American Committee of Reference and Counsel for the Sixth Mennonite World Conference, which represents seven Mennonite bodies.

A series of inter-Mennonite agencies in the field of relief and nonresistance was also set up in Canada, all now affiliated with the MCC. They are the Nonresistant Relief Organization (q.v., November 1917) in Ontario, the Conference of Historic Peace Churches (q.v., July 1940) in Ontario, the Mennonite Central Relief Committee (q.v., March 1940) in Western Canada, and the Canadian Mennonite Relief Committee (q.v., December 1940) in Manitoba.

In the United States a significant number of new inter-Mennonite organizations have been set up since World War II. They include the Association of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges (q.v., 1944), the Mennonite Research Fellowship (q.v., 1946), the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA (published by a joint publishing committee of the three major Mennonite publication boards set up in 1947), the Association of Mennonite Hospitals and Homes (q.v., 1951), the Association of Mennonite Aid Societies (q.v., 1955), and the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries (q.v.), set up in 1956. The last is a grouping of Biblical seminaries with center at Elkhart, Ind. (Mennonite Biblical Seminary, GCM, and Goshen College Biblical Seminary, MC, at Goshen, with hoped for adhesions of certain other groups later). In 1956 the Mennonite Publishing House (MC) and the Mennonite Publication Office (GCM) began the joint preparation and publication of a graded Sunday-school lesson series. The Mennonite Quarterly Review (founded 1927) and Mennonite Life (founded 1946) have from the beginning had inter-Mennonite editorial boards; though published by single agencies. The Mennonite Weekly Review, reaching as it does a large readership in all branches and having an all-Mennonite news coverage, has been a wholesome influence. The latest inter-Mennonite project is the Inter-Mennonite Ministerial Study Conference, sponsored by the Inter-Mennonite Ministerial Study Committee, which in turn was sponsored by the North American Committee of Reference and Counsel for the Sixth Mennonite World Conference, and which is composed of representatives of five North American Mennonite conferences.

Local inter-Mennonite meetings of various kinds have been held in several Mennonite communities, such as the Mennonite Teachers Association (Kansas), Sunday-school conferences, ministerial meetings, and conferences of former CPS men. Disaster Service agencies have been set up on an inter-Mennonite basis across the United States (1954-56), and in more than one case inter-Mennonite groups have co-operated in actual disaster work. In the area of Kitchener-Waterloo, Ont., an inter-Mennonite ministerial meeting is held (annually since 1950) and in another area (central Illinois) one such meeting was held in 1956. In Chicago for some years an inter-Mennonite meeting of city missions has been held annually (since 1940). In New York, Chicago, Toronto, Philadelphia, and Iowa City, inter-Mennonite student group meetings have been held occasionally and in Philadelphia the Mennonite Student Center has been established (1953), open to all Mennonites though operated by one group alone.

The Conference on Mennonite Cultural Problems met annually 1942-47, since then biennially, sponsored by the Association of Mennonite Colleges. Since 1947 this association has also sponsored annual summer tours of Mennonite students and alumni to Europe. It also sponsors the Inter-Collegiate Mennonite Peace Society, which has been active since 1950.

A considerable number of educational institutions were established on an inter-Mennonite basis from 1886 on, sometimes with only two groups co-operating officially, sometimes without official group cooperation but on the basis of a private board of control with unofficial representatives from two or more groups. Among these have been Mountain Lake (Minn.) Bible School (1886); Mennonite Collegiate Institute at Gretna, Man. (1890); Freeman Junior College, Freeman, S.D. (1903); Immanuel Bible School (now Academy) at Reedley, Cal. (1927); Lustre Bible School at Frazer, Mont. (1928); Elim Bible School at Altona, Man. (1928); Steinbach Bible School at Steinbach, Man. (1936); Bethany Bible School (now Academy) at Munich, N.D. (1938); and Grace Bible Institute at Omaha, Neb. (1943).

A number of Mennonite hospitals have also been established on an inter-Mennonite basis, chiefly in Manitoba, such as Concordia at Winnipeg (1930), Bethania at Altona (1936), Bethel at Winkler (1935), and Bethesda at Steinbach (1937).

The remarkable growth of inter-Mennonite activities since 1940 reflects a growing mutual understanding and enlarging good will among Mennonites of the several distinct denominational organizations. Recently mergers of several Mennonite groups have taken place, or are in process: G.C.M.-Central Conference in 1945; Evangelical Mennonite and Evangelical Mennonite Brethren in 1953 (not fully merged as yet); K.M.B. and M.B. planning to merge in 1957. Earlier the Mennonite (MC) and Amish Mennonite district conferences (MC) had merged in stages in 1916-25, and in 1956 the Conservative Mennonites had to all intents and purposes merged with the Mennonite Church (MC). One related group, the Brethren in Christ, originally branching off from Lancaster County (Pa.) Mennonites in 1770, but with little or no connection to Mennonites since then, has drawn very close to the Mennonite denominational family through its membership in the MCC, in the Council of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges, and in the Mennonite World Conference. On the other hand, the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (United Missionary Church) has drawn almost completely away from the Mennonite family even dropping the name Mennonite except in Pennsylvania.

Through numerous channels also the relations between European Mennonites and North American Mennonites have been growing closer and warmer. Chief of these channels has been the MCC relief work in Europe in 1945 ff., which has directly served Mennonites in all European countries, and brought some 300 workers from America to Europe often in direct contact with European Mennonites in various local areas. These workers and MCC executive committee members have often attended Mennonite congregational and conference meetings in Europe, as well as numerous special meetings designed to provide for fellowship between European and American Mennonites. MCC area directors have been charged with liaison responsibilities, and in 1950 a direct Liaison Committee was established in Germany composed of representatives of the MCC and the three German Mennonite conferences. The Student Exchange Program sponsored by the Association of Mennonite Colleges has brought over 100 European Mennonite students to American Mennonite colleges since 1946, and the MCC Exchange Trainee Program likewise has brought over 150 young Mennonites to America. The Mennonite World Conference in 1948 brought some 25 European delegates to America, many of whom toured American and Canadian Mennonite congregations afterwards. And the two world conferences in Europe since then, at Basel (1952) and Karlsruhe (1957), have brought over 500 different American Mennonites to Europe. The MCC brought Elder Samuel Gerber from Switzerland on a tour of North American churches in 1951. Ernst Crous of Göttingen, Germany, served as exchange professor at Goshen, Bethel, and Bluffton colleges in 1948-49.

Closer relations between the older European and American bodies and the young churches established in Asia, Africa, and South America by mission efforts are cultivated not only by the regular visits of mission board secretaries to the several foreign fields, but also by the MCC relief operations in these areas and by visits from leaders of the younger churches to the West as well as attendance by some of them in Mennonite colleges and seminaries in the States and Canada, and at the World Conference sessions. The MCC centers in Sao Paulo, Montevideo, and Asuncion in South America also contribute to closer relationships.

Closer intergroup relations among the mission areas of the several boards on the foreign mission fields, especially in India and Japan, have been fostered through the creation of area co-operating relief committees through MCC stimulus. Such committees have been created in India (Mennonite Relief Committee for India, 1948) and Japan.

The only inter-Mennonite institution established in the areas outside Europe is the Mennonite Biblical Seminary founded in Montevideo, Uruguay, in April 1956, supported by the M.C. and G.C.M. mission boards in North America and administered by an inter-Mennonite board of directors representing Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Argentina.

Thus inter-Mennonite relationships are growing on an intercontinental as well as an interdenominational and international basis, and give good prospect of continuing to grow closer and more fruitful.

H.S.B.

International Mennonite Peace Committee (IMPC) was organized at Fredeshiem, Netherlands, July 4, 1936, immediately following the Mennonite World Conference meeting held at Amsterdam and Elspeet, with Jacob ter Meulen, librarian of the Hague Peace Palace Library, as executive secretary. The purpose of the committee was to promote the peace principle among the Mennonites everywhere and to render assistance to conscientious objectors who might become involved in difficulties because of their refusal to do military service. The committee issued a "Manifesto" to all Mennonites, but apart from rendering some aid to the Hutterites who were forced out of Germany by Hitler, did not accomplish much, partly because activity was suspended by World War II. It became moribund and was superseded by a reorganized committee in 1949.

The IMPC was reorganized in 1949 at Elspeet, Holland. The members of the new committee represented Holland, France, Switzerland, Germany, United States, and Canada, the North American members being appointed by the MCC Peace Section. The first officers were H. S. Bender (United States) chairman, Chr. Schnebele (Germany) vice-chairman, C. F. Brüsewitz (Holland) secretary, Pierre Widmer (France) fourth member; they have continued with little change to date (1957). The stated purpose of the IMPC is (a) to maintain contact between the Mennonite peace groups in the various countries; (b) to furnish a channel for co-operative action by these groups as may be desirable; (c) to publish a news bulletin to serve the international Mennonite peace cause; (d) to provide international Mennonite peace conferences at regular intervals; (e) to support those Mennonites in various countries who suffer for conscience' sake because of their nonresistant convictions; (f) to aid in clarifying, deepening, and applying fundamental convictions in regard to Biblical nonresistance; (g) to aid in a more effective nonresistant witness.

The committee has carried on its work in line with the above purpose, holding a number of international conferences at Belfort, Basel, Karlsruhe, Heilbronn, and Heerewegen, and beginning in 1955 the publication of a newsletter. H.S.B.

International Refugee Organization (IRO) was the official agency of the United Nations Organization (UNO) for the maintenance and resettlement of European refugees. Although it was first officially organized on Aug. 20, 1948, through the Preparatory Commission of IRO it actually began work July 1, 1947, the date of expiration of the UNRRA (United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Agency) and the Intergovernmental Committee for Refugees. By the time it had terminated operations on Jan. 31, 1952, it had provided care and maintenance for more than 1,000,000 refugees in camps in Europe, moved 1,038,750 in resettlement to overseas countries, and repatriated 72,834 to their countries of origin, at a cost of slightly more than $400,000,000.

Many Russian Mennonite refugees were helped by IRO, both in maintenance in camps in Germany, as well as in free transportation to Canada and South America. In 1948 four major transports (Volendam twice, General Heinzelmann, Charlton Monarch), all IRO except the first (for which MCC later received $160,000 from IRO), transported a total of 5,499 refugees to South America, chiefly to Paraguay. The first Volendam (q.v.) transport of Jan. 28, 1947, actually initiated the IRO resettlement program. The MCC through C. F. Klassen (q.v.), its

MENNONITE CHURCHES IN IOWA
KEY
1a-Iowa Mennonite School
1-Mennonite Church
2-General Conference Mennonite Church
4-Old Order Amish community
5-Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church
6-Beachy Amish Church
9-Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church
19-United Missionary Church
See Johnson County, Iowa, map for details of the area outlined.
1•Manson
CALHOUN
4
BUCHANAN
9 • Luton
Missouri River
Mississippi River
NEBRASKA
IOWA
Des Moines
JOHNSON
6
IOWA
1a
Iowa City
1
5
4
KEOKUK
WASHINGTON
2
19
HENRY
• Council Bluffs 19
ILLINOIS
PAGE
Shambaugh•19
19 •New Market
DAVIS
Pulaski•2
LEE
2•Donnellson
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20 30 40 50
MISSOURI

commissioner for refugees, co-operated closely with the IRO, with whom it had excellent relationships.

When IRO was discontinued, part of its work was assumed by the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees established by UNO in December 1950, and part by the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, organized in late 1951 on the initiative of the United States.

Before IRO took over, UNRRA, which had been established by UNO on Nov. 9, 1943, took on the refugee problem and established refugee camps, beginning this work on Sept. 1, 1944. However, its service was limited to citizens of member states of the United Nations. The Intergovernmental Committee for Refugees, established in 1945, assumed responsibility for the relief of refugees in Western European and neutral countries where the MCC was not operating. The constitution of IRO was actually adopted by UNO in December 1946, but the required 15 signatory nations were not secured until 1948. The Preparatory Commission in IRO was set up on July 1, 1947, by 20 nations (including some that had not yet formally adhered to IRO) as a stopgap until the full official activation of IRO could take place.

The MCC co-operated with IRO also by lending, beginning June 27, 1949, a team of three (or more) workers for welfare service in IRO-operated Displaced Persons (DP) camps. When the IRO program was discontinued in January 1952, and Church World Service (CWS) continued a welfare service program in the DP camps, the MCC-IRO team was transferred to CWS, continuing this service until 1954. H.S.B.

Intzinger, Franz, an Anabaptist at Leoben, Styria, Austria, was to be arrested in March 1530, but left the country a week before the order was to be carried out. In 1535 the note is made, "Franz Intzinger has become an Anabaptist, is being sought." He was apparently among the iron-dealers in Leoben at that time. (Archives of the city of Styria, Faszikel 18315; Ztscht des. hist. Vereins für Steiermark, No. 20, p. 268.)

Intzinger is probably identical with Franz Intzinger of Leiben in Styria, who emigrated from Nikolsburg with other nonresistant Anabaptists in 1528 and was made deacon together with Jakob Mändl, and then preacher at Austerlitz. It is thought that he lived for a time in Linz and baptized there (Wappler, 73, 187 f.). In 1530 complaint was voiced concerning their bookkeeping. The dissatisfaction over his management of church property may have been the cause for his return to his former home. HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozess in Zwickau (Leipzig, 1908); ML II, 427.

Iowa, an agricultural state in the upper Mississippi Valley, in 1953 had nine Mennonite communities, with approximately 5,200 members. Of these, 2,814 are members of the Mennonite Church (MC), while 817 are Old Order Amish, 754 General Conference Mennonites, 470 Conservative Amish Mennonites, 230 United Missionary Church, 52 Beachy Amish, and 26 Evangelical Mennonite Brethren.

By 1839 the wave of Mennonite westward migration had reached Iowa, when John C. Krehbiel from the Palatinate settled in West Point Twp., Lee County. By 1845 enough settlers had located there to make it possible to organize a church (GCM), but this was postponed until 1849 because of the murder of their minister. In 1850 they completed the building of their new church, the first Mennonite meetinghouse in Iowa. Later a new one was built in West Point, but for the past several decades no services have been held in it, and the West Point congregation has been dissolved. During the 1850's large numbers of Mennonites from the Palatinate and from Bavaria moved into Franklin Township, and organized the Zion congregation, which is now located in Donnellson. As their numbers increased, a third congregation was organized in Franklin Center, but when their members moved to Kansas in the seventies their church declined in membership, and the building was finally torn down. Only one congregation of Mennonites is left in Lee County, but through the influence of their German parochial school, which they maintained until World War I, they have preserved much of their German background and their philosophy. Members of the Lee County church moved to Washington County, where they organized the Salem Church in 1865, but after 1875 the members began to move to Kansas and the church became extinct.

The Christian Raber family, who reputedly settled in Lee County in 1840, were very likely the first Amish to live in Iowa. The Rabers were followed by other Ohio families, so that by 1846, when Bishop Joseph Goldsmith arrived from Butler Co., Ohio, there were enough Amish for the organization of a church. By 1855 the church membership reached 55, its largest number. At that time, the Amish began to move to Henry and Davis counties, and in 20 years their Lee County settlement had completely disappeared. The first Amish to settle in Davis County bought land there in 1854, but did not organize a church until 1861. At that time they had 32 members and in 1954 they had 121. By 1890, when the Pulaski Mennonite Church joined the Middle District Mennonite Conference (GCM), they had discarded all of the distinctive teachings of the Amish branch.

The settling of Joseph Roth in Jefferson County in 1843 was the beginning of the Jefferson-Henry-Washington County Amish community. During the next decade Amish settlers moved into Henry County, and in 1851 they first bought land in Marion Twp., Washington County. These settlers, originally from Alsace and Switzerland, had migrated from Wayne Co., Ohio. Their church (MC) was organized in 1852-53 by Joseph Goldsmith of Lee County. After he moved to Henry County in 1855, he became its resident bishop. At first there was only one church organization, but later the church was divided into the Trenton Township and the Marion Township congregations, with Goldsmith in charge of both. In 1862 Benjamin Eicher was ordained preacher of the Washington County group and in 1866 he became bishop. The two congregations gradually drew apart, and after 1874 the Washington County or "Eicher" church no longer co-operated with the Henry County congregation, which came to be known as the Sugar Creek Church. The Eicher church developed along more liberal lines than its sister church, and in 1892 it joined the General Conference of Mennonites (GCM). In 1900 the Eicher congregation established a branch church in Wayland, which since 1927 has been an independent congregation. The Sugar Creek Mennonite Church (MC) outgrew its building and so in 1949 the Bethel church was built north of Wayland to accommodate the members living in that area. The combined membership of the two churches (1955) is over 600.

By far the largest Iowa Amish and Mennonite settlement, established in 1846, is the one in Johnson and the bordering counties of Iowa and Washington. Their church was organized with 27 members by Joseph Goldsmith of Lee County in 1851. The 16 congregations of the settlement in 1953 had over 2,850 members. At first the Johnson County group adhered strictly to the Amish discipline, but during the late seventies a more liberal element withdrew from the Old Order. Since then, a majority have joined the more liberal Amish Mennonite or Mennonite (MC) churches, and the Johnson County Old Order membership in 1953 was only 464. (See map of Johnson County.)

Settlements established in several other Iowa counties were not permanent. Among these were the Mennonite settlement established in Mahaska County in 1852 (MC), the Page County Mennonite colony of 1864 (MC), and the Polk County group of 1856 (GCM). The Amish Mennonite settlements established in Pocahontas and Wright counties during the nineties have also disappeared, and the church established by the Stauffer (q.v.) Mennonites from Pennsylvania in Osceola County lasted only from 1887 to 1911. These groups were so small that it was difficult to maintain a community life. Other causes for their failure were the lack of leadership and disagreements among the ministers.

The Shambaugh, Iowa, Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church was organized first as a Brethren in Christ congregation, but joined the Mennonite Brethren in Christ conference after 1883. Near by is the New Market Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, incorporated May 12, 1894. Their third church is the one at Trenton in Henry County. This latter church, organized during the eighties, became one of the first members of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Conference, founded in 1883. More recently another congregation was established in Council Bluffs and very recently the Grace Missionary Church (UMC) was organized in Iowa City.

During the Civil War Mennonite families from Virginia settled in Keokuk Co., Iowa. When S. B. Wenger moved to the community in 1879 he hoped to establish a Mennonite church there, but not until 1898 was a congregation organized at that place. In 1953 this Mennonite (MC) church had a membership of 92. In 1892 and after, Amish Mennonite families from Illinois moved into Calhoun Co., Iowa. Five years later their congregation, now known as the Manson Mennonite Church (MC), was organized. In 1953 it had 273 members. Dissatisfied Old Order Amish Mennonites of Johnson County established a settlement in Buchanan County during 1914. Since that time others have moved in from Kansas, Indiana, and Ohio, and in 1953 their total membership was 353. Other Old Order Amish organized a Beachy Amish church in Johnson County in 1946, now known as the Sharon-Bethel church (q.v.). Others leaving the Amish in recent years joined the Conservative Amish Upper Deer Creek Church (q.v.), which has led to its expansion into the second congregation, Fairview, the two having a combined membership of 470. Missionary activity of the Johnson County churches brought about the establishment of congregations in Iowa City and at Iowa Valley. The most recently established Mennonite community in Iowa is the one founded near Luton (q.v.) in the western part by the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. A mission (MC) was started in Des Moines in 1956.

The Mennonites in Iowa are mostly rural although a shift to small town business has gained momentum among them during the last two decades. The chief towns in which Mennonites live, either as retired citizens or as businessmen, are South English, Wellman, Kalona, Iowa City, Wayland, Donnellson, Pulaski, and Manson. Many Mennonites are engaged in specialized agriculture, especially in the turkey industry. The Maplecrest turkey industry, which began in the Johnson County Mennonite community, is nationally known.

The only Mennonite church institution in the state is the Iowa Mennonite School (q.v.), northeast of Kalona, founded by the local churches (MC and CAM) in 1945. In 1878 Samuel D. Guengerich (q.v.) of Johnson County launched Der Christliche Jugendfreund. In 1912 S. D. Guengerich and four other Amish leaders, three of whom lived in Iowa, organized the Amish Mennonite Publishing Association (q.v.), which has been an important influence in the life of the Amish through the past four decades.

The General Conference Mennonite Church had its origin in a conference meeting in the West Point Mennonite Church in May 1860. Among the prominent Mennonite leaders in Iowa have been Christian Schowalter (1828-1907, GCM), Benjamin Eicher (1832-93, GCM) Joseph Goldsmith (1796-1876, MC), Sebastian Gerig (1839-1924, MC), Jacob Swartzendruber (1800-68, OOA), Jacob F. Swartzendruber (1851-1924, OOA), and Samuel D. Guengerich (1835-1929, CAM).

During World War I many Mennonite young men were assigned to Camp Dodge, near Des Moines. In World War II Mennonite Civilian Public Service camps and units were located at Denison (No. 18) and Mount Pleasant (No. 86). A Mennonite dairy herd tester unit also operated in the state. Under the draft law which followed World War II Mennonite I-W men were in units located in Des Moines, Mount Pleasant, and Iowa City. M.G.

In 1953 the Iowa Mennonite churches had the memberships given below.

Northwestern Iowa
Luton (EMB)	26
Manson (MC)	273
Northeastern Iowa
5 OOA districts, Buchanan Co. area	353
Southwestern Iowa
New Market (UMC)	50
Shambaugh (UMC)	49
Council Bluffs (UMC)	12
Southeastern Iowa
Davis County
Pulaski (GCM)	121
Lee County
Donnellson (Zion, GCM)	223
Henry-Washington County
Sugar Creek (MC)	462
Bethel (MC)	152
Wayland (GCM)	285
Eicher-Emmanuel (GCM)	125
Trenton (UMC)	89
Keokuk County
Liberty (MC)	92
Iowa-Johnson-Washington Counties
6 Kalona area OOA districts	464
Sharon-Bethel Beachy Amish	52
Upper Deer Creek and Fairview (CAM)	470
Grace Missionary (UMC)	30
Iowa City (MC)	93
Iowa Valley (MC)	27
West Union (MC)	381
Wellman (MC)	345
Daytonville (MC)	55
Lower Deer Creek (MC)	369
East Union (MC)	565

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939); E. G. Swartzendruber, Amish and Mennonite Church Centennial near Wellman and Kalona, Iowa (Wellman, 2d ed., 1953); Documents Relating to Bishop Jacob Schwarzendruber (1800-1868) (reprinted from MQR, July 1946, Vol. XX); M. Gingerich, "A Century in Iowa," Menn. Life II (January 1947) 24; Emma K. Bachman, "From the Krehbiel Family Album," Menn. Life X (July 1955) 135; Vernon Neufeld, "Mennonites Settle in Lee County," Menn. Life VIII (October 1953) 170; Haus und Handbuch für die Familie David Ruth, zu Eichstock, 1852 (at BeCL); ML II, 436-38.

Iowa City, Iowa, is the county seat (pop. 27,212) of Johnson County (q.v.) and the home of the University of Iowa, which has attracted many Mennonite students, partly because of its proximity to the large Mennonite settlement southwest of the city. Nine members of the faculty of Goshen College, five of Hesston College, and three of Bethel College have received degrees from the University of Iowa. In the 1951-52 school year Mennonite students in Iowa City organized a fellowship which has remained active. In 1953 a I-W unit of conscientious objectors was established at the University of Iowa hospital. The Iowa City Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.) has a membership of approximately 100, comprising largely the Mennonites who have moved to the city. Mennonites of the county regularly patronize the stores of Iowa City. M.G.

Iowa City (Iowa) Mennonite Church (MC), formerly Iowa City Gospel Mission, began as the Mennonite Sunday School on Nov. 27, 1927, in the old Cartright schoolhouse on Orchard Street on the west side of the Iowa River in Iowa City. The work began as a result of the vision of Will Guengerich, Chris Hershberger, Joe C. Brenneman, and others, in part to provide a church home for Mennonites who had moved to the city. The present meetinghouse was erected in the summer of 1939 at 614 Clark Street (corner of Clark and Seymour) on the east side of the Iowa River. The present membership (1954) is 100 and the pastor is Virgil J. Brenneman. As a mission it was operated by the Iowa-Nebraska District Board of the Mennonite Church. In January 1952 Norman Hobbs, who was then pastor, left the Mennonite Church. Taking about 20 members with him, he organized a new congregation (Grace Missionary) which is now affiliated with the United Missionary Church. In October 1954 the Mission became an independent congregation assuming almost the entire support of the program and its pastor. At that time it was also decided to change the name to Iowa City Mennonite Church. V.J.B.

Iowa County, Iowa, located in the southeastern part of the state, is bounded on the east by Johnson County (q.v.) and on the south by Keokuk and Washington counties, all of which contain Mennonite settlements. Amish Mennonites settled in adjoining Johnson County in 1846 and by the next decade the settlement had spread westward into Iowa County. The Upper Deer Creek Conservative Mennonite Church (q.v.), the West Union Mennonite Church (MC) (q.v.), and the Parnell Mission sponsored by the West Union Church, are located in the southeastern part of the county. Approximately 500 Mennonites live in the county. M.G.

Iowa Mennonite Benevolent Association, Inc., was organized in March 1956, at Kalona, Iowa, to build and operate a Mennonite home for the aged, to be erected in 1957 at Kalona to accommodate about 40 guests. The association is composed of 33 members representing six of the seven Mennonite (MC) congregations, the three Conservative Mennonite congregations, and the one Beachy Amish congregation in the general Kalona-Wellman area, and elected by them. The board of directors consists of six members chosen by the association. H.S.B.

Iowa Mennonite Historical Society: see Mennonite Historical Society of Iowa.

Iowa Mennonite School (MC), Kalona, Iowa, is a Christian high school established to counteract through Christian education the secularism of the public schools and to offer high-school training to a considerable number of youth who would otherwise not have received such training. It serves the compact Kalona-Wellman Mennonite settlement in Johnson, Iowa, and Washington counties.

The school was founded in the fall of 1945, offering the 9th and 10th grades. Grades 11 and 12 were added in succeeding years. The school is located about eight miles northwest of Kalona and the same distance northeast of Wellman, directly south across the road from the Lower Deer Creek Church. It is operated under the direction of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, with a Conference-appointed board, originally of six members. Other governing groups of the school are a local board composed of lay members, and a religious welfare board composed of personnel from the other two boards.

Ministers who led in organizing the school were Amos Gingerich, J. Y. Swartzendruber, and S. J. Horst. The charter faculty was S. J. Horst, Samuel B. Nafziger, and Esther Detwiler. Administrative officers of the school have been S. J. Horst, principal 1945-49, Paul T. Guengerich, principal 1949- , Samuel B. Nafziger, dean 1945-52, Alvin J. Blough, asst. principal 1952- . The enrollment in 1954-55 was 184.

The physical plant consists of a nine-acre campus with a 50 x 72 ft. three-story brick building (erected in 1948) for classrooms and administration, and an 80 x 140 ft. brick and glass block auditorium-gymnasium with supplementary classrooms and farm shop (erected in 1954). The auditorium has a seating capacity of 1,800.

Spiritual benefits already being harvested are obvious as the youth find, in addition to their secular training, an added sense of loyalty to Christ and the church. Among the 182 alumni are quite a number who are in further preparation for a positive service to the program of the church. P.T.G.

Iowa-Nebraska Conference (MC) came into being in 1920 as a result of a merger of the Western Amish Mennonite Conference and the Mennonite conference west of Indiana. All congregations belonging to the above-named conferences within the states of Iowa, Nebraska, and Minnesota, and one congregation located at Thurman, Col. (16 in all), were designated as one section or district and formed into the new conference.

The Merger Committee also appointed the following executive committee, whose duty it was to arrange for the first meeting of the new conference: S. C. Yoder, D. G. Lapp, J. E. Zimmerman, P. J. Blosser, C. J. Garber, and Simon Gingerich (Lapp, Blosser, and Garber represented the Mennonites; Yoder, Zimmerman, and Gingerich the Amish Mennonites). The first session of the conference was held at the Lower Deer Creek Church, Kalona, Iowa, on Sept. 14 and 15, 1921. Officers of conference elected were: Moderator, S. C. Yoder; Asst. Moderator, D. G. Lapp; Secretary, Simon Gingerich; Asst. Secretary, Allen Good (a guest from Carstairs, Alberta). Bishop J. S. Shoemaker, Dakota, Ill. (also a guest), preached the conference sermon. Committees were appointed to draft constitutions for the conference and the mission board to be presented at the next regular meeting. Several revisions and reprints have been authorized, the latest of which bears the date of 1949.

The preamble of the constitution states the object of conference in the following words: "For the purpose of promoting the cause of Christ and unifying and strengthening the church in our field." The constitution provides that all regularly ordained bishops, ministers, and deacons who are in full fellowship in their respective congregations in the district shall be members of conference. The first report of congregations to the conference listed 15 congregations reporting (one having failed to report) a total membership of 2,924; bishops 7; ministers 29; deacons 13. The latest (1955) report available lists the membership as being 4,386; bishops 12; ministers 36; deacons 16.

J. D. Graber and wife were the first from the conference to enter the foreign mission field. At present there are missionaries from this district in Puerto Rico, South America, India, and Japan. The Iowa City Mission was opened in 1927. A number of congregations are sponsoring Sunday schools and preaching points in the outlying districts. Young men and young women from this district have been working with the Mennonite Central Committee in the homeland and in the foreign fields.

The Iowa-Nebraska School Committee was organized by the conference in 1944 and a high school launched in 1945 with Silas Horst, South English, Iowa, as principal. The school is known as the Iowa Mennonite School (q.v.), and is located near Kalona. Its initial enrollment was 38, and at this writing it is approximately 176. It offers a full four-year high-school course together with a high-school Bible course. Members from this district are also found on the faculties of Goshen College, Hesston College and Bible School, and the Mennonite Nurses Training School. (ML II, 438.) S.Gi.

Iowa-Nebraska (Mennonite) District Mission Board (MC) was organized in September 1922 upon the adoption of its constitution by the Iowa-Nebraska Conference. Its first officers were J. C. Brenneman, Kalona, Iowa, president; D. B. King, Parnell, Iowa, treasurer; and Peter Kennel, Strang, Neb., secretary. The board is composed of the executive committee of five members and one member elected by each of the 23 congregations, making a total of 28 members. Members of the executive committee hold office for three years and are elected by the conference. Its current annual budget is approximately $3,000, with which it carries on the work of the Thurman, Col., rural mission and continues to give some support to the Iowa City congregation, which is now independent. Beginning in 1948 the board has published Missionary Challenge, which is now a 24-page quarterly, edited by Fred Gingerich, Chappell, Neb. In 1954 the officers of the board were Ammon Miller, Milford, Neb., president; Leroy V. Miller, Kalona, Iowa, vice-president; Silas Horst, South English, Iowa, secretary; and Ira Wenger, Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, treasurer. S.J.H.

Irapuato, a city in the state of Guanajuato, Mexico, about 220 miles northwest of Mexico City, where under the leadership of H. P. Krehbiel of Newton, Kan., some of the Mennonite refugee families settled who had come to Mexico and had settled first in Rosario (q.v.). In Irapuato the refugee settlers attempted to earn a living by means of irrigation farming. After two years of discouraging experiences most of the families left. Some went to El Trebol in the state of Durango to try for the third time to found a successful settlement; others moved to Cuauhtemoc, and still others decided to emigrate to Canada. This was possible because after two years in Mexico they could secure citizenship and overcome illnesses which had earlier prevented them from entering Canada. (See Mexico.) C.K.

Irle, Tilmann, b. May 14, 1848, at Anstoss near Freudenberg, Germany, d. Nov. 25, 1922, at Velbert (Rhineland), was a German missionary in the service of the Dutch Mennonite Missionary Association 1880-87 at the station of Pakanten in Sumatra, Indonesia. He found a church with about 100 members, which he increased with 17 baptisms. In his further work under the Rhenish Missionary Association of Barmen he became very well acquainted with the difficulties involved in mission work among Mohammedans; nevertheless he remained at his post as long as he was able (1921). (ML II, 438; DB 1893, 110-20.) Neff.

Irnsum, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, about eight miles south of Leeuwarden. Mennonites were found here at an early time, at least before 1600. In the 17th century there were in Irnsum two congregations, one of which died out about 1740; nothing more is known about it. The other congregation, with a baptized membership of about 75, joined the Mennonite Conference of Friesland in 1695. Shortly before, in 1684, it acquired a meetinghouse with some stained glass windows, which was an exception in Mennonite meetinghouses. In the 18th century it united with the Poppingawier (q.v.) congregation. In 1838 the membership of Irnsum and Poppingawier numbered 83; in 1871, the membership having increased to about 160, it was decided that each congregation should be independent, but served by the same preacher. The old church of Irnsum was remodeled in 1837, 1848, 1866, and 1940. The last lay preachers of the congregation were Sipke Jelles van Teerns, serving 1804-29, a baker, who received a small remuneration, and Durk Gerbens Visser, a retired farmer, in 1829-36. The first trained minister, educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, was Izaak Molenaar, who served here 1837-78. The later ministers were J. Pottinga Hz. 1880-86, H. J. Elhorst 1887-88, J. S. Pekema 1889-91, M. L. Deenik 1892-97, R. van der Veen 1897-1902, Iz. Hulshoff 1903-14, H. J. Woelders 1915-17, P. A. Vis 1918-30, M. van der Meulen 1935-39, A. J. Snaayer 1940-44, H. R. Keuning 1948-50, Miss J. W. Zuidema 1951-54, and H. Annema since 1954. The parsonage was built in 1838 and enlarged in 1852. The baptized membership of Irnsum is now (1954) 114 and Poppingawier 41. Church activities include a Sunday school for children, Menniste Bouwers (youth association), young members' group, and a ladies' circle. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 221; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 168, 189, 247, 306; Naamlijst 1829, 54 f.; DB 1870, 139-60; 1872, 190 f.; ML II, 438.

Isaac (Isaak, Isac) is a Mennonite name of Prussian background appearing early in the church records of Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Heubuden, Elbing, and other congregations. From Prussia this name was transplanted to the Mennonite settlements of the Ukraine. Franz Isaac (q.v.) was the author of Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908). From the Ukraine the name was spread over Russia and also transplanted to the United States in the 1870's and to Canada and South America after World War I.

Outstanding representatives were F. J. Isaac, b. Aug. 9, 1888, who was a G.C.M. missionary to India; John P. Isaac, b. Aug. 5, 1872, who was physician in Freeman, S.D., and Glendale, Cal.; Susan Isaac, physician and surgeon, Moundridge, Kan., b. Aug. 23, 1859, d. July 8, 1938. C.K.

Isaac, Franz (d. 1899), of Tiege, Molotschna, Russia, was a farmer, teacher, and after 1850 minister of the Ohrloff-Petershagen Mennonite Church. His chief contributions were his championship of tolerance, easing the lot of the oppressed, and writing the book Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908), in which he presents mostly documents pertaining to the economic, religious, and cultural life of the Molotschna Mennonites. His father started the collection of documents which he continued and which his son Franz Isaac, Jr., prepared for publication, the latter stating in the preface "that a certain bias in the presentation cannot be denied." His struggle and "bias," according to P. M. Friesen (p. 703), finally led him to withdrawal from the ministry and his congregation.

Isaac became a member of the Commission for the Landless (q.v.), in which capacity he wrote many applications and represented the growing number of landless Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement (Molotschnaer Mennoniten, 27-86). His efforts along these lines were not in vain. In the documents pertaining to the religious development of the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement we find his name attached to many applications in behalf of groups separating from the main body of the Mennonites, such as the Mennonite Brethren and the Friends of Jerusalem. In paragraphs between the documents in his book he freely expressed his convictions, particularly in the concluding chapter (pp. 333-52). The following sentence is characteristic: "One is astonished and wonders how it is possible among Mennonites for the stronger group with their spiritual leaders at the helm, again and again to attack smaller groups as if they alone had the right to exist, not realizing that all Mennonites are merely a tolerated sect" (p. 345). He considered the "failure to recognize the line between the religious and the civil authorities and responsibility" as the crux of this problem (p. 348). Again and again he reproached the religious leadership for appealing to civil authority to achieve its goals; he believed that a spiritual leader must achieve his goal by setting an example of true piety and Christian living.

When the Mennonites of Russia confronted compulsory military conscription during the 1870's, Isaac was repeatedly delegated to represent the Molotschna Mennonites, together with men like Leonhard Sudermann and H. Epp. In contrast to those who thought that migration to America was the only solution, he was satisfied with the institution of forestry service and expressed his "Russian patriotism" similarly to P. M. Friesen. Isaac championed an enlightened, educated, and democratic Mennonitism in Russia and was spiritually akin to the Friends of Jerusalem who separated from the main Mennonite body during the days of his activity. As a Mennonite historian, Isaac's chief contribution lies in his making available documents pertaining to the Molotschna Mennonites, most of which would otherwise be entirely inaccessible today. (ML II, 438.) C.K.

Isaachs (Isaac, Isaks, Izaaks), Jacob, was a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation of Przechowka (German, Wintersdorf) (q.v.), Poland. He lived at Schönsee (q.v.) on the Vistula. On July 13, 1719, when the Dutch elder Hendrik Berends (Hulshoff) (q.v.) visited the congregation he was chosen as preacher (dienaer in't woordt). About 1722 he visited Holland and conferred with Herman Schijn (q.v.), the elder of the Amsterdam Zonist congregation, concerning the needs of a number of Mennonites in Lithuania. His letters (found in the Amsterdam Archives) give much information on the situation and emergency of the Lithuanian and Polish Mennonites of the Culm district. In a letter of June 18, 1737, he wrote that he was severely ill, that he expected his death in the near future, bidding a last farewell to his friends and benefactors in Holland, but in August 1738 he was still alive; indeed his name is still found in the Naamlijst of 1743. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1105 f., 1594, 1596, 1602 f., 1606, 1608, 1612, 1621, 1637, 1661; II, 2, Nos. 738, 763.) vdZ.

Isaak, Franz F., was born in Tiege, Molotschna, South Russia, Sept. 27, 1876. He taught school in the Don area ten years, in Nikolaifeld, Bezabotovka, and Millerovo. In 1898 he was converted and joined the M.B. Church by baptism. He married Aganetha Dörksen in 1899. He was elected to the ministry in the M.B. Church and ordained in 1911 and served as minister in Millerovo. He emigrated to Canada in 1925 and settled in Winnipeg, where he served the M.B. Church as minister for many years and for some time as leader and on the M.B. Canadian Conference city missions committee. For many years he was employed by the British and Foreign Bible Society in its Bible House in Winnipeg. He died May 14, 1944. A.J.I.

Isaak, John Phillip (1861-1918), a Russian Mennonite Brethren businessman and minister, was born Feb. 20, 1861, in Tiege, Molotschna, in the province of Taurida, Russia, the oldest son of Phillip and Margaret (Toews) Isaak. He was followed by three brothers and two sisters. He graduated from the Zentralschule in Orloff. In 1881 (or 1882) he was married to Catherine Jantz. To this union were born 13 children, several of whom died in infancy, with John, Phillip, James, Margaret, Elizabeth, and Marie surviving. Several of these became physicians. Dr. J. J. Isaak was chairman of the Relief Committee in Harbin, Manchuria, ca. 1930, and helped many refugees to the United States and to South America. Elizabeth, also a physician, succeeded him in this field and is still in China. Margaret, the first Mennonite woman to attend the University of St. Petersburg, married a Baptist preacher, I. V. Neprash, and with him now directs the Russian Missionary Service with headquarters at Philadelphia, Pa.

J. P. Isaak with his wife joined the Mennonite Brethren Church in its early years and held many important church offices, including the leadership of a congregation for about 20 years. He served for about the same period of time as a member of the school board and Agricultural Association board in the province of Taurida, participating actively in relief work for native Russians in 1905-6 near the Volga River.

J. P. Isaak gave great encouragement to P. M. Friesen (q.v.) in writing his historical book (Brüderschaft) and assisted substantially in financing this work. He also contributed to missionary enterprises. His life was one of constant activity as a landowner, farmer, Christian businessman, and minister of the Gospel. He died in 1918 and was buried in the cemetery of the village of Tiege. He resided at various places including Adamovka and Zhitlova Balka, Ekaterinoslav; Rückenau and Tiege, Taurida. J.J.T.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; J. F. Harms, Geschichte der Mennoniten Brudergemeinde (Hillsboro, Kans.).

Isenbaert, Joost (d. Aug. 25, 1673), was an elder of the Flemish congregation of Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, after 1637. He was a man of conservative principles and in 1659 fell into disharmony with his colleagues Adriaan van Eeghem and Pieter Baart, whom he accused of Socinianism (q.v.). In 1665 he brought a charge before the city government against Adriaan van Eeghem and Thomas van Eeghem (who in 1663 had succeeded Pieter Baart after the latter had moved to Vlissingen). Both preachers were suspended and only Isenbaert was allowed to preach. But most members took the side of the van Eeghems. A schism in the congregation threatened but was prevented by the conciliatory attitude of Adriaan van Eeghem in December 1665. vdZ.

C. P. van Eeghen Jr., Adriaan van Eeghem (Amsterdam, 1886) 20 f., 25-81 passim.

Isolley (Iseli), Rudolph, from the Tannental, Switzerland, a martyr of the Swiss Brethren, executed at Bern in 1538. (ML I, 171; II, 438; Mart. Mir. E 1129.)

Israels, Ben, pseudonym of the author of Tractaet der Buytengetrouwden (Amsterdam, 1628). The author, who rejects the severe practice of forbidding intermarriage, is either Anthony Jacobsz (Roscius, q.v.) of Hoorn, or Yeme de Ringh (q.v.) of Harlingen, both preachers of the Dutch Waterlanders. (Biogr. Wb. IV, 471.) vdZ.

Issoli, Verena, of Schülbach, Signau territory, Switzerland, an Anabaptist martyr executed at Bern in 1537. (ML II, 438; Mart. Mir. E 1122.)

Italy. Sixteenth-century sources contain many references to Anabaptism in Italy, and later observers, among them Karl Benrath (q.v.), have assumed an organic connection between Swiss or German Täufer and Italian congregations. Critical study of the extant evidence, however, fails to reveal such a relationship. Italy provides, therefore, a classic example of the misunderstandings that may result when loosely defined terms like "Anabaptism" are used freely for polemical purposes.

Lutheran ideas penetrated Italy in the 1520's, leading Cardinal Caraffa, the later Pope Paul IV (in office 1555-59), to publish an edict against Protestants in 1530. By 1542 the Evangelical movement had grown to such proportions that Pope Paul III (1534-49) reorganized the Roman Inquisition, which quickly took steps to liquidate heresy. Many Italians then fled to the Swiss cities, to the back-country regions of Graubünden (Grisons, q.v.), and to some territories now in northern Italy (viz., the Valtelline and the counties of Chiavenna and Bormio) which were at that time in political dependency upon the three Raetian Leagues. The free-thinking ideas of some of the refugees, reflecting a rationalistic approach to the fundamentals of Christianity, drew the attention of Swiss reformed leaders to them. Camillo Renato of Sicily was the most troublesome of these Italians. He was active in Chiavenna in 1546 and succeeding years and became embroiled in controversy over the sacraments and other subjects with the Reformed pastor Mainardi. The struggle dragged on for several years and during its course Renato was condemned by synods and by Bullinger himself. Mainardi called Renato an "Anabaptist" and listed his heresies: he rejected infant baptism and held unorthodox opinions concerning the nature of Christ, salvation, the existence of hell, and the sleep of souls. Another man, Tiziano by name and a friend of Renato, professing to be guided only by the Spirit, combined anti-Trinitarian views with rejection of infant baptism. Although he opposed the magistral use of the sword by Christians, neither he nor Renato was associated with any northern Täufer community. Both Renato and Tiziano are best thought of as "spiritual reformers." There are scattered references to later Italian "Anabaptist" activities in these border regions, but they are careless polemical accusations.

In northern Italy around 1550 there flourished an evangelical movement, often called "Anabaptist," whose radical teachings closely resemble those found in the Leagues. Tiziano, expelled from the Leagues in 1549, returned to Italy, and in Florence met one Pietro Manelfi (q.v.), a former priest. He converted Manelfi and others to that brand of spiritual religion which he had himself learned from Renato. Manelfi believed Tiziano responsible for the Italian "Anabaptist" movement, and thought he had some link with the northern Täufer. Internal evidence belies the latter connection; and the origin of the movement can hardly be ascribed to Tiziano, for the anti-Trinitarian teachings of Servetus had been preparing the soil in Italy at least since 1539. But Tiziano certainly played a leading part in the growth of a number of small clandestine communities which existed in Venetia by 1550. In that year Christological disputes disturbed the congregation at Vicenza. Manelfi, who defected in 1551 and exposed details of the movement to the Inquisition, described a synod which met at Venice in September 1550 to consider these matters. Although the assembly contained delegations from congregations in Switzerland as well as Italy itself, all of the participants were Italian, the implication being that there was no connection with northern Anabaptists. This synod agreed upon a set of anti-Trinitarian principles. It seems indubitable that Renato and Tiziano, representing the indirect influence of Servetus, were responsible in large measure for this radical orientation. However, some members of the sect refused to go along with the majority, notably the congregations of Cittadella and Verona. This moderate element, whose origin and teachings are obscure, seems to have had an independent origin despite similarities to the Täufer in their conception of baptism.

Following the synod Manelfi and Tiziano worked for a year as missionaries, but then late in 1551 Manelfi exposed the whole situation to the Inquisition at Bologna. In the flurry of prosecutions that followed, some individuals named by Manelfi abjured and their depositions confirm the anti-Trinitarian character of the movement. Others remained true to their faith and fled their homeland. Among these fugitives are to be found not only representatives of the anti-Trinitarian viewpoint who constituted a majority of those fleeing to Moravia and Poland but also the only Italians about whom we have evidence of association with genuine Täufer; for several of them eventually found their way to the Moravian Hutterite communities. When these men learned of the Hutterites they were greatly surprised and pleased: this is convincing evidence that the Italian sect had developed independently, at least of the Hutterites. One of these men, Antonio Rizzetto (q.v.), went first to Thessalonica and only after several years joined the Hutterites. Giulio Gherlandi (q.v.) and Francesco della Sega (or Saga, q.v.) evidently stayed in hiding in Italy for several years before making the trip to Moravia and joining the Hutterites. These three men stand out because they later undertook missionary trips to Italy for the Hutterites and were there arrested and put to death by the Inquisition at Venice in the 1560's. The net result of Inquisitorial activity in this whole period was the liquidation of the Evangelical movement in north Italy.

Venetian anti-Trinitarianism had connections with a similar movement in Naples. A deposition made to the Venetian Inquisition by Lorenzo Tizzano, who may be identical with Tiziano, classified heretical opinions in Neapolitan circles into "Lutheran," "Anabaptist," and "diabolical," but this testimony reveals that Tizzano meant "anti-Trinitarian" when he said "Anabaptist." There is no evidence connecting the movement in Naples with the Täufer.

The evidence given in this article invalidates much of the material in the following ML articles: Ferrara, Italien, Manelfi, Mantua, Negri, Padua. Camillo Renato, Pietro Manelfi, and Franciscus Negri can no longer be considered as Anabaptists, and the meeting at Venice in 1550 was not an "Anabaptist Synod." DEWIND.

L. Amabile, Il Santo Officio della Inquisizione in Napoli I (Citta di Castello, 1892); K. Benrath, Geschichte der Reformation in Venedig (Halle, 1887); idem, "Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen um die Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts," Theologische Studien und Kritiken LVIII (1885) 9-67; D. Berti, "Di Giovanni Valdes e di taluni suoi discepoli secondo nuovi documenti tolti dall'Archivio Veneto," Atti della R. Accademia dei Lincei: anno CCLXXV, serie terza, memorie della classe di scienze morali, storiche e filologiche II (1877-78) 61-81; Bullingers Korrespondenz mit den Graubündnern, ed. T. Schiess, XXIII-XXV of Quellen zur Schweizer Geschichte (Basel, 1904-6); D. Cantimori, Eretici italiani del cinquecento (Florence, 1939); F. C. Church, The Italian Reformers, 1534-1564 (New York, 1932); E. Comba, I nostri protestanti II (Florence, 1897); idem, "Un sinodo anabattista a Venezia anno 1550," Rivista cristiana XIII (1885) 21-24, 83-87; H. A. deWind, "'Anabaptism' and Italy," Church History XXI (1952) 20-38; idem, "Italian Hutterite Martyrs," MQR XXVII (1954) 163-85; C. Renato, "Trattato sul battesimo e sulla eucaristia di Camillo Renato," in Per la storia degli eretici italiani del secolo XVI in Europe, ed. D. Cantimori and E. Feist, No. 7 of Reale Academia d'Italia (1937) 47-54; F. Trechsel, Die protestantischen Antitrinitarier vor Faustus Socin, Book II, Lelio Sozzini und die Antitrinitarier seiner Zeit (Heidelberg, 1844); E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and its Antecedents (Cambridge, Mass., 1947); ML II, 438 f.

Ittlingen, a village (pop. 1,307, with 31 Mennonites) in the Sinsheim district of Baden, Germany. The first Mennonites, refugees from Switzerland, settled here in 1655. In the 19th century the village was the seat of a Mennonite church, whose members came from the Bockschaft and Streichenberg congregations. In 1841 Christian Hege placed his newly built house in Ittlingen at their disposal for services. In Bockschaft and Streichenberg services continued to be held alternately for two years longer. For many years Ulrich Hege (d. 1896) of Reihen, founder of the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten (q.v.), served as their elder. In 1913 the congregation merged with that at Immelhausen (q.v.), with their seat at Sinsheim (q.v.). (Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 31; ML II, 439.) HEGE.

I-W Service. When the 1948 Selective Service law was passed by the United States Congress conscientious objectors were deferred from all service obligations. The amendment to the law passed in 1951, however, required conscientious objectors, in lieu of induction into the armed forces, to perform "civilian work contributing to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest" for a period equal to that required for men inducted into the armed forces, that is, for a period of twenty-four consecutive months.

In anticipation of some such required period of service, the Selective Service System had prepared and recommended to Congress a system of government-operated camps for conscientious objectors similar to those operated under the former Civilian Public Service program. This plan was specifically rejected by Congress, and it was clearly stated that no "camps" were to be set up under the new law. As a result of further study by the Selective Service System in consultation with other government agencies and with church agencies representing conscientious objectors, the present service plan was devised and set up.

Under this new service plan conscientious objectors may be assigned to public agencies and to approved nonprofit private agencies for the performance of their required two years of service. Working conditions, pay, and leave arrangements for conscientious objectors are expected to be the same as for other employees in the same grade and class in the same employing agency. (In a few states conscientious objectors were engaged in state institutions at rates lower than those for other employees, but these discriminatory practices have been gradually reduced.) Conscientious objectors are permitted to volunteer for approved work, and are usually assured of assignment to the work of their choice if it is within the approved category. About 85 per cent of the men who entered I-W service have exercised the privilege of volunteering and thus of choosing their place of employment. Those who do not volunteer may be ordered to service by their local boards if they have reached the age at which men are being called for the armed services and if the local board has found an employing agency which is willing to hire them. Assignments may be made to church agencies engaged in relief and other welfare services at home and abroad, and the men so assigned may be used in foreign as well as domestic service. While dissatisfaction with service assignments has occurred in some instances, Selective Service statistics show that out of a total of 6,000 persons assigned to I-W service only 25 had deserted their job, thus becoming delinquent. This may be compared with about 600 delinquents in the CPS period. The much better record is attributed to greater general satisfaction as a result of the much wider range of opportunities of service, and the liberal choices provided.

More than 1,700 governmental and private nonprofit agencies have been approved by Selective Service for the employment of conscientious objectors, but assignments have been made to less than half of this number. Assignments to public agencies are not approved if their employee needs may be filled from the ranks of unemployed persons in the surrounding locality, and other limiting factors have entered into some situations. Most of the openings have occurred in mental hospitals, general hospitals, and tuberculosis sanatoriums. In spite of unemployment in some parts of the country, there have usually been more openings for conscientious objectors than qualified persons available to fill the openings.

The regulations establishing this new plan of service were issued in February 1952, but the first assignments were not made until July 1952. Because of a large backlog of available men, assignments continued at an accelerating rate so that in the period of October 1952 to September 1953 the average monthly rate was more than 300. With the backlog of men taken up, the rate of assignments has dropped considerably and is not likely to exceed 100 per month and may be lower, depending on the rate at which men are called for the armed services. A peak was reached in September 1954, when almost 5,000 men were in service. Since that time, while assignments have continued at a reduced rate, large numbers have completed their two years of service, thus reducing the total in service. Approximately 6,400 men were assigned during the first three years of the program's operation.

At the peak there were about 3,400 men in service from the churches of the MCC constituency, of whom about 45 per cent were of the Mennonite Church (MC), 15 per cent Old Order Amish, 14 per cent General Conference Mennonite, 5 per cent Conservative Mennonite, 5 per cent Church of God in Christ, 4 per cent each Mennonite Brethren and Brethren in Christ, 9 per cent from the other groups, including independent congregations, in the MCC constituency.

In October 1954, 1,794 Mennonite and Brethren in Christ I-W's answered a questionnaire circulated by J. S. Schultz of the Mennonite Central Committee. The following information was compiled by Schultz.

Mental and general hospitals employ more than two thirds of the men. If Veterans Administration Hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoriums and boys' training schools are added, 80 per cent of the men are accounted for. Over half of the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ men are employed in government-controlled institutions, either state, municipal, or federal. During the first three years of operation, an average of 8 per cent of the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ I-W's chose to work in projects administered by their own church agencies. 75 per cent of I-W's are 20-24 years of age.

Nearly 45 per cent of the men are hospital attendants. The next largest group, consisting of only 14 per cent, work on maintenance crews. Following closely in size are groups such as kitchen workers or janitors performing housekeeping duties, and those in specialized fields such as medical laboratory technicians or personnel directors. Only 5 per cent are doing farm work.

About 70 per cent of the men work in urban centers of more than 50,000 population. Mennonite and Brethren in Christ I-W's are employed by about 300 of the more than 1,700 approved institutions. They are serving in 37 states and 20 foreign countries. Fifty per cent are employed in Kansas, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Over 36 per cent are in the larger metropolitan areas of Los Angeles, Cal.; Denver, Col.; Chicago, Ill.; Indianapolis and Westville, Ind.; Kansas City and Topeka, Kan.; Cleveland, Ohio; Norristown, Pa.

Sixty-five different denominations are represented in the ranks of I-W men. I-W men from the MCC constituency make up 67 per cent of the total. This compares with approximately 40 per cent in the CPS period. Selective Service statistics show 8,500 conscientious objectors who are either at work or will be assigned out of a total of 16,153,861 registrants (eighteen years and over). According to their statistics the percentage of conscientious objectors in the total population (.005) has remained constant as compared with the proportion during the World War II period.

As in the World War II period, the Mennonite Central Committee has been asked by its constituent churches to assume over-all responsibility for the I-W program administration. All representation to Selective Service officials is channeled through the MCC. Services to the men themselves are administered by or co-ordinated through the MCC. The Mennonite Relief and Service Committee (MC), Elkhart, Ind., and the Civilian Public Service Committee (CGC), Galva, Kan., share in this administration, particularly to the men of their own conferences. In addition to these well-organized efforts, numerous pastors, both on their own and at conference request, make periodic calls on I-W men at their places of employment. Organization among the men themselves wherever they can be grouped is encouraged to provide opportunities for worship and fellowship and the strengthening and extension of their Christian witness.

The cost of administering the I-W Service is borne by voluntary contributions from the constituency. The administrative office for this department at the MCC headquarters has been headed continuously by W. T. Snyder to date (January 1956). J.Ha.S.

Ixheim, a village south of Zweibrücken, Palatinate, Germany, now a suburb of the city, the seat of a former Amish congregation which had some members living in the adjacent province of Lorraine, France. Until 1814 Zweibrücken was the capital of a duchy. After the Thirty Years' War (1618-48) the dukes of Zweibrücken, in order to rebuild their sorely devastated land, accepted persons who were suffering religious persecution. Thus in 1648 Swiss Mennonites were already finding their way to Zweibrücken. In 1712, when Louis XIV expelled the Mennonites from Alsace, some of the expellees came to Lorraine and to Zweibrücken, most of them from the principality of Rappoltstein. From that time on, the Zweibrücken congregation was an independent organization. It was represented at the conference in Essingen in 1759 by Jakob Steinmann and Uli Bachmann, in 1779 by Andreas Leyenberger, Jakob Bachmann, and Jakob Dettweiler. In the records of both conferences it is called the Zweibrücken congregation but in several issues of the Naamlijst (e.g., 1769, 1784) it is called Hirschberg-Kirschbach (q.v.), possibly after certain villages in which the meetings were most frequently held in the homes of members. When the Palatinate passed into French hands in 1797 many of the Ixheim people emigrated to Bavaria, and with them some from Lorraine and Lower Alsace. The prefect of the Moselle region writes in 1803: "The emigration of these Anabaptist farmers would be disastrous, for they are the most competent, and in general they are very obedient to the law. Several families from the region of Zweibrücken have already been lured to Bavaria by the elector, their former ruler, and he is planning to bring as many as possible into his new state."

In the course of the 19th century emigration continued. Many went to the interior of France; many a French Mennonite family of today stems from Zweibrücken. Others went to America. In spite of all this, the church maintained itself. Meetings were held in the scattered homes on both sides of the border. In 1844, when a division took place in the congregation, one party of 17 families built a small church at Ixheim, while the remaining families met on the Stuppacherhof near Hornbach, and later rented a hall in Zweibrücken (Menn. Bl., 1859, 15), where they continued to meet until the death of their last elder, Christian Stalter, in 1909. After that they all met together at Ixheim. About this time several families joined them from the Bitscherland (q.v.) congregation in Alsace which had been dissolved about 1902. After World War I the remnants of the latter congregation formed a new organization at Saargemünd. The Ixheim congregation was incorporated in 1912.

The Ixheim Amish long maintained their distinctive practices: lay preachers, beards, strict shunning, footwashing (some of the older members until 1932). And although hooks and eyes were discarded by 1880, the Ixheim members were long called Häftler (q.v.) and the near-by Ernstweiler Mennonite members Knöpfler (buttoners). In 1859 Ixheim had 141 members; the preachers were Christian Oesch, Christian Stalter, and Christian Gingerich, and the deacon was Georg Guth. The congregation was fully organized as Ixheim in 1884. In 1937 the baptized membership was 134, with Christian Guth as elder (since 1907), and Otto Schertz and Georg Nafziger as preachers; the congregation was at that time called Ixheim-Saar, since it included the remnant of the Saar congregation. On Jan. 17, 1937, the Ixheim and Ernstweiler congregations met jointly, agreed to merge the proceeds from the sale of their properties, and established a single congregation called "Mennonitengemeinde Zweibrücken." Hugo Scheffler, pastor of Ernstweiler, served as pastor until the appointment of Theo Hotel of Kaiserslautern in 1952. This was the last Amish Mennonite congregation to merge with the South German Mennonite Conference. The Ixheim meetinghouse still stands as a private dwelling. (Hugo Scheffler, "Vereinigung Ixheim-Ernstweiler," Gem.-Kal. 1939, 71-81; ML II, 448 f.)

P.So., J.A.H.

J

Jaarboekje, Doopsgezind (Dutch Mennonite Yearbook): see Doopsgezind Jaarboekje.

Jaarboekje voor de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in de Nederlanden (Yearbook of the Mennonite Congregations in the Netherlands), usually cited as Muller's Jaarboekje, was published by Samuel Muller at Amsterdam, first issue in 1837. In the foreword Muller explained that it was to be a new edition of the Naamlijst (q.v.), a list of European Mennonite congregations and their ministers, which at first had been published annually, then at longer intervals, the last issue being that of 1829. The new Jaarboekje, under the title "Doopsgezinde Mengelingen" (Miscellanies), presents an extremely valuable series of historical articles.

The second edition of the Jaarboekje appeared in 1840, covering the years 1838-39, and in addition to the lists and news of the congregations also contained valuable historical material, especially the articles by Leonhard Weydmann (q.v.) on the Palatinate. The third and last issue, for the years 1840-50, appeared late in 1850. Its principal contents were an extensive account of the history of theological instruction among the Dutch Mennonites, written by Muller.

The Jaarboekje was in a sense continued in the three editions of D. S. Gorter's (q.v.) Godsdienstige Lectuur voor Doopsgezinde, 1854, 1856, and 1858, followed by the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (q.v.) of 1861-1919. (ML II, 385.) Neff.

Jaarsma, Frederik, was a Dutch Mennonite preacher, serving the Waterlander congregation at Leeuwarden (q.v.) ca. 1710-26; here he became involved in a quarrel with some members of the church who insisted on baptism by immersion. In 1726 he moved to Vlissingen, where he served until about 1752 (he did not die in 1726 as is stated in DB 1874, 73). His son Hermannus Jaarsma, after studying at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Theological Seminary, served as minister in the Mennonite congregations of Gouda 1740-44 and Emmerich, Germany, 1744-83. (DB 1874, 60-73, 95, 111; Naamlijst 1743.) vdZ.

Jacob Antheunis (Jacob de Schoenlapper, i.e., cobbler), an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed by burning at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 22, 1575, the evening before Pentecost. Van Braght relates that he was put to death with tongue screws to prevent his speaking to the bystanders. Van Braght also states that Antheunis' pregnant wife was executed after her confinement; but P. Génard, who studied the sources, did not find any record of her. Jacob was sentenced on the charge of frequenting forbidden meetings and possessing forbidden books. He is said to have written some letters from prison, which were lost during the revolt at Antwerp on Nov. 4, 1576. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 693, E 1007; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 193, 200; XIV, 96 f., No. 1082; ML II, 386.

Jacob of Antwerp (Jacob van Antwerpen, Jacob van Herwerden, Gosen van Winterswijk, Wolter), a Dutch Anabaptist leader, was beheaded at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, on May 17, 1535. He was born in the Dutch Betuwe district, had formerly been an organist of the Catholic Church, had been baptized in March 1534 at Emden, East Friesland, by Tasschenmaker (Dirckgen Tasch, q.v.) and joined the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism as a co-worker of the Münsterite leader Jan van Geelen (q.v.), who sent him to Deventer to take a letter to van Geelen's wife Fenne. Jacob also baptized her and her servant (Feb. 9, 1535). A few days later he was arrested, tried, and put to death. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 96; DB 1899, 9; 1917, 116, No. 58; 1919, 8 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.

Jacob Bul, an Anabaptist martyr, is identical with Arent Block (q.v.). (DB 1912, 36, 42.) vdZ.

Jacob van Campen (Kampen), or Jacob Jansz van IJsselmuiden, also called Coomans, born 1505, a bishop of the Dutch Anabaptists and a martyr, executed at Amsterdam on July 10, 1535. He was a native of IJsselmuiden, was a cloth shearer by trade, but sometimes he worked as a peddler. He was married to Aeff Petersdochter of North Holland. It is rather strange that this important leader is not found in the martyrbooks. The reason for the omission may be that in his early period he had many contacts with revolutionary leaders.

Jacob van Campen was one of the 12 apostles sent out by Jan Matthysz van Haarlem (q.v.) in the fall of 1533. His trips extended unto Münster in Westphalia and Emden in East Friesland; he also visited the Dutch provinces of Groningen and Friesland; his activity in the towns of Kampen and Rotterdam is known and in the provinces of North Holland and Utrecht he baptized a number of persons. He himself was baptized and ordained a bishop by Pieter de Houtzager (q.v.). From early 1534 he mostly stayed at Amsterdam, then already the seat of a considerable Anabaptist congregation. In February 1534 Jacob van Campen and Pieter de Houtzager baptized a large number of persons at Amsterdam and van Campen held regular meetings there near the Jan Rodenpoorts tower. The assertion made by some authors, e.g., L. Hortensius and G. Brandt, that Jacob van Campen was sent from Münster by Jan van Leyden to be a bishop at Amsterdam is not correct. He warned against the revolutionary Münsterite principles, especially against polygamy, and opposed acts of violence and revolt. In a meeting of Dutch Anabaptist leaders held at Spaarndam near Haarlem in December 1534 or January 1535, where the question was discussed whether the Anabaptists of Holland should take up arms and go to Münster, van Campen argued that the coming of the Lord should be patiently awaited; when Jan van Geelen (q.v.) planned an attack on the city of Amsterdam (May 1535), Jacob van Campen "did not consent to this proposal." The accusation of some authors like Vos and Mellink that van Campen belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism is not true. He was a follower of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) and a man of peaceful principles.

As to his interpretation of the Bible van Campen was of the opinion (like Cornelis Pietersz wt den Briel, while Obbe Philipsz was opposed to this view) that the Scriptures "stand on two hoofs" (see Gespauwde Klauw), i.e., he defended the doctrine that "all that is written in the Old Testament is also found in the New Testament and will take place either spiritually or literally." This opinion gave rise to much unsound interpretation of Old Testament prophecies.

Jacob van Campen was an important leader, whose activity was well known to the government. As early as Feb. 23, 1534, a mandate of the imperial stadholder of Friesland indicated van Campen as a principal Anabaptist, together with Melchior Hofmann, Obbe Philipsz, and Pieter de Houtzager, and on March 2, 1534, it was announced in Amsterdam that anyone who delivered Jacob van Campen or Jan Matthysz to the officials of justice would be rewarded. In May 1535 van Campen was arrested in Amsterdam. A widow who had given him shelter was hanged with her son before her own door. Van Campen was tried several times and also tortured. He did not forsake his faith. On July 10, he was sentenced to death and executed that very day. First his tongue "by which he has disseminated his false teachings" was cut off, then his right hand "by which he has rebaptized." Thereupon he was beheaded and his corpse burned.

His confession during the trials, containing a number of valuable facts about the Anabaptist movement in Amsterdam, was published by Grosheide. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 97; Grosheide, Verhooren, 94-105, 193 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim, see Index; DB 1917, 85, 98, 101 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Jacob Claesz of Landsmeer (Dutch province of North Holland), an Anabaptist martyr who was burned at the stake at Amsterdam on Nov. 9, 1549, after cruel torture. His property was confiscated. His wife Cecilia Jheronymusdochter (q.v.) was also put to death at Amsterdam in 1549. Jacob Claesz is apparently identical with Jacob van Wormer (q.v.). vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 85, E 485; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 35*i*; DB 1917, 173; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 158; ML I, 358.

Jacob Claesz van der Veer, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr who lived at Utrecht outside the St. Catharine's Gate. In 1533 he had received (re)baptism, but in July 1534 before the Court he retracted his "error" in order to save his life; yet he remained in contact with the Anabaptists. For this fact, and especially because he read heretical (i.e., Anabaptist) books which he had bought in Amsterdam, he was sentenced to death and beheaded at Utrecht on March 13, 1535. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 106; Berigten Hist. Genootschap, Utrecht 1851, IV, 2, p. 129; DB 1917, 122, No. 163.

Jacob Cremer (Cramer, Kremer), a Dutch Anabaptist, a native of Winsum, Dutch province of Groningen. He belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism; with Antonius (Anthonie) Kistemaker (q.v.) he was active in the province of Groningen in 1534-35; in East Friesland he had been in prison for a while; he also had visited Münster (q.v.) in 1534. He was arrested during the Anabaptist assault on the St. Johns monastery at Warfum in the province of Groningen and brought to the city of Groningen, where he was beheaded in April 1535. vdZ.

BRN VII, 362, 369 f.; DB 1906, 31; 1917, 119, No. 100; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index; ML II, 179.

Jacob Daneels (Jacob de Metselaar, i.e., mason), an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake on the market square at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 5, 1558, because he had been rebaptized and even after much suffering refused to recant. He was gagged to prevent his addressing the crowd of bystanders. Jacob was a native of Komen (Commines) in Flanders. His name is found in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 201, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 443, 445; XIV, 22 f., No. 253; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML II, 386.

Jacob Dirks (Diericsens), a native of Wageningen, Dutch province of Gelderland, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor of Utrecht, Dutch province of Holland. About to be seized as a Mennonite, he fled to Antwerp. His wife, not a Mennonite, joined him later and died there. But Jacob and his two grown sons, Andries (or Adriaen) and Hans (or Jan), were seized and condemned to death. On the way to the place of execution his youngest son, Peter, met them and threw his arms around his father; he was rudely torn away. Standing at the scaffold the father asked, "How is it, my dear sons?" Each replied, "Very well, my dear father." They were hanged and then burned on March 17, 1568. Andries' fiancee and her sister looked on from a distance with sad hearts. Jacob's property was confiscated and realized a considerable amount. Neff, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 370, E. 724; Antw. Arch.-Blad, X, 13, 67; XII, 477; XIV, 54 f., No. 630; ML I, 450.

Jacob Elberts, a martyr: see Jacob de Geldersman.

Jacob van Emden, a Dutch Anabaptist, a follower of the Münsterite leader Jan van Geelen (q.v.), took part in the Anabaptist revolt at Amsterdam, May 10-11, 1535. He was bestially executed at Amsterdam on May 14, 1535. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 62-64.) vdZ.

Jacob Fredriks, a Dutch Mennonite, who went with Dirk Jansz Cortenbosch (q.v.) on a visit to the Mennonites along the Rhine, and then in April 1572 paid a visit to Prince William I of Orange at his castle at Dillenburg, Germany. They were asked by the Prince to collect money among the Mennonites of Holland for the purpose of liberating this country from the Spanish yoke. They promised to do so, but because Fredriks, of whom nothing further is known, had no opportunity to visit the congregations, Cortenbosch and P. W. Bogaert (q.v.) collected the money. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 421; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 84; DB 1873, 4, 8.

Jacob de Geldersman, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Harderwijk, Dutch province of Gelderland, died at the stake at Amsterdam, May 24, 1546, with Dirk Pieters Smuel. In the sentence he is called Jacob Elberts van Harderwijk. Both lived in Edam and on March 12 were seized at home by the court procurator of The Hague and the sheriff of Amsterdam and taken to prison. Smuel was a preacher who had for several years been preaching secretly, and rejected the confessional, purgatory, and the Mass. Jacob had refused to honor the host when the priest approached him with it. He attended Smuel's sermons. The Martyrs' Mirror indicates that a fourth man (Andries Smuel) had apparently also been arrested; but there is no verdict concerning him. The two were sentenced at The Hague, but executed in Amsterdam. Van Braght gives a part of the sentence, Smuel's will to his wife Wellemoet Claes, and a letter to the brotherhood. They stated that they owned no books by Menno Simons or David Joris; but in addition to the Bible they possessed a "booklet on the faith." His letters are very well written, with an abundance of Biblical citations; but they contain no special information. The execution lasted more than 24 hours. K.V.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 338; Mart. Mir. D 75, E 475; DB 1887, 114-16; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 108 f.; ML II, 47.

Jacob van Gershoven, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 17, 1562, together with his brother Aert van Gershoven. He was a native of Tongeren, Brabant, and had lived for some time at Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant, and was a confectioner by trade. (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 142, 149; XIV, 32 f., No. 366.) vdZ.

Jacob Ghysbertszn van Gameren, a native of the Dutch duchy of Gelderland, had on the instigation of the Münsterite leader Jan van Geelen (q.v.) partaken in the Anabaptist assault on Amsterdam, May 10-11, 1535, and was therefore brutally executed on May 14 at Amsterdam. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 61, 63 f.) vdZ.

Jacob de Goudsmid: see Jacob Schot.

Jacob Heymans Tollincx, a brother of Gosen Heymans (q.v.), was beheaded at Utrecht, Netherlands, on July 5, 1569, because he had been present at heretical meetings. He may have been a Mennonite. Jacob and Gosen had been arrested on Sept. 20, 1568. vdZ.

I. M. J. Hoog, "Onze Martelaren," in Ned. Arch. v. Kerkgeschiedenis, n.s. I (1902) No. 172.

Jacob Jansz Scheedemaker (also called Jacob Jansz Kist), a Dutch Mennonite leader, a preacher at Emden, East Friesland, who was banned in 1555 or 1556; he was probably excommunicated by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) for being too lax in the practice of shunning (see Ban). But a considerable number of Mennonites agreed with Scheedemaker and they were then called the "Scheedemaker" group. At the same time and for the same reason Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.) and Joriaen Heynsz were excommunicated; both were leaders at Franeker in Friesland; they also had many followers, who were called "Franekeraars." Soon after his excommunication Scheedemaker moved from Emden to De Rijp in the Dutch province of North Holland; in this Waterland district most Mennonites rejected rigorous shunning, being inclined to somewhat milder practices. From then on, the names "Franekeraars" and "Scheedemakers" disappeared, and were replaced by the general term "Waterlanders" (q.v.), who separated from the main body in the fall of 1556. An attempt made by Menno Simons early in 1557 to reconcile the Waterlanders with Leenaert Bouwens and the supporters of rigorous shunning miscarried. Jacob Jansz Scheedemaker became a Waterlander leader. In September 1577 he drew up the first Dutch confession (Waterlander Confession) with Hans de Ries, Simon Michiels, Simon Jacobs, and Albert Verspeck. On Nov. 28, 1578, he and Hans de Ries debated with D. V. Coornhert (q.v.) on the question whether there could be a true Christian church on earth. In 1581 Scheedemaker was appointed elder and moved to Haarlem. Here he became involved in a quarrel with Hans Doornaert (q.v.), a Flemish immigrant and a preacher. The quarrel was settled during a meeting at Haarlem, Sept. 14, 1587, which Coornhert, then a notary at Haarlem, also attended. A debate between Scheedemaker and Coornhert was held at a meeting of Waterlander leaders at Alkmaar on Nov. 29, 1587, when they agreed that persons who had not been baptized should also be admitted at the communion. Scheedemaker was still active in 1596. On March 3 of that year he preached at Rotterdam, using the silent prayer criticized by the Reformed Minister Franciscus van Lansbergen (q.v.). He must have died soon after.

In 1591 Scheedemaker was attacked by Pieter Cornelisz, a Reformed pastor at Alkmaar, in a booklet, Argumenten ende Bewysredenen, in which he proved that it is permissible for a Christian to hold government office. Scheedemaker, supported by Hans de Ries, his fellow preacher, answered with Nootwendighe Verantwoordinge der Verdruckter Waerheyt (probably published in 1597), in which he also defended silent prayer against van Lansbergen. In 1590 he was elder of the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam; on Oct. 22 of this year some young Frisian leaders such as Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) and Hoyte Renix (q.v.) wrote a letter to Scheedemaker concerning a merger of the Frisians and the Waterlanders, which had been proposed by Scheedemaker and his co-ministers, but which the Frisians considered premature. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 714; BRN VII, 55; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 46, 114, 119, 123 f.; K. Vos. Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 132, 135, 191; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 317 f., 350, 353, 359, 363 f., 368-74; DB 1863, 114; 1864, 2, note 20 f., 32 f., 35; 1877, 79-91; 1894, 34; 1897, 78 f., 92-105; 1904, 142-58; 1909, 145 f.; 1917, 29; Biogr. Wb. IV, 525 f.; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 449.

Jacob de Keersgieter, a martyr: see Jacob de Rore.

Jacob Lowys, an Anabaptist martyr executed at Gent, Belgium, on Nov. 22, 1570 (method unknown). The Dutch martyrbook Historie der Warachtige getuygen Jesu Christi . . . (Hoorn, 1617) contains two accounts on this martyr and Joris van Meersch, executed with him. Both accounts are incomplete; the second was used by van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror.

The exact year and date of execution (not given by van Braght) were found in the records by A. L. E. Verheyden. Jacob and Joris are celebrated in a hymn, "Broeders en susters al ghemeyn, fondeert alleen op Christum den Steijn" (Brethren and sisters altogether, build only on Christ, the stone, as a foundation). The hymn is found in the Tweede Liedenboeck of 1583. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 506, E 845; Bibliographie II, No. 489; Verheyden, Gent, 57, No. 199; Wolkan, Lieder, 72; ML II, 696.

Jacob van Meppel, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Sept. 16, 1534. He had taught in Anabaptist meetings. Further particulars are unknown (DB 1917, 122, No. 154). vdZ.

Jacob (or Jaques) Mesdag (Mestdach, Mesdach), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium, on Nov. 8, 1567, with Joos Casteels, Willem Aertsz (Aertsen), and Karel Hannebeel. They had been arrested at Zwevegem on March 1, 1566. They all remained steadfast and died valiantly. Jacob Mesdag was born at Langemarck and had lived at Capelle near Ieper; he was a weaver and a miller; in 1563 he had been (re)baptized and joined the congregation.

The Martyrs' Mirror contains a letter written by Jacob Mesdag in prison on Sept. 9, 1567, after he had been in prison for 18 months, addressed to S. I. H. or Suzanneken, who was his sister and also a member of the church. Jacob Mesdag was a member of the Dutch Mennonite Mesdag (q.v.) family. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 358-66; E 715-21; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 36 f., No. 17; ML III, 116.

Jacob de Metselaer, a martyr: see Jacob Daneels.

Jacob van Os(s)enbrug (Ossenbroich), not a native of the German town of Osnabrück as has been supposed, but probably originally from the duchy of Jülich. By trade he was a farrier (shoeing smith). He was an Anabaptist leader and confessed (according to the record) that he had been baptized at Münster (q.v.) on Jan. 6, 1534, by Jan van Leyden. But this must be an error; on that date Jan van Leyden was not yet in Münster. Soon after he returned to the territory of Jülich to win recruits for Münster. He promised to show them all the miracles which God had performed in Münster and threatened that God would punish the wicked world about Easter, when only those who were in Münster could be saved, because Münster was the New Jerusalem. He succeeded in rounding up a number of persons, including Gillis (Gys) van Rothem (q.v.), with whom he marched to Münster. It is very remarkable that they are said to have traveled unarmed. At Neuss they crossed the Rhine; upon arrival at Düsseldorf the whole group was arrested and tried on Feb. 28, 1534. The outcome of this trial is not known and further information about Jacob van Ossenbrug was not available. vdZ.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 372-77; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 70-72; Mellink, Wederdopers, 28 f., 291; ML III, 314.

Jacob, de Oude (Old Jacob), an Anabaptist martyr, executed in the castle of Berchem near Antwerp, Belgium. Bartel (q.v.) and Jacob had come from Antwerp to Berchem to comfort Hans van Monster (q.v.), who was in prison here. Both were then arrested and after much temptation executed. The date of execution is unknown; van Braght (Mart. Mir.) places it "about 1550." All three remained loyal to their faith. Jacob's judges thought he was a preacher and elder, but he was not. He is said to have been very eloquent and well versed in the Scriptures. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 102, E 500; Blaupot t. C., Groningen, II, 18; ML II, 385.

Jacob Peeters (in the official records Jacob Peeters Aertssone), by trade a cooper, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 22, 1551. (The Offer des Heeren and later martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, give the date as Oct. 2.) No particulars are known about this martyr, except that he admitted that he had been (re)baptized and he was not willing to recant. He died with Pieter (Peter) Bruynen and three other brethren. Van Braght does not report the name of Jacob Peeters, but states that on the same day still "another brother" was executed. This unknown martyr must have been Jacob Peeters. vdZ.

Offer, 177, note 1; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 405, 415; XIV, 18 f., No. 207; Mart. Mir. D 128, E 498.

Jacob Pouwels, an otherwise unknown Dutch Anabaptist, who was the leader of the Anabaptist group in Groningen in the spring of 1534, when the elder (bishop) of Amsterdam, Jacob van Campen, visited that city. The statement that the group of Anabaptists in the city of Groningen then numbered 1,100 must be an exaggeration. (DB 1917, 114, No. 41; Mellink, Wederdopers, 254.) vdZ.

Jacob Rederwijn, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, on April 13, 1557, together with two other martyrs. (Verheyden, Gent, 24, No. 53.) vdZ.

Jacob Remmes, a Dutch Anabaptist preacher, active in 1534, and a follower of the revolutionary Münsterite (q.v.) principles. Particulars are lacking. (DB 1909, 11; 1917, 119, No. 93.) vdZ.

Jacob (Jacques) de Rore (also called Jacob de Keersgieter, i.e., chandler, his father's trade), an Anabaptist martyr, executed with Herman van Vlekwijk by burning at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on June 8, 1569. Jacob de Rore was a preacher (probably an elder) and one of the most prominent Mennonite leaders in Flanders. He was born at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders in 1532 or 1533 and was a weaver by trade. In 1551 he left the Catholic Church and in 1554 he was one of five persons baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.) in the forest of Marken near Kortrijk. Soon after, he became a leader in the Kortrijk (q.v.) congregation. When Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized here in 1557, Jacob de Rore was present. In 1559 he married a member of the congregation at Armentières; the wedding was performed at Armentières by Adriaen Termentiers. In 1560 Jacob became a preacher. Up to 1566 he was especially active in the south of Flanders; he preached at Armentières, Kortrijk, Meenen, Wervik, Poperinge, Roesselare, Ieper, Thielt, Gent, St. Andries, and Brugge. He performed a large number of marriages. In 1566-68 he mostly lived in Brugge. On Feb. 1, 1567, he attended a conference at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, which was called to settle the Frisian-Flemish schism (see Flemish Mennonites). Jacob de Rore took the side of the Flemish.

In 1569 he visited Gelre and the territory of Cleve. In April of the same year, having returned to Brugge with Herman van Vlekwijk, both were arrested. They were severely cross-examined (the Franciscan monk Broer Cornelis was one of the Inquisitors) and tortured. They died steadfast.

In prison Jacob de Rore wrote 19 letters. Letters 1, 7, 10, and 14-19 are undated. They are addressed to his wife (Nos. 1, 8, 18), to his children (Nos. 3, 4), to his sister G. F. (Nos. 6, 15, 17), to his brother (No. 9), to his congregation at Brugge or Kortrijk (Nos. 2, 10, 16), to the congregation of Hondschote (No. 5), to Elder Paulus van Meenen (q.v.) (No. 7), to a brother of the congregation (Nos. 11, 13), to the ministers of the Flemish congregations (No. 12), to the congregation of Armentières (No. 14), to Adriaen Olieux, who was in prison at Armentières (No. 19).

These 19 letters are found in a book published in 1577 (n.p.), entitled: In dit teghenwoordighe Boecxken zijn vele schoone ende lieflijcke Brieven van eenen ghenaemt Jacob de Keersmaecker die hy wt zijnder ghevanchenisse ghesonden heeft, etc. There is a reprint of 1584 (n.p.). Of both editions a copy is found in the Mennonite Library at Amsterdam. There must also have been an edition of 1571, which has been lost. The book also contains the disputation between Jacob de Rore and Broer Cornelis, and two songs: (a) "Aenhoort ghy Christen schaer voorwaer, Hier int openbaer" (Hear, ye host of Christians, here publicly), (b) "Seer minnelijc gegroet zijn moet alle die doet het goet" (Kindly greeted should be all who do the right). These songs are found in Wackernagel, Lieder.

The Dutch martyrbooks have inserted a number of these letters of Jacob de Rore. The 1615 edition contains Nos. 1, 2, and 3; the editions of 1617 and 1626 and 1631 Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, and 12; van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, editions of 1660 and 1685, both have Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 11, and 12. The book of Jacob de Rore was very popular among the Mennonites. Joos de Tollenaere (q.v.) wrote 1589 from prison to his daughter (see Mart. Mir. D 777, E 1080) that after his death her mother should give her the booklet by Jacob de Keersgieter, "because therein are found fine exhortations." vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 424-37, 452-75; E 371, 774-818; Verheyden, Brugge, 58-60, No. 63; Bibliographie I, 305-18; DB 1893, 44; Wackernagel, Lieder, 200-2.

Jacob de Schoenmaker (the cobbler), an Anabaptist martyr: see Jacob Antheunis.

Jacob (Jacques) Schot (Jacob de Goudsmid, i.e., Goldsmith) was drowned in a tub in the Steen castle prison at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 1, 1560, with Gomer de Clercq (Gomer de Metselaer) and Pedro de Soza (Pieter van Spagnien). The names of these martyrs are celebrated in a hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, where they are called Gommer Metser, Peter van Spaengen, and Jacob Goutsmit. vdZ.

Offer, 567; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 640; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 6, 11; XIV, 28 f., No. 309; ML II, 386.

Jacob Spillebout (Spilboot or Spillebont), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Aug. 7, 1559, at Gent, Belgium, together with five other martyrs. He was a native of Nukerke (Nijpkerke) in Flanders and a serge weaver. His name is found in the song "Ick moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), No. 14 in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 348, 556; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 65; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 71.

Jacob de Swarte (Zwarte), an Anabaptist martyr, was born at Nukerke (Nijpkerke) in Flanders, a son of Jan de Swarte (q.v.). He lived in Oostende and Hondschoote, in which town he was baptized upon his faith in 1557. In the spring of 1558 he moved to Brugge, and soon united with the Mennonite congregation. In vain he tried to win his Catholic wife and his son-in-law to the faith. During a meeting of the congregation a number of members were arrested including Jacob and his cousin Jan Vervest. He did not forsake his Lord and died loyally at the stake on Aug. 15, 1558, at Brugge, Belgium. (Mart. Mir. D 202, 583; Verheyden, Brugge, 41, No. 24.) vdZ.

Jacob Symonsz of Delft, a Dutch Anabaptist preacher of whom not much is known. He is said to have been a learned man. In March 1534 he was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.) as a leader of the 3,000 Anabaptists who had arrived there en route to Münster, having sailed from Amsterdam. He was beheaded at Amsterdam on March 30, 1534. A hymn written by Jacob Simonsz is found in the Geestelyck Lietboecxken van D(avid) J(oris). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 121, No. 125; Mellink, Wederdopers, 107, 210, 353.

Jacob Tyettye of Goënga, Dutch province of Friesland, is listed among the Anabaptist preachers in a proclamation of the Frisian Stadholder of Feb. 23, 1534, but about his activities nothing is known. (DB 1917, 116, No. 61; Mellink, Wederdopers, 243.) vdZ.

Jacob van der Weg(h)e, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at the Vrijdagsmarkt of Gent, Belgium, on July 28, 1573. Jacob was born at Ronse (Renaix) in Flanders. After having been hunted for a long time by the inquisitors in the south part of Flanders, he went to Gent, where he joined the congregation and lived quietly for three years. Then he was arrested and put to death with three other martyrs. During this execution, which took place at eleven o'clock in the morning, the crowd of bystanders, sympathizing with the martyrs, interfered with the executioner and the priest-confessor, and the execution could not be carried out until the police arrived and the victims were gagged to prevent their speaking to the crowd. Like many martyrs in Flanders, Jacob does not seem to have accepted the doctrine of incarnation (q.v.) as taught by Menno Simons. A brother of Jacob, Hans van der Weghe (q.v.), had also died at the stake at Gent on Nov. 7, 1570. (Mart. Mir. D 61, E 969; Verheyden, Gent, 63, No. 224.) vdZ.

Jacob of Wormer, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, who according to van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, was burned at the stake at Amsterdam in 1542, together with his wife Seli. They are obviously identical with Jacob Claesz (q.v.) of Landsmeer and his wife Cecilia Jeronymusdochter (q.v.), both executed at Amsterdam in 1549. Van Braght himself suggests this identity. (Mart. Mir. D 61, 85, E 464; ML II, 386.) vdZ.

Jacob van Yperen (also called Jacob van Houte), an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 22, 1557. (Van Braght in the Mart. Mir. says he was beheaded and does not give exact date.) His name is found in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader," No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 434, 438; XIV, 22 f., No. 246.

Jacobs, Antonius, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist leader, who in prison at Haina, Hesse, Germany, wrote a letter with Melchior Rinck (q.v.), which is found in Brüderliche Vereynigung etzlicher Kinder Gottes, 1534, Dutch translation 1560. (BRN V, 599 f., 642.) vdZ.

Jacob's Creek Valley in Fayette and Westmoreland counties in Southwestern Pennsylvania was the site of what seems to have been the first Mennonite settlement west of the Allegheny Mountains and the second oldest in the Allegheny Conference District. The pioneer settlers came to Jacob's Creek Valley in the period prior to 1789 on to 1800 from Lancaster Co., Pa., and Washington Co., Md. Early names were Strickler, Stauffer, Shallenberger, Sherrick, Shank, and Rist. The settlers south of Jacob's Creek built a meetinghouse near Pennsville before 1800, and this group was sometimes called the congregation of Jacob's Creek Valley. Those north of the creek built a place of worship at Stonerville in about 1800. These two congregations were later merged into one with a meetinghouse in Scottdale, Pa. J.L.H.

E. Yoder, "The Mennonites of Westmoreland County, Pa.," MQR XV (1941) 155-87.

Jacobs, Eduard (1833-1919), born at Crefeld, Germany, archivist and librarian of the Prince of Stolberg at Wernigerode a.H., author of the treatise "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz" in Zeitschrift des Harzvereins für Geschichte und Altertumskunde (Wernigerode, 1899), 423-536 and 631-33. The work constitutes a valuable addition to research in Mennonite history, giving much source material (from the court records in the Magdeburg archives) and a thorough presentation of the life and faith of the Anabaptists in the Harz.

Jacobs, in co-operation with Gustav Kawerau and Julius Köstlin, founded in 1883 the Verein für Reformationsgeschichte, which after World War I made plans to publish all the hitherto unpublished court records, government and church protocols, mandates, letters, regulations, etc., relating to the Anabaptist movement of the 16th century in a single comprehensive collection of source material (see Historiography). Since 1948 this Verein has in conjunction with the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein been publishing and preparing for publication these new source materials of Anabaptist history. Neff, H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "Publication and Research Projects in Anabaptist-Mennonite History," MQR (January, 1949); ML II, 101; Die Heimat (Crefeld) XI (1932) 99; ML II, 386.

Jacobs, Heinrich, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded in Bergheim, Rhineland, Germany, in 1536 because he would not give up his faith. (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 523; ML II, 386.) Neff.

Jacobs, Joris, an elder of the Janjacobs (q.v.) group, ordained in 1639, who baptized 302 persons in 1640-47 in the Dutch province of Friesland. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 9a; DB 1889, 4.) vdZ.

Jacobs, Rijk, author of Een schriftelycke waerschouwinge voor valsche leere. Ghemaeckt door R. J. en voor sijne kinderen tot een Testament naeghelaten om daerdoor te onderscheyden het thegenschrijven van J. R. [Jacques van Reineghem, i.e., Jacques Outerman, q.v.] gedaen thegen dat heylsaem schriftmatige getuygenisse der gesonder leere Jesu Christi schriftelick ende mondelick betuycht door A[rent] B[arentsz] en H[endrick van Gulik] (n.p., 1612). In this booklet Jacobsz accuses Outerman of Socinianism (q.v.). This Rijk Jacobs is probably identical with the Rijck Jacobsz who was a physician at Baambrugge, province of Utrecht, and from 1614 a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Staveren, Friesland, who disagreed with Hans de Ries (q.v.) and other Waterlanders in insisting that persons coming from the Reformed Church should be rebaptized. He also published De predicatien der namen Gods (Amsterdam, 1624). W. J. van Douwen's surmise (Socinianen en Doopsgezinden) that he later became a Reformed pastor is not very probable. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 545-53; DB 1897, 164; N.N.B. Wb. IX, 443 f.; Biogr. Wb. IV, 485 f.

Jacobs, Wouter, a Mennonite preacher of Ameland (q.v.), who in 1714 copied the "Dooplijst" (list of baptisms) of Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.). This copy, acquired in 1855 by Pastor K. S. Gorter of Ameland (DB 1889, 3), is now in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 9). The Wouter Jacobs copy, which is more accurate than the Appingedam copy used by Blaupot ten Cate, was used by Karel Vos in his study on the "Dooplijst" in Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Hist. Genootschap XXXVI (1915) 39 ff. vdZ.

Jacobs(z), Anthoni (Anthony, sometimes called Roscius after the friend and teacher of Cicero), b. 1594 probably at Amsterdam (according to Schijn in Hoorn), d. 1624, was a Dutch Mennonite elder in the Waterlander congregation at Hoorn. In January 1624 he was skating from Hoorn to Amsterdam, where he was to preach a sermon, pushing the sled in which his wife Jannetje Jansdochter was sitting with their child, and fell through a hole in the ice. The child drowned and Jacobsz with much trouble saved his wife, who, however, died soon after. Two weeks later Jacobsz also died. This tragic accident made a deep impression. Joost van den Vondel (q.v.), Holland's greatest poet, then still a member of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, celebrated the family in a poem, and Jeme de Ring (q.v.) of Harlingen published a sermon for Anthoni's funeral. Anthoni Jacobsz was a grandson on his mother's side of the well-known Elder Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) and a son of Jacob Thonis (Theunissen), a deacon of the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam; his brother Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.) was an elder of the Waterlander congregation of Leeuwarden. Anthoni studied medicine, obtained his doctor's degree, and was appointed elder at an early age, being much appreciated by his congregation. He published Wederlegginghe des Kinder doops . . . teghen Robertum Puppium, dat deselve niet uit God is (n.p., 1617, reprinted Amsterdam 1636). After Herman Faukelius (q.v.), a Reformed divine, had attacked the Mennonites in Babel, dat is Verwerringhe der Wederdooperen onder malkanderen (1621), and Claes Claesz (q.v.) of Blokzijl had defended the Mennonites, Anthoni Jacobsz also wrote a refutation entitled Babel, d.i. Verwerringe der Kinderdooperen onder malcanderen (n.p., 1626), which was published after Jacobsz' death. He is also thought to have been the author of a booklet published at Amsterdam in 1628 under the pseudonym of Ben Israels, Tractaet der Buytengetrouwden sonder onderscheijt. vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 270-89; Biogr. Wb. IV, 480-82; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 44, 59, 64, 66-69, 77, 142 f.; DB 1883, 7; ML II, 386.

Jacobsz, Claes, a Mennonite bookdealer at De Rijp, Dutch province of North Holland, who published the well-known book by Pieter Pietersz, Wegh na Vreden-stadt (1624), and in the same year two sermons of the same author, Twee Eenvoudighe Stichtelijcke Predicatiën. This volume also contains a booklet by Claes Jacobsz himself, Een Christelijcke Sendtbrief aen een bedruckte Weduw, of 1622. The letter by Claes Jacobsz was reprinted at De Rijp in 1644. vdZ.

Jacobs(z), Jan, a Dutch Mennonite elder, b. May 25, 1542, at Harlingen, d. July 17, 1612, at Leeuwarden, who founded a group called the Janjacobsgezinden. Jan Jacobsz was a preacher and elder of the Frisian Mennonites. He was appointed to the ministry about 1562, became an elder about 1580. He visited a large number of congregations, always traveling about and until his death preaching and baptizing, sometimes in mortal danger. He was a man of austere principles, requiring that the members of the church avoid the "world" in every way, not marrying outside the group, nor carrying on business with nonmembers. In 1589, when the Frisian Mennonites were divided into Zachte Vriezen (Mild Frisians) with Lubbert Gerritsz as leader and Harde or Oude Vriezen (Severe or Old Frisians), Jan Jacobsz was one of the leaders of the latter and in 1599, when a quarrel arose among the Old Frisians he separated with a number of adherents, forming the Janjacobs group, which banned Pieter Jeltjes (q.v.) and his followers. About 1603 he was probably involved in a quarrel with the followers of Tijs Gerrits (q.v.), which caused a new schism.

In the meanwhile Jan Jacobsz was exiled from Friesland by the government because of his great activity (April 1600); he then turned first to Medemblik, and soon after to Hoorn, where he had many followers. In the course of time he was allowed to live in Friesland, though forbidden to preach. When this restriction was lifted in 1611, he and his wife returned to Harlingen, and he again began to travel about. Arriving at Anjum (q.v.) in June 1612, he fell ill and was unable to preach; he went to Leeuwarden, and feeling his end drawing near he called his coelders for a last farewell, soon after dying at the home of his sister Griet Jacobs at Leeuwarden.

Jan Jacobsz composed 46 hymns, which are found in a songbook published after his death, entitled Eenighe Gheestelijcke Liedekens, gemaeckt aen verscheyden personen door Jan Jacobszoon van Harlingen . . . Ende ten Druck bestelt door P. W. (Amsterdam, Nicolaes Biestkens, 1612). Loosjes's assertion that Jan Jacobsz was a son of Jacob de Heere, or Scheltema, who was born at Aalst, Flanders, and that Jan Jacobsz was the Dutch ancestor of the de Heere family has been proved false. His father was Jacob Hayesz, a native of Harlingen where Jan Jacobsz was born. vdZ.

J. Loosjes, Jan Jacobsz en de Jan Jacobsgezinden in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgesch. XI (The Hague, 1914) number III, 183-209; Biogr. Wb. IV, 482-84; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 911; Ned. Patriciaat XXVII (1941) 218; BRN VII, 67 f., 213 ff., 527, 554; DB 1867, 65; 1876, 30-35; 1889, 6-10; 1894, 31; 1900, 74, 98.

Jacobsz, Lambert, b. ca. 1598 in Amsterdam, d. June 27, 1636, at Leeuwarden, a grandson on his mother's side of the noted Mennonite leader Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), a son of the deacon Jacob Teunis, and a brother of Anthoni Jacobsz (q.v.), was an elder of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation at Leeuwarden (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland. During his ministry there was some difficulty with the city government because of the building of a new meetinghouse in 1630-31, and Lambert Jacobsz was fined twice, apparently because he had preached in the new church, which was forbidden by the government.

In 1620 Lambert Jacobsz married Aeghtje Theunisdochter, a daughter of a Mennonite preacher and flax trader. Vondel (q.v.) wrote a poem for this occasion. In the fall of 1633, after the death of Aeghtje, he married Hillegont, daughter of Dirk Velius of Hoorn. He was a close friend of Dirk R. Camphuyzen (q.v.). In 1636 Lambert Jacobsz died as a victim of the plague. A son of Lambert Jacobsz was Abraham van den Tempel (q.v.), a well-known Dutch painter. The artist Govert Flinck was a pupil of Lambert Jacobsz.

Lambert Jacobsz was not only a Mennonite minister but also carried on a business in paintings, being himself also a painter. About 1618 he had visited Italy. Until very recently Lambert Jacobsz was quite unknown as a painter. None of his paintings were discovered before 1918. Now there are 25 pictures known to have been made by him. The Mennonite congregation of Leeuwarden possesses three of them. In 1936 a memorial exhibition of his pictures was held in Leeuwarden and Amsterdam. Most of his pictures show an Italian landscape, after a drawing he obviously made in 1618, and in this landscape a Biblical scene, such as Joseph sold by his brethren, Isaac and Rebecca, Ruth and Boaz, or the question of paying tribute (Matt. 22:16-21). His most impressive painting is that of the Apostle Paul. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 484 f.; Friesch Museum, Leeuwarden, Herdenkings-Tentoonstelling Lambert Jacobsz. 27 Juni-27 September, 1936, Catalogus; H. L. Straat, "Lambert Jacobsz, Schilder," De Vrije Fries XXVIII, 1 (Leeuwarden, 1925); DJ 1937, 67-72; Oud Holland, 1930, 145; 1934, 241 ff.

Jacobsz, Mattheus, a Dutch book printer, who in 1557 published the New Testament in the Dutch language, reprinted in 1558, 1559, and 1562. These editions were especially used by the Dutch Mennonites before the Biestkens Bible (q.v.) was printed in 1560. vdZ.

Jacop Pierin, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, executed about 1559 at Hondschoote (q.v.) in Flanders. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Jacquemijne de Wilde, an Anabaptist martyr, widow of the martyr Gillis Rooze (q.v.), was imprisoned in February 1568 at Brugge, Belgium, together with 13 other Mennonites, when their meeting was surprised by the police. Nine of them recanted, but Jacquemijne remained faithful to the end and died as a martyr at the stake between April 13 and July 28, 1568. (Verheyden, Brugge, 54, No. 54.) vdZ.

Ja(c)ques d'Auchy (Dauchi, Dosie, Doussy), an Anabaptist martyr, secretly executed on March 14, 1559, in prison at Leeuwarden. He was a merchant who was basely betrayed to the police by a van der Waal at Harlingen. In prison he was visited by his wife, who "would have liked to die with him and inherit the blessed life." He comforted her with the words, "Do not let it dismay you that I must go a little ahead of you; that is the Lord's will." It was revealed in the trial that he was baptized by Leenaert Bouwens in Emden. Nothing else is known of his activities. He was a man of considerable education, unequaled by any other Dutch martyr. Before his conversion he may have been a lawyer. In the discussion with the inquisitor he cites the church fathers Eusebius, Tertullian, and Cyprian. The French language was his mother tongue. His confession was translated from the French into the Dutch language and at least one song he composed was French. So we may assume that northern France or French Flanders was his native country.

Of great importance is his confession, a detailed transcription of his trial by the inquisitors, which he wrote from memory, since it offers an extremely valuable insight into the doctrine and life of the Anabaptists of that period. More than 20 times he was ordered to appear before the inquisitor and again and again the painfully detailed examination about the most important questions of faith was begun anew. Quite surprising is the spiritual superiority of the Anabaptist over his theologically trained opponents in keen understanding and extensive acquaintance with the Scriptures. He met them most skillfully.

Most of the arguments were about baptism and communion. Adroitly he refuted the arguments for infant baptism with superior Biblical grounds. When, for instance, his opponent pointed out that whole households were baptized and that they probably included small children, he replied that the Bible says nothing of them, but rather states expressly that all the members of the households had heard and believed the word, which could surely not be said of small children. With equally convincing force, and with clever, most fitting Scriptural replies he disputed the bodily presence of Christ in the communion, and rejected the doctrine of the Mass as un-Biblical. To the reproach that he rejected the word of the holy Church Fathers, he replied, "I do not reject them, but leave them where they are; for I find enough material in the Word of God for a firm foundation, and enough water of life in the pure fountain, so that I do not need to drink from creeks and pools, which are usually murky and foul." On one occasion he denounced David Joris as "a heretic who destroys the breaking of bread"; i.e., rejects the Lord's Supper.

When asked if he was a follower of Menno Simons' doctrine, he answered, "I believe that Jesus was entirely the Son of God in flesh and spirit; but the question of the origin of His flesh I leave to . . . God; the apostles did not argue about it." His view of the Old Testament is also interesting: it is to be appraised only according to the testimony of Jesus and His apostles. "We are no longer under the law, but under the Gospel." Finally he pointed out the immoral conduct of the bishops and priests, and challenged his opponent to name a single one in the great number who lived a morally clean life, so that he might follow after him. The "heresy master" was now silent, and at length remarked that wicked can also have faith, pointing to Judas and Demas. But the Anabaptist replied aptly, "Then a thief who admonishes his fellows not to steal will also secure results. They would much more probably say, 'If it is evil, why do you do it? You hypocrite, take the beam from your own eye; then you will be able to see the mote in mine.'" His "Confession" is a significant document for the understanding of Mennonite history.

Jacques d'Auchy also composed a number of songs, at least three of which are known: (a) a song translated from the French into the Dutch and included by Carel van Mander (q.v.) in his hymnbook De Gulden Harpe, which begins "Tot Leeuwarden op eenen dag"; (b) a song beginning "Ghy Borgers Jerusalem, aensiet," found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and later hymnbooks; (c) a song beginning "Och siet hoe droeve dingen," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1563 and following editions), No. 24 (Offer, 608-11).

The oldest martyrbook, Het Offer des Heeren of 1562, contains the following by and about Jacques d'Auchy: (1) his confession of faith; (2) accounts written by himself of his confessions made before the commissarius and the inquisitors; (3) a song on his capture, suffering, and death, beginning: "Seer wonderlijck, o Heere, sijn U wercken vermaert." All of these, the song in prose, are found in the later martyrbooks including van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror. Van Braght contributes two accounts on this martyr, once calling him Jaques Dosie and once Jaques d'Auchy. Of Jacques' confession there is also a French edition, titled Confession de Foy . . . (n.p., 1626). Neff, vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; Offer, 268-323, 608-11; Mart. Mir. D 101 f., 212-36; E 498, 591-611; BRN VII, 173 ff., 197 ff., 225; Wolkan, Lieder, 64, 67, 70; Wackernagel, Lieder, 198; F. C. Wieder, Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 187; ML I, 89 f.; III, 394.

Ja(c)ques Bostijn (Coppin Bostijn), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 16, 1562, at the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, with Laurens Allaerts, Pieter van Maldegem, and Pieter van Male. His name is celebrated in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert Jaer," in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, edition of 1578 and following. He was a native of Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders. Members of the Mennonite Bostijn family were found in the Amsterdam "Lam and Toren" congregation in the 17th and 18th centuries. They may be related to this martyr. (Offer, 650; Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 88.) vdZ.

Jacques van Hulten (Verhulten), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 28, 1573, together with Grietken van den Steene and Janneken Croecx. Jacques' wife Lynken Ghysseleers (q.v.) died as a martyr on Feb. 20, 1573. Jacques is charged with the crimes of having left the Catholic Church, being rebaptized, having partaken in forbidden meetings in Antwerp and elsewhere. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 99 f., 171; XIV, 88 f., No. 1001.) vdZ.

Jacques (Jacob) van Maldegem, a Mennonite preacher: see Maldegem.

Jacques van der Mase, an Anabaptist martyr from Brussels, was burned at the stake in 1536 or 1537 at Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium. He probably had belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism and he had relations with Münsterite Anabaptists in a number of towns in the Netherlands, as The Hague, Delft, Rotterdam, Dordrecht, Gorinchem, and Geertruidenberg. After the fall of Münster (q.v.) in July 1535 he went to Flanders. He is one of the rare instances of revolutionary principles among the Anabaptists in Flanders and at the same time an indication of early occurrence of Anabaptism at Kortrijk. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 31, No. 1.) vdZ.

Jacques Mergaert, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, with Hans Cornelisszoon de Ruytere and Hans Bret on Jan. 4, 1577. Jacques was born at Gent and was sentenced to death for attending forbidden meetings of the Anabaptists, being rebaptized, and persevering in this "heresy." (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 210; XIV, 98 f., 1119.) vdZ.

Jacques (Jacob) Semou, perhaps identical with Jan de Schaper (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, born at Béthune, French Flanders, a weaver, 38 years of age, living at Borgerhout near Antwerp. He had been (re)baptized at Gent about 1558 by Joachim Vermeeren, and was arrested while attending a meeting in the house of Jan Poote (q.v.) at Antwerp in February 1569. Twice he was severely tortured, but refused to tell the inquisitors who had preached the sermon. On March 19, 1569, he was burned at the stake at Antwerp together with Jan Poote, Hans Vermandele, and Joos van Beeke. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 344, 368, 398, 440; XIV, 64 f., No. 714.) vdZ.

Jacques de Stremont (d'Estremont), a martyr, was burned at the stake at Brussels, Belgium, on March 28, 1571, together with Hans van der Straten. It is likely, though not quite certain, that he was a Mennonite. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 102, No. 148.) vdZ.

Jacques Verbruggen, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Jan. 31, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Hans der Weduwe and Jenneken Beaucoup. Jacques was charged with rebaptism and attending the meetings of the Anabaptists. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 101 f., 173; XIV, 88 f., No. 1004.) vdZ.

Jaecxken van Hussele, an Anabaptist martyr, who on Dec. 22, 1569, was burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, after having been strangled, together with Tanneken van der Meulen and Jaecxken Teerlings. Particulars are not available. Their names are found in a song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert Jaer," of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, edition of 1578 and following. (Offer, 653; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759; Verheyden, Gent, 55, No. 185.) vdZ.

Jaecxken Teerlings, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Antwerp, Dec. 22, 1569 (Verheyden, Gent, 55, No. 186), together with Jaecxken van Hussele (q.v.). vdZ.

Jaepgen Maertensd, an Anabaptist martyr of Ouddorp, who was drowned at Alkmaar in Holland on July 14, 1537, on a charge of sacrilege, together with Kathryn Willemsdr. (DB 1909, 20 f.) vdZ.

Jagdeeshpore Mission, a station and the hub of the General Conference Mennonite Christian work in the Phuljhar and Deori area of India, and the most recent station in this work. Jagdeeshpore is located south of the great Mahanadi River, about 60 miles south of Champa. E. B. Steiner and P. J. Wiens with their families had visited this area off and on since 1916, and baptized a number of persons. In 1923 the Moyers were asked to go to this area and search out a plot for a mission station. A plot, 5½ miles north of Basna, near the little village of Jagdeeshpore, in a dense oriental semitropical jungle was chosen. Christians from all around this jungle plot came to help in clearing it and building the first buildings. Growth came with almost breath-taking speed. By the end of 1924 several buildings were finished. By the end of 1928 Dr. Dester had a complete hospital established. By the end of 1948 John Thiessen had a complete high school established with a 28-acre school farm, poultry establishment, dairy, carpentry shop, weaving shop, tailoring shop, print shop, etc. The Christian community has increased from a few hundred to some three thousand in 1949, scattered in some 130 villages, all around Jagdeeshpore. Jagdeeshpore has grown in a quarter of a century from an obscure village hidden in the jungles of India to one widely known and appreciated. J.T.

Jager, de, a family name, borne by a number of Dutch Mennonite ministers. Besides Hendrik de Jager (q.v.) and his son Jan de Jager (q.v.), both of whom served at Hamburg, Germany, there were Pieter de Jager, serving at Vlissingen 1663-71, Leiden 1671-79, and later at Schiedam 1692-? (concerning this man and the troubles he caused at Leiden and Rotterdam, see Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 809, 815-17; DB 1909, 160; and De Zondagsbode, 1898, Sept. 18 and 27), Henrik Teunis (Hendrik Theunis de Jager) who was a preacher at Harlingen, Holland, in the last decades of the 17th century, and Wigger Thomas de Jager, who served at South Giethoorn 1749-ca. 98. vdZ.

Jager, Henrick de (Hendrik Teunis de Jager) (1690-1749), an outstanding preacher of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church in the first half of the 18th century, was born Feb. 23, 1690, the son of the preacher Henrik Teunis of Harlingen, Holland. He was given an education unusual at the time in science and linguistics, mastered Latin and the Oriental languages, thus becoming after Hoekstra (q.v.) the "first learned preacher of the church." Because of his talents and education much attention was early centered on him, especially in view of the current shortage of ministers. Following Hamburg custom he prepared himself for business as a vocation. At the age of 21 he was chosen preacher, and nine years later, in 1720, elder. His strength of character enabled him to overcome his physical weakness.

The congregation was in a period of fermentation and change, having just come through the Socinian storms raised by Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan. The foe was no longer the external one of government oppression, such as de Jager's predecessor, Gerrit Roosen, had struggled against in his booklet, Unschuld und Gegenbericht, but internal in the freer flow of spirit within the congregation. At the same time the church reached new cultural and economic prosperity, in spite of the heavy war levies and the burning of Altona in the war between Sweden and Denmark. Nevertheless de Jager maintained the traditional doctrine; indeed, in opposition to contrary opinion he held it the more carefully. But the inner relationship between congregation and pastor relaxed. A symbol of this change was the transition to a paid ministry. Thus de Jager stands at the threshold of the period in which a new type of minister was developing, with a new awareness of his calling.

De Jager led the church with a firm hand. After his ordination orderly church records were kept again, church discipline was exercised, and baptismal instruction prepared for life. Unfortunately there are no printed sermons from his pen. The speaker at his funeral, Karsdorp the Elder, gives this general characterization: "He preached Jesus Christ the Crucified as the foundation of salvation. He pointed constantly to the Word of God and sound doctrine." We can assume that he remained true to the irenic and practical views of Philippus of Limburg, his theological teacher, and that pietistic coloring, except in a few turns of phrase, cannot be found in him, in spite of the resemblance to Zinzendorf seen by Roosen.

With de Jager's collaboration, perhaps at his instigation, the first church school was established in Altona. The occasion for it was the fact that the Dutch language, used in preaching, writing, and church business, was being gradually replaced by German in the home and secular life, so that the oncoming generation scarcely understood Dutch. The schedule was not ambitious; it provided for the three R's, the main subject being Bible, with its adjunct, the singing of hymns. In connection with the school de Jager carried on extensive correspondence with Holland, Danzig, and Friedrichstadt. He was the founder of the church library at Altona, leaving to it much of his personal library.

De Jager's frailness and the death of five children caused him to live with his own demise in view. He died at the age of 59, on April 10, 1749. Gerrit Beets (q.v.), in his introduction to Karsdorp's funeral address, called him a "pillar of the church." He is the author of Lykdicht ter heuchelyke nagedachtnisse van den Godzaligen Gerrit Roosen in zyn Leeven oudste Leeraar der Gemeente. O.S.

Gerrit Karsdorp, Over de doot van den eerwaarden H. T. de Jager (Hamburg, n.d.-1749); B. C. Roosen, Gesch. d. Menn.-Gem. zu Hamburg und Altona (Hamburg, 1886-87); E. H. Wichmann, Geschichte Altonas (Altona, 1865); Bolten, Historische Kirchennachrichten; ML II, 387.

Jager, Jan de, a minister of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church, b. March 10, 1719, d. May 12, 1802, the oldest son of Henrick de Jager (q.v.), who gave him an excellent education in the "learned languages," astronomy, anatomy, and botany. From his twelfth to his twenty-second year he lived with his uncle, in order to be introduced into "trade."

Three years after his first marriage he was chosen as a probationary minister, having been in a sense bequeathed to the church, together with Karsdorp, Jr., by the "dying lips" of his father. It was even harder for the son to accept the office than it had been for the father. He did not preach a sermon until a year later, and his installation as a full preacher was postponed repeatedly until a year after the death of his first wife. He had meanwhile refused remuneration in order not to be bound. He was too adventuresome to be suited to a permanent pastorate. He spent much time in Friedrichstadt, the home of his second wife, so that the congregation had to have several ministers at the same time. Nevertheless Hoekstra stated in Jager's funeral sermon that his preaching was stirring and appealing, based on the conviction that faith is profitable, disbelief harmful, because on them depend life and death.

Extant are the following sermons preached by him: a sermon in verse, "Vaderlijke Ontboezeming aan myne kinderen," and the following printed funeral addresses: (1) "Die Aufmerksamkeit einer Gemeinde auf den Tod ihrer Lehrer bei dem seligen Absterben des . . . G. Karsdorp" (1750); (2) "De zalige hope en verwachting eener godvruchtige Ziele in Leven en in Sterven ter gelegentheid von het zalig overlyden van . . . J. Ris over Ps. 39, 8" (Hamburg, 1784). O.S.

G. Karsdorp and S. Hoekstra, Stand- en Gedachtenisrede, 1802; Biogr. Wb. IV, 488; Naamlijst 1804, 70; ML II, 387.

Jäger, Philip: see Philip Weber.

Jahrbuch der altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten-Gemeinden, published by H. G. Mannhardt (Danzig, 1888), is a continuation of the Jahrbuch der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in West- und Ostpreussen, published by the same author in 1884. The latter contains first a New Year's sermon of the author, then statistics of the churches in East and West Prussia of 1852 and 1882, showing that there had been a decline of 655 in membership. It is followed by the essays: "Die Mennoniten in der dramatischen Literatur," and "Ein Beitrag zu den Rechtsverhältnissen der Mennoniten," which deals with a suit against the Danzig Mennonite Church, which was decided in favor of the church. In conclusion he presents a brief chronicle of events in the Mennonite churches.

The yearbook of 1888 is richer in content. It contains exact statistics of the Mennonites in the various countries: Germany, Switzerland, France, Holland, Russia, and some from America, reporting the date of origin, membership, names of preachers and elders, and the institutions. The second part of the booklet is entitled Verschiedenes aus der Tätigkeit und den Einrichtungen der Mennoniten, and presents articles on (1) the home and foreign mission work of the Mennonites; (2) the Vereinigung der Mennoniten-Gemeinden im Deutschen Reich and its origin; (3) instruction among the Mennonites of Russia, with an interesting account of their school for the deaf in Blumenort; (4) the school at the Weierhof near Marnheim (Palatinate); and (5) the text of several laws and regulations concerning the Mennonites. Ludwig Keller (q.v.) gives a list of books important to the history and doctrine of the Mennonites; the book closes with a recommendation of Mennonite books and periodicals. (ML II, 388.) NEFF.

Jahrbuch, Mennonitisches: see Mennonitisches Jahrbuch.

Jakob, Hans, a co-worker with Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.), a High German Anabaptist elder. The only fact known about his life is that he participated in the composition of the extensive defensive booklet, Antwort auf Kaspar Schwenckfelds Beurteilung des Buches der Bundesbezeugung von 1542, written by the South German and Swiss Brethren 1544-46 under Marpeck's leadership.

The esteem in which the High German and Swiss Mennonites held the document can be estimated by a comment written by Walpurga, the Marshalck of Pappenheim, the original owner of the copy now in the central library of Zürich: "If God should call me (i.e., to eternity), this book shall be handed out only to the true believers, and those who have a zeal for God shall see the salvation of their souls therein; it shall not go into the world, for I prefer to give it to the God-fearing." (ML II, 388.) HEGE.

Jakob Heinrich, an Anabaptist writer of hymns, author of the hymn, "Ick roep tot u wt dieper noot" and probably also of "Ick moet eens gaen vertellen." Nothing else is known of him. (Wolkan, Lieder, 80; ML II, 279.) NEFF.

Jamaica Mennonite Church (MC) was organized with 26 members on July 10, 1955, at Constant Spring, Jamaica, by Bishop Truman Brunk, Moderator of the Virginia Mennonite Conference, who baptized 11 persons and received by transfer from other denominations 15 persons. Warren and Erma Metzler were appointed missionaries to Jamaica in November 1955 by the Virginia Board of Missions and Charities, which is administering the work in cooperation with the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (Elkhart, Ind.). This work had a unique origin. Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Loewen of Manitoba (GCM) went to Jamaica in October 1954 to investigate the possibilities of mission work and soon began a private work. Unable to continue because of poor health, and failing to secure the support of their own conference mission board, they appealed to the MCC for help, which passed on the appeal to the Virginia board. The Loewens and a group of Jamaican Christians with whom they had found fellowship then formally invited the Virginia board to take over the work. Jamaica is a small British island in the West Indies, 95 miles southeast of Cuba, about 145 miles long (4,450 sq. mi.) and very mountainous, with a population (1943) of 1,237,391. H.S.B.

Mary Slabaugh, "Let's Visit Jamaica," and "Farewell for the Metzlers," Gospel Herald XLVIII (1955) 1214-16.

Jamerau (Jamrau), a village situated near the Vistula River in West Prussia, belonging to the territory of Culm (q.v.). Jamerau was settled by Dutch Mennonite farmers as early as 1597. The oldest lease was not preserved; in the lease of 1626 the following names are found (some of them may have been garbled): Joachim Rothe, Joachim Leskau, Hans Fott, Steffen Baltzer, Michel Decker, Hans Zimmermann, Ertman Stubbe. The Mennonites of Jamerau belonged to the Schönsee (q.v.) congregation. In 1752 the burgomaster and city council of Culm renewed a lease with the tenants Cornelis Frans, Johan Voet, Johan Nagtigal, Jakob Wedel, Peter Sievert, and Andreas Kurk, which obligated these tenants to keep the dikes along the Vistula in good condition. These tenants were all Mennonites, who (or whose parents) had fled from Lithuania (q.v.) about 1732. Abraham Nickel of Jamerau, a deacon of the Schönsee congregation, in 1806 presented a gift of 30,000 Talers to King Frederick William III and Queen Louise of Prussia, then fleeing before Napoleon, as a proof of the loyalty of the Mennonites in this district. vdZ.

F. Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 147 f.; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk der niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 36, 57, note 16, 82, 94; J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76-82.

James, Epistle of, is generally attributed to James, the brother of Jesus, in Jerusalem. Luther called it an "epistle of straw," because it does not "promote Jesus." Menno criticized Luther severely for this statement. But even though the name of Jesus is mentioned only twice, His teachings meet us throughout, as they are given in the Gospels, particularly in the Sermon on the Mount. His earnest admonition to endure suffering and trial in patience, his opposition to an unfruitful theology, his warning against sins of the tongue, against the secularization of the church, against the injurious influence of wealth and opulent living, the command against swearing, and his insistence upon a life of prayer make of the Epistle of James a classic exponent of a practical Christianity which permeates everyday life. No wonder that it has always been highly regarded in Anabaptist circles. NEFF.

C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 56, 109; ML II, 388.

James River United Missionary Church, organized in 1936, is located one mile south and 1½ miles west of James River, Alberta. In June 1941 a meetinghouse was erected with seating capacity of 75. In 1955 the church had 14 members with G. W. Dedels serving as pastor. M.L.B.

James Valley Hutterite Bruderhof, four miles south of Elie, Man., was founded in Canada in 1918 because of Canada's more liberal provisions for conscientious objectors to military service. It was established by several families of the Milltown Bruderhof, 12 miles southeast of Huron, S.D., with David Hofer their preacher. David Hofer was also one of the founders of Milltown, was chosen to the ministry there on June 2, 1907, and confirmed in the office on Oct. 10, 1909. He died on April 6, 1941, in the James Valley Bruderhof at the age of 64. Peter Hofer was chosen preacher on Aug. 24, 1919, and confirmed on Sept. 8, 1935. In 1950 the colony had a total population of 128. D.D.

Jamesville Hutterite Bruderhof, Utica, S.D., was founded in 1884 by several families from the Wolf Creek Bruderhof. Their preacher Elias Walter, Sr., was chosen to the ministry in 1889 in Wolf Creek. In 1918 the Bruderhof sold its possessions and moved to Alberta, founding the Springvale Bruderhof near Rocky Ford. In 1937 the Jamesville site was bought by Hutterian Brethren from Manitoba. Their preacher Friedrich Waldner was chosen in the Roseisle Bruderhof. In 1950 the Jamesville settlement numbered 107 souls. D.D.

Jamnitz, Oswald von, an Anabaptist martyr, who was arrested at Vienna, Austria, in 1545 and because he remained steadfast in his faith was drowned there in the Danube. (Mart. Mir. D 71, E 473; DB 1899, 115.) vdZ.

Jan, an Anabaptist martyr who was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 2, 1551. This martyr, named in a letter by Peter Bruynen (Offer, 180, 182 and Mart. Mir. D 129 f., E 498), is identical with Jan de Oude Kleerkoper (q.v.). vdZ.

Jan, an Anabaptist martyr, reported by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655), executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1561, is Jan van Lyere (q.v.). vdZ.

Jan, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed in 1561 at Cologne, Germany, by drowning in the Rhine, together with Orvel and Pleun (Pleunis). (Mart. Mir. D 286, E 654; ML II, 389.) NEFF.

Jan van Ackeren (Akeren, Akkeren), an Anabaptist martyr, born at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, a serge weaver, was executed on April 2, 1569 (not 1573, as van Braght states), at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Jan de Timmerman and Balthasar de Rosières. Jan van Ackeren, who was 63 years of age, declared during his trial that he had been (re)baptized "six or seven years ago" by Pauwels van Tielt in a wooded spot near Halewijn, Flanders, in the presence of about 50 persons shortly after midnight. Jan, whose wife and two daughters were still living at Kortrijk, had moved to Antwerp only two weeks before he was arrested. He was tortured on March 9, and refusing to recant was sentenced to death, which he underwent with cheerfulness. The letters which he wrote in prison have been lost. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 644, E 965; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 361, 370, 399, 440; XIV, 64 f., No. 722; ML II, 389.

Jan Aertsz, an Anabaptist martyr, a joiner from Oesterhout (Oosterhout, Dutch province of North Brabant?), was beheaded at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, with 10 others on Jan. 7, 1539. Apparently he was a follower of David Joris (q.v.). In 1534, when living in the territory of IJsselstein, he organized meetings in which the Scriptures (or other books?) were read. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; DB 1899, 158-60; 1917, 160-67; Mellink, Wederdopers, 233.

Jan (Johan) Andries, a Mennonite preacher of Utrecht: see Aken, Jan Andries van.

Jan Arends (Arents, Arnts), an unknown Anabaptist martyr, executed at Amsterdam on May 11, 1532. vdZ.

C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860) 385.

Jan van Bemelen, an Anabaptist martyr of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. When persecution arose there, Jan and his wife fled, but afterwards returned and were arrested. Jan was beheaded there in April 1538 on the Vrijthof square. His wife was released because she was not (re)baptized. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) passim, especially 141 f.

Jan Berne, a shoemaker, one of the four leaders of the Anabaptist congregation in Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, in whose home Henric Slachtscaep of Tongeren (q.v.) stayed in 1533, writing "letters and other things," according to a letter written by the Duke of Jülich to the city of Maastricht, July 16, 1533. In 1527 Jan Berne had been in court for "Lutheranism"; he was reading (said the charge) forbidden books. He was released upon a public church confession. One and one-half years later he was again in prison, with Jan van den Bosch. In 1532 he had been charged with blasphemy against the holy sacrament; in March 1533 he was accused of holding secret conferences. In 1535 he fled from the city with his wife. Nothing more is known of him. NEFF.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 79-81 and passim, see Index; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 76, 78, 358; ML I, 197.

Jan Beukelsz (Bokelszoon, Bockelszoon), the revolutionary Anabaptist leader and "King of Münster": see Jan van Leyden.

Jan (Johan) Block, an Anabaptist martyr, had as a rich young man led a frivolous, pleasure-seeking life. The conversion of one of his former drinking companions made such an impression on him that he also became a believer and joined the Mennonites. When the government heard of this they confiscated all his lands and set a reward of 70 guilders on his seizure. He fled, but returned when he found no refuge anywhere, to support himself by the work of his hands. He was betrayed and in 1569 (not 1572, as van Braght erroneously states) was arrested in Nijmegen. He was held in the city prison for 53 days, and racked three times. During his imprisonment he wrote a letter to his fellow believers, in moving words bidding his friends a last farewell in the hope of a reunion in eternal joy. Before the courts he remained steadfast in his faith, and was therefore sentenced to die at the stake and was executed outside the Molenpoort on July 23, 1569. He endured his martyrdom with the same joyful submission. O.H., vdZ.

P. C. G. Guyot, Bijdragen tot de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1845) 26-28; Mart. Mir. D 562, E 894; ML I, 237.

Jan Blo(c)k, a linen weaver of Gent, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed by burning at the stake at Vught, Dutch province of North Brabant, on Sept. 9, 1538, with a gag in his mouth to prevent his speaking or calling. He had been arrested in August at 's-Hertogenbosch (q.v.), together with seven others, including his wife Lysken (q.v.), who was burned at the stake the next day, and Paulus van Drunen (q.v.), the bishop of the congregation, who was executed on the same day as Jan Block. (Mart. Mir. D 42, E 447; DB 1917, 189.) vdZ.

Jan Bosch van den Berge, a martyr: see Jan Durps.

Jan Boulin (Boullyn), an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, born at Hasselt in the Belgian province of Limburg, was burned at the stake on July 13, 1553, at Antwerp. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 421, 423; XIV, 20 f., No. 223.) vdZ.

Jan van Capel(le), a native of Flanders, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Vught, Dutch province of North Brabant, on Sept. 11, 1538. (Mart. Mir. D 42, E 448; DB 1917, 189.) vdZ.

Jan Christiaenz (in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, Jan N.), an Anabaptist martyr. He was a native of Zeebrugge in Flanders and lived in Brugge (q.v.). In the fall of 1561 a severe persecution befell the congregation and a large number of members were arrested. Jan Christiaenz was among them. He was burned at the stake on Dec. 11, 1561, together with six others, while on the previous day five had already suffered martyrdom. These martyrs are celebrated in a song, "Genade en Vrede moet Godvresende sijn," found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569, reprinted by Wackernagel. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 49, No. 37; Wackernagel, Lieder, 130.

Jan Claesz (John Claess in the English Mart. Mir.), an Anabaptist martyr, born at Alkmaar, baptized by Menno Simons, for whom he rendered valuable service as a bookdealer. In Antwerp he had 600 copies of Menno Simons' books printed; 200 he sold in the province of Holland and the rest he shipped for distribution to Friesland. He was a Mennonite preacher in Amsterdam; in his house religious services were held. Betrayed by Reynier Willemsz, a follower of David Joris, he was imprisoned and on Jan. 19, 1544, he was beheaded at Amsterdam with Lucas Lamberts van Beveren (q.v.), surnamed Bestevaer. Van Braght presents six testaments made by him, three to his wife, one each to his children, to his "brethren and sisters according to the flesh," and "to his entire generation," which bear witness to his faithful brotherly love and the faith of the Mennonites of that period. This is also true of the brief, moving courageous confession given before his cruel execution. The Offer des Heeren contains a song written on the death of these two men (p. 65), beginning "Het waren twee gebroeders goet, seer lieffelijck van zeden." It is also found in the Ausbund of 1583 and following editions: "Es waren zwei Brüder gut, sehr lieblich auch von Sitten." NEFF.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 257-59; Offer, 78-90; Mart. Mir. D 66-70, E 468; DB 1864, 144-46; 1899, 77; 1903, 17; 1906, 56-73 passim; 1909, 26 f.; Wolkan, Lieder, 65, 128; ML I, 359.

Jan Claesz, a cloth shearer of Gouda, Dutch province of South Holland (not of Grouw, Friesland), an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Leeuwarden, capital of Friesland, together with four others, on Feb. 8, 1539, charged with (re)baptism and "contempt of the holy sacrament and the institutions of the Holy Church." vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 746; F. H. Pasma, De Doopsgez. te Grouw (Grouw, 1930) 5, note 1.

Jan Claesz, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Weesp, an unmarried man who lived at Rarop in the Dutch province of North Holland. He cheerfully confessed his faith and was therefore burned at the stake at the Muiden castle near Amsterdam in 1569 together with Thijs Jeuriaensz. (Mart. Mir. D 480, E 823; ML II, 389.) vdZ.

Jan Claesz Cock (Jan de Cock), a Dutch Anabaptist leader, executed at The Hague on March 24, 1535, by being torn to pieces. Though not much is known about his activities, he must have been a man of great influence, for Reinier Brunt, attorney general of the Court of Holland, called him "a bishop, being a great preacher of the new sect." He was living at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, and about the spring of 1534 adopted the Anabaptist-Münsterite principles. He not only baptized a large number of persons, but was also involved in revolutionary activity, such as an assault planned on Amsterdam. He was arrested at Terheide near The Hague and before his judges named a large number of leading Anabaptists. Maybe it was for this reason that David Joris (q.v.), also betrayed by Cock, left Delft. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 213, 745; DB 1917, 112, No. 27; Mellink, Wederdopers, 77, 85, 213-18, 371.

Jan Cleeren, of Gortsleeuw, Flanders, an Anabaptist martyr, by trade a hertekens-maker(?), was drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Aug. 9, 1560. He is probably identical with Jan de Tasmaker (q.v.), found in the Offer des Heeren and later martyr books, including the Martyrs' Mirror. (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 111, 121; XIV, 30 f., No. 330.) vdZ.

Jan de Cock: see Jan Claesz Cock.

Jan Cooman (Koopman, i.e., merchant), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 5, 1569, together with Jan Hasebroek, Hans Moens, and Herman de Timmerman. Jan Cooman was sentenced to death because he had been rebaptized and held meetings in his house, in which he had exhorted those present. From this fact we may suppose that he was a preacher. (Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 382, 400; XIV, 66 f., No. 755.) vdZ.

Jan Cornelisz (called Oude Jan) of Hazerswoude (q.v.), Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 26, 1534, at Haarlem. He is called one of the principal Anabaptist leaders. Nothing more is known. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 121 (No. 124) 151; Mellink, Wederdopers, 176, 189.

Jan Cornelisz (Jonge Jan Cornelisz) of Hazerswoude (q.v.), Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at The Hague on April 15, 1534. He had been among the Anabaptists who were taken prisoner at Bergklooster (q.v.) en route to Münster (q.v.). Together with him five others suffered martyrdom. (DB 1917, 121, No. 135, 171.) vdZ.

Jan de Cudse (also de Kudse or van Cussegem), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Sept. 4, 1556, at the market place of Antwerp, Belgium. His name is mentioned in a song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 167, E 554; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 432, 435; XIV, 22 f., No. 235.

Jan Damasz, a cobbler of Monnikendam or Noordwijk, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at The Hague on April 10, 1535. He was one of the principal Dutch Anabaptist leaders, apparently of the revolutionary wing. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 113, No. 33.) vdZ.

Jan Davion, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Antwerp, Belgium, in February 1545. He was a merchant at Rijssel (Lille) in France, and an adherent of David Joris (q.v.). He was arrested at Antwerp in September 1544. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 413.) vdZ.

Jan van Delft, of Amsterdam, a fuller, was one of the first Anabaptists in the Netherlands. With nine others he was arrested and sentenced to death because of heresy and rebaptism. Like most of this group, Jan recanted. He was beheaded at The Hague on Dec. 5, 1531. The other victims were Jan Volkertsz (Trypmaker) (q.v.); Evert Jansz, a cobbler from Coesfeld in the territory of Münster, Germany; Frans Willems; Gerrit (Geryt) Meynerts, a goldsmith; Jan Hermansz (Lange Jan Houtstapelaer), born at Haarlem; Jan Gouweszn, a fuller; Thomas Janszn; Jan Thomaszn; and Vranck Willemszn. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 6; DB 1917, 159 f.; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 50, 302.) vdZ.

Jan Diericxsone (alias de Cammere), born at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, a cordmaker, was arrested at Brugge, Belgium, and beheaded there in 1568, exact date unknown, because of Anabaptism. The fact that he was not burned at the stake seems to indicate that he had recanted. (Verheyden, Brugge, 56, No. 57.) vdZ.

Jan Dirck Volbrechtsz, of Leiden, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at The Hague in the Netherlands on Aug. 16, 1544. He had been baptized in 1534 at Leiden by Cornelis Pietersz wt den Briel (q.v.). He is supposed to have been an adherent of the revolutionary Anabaptist leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 288, 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 192, 410.) vdZ.

Jan Dircksz (Jan Dircxs, Dirks, Dirksz). There are a number of Anabaptist martyrs in the Netherlands bearing this name:

(1) Jan Dirks (Dircxszoon), of Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, who was among the Anabaptists sailing from Amsterdam to Bergklooster (q.v.) en route to Münster; arrested in Bergklooster, he was sentenced to death by the Court of

Holland and executed at The Hague on April 10, 1534 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1905, 173). According to Vos (DB 1917, 170) this Jan Dircksz is identical with Jan Walen (q.v.), the date of execution being April 15, 1534. Another Anabaptist from Alkmaar, a locksmith also called Jan Dircx, who had also sailed to Bergklooster, but who had not yet been baptized, was tried April 25, 1534, and was sentenced to ask the sheriff and the alderman of Alkmaar for pardon for his trespass. (DB 1909, 14.)

(2) Jan Dirksz, of Aalsmeer, Dutch province of North Holland, in whose house Jacob van Campen (q.v.), bishop of the congregation of Amsterdam, had preached before March 1534. He was burned at the stake at The Hague on April 10, 1534.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; DB 1917, 121, No. 127; Grosheide, Verhooren, 97; Mellink, Wederdopers, 185 f.

(3) Jan Dirksz, also of Aalsmeer, a blacksmith. He was arrested before Feb. 23 and burned at the stake on April 10, 1534, the same day as the above Jan Dirksz. (Bibliography immediately above.)

(4) Jan Dirks de Lapper (cobbler), executed Oct. 29, 1538, at The Hague by beheading, being charged with heresy and Anabaptism. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 198, 475.)

None of these martyrs is found in the Mennonite martyrbooks. vdZ.

Jan van Doornik, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1569 at Antwerp and named by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766), is identical with Jan Poote (q.v.). vdZ.

Jan Dries, from Lier in Brabant, Belgium, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, on April 3, 1557. (Verheyden, Gent, 23, No. 51.) vdZ.

Jan Droochscheerder (cloth shearer, his official name being Jan Deels), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at Antwerp, Belgium, on Aug. 27, 1555. Particulars are not known. He is named in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 161, E 550; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 426, 429; XIV, 20 f., No. 288; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Jan Durps (Jan Bosch van den Berge, Berghe), an Anabaptist martyr, a weaver, was burned at the stake at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, on Sept. 23, 1559. He served the congregation "by reading as well as admonition," and thus came to the attention of the government. He was arraigned as a heretic and Anabaptist. Before the clergy, who tried to lead him to recantation, as well as before the government, he openly confessed his faith. In order to bring Durps back to the Catholic Church in spite of all, the affair was turned over to the Inquisition. This attempt was also futile. In spite of torture he remained steadfast until his death at the stake, Sept. 23, 1559, at Maastricht, having just before his death spoken to the assembled crowd about his faith. (Mart. Mir. D 258, E 630 f.; DJ 1939, 59-61; ML I, 248.) O.H., vdZ.

Jan Echtwerken (Egtwerken, Egtwarken), from "Krommeniersdijk in Waterlandt" (Dutch province of North Holland), an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at The Hague in April 1534. (Van Braght, Mart. Mir. D 62, E 465, erroneously gives the date as 1542.) K. Vos suggests that Jan Echtwerken is identical with Jan Walen (q.v.), who is the same person as Jan Dirksz (q.v.), burned at the stake at The Hague on April 15, 1534. (DB 1917, 170; ML I, 501.) vdZ.

Jan van Eenhoorne, born at Landegem, Flanders, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on March 12, 1562. (Verheyden, Gent, 27, No. 81.) vdZ.

Jan Everts, an Anabaptist martyr, a shoemaker by trade, born at Deventer, was seized with his wife Anneken at Arnemuiden, not far from Middelburg, capital of the Dutch province of Zeeland. He confessed that he had been baptized at The Hague by a weaver, Meynart (probably Meindert of Emden). For four years he had neither been at the confessional or at communion; he had no intention of going, for he disregarded the commands of the Catholic Church. Concerning the sacrament of the altar, he did not believe that God was in it, but that it served only as a memorial of the suffering and death of our Lord. Any ordinary person who had been baptized upon his faith could distribute it. The Son of God received no flesh from Mary, for whatever is of the flesh is sinful, and God's Son was without sin. He confessed that he had, to be sure, heard of Jan Beukelszoon van Leyden, who was in Münster, "but what he is or does there is unknown to him except that he has heard tell that he is king there." On the rack Jan Everts betrayed a number of Anabaptists in Amsterdam, The Hague, and Delft. After he had been baptized he traveled about, going first to Amsterdam, where he was arrested, but was released upon recanting; then he lived in the bishopric of Münster and afterwards in the city of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, where he married Anneken "only with a promise, giving her half of a broken coin, not marrying her according to the ordinance of the Church, which seemed to him to be of no value." He died faithful, only 26 years of age. The execution took place at The Hague on April 19, 1535, by beheading.

His wife Anneken, also called Tanneken, who had been baptized at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, by Obbe Philips (q.v.), was pregnant when she was arrested; she had to stay in prison until the birth of the child. What happened to her is not known. Neff, vdZ.

K. R. Pekelharing, Bijdragen voor de Gesch. der Hervorming in Zeeland, in Archief Zeeuwsch Genootschap VI (Middelburg, 1866) 19-24; DB 1908, 5-7; Mellink, Wederdopers, 91, 207-11, 319 f.; ML I, 616.

Jan Evertsz van Wij, of Amsterdam, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Amsterdam on Dec. 31, 1534. He had been baptized by Jacob van Campen (q.v.) after he had not attended the Catholic Church for a number of years. He was in prison for about six weeks. The city government tried to protect him from capital punishment, but they were apparently compelled by the Court of Holland to put him to death. He seems to have belonged to the revolutionary type of Anabaptism. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 13, 35-43.) vdZ.

Jan-Evertsvolk, followers of Jan Evertsz (q.v.), preacher of the Flemish congregation at Haarlem (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, numbering 728 baptized members, who in 1681 formed a separate congregation, at first holding services at the Bakenessergracht, and after 1684 in a new meetinghouse at the Kruisstraat. In 1747 the Jan-Everts group, who had especially in the first decades been very conservative, dissolved, its members joining the main Flemish congregation. (DB 1863, 147 f.) vdZ.

Jan Fasseau, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, a native of Griory in the Belgian province of Hainaut (q.v.), was beheaded in 1555 or 1556 at Bergen (Mons), capital of Hainaut. (ML II, 284.) J.L.

Jan Fransz, from Calcar, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Amsterdam on Sept. 15, 1534, because he had participated in the journey to Münster, having been arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745.) vdZ.

Jan van Geelen (Jan van Geel, Johan van Geyl, Hansken van Gelen, once called Hansken Lukener), a partisan of Jan van Leyden (q.v.), a former soldier, a resident of Deventer, went from there to Münster early in 1534 and became the doorman of Queen Divara. On Dec. 24, 1534, he left the city with three companions, equipped with money and a thousand copies of Rothmann's Van der Wraecke (revenge) for distribution. In the Netherlands he propagandized for the cause of the Münsterite kingdom and everywhere handed out money for the purchase of arms. For he was sent to the Netherlands by Jan van Leyden specifically to create revolution there in order to detract attention from Münster. Early in January 1535 he came to Amsterdam. Here the "banner of justice" was to fly, i.e., the signal for revolution given. But among the Anabaptists he met resistance. Their bishop, Jacob van Campen (q.v.), would not be persuaded. Also the conference at Spaarndam, where 32 Anabaptist preachers met in the middle of December 1534 or early in January 1535, rejected his plans. At the end of January 1535 he was in Antwerp, Belgium, where he had a number of adherents; then he became active in the Dutch provinces of Friesland, Groningen, and Utrecht, where he succeeded in stirring up sedition (Olde Klooster near Bolsward, Warfum, and in the territory of IJsselstein). At Amsterdam he even contacted Pieter van Montfoort, a young priest, who was the ambassador of the Spanish government of Brussels (April 1535), and through deceit and cunning he obtained safe conduct from him to continue his criminal activity. He sent word to his wife Fenneken at Deventer that unless she had herself baptized he would disown her. She complied, and on April 17 suffered a martyr's death by drowning in the IJssel. Van Geelen's efforts to create revolution throughout the Netherlands had but small success. He was partially successful in Friesland, where the Oldeklooster (q.v.) was taken by a band of revolutionaries, but in Groningen at Warfum (q.v.) a similar attempt failed. In South Holland, where van Geelen had a number of followers, especially in the small town of Benschop (q.v.), plans were continued to attack Woerden, Oudewater, and Leiden, but both because of lack of organization and insufficient numbers these grand revolutionary plans completely failed. He planned a major attack on Amsterdam, secretly calling the Anabaptists from everywhere in the Netherlands. But most of the Anabaptists were not revolution-minded, and stayed at home. Van Geelen, in bitter disappointment, nevertheless pressed the attack. On the night of May 10, 1535, followed only by 32 men, he assaulted the city hall of Amsterdam. Jan van Geelen himself was killed in the storm of the city hall, and the survivors were all executed. NEFF, vdZ.

C. A. Cornelius, Historische Arbeiten (Leipzig, 1899); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 96; Grosheide, Verhooren, 15-21, 59-64; DB 1875, 63; 1899, 1-19; 1919, 5, 9; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim, see Index; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index; C. A. Cornelius, Die Niederländischen Wiedertäufer während der Belagerung Münsters 1534 bis 1535 (Leipzig, 1869); ML II, 41.

Jan Geertsz (Geers, Gheerts, Gheertszoen, Gheertsen, Gerritsz, Gerritsen, and after his trade also Jan Ketelaer), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, a native of Delft, province of South Holland. He was a coppersmith living on the island of Texel, where he was baptized in 1559. His wife was able to visit him in prison at The Hague. On Dec. 15, 1564, he was burned at the stake in The Hague. In 1566 a booklet appeared containing letters written by Maeyken Boosers and Jan Gerrits' testament to his brethren (he was evidently a preacher) and the first part of his letter to the "Lutheran pope." A copy of this very rare booklet is found in the Library of the University of Gent, Belgium. The second part was printed in the martyrbook of 1617, known as the Groot Martelaersboek. The booklet of 1566 was reprinted in Het Offer des Heeren of 1570 with a letter "to his acquaintances" and a song about him, "Tis een periculose tijt" (It is a perilous time). He knew Latin. His letter to the Lutheran preacher is very rude in tone. His will reveals that he was married and his mother was still living. From prison he sent nutshells, spices, and cloves to be used in his memory. From his third letter it is seen that he was tortured in prison, that he attended school in Delft during the great fire there (May 3, 1536), and that he owned a copy of Menno Simons' Van de nieuwe Creature, as well as of Dirk Philips' Van de geestelijke Restitution. K.V.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 407, 744 f.; Offer, 393-410; Mart. Mir. D 317, E 680; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML II, 83.

Jan van Genck (van Ghenck, van Gink), an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Amsterdam. This martyr is the same person as Jan van Ghenck Jr., who lived at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, in 1528 and was fined there because he had some heretical books. Henric Rol (q.v.) stayed in his house in September 1534. At this time meetings of the newly founded congregation of Maastricht, as of heretics before, were held in his house and sometimes baptism was administered here. Jan van Genck seems to have been a deacon. By trade he was a shoemaker. At the end of 1534 or the beginning of 1535 Jan and his father, also called Jan, and a brother Frans, all with their wives, fled from Maastricht. Apparently they went to Amsterdam. Nothing further is known of the father or of Frans. Jan van Genck Jr. was arrested in February and beheaded on March 6, 1535, at Amsterdam, with a number of others, among whom was Hendrik Biesman (q.v.), also from Maastricht. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 412, E 763; Grosheide, Verhooren, 53; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 84 f.; ML II, 389.

Jan (Jehan) van Gendtbrugge, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded before the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, on July 19, 1535. Particulars are lacking. (Verheyden, Gent, 2, No. 4.) vdZ.

Jan Gerrits, an elder of Emden: see Gerrits, Jan.

Jan Gerritsz, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Geertsz.

Jan Gerroltsma, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed on April 14, 1533, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, because he had been rebaptized. His daughters Griete and Femme were executed there for the same reason on the following day. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden 1914, 229.) vdZ.

Jan Ghyselinck (Jan de Lapper, i.e., cobbler), an Anabaptist martyr, died on March 15 or 16, 1569, at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, during his torture. (The records say "Op den Steen doot gepijnt.") His corpse was hanged as a deterrent example.

Jan, born at Brugge and previously living at Dambrugge, had been in Antwerp about one year when he was arrested with other members at a meeting of the congregation held in the house of Jan Poote (q.v.). Jan then was 38 years of age and a widower. He had been baptized upon his faith four years before by Elder Hendrik van Arnhem (q.v.). He played an important part in the congregational life at Antwerp, being a weetdoener, i.e., the man who announced to the members the place and hour of the meetings. The meetings were held at irregular times and different places, in order to evade (as far as possible) being surprised by the police. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 353, 367, 414; XIV, 64 f., No. 718.) vdZ.

Jan Gouwensz: see Jan van Delft.

Jan Grendel, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium, came from Oudewater to Goes, Dutch province of Zeeland, in 1562. He was arrested the day after his arrival and put to death after a long imprisonment, the execution taking place before Easter 1563. Neither the exact date nor the manner of execution is known, nor are any other particulars about him known. (Mart. Mir. D 298, E 663; ML II, 172.) vdZ.

Jan van Gulik (Johann von Jülich), an Anabaptist leader, of whose activities nothing is known, was present in 1536 at an Anabaptist meeting in Bocholt (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany. The field of his activity was Gelre (q.v.). (DB 1919, 193; ML II, 239.) vdZ.

Jan van Halteren, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded June 2, 1539, at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. Here he was arrested in the house of Lambrecht Duppijns (q.v.). He was originally from the Dutch province of Utrecht and obviously an adherent of David Joris (q.v.). vdZ.

Bijdr. en Mededeelingen Historisch Genootschap Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 200 f., 208, 210 f., 218.

Jan van Hasebroek (Haesbrouck), an Anabaptist martyr, apparently a native of Hasebrouck in French Flanders. He was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 5, 1569, because he had been rebaptized. While in prison he wrote three letters to his wife, which reveal his great love for his family, as well as his strong faith. From the wealth of his knowledge of the Bible he comforted his wife and admonished her to be faithful unto death, which is followed by eternal joy. He urged her to take good care of their two small children and teach them the way of truth, that at the judgment they might stand at God's right hand. He told her that a letter coming to them fell into the hands of the prison master and caused them much grief. He gave her a sign to use in writing to him to indicate that she had received his letter. He sent greetings from his fellow prisoners Jan Koopman and his servant Hansken. NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 415, 419-24; E 766, 770-74; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 382, 401; XIV, 66 f., No. 756; ML II, 262.

Jan van Hasselt, an Anabaptist leader of Amsterdam, who had much influence in a group called after him the Jan van Hasselt Sect. He was apparently also active in Rotterdam and Antwerp. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 115.) vdZ.

Jan Helleman, an Anabaptist martyr, burned alive at Brugge, Belgium, on Jan. 16, 1552. Particulars are lacking. (Verheyden, Brugge, 36, No. 17.) vdZ.

Jan Hendricks (Heyndricx), an Anabaptist martyr, strangled and burned at the stake on Feb. 21, 1559, at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, together with Mayken Daniels and Andries van Laerbeke. They had all three fled from Flanders because of their faith and were arrested July 15, 1558. The city government of Middelburg questioned the Catholic priest at Roesselare, Flanders, about them, indicating that they had lived there. Jan was a native of Waert (Weerden) and was by trade a locksmith. vdZ.

K. R. Pekelharing, Bijdr. voor de Gesch. van de Hervorming in Zeeland, in Archief Zeeuwsch Genootschap VI (1866) 38-40.

Jan Hendricksen (Hendriksz), from Zwartewaal, Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, living at Delfshaven near Rotterdam, the steersman of a herring-drifter, was burned at the stake at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Feb. 5, 1572, with Maerten Jansz Corendrager. He was held in prison for more than a year. While in prison he wrote a moving letter of farewell to his wife, urging her to continue faithfully in the doctrine. He wrote in a similar vein to Maerten Jansz, his fellow prisoner, and also to his brother and sister. His report of his repeated cross-examinations shows an amazing knowledge of the Bible and a firmness of faith not usual in an unlettered man. His death is the subject of the hymn "Verhoort ons droevich claghen" (Hear our sad lament), which is found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, 1578 and later editions. (Offer, 558-62; Mart. Mir. D 606, E 932; Wolkan, Lieder, 69; ML II, 282.) NEFF, vdZ.

Jan Hendriks (Heynricxz), a mason from IJsselstein (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 12, 1535, at Utrecht in the Netherlands. He admitted that he had often lodged Anabaptist bishops in his house. He was familiar with the revolutionary plans to make an attack on Amsterdam. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 104; Berigten Hist. Genootschap Utrecht IV, 2 (1851) 1; DB 1917, 122, No. 162; Mellink, Wederdopers, 76, 81, 200, 235.

Jan Hendriksz of Utrecht, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, who had been baptized by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), was at the age of 28 sentenced to die at the stake on March 28, 1558, at Rotterdam, with Peter van Eynoven (q.v.), Evert Nouts (q.v.), and two women, Annetgen Antheunisdochter and Stijntgen Jansdochter. The execution, however, miscarried. Its slow and horrible progress caused the crowd of spectators to become so greatly excited that they violently freed the victims. Jan Hendriksz, unconscious, was taken to a house near by and escaped. A song commemorating this execution, beginning "In den jare vijfthienhondert, En achtenvijftig claer," is found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569. The Rotterdam court records show that three days after this event Guert Willemszoon, who had taken part in the liberation of the above victims of persecution, was sentenced to death. NEFF, vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 384-86; Mart. Mir. D 192-96, E 575; I. M. J. Hoog, De Martelaren der Hervorming in Nederland (Schiedam, 1885) 31-33, 237-41; Wackernagel, Lieder, 135; ML II, 282.

Jan Henricxz of Delft, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on Nov. 8, 1544, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, because of Anabaptism. He was a follower of David Joris (q.v.) and had received from Cleve two booklets written by David Joris. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 217, 414.) vdZ.

Jan Hermansz (Jan de Houtstapelaer, or Lange Jan): see Jan van Delft.

Jan Hesselsz, a cooper from Dokkum, Dutch province of Friesland, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Leeuwarden, Friesland, on Feb. 11, 1539. Particulars are not known. vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Gesch. der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Jan Heyndricx, a cabinetmaker of "Yertsele by shertogenbosche," an Anabaptist martyr, likely a follower of David Joris, was beheaded on Jan. 7, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, together with ten others. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; DB 1899, 158-60; 1917, 160-67.) vdZ.

Jan Hulle, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1561 at Ieper (Yperen) in Belgium. The information of van Braght (Mart. Mir.), who states that he died faithfully, does not contain any particulars. Apparently Jan Hulle was a victim of the inquisitor Titelman (q.v.), who in 1561 severely persecuted the congregation of Ieper and other Flemish towns. If the name should be Jan van Hulle, this martyr very likely belonged to the Mennonite van Hulle family, which was found in Gent and Antwerp in Belgium, and whose descendants in the 17th and 18th centuries lived at Haarlem in the Netherlands (see Denys van Hulle) (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 656.) vdZ.

Jan Jacobsz, a martyr: see Hans Jacopsens.

Jan Jacobsz (Jacobssen) of Amsterdam, called De Noorman, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on May 15, 1535, at Amsterdam, because he had been rebaptized. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 412, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 70-72; Mellink, Wederdopers, 144.

Jan Jacobs(z) of Benschop (q.v.), Dutch province of Utrecht, an Anabaptist martyr in whose house baptism had been administered and who persevered in his "heresy," was burned at the stake on May 11, 1534, at Amsterdam. (DB 1917, 121, No. 141; Mellink, Wederdopers, 233.) vdZ.

Jan Jacobsz Hayesz, a Dutch elder and leader of the Janjacobsgezinden: see Jacobs(z), Jan.

Jan Jansz, surnamed Ghyphen(?), a tailor from Hamm near Wesel, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on Jan. 7, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, because of rebaptism. He was probably a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; DB 1899, 158-60; 1917, 160-67.) vdZ.

Jan Jansz van den Berg (Berch) from the territory of Cleve, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Amsterdam on July 8, 1539. He had been baptized at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, in 1538 by Claes "with the crippled hand." vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 211; Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 143, 307.

Jan Jansz Brant, an Anabaptist martyr, who in his youth had led a dissolute life. After his conversion both he and his wife joined the Mennonite Church. They were natives of Zuidland on the South Holland island of Putten, and were arrested on Nov. 9, 1559, at Geervliet on the same island. Jan Jansz remained steadfast and was sentenced to death on Nov. 29, 1559. The execution did not take place immediately after the sentence. Apparently this delay was caused by negotiations for a ransom, which, however, were fruitless. The date of the execution is not known. It took place at the castle of Geervliet (not at The Hague as Bibliographie and also ML report). Jan Jansz was bound in a sack and thrown from the bridge of the castle into the moat. When the sack burst open, the executioner pushed him under the water with a pole. This cruel death is celebrated in a song found both in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1563 and following editions) and the Tweede Liedeboeck (1583) beginning "Hoort Vrienden, ich schenck u een liet" (Hear, friends, I give you a song). The account found in the later martyrbooks, including van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, is taken from this song. It is not clear what happened to Jan Jansz's wife. She was still in prison when the song was written after her husband's death. NEFF, vdZ.

Offer, 550-52; Mart. Mir. D 243, E 617; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 71; ML I, 256.

Jan Jansz van Calckeren, a native of Calcar, territory of Cleve, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on March 12, 1535, at Utrecht in the Netherlands. He was a barber and surgeon and belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 103; DB 1917, 122, No. 161; Mellink, Wederdopers, 85, 234.) vdZ.

Jan Jansz Schot (Jan Jansz Schilder, i.e., painter) was an influential leader of the Anabaptists at Rotterdam (q.v.). He had been baptized in December 1533 by Jan van Leyden. After much activity he was apprehended and imprisoned at The Hague. Forsaking his faith, he was not burned at the stake but beheaded. This execution took place on April 10 at The Hague (not Rotterdam as de Hoop Scheffer suggests). After his death his widow Maryken continued to lodge Anabaptists. According to K. Vos, Schot was originally from Brussels, and his wife, also of Brussels, was an illegitimate daughter of Johanna van der Gheenst and Emperor Charles V. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 744 f.; de Hoop Scheffer, Gesch. der Kerkhervorming (Amsterdam, 1873) 532; K. Vos, Gesch. der Doopsgez. gemeente te Rotterdam (Rotterdam, 1907) 5; DB 1905, 169-75; 1917, 115, No. 49.

Jan Jansz de Timmerman (Jan Pouwelszn van Dircxhorn), an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Amsterdam on May 8, 1534, together with Gheryt van Campen because of revolutionary Anabaptist activity. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 26; Mellink, Wederdopers, 108-10, 160.) vdZ.

Jan Jansze (Hansken Schalijdecker) from Tongeren in Belgium, an Anabaptist martyr, baptized Feb. 9, 1535, by Damas (q.v.) at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, was beheaded in 1536 at Zierikzee, same province. Particulars were not available. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 744 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 317.) vdZ.

Jan Jantsz of Benschop (q.v.), Dutch province of Utrecht, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced March 11, 1534, by the Court of Holland to be executed by burning at the stake because he had been rebaptized and had been among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam en route to Münster (q.v.). The execution took place on March 24, 1534. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 744 f.) vdZ.

Jan Joosten van Goedereede (Jan Jooste) of Goeree, Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded at The Hague Feb. 10, 1534. He had previously been a Catholic priest in the Dutch province of Zeeland, joined the Anabaptists, being baptized by Gerrit Boeckbinder in 1531 and lived in Amsterdam three years. Here he married and was ordained a preacher by Jacob van Campen. With eight fellow believers he was arrested. At this cross-examination he admitted that Gerrit Boeckbinder had baptized him; he then was sent with Jan Matthys from Haarlem and Jacob van Campen to Wormer and Westzaan, where he preached and baptized seven or eight persons. When he was asked whether the Anabaptists kept a list of baptized persons, he replied that he knew nothing of it; their promises were Yea and Nay; they called themselves Bondgenoten (q.v.), the name of the adherents of Melchior Hofmann. NEFF.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 11, 744 f.; DB 1907, 41; 1917, 115, No. 53; L. Keller, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer . . . (Münster, 1880) 153; C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs (Leipzig, 1865) 383, 387; Mellink, Wederdopers, 105, 156, 207, 351 f.; ML II, 130 f., 432.

Jan Kanneghieter of Coesfeld in Westphalia, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on June 1, 1535, at Amsterdam, on the charge of being rebaptized and having partaken in the attack on the Amsterdam town hall, May 10-11, 1535. He was tried on May 11 and 24. Jan admitted that he had been at the place before the town hall when the attack was launched, but he had not joined and had no weapon. Seeing what was taking place, he had left. Jan had been baptized by Obbe de Vriess, i.e., Obbe Philips (q.v.) outside the town of Dokkum in Friesland. Before he came to Amsterdam, he had stayed in Groningen. Severe torture "with rope and rod" on May 28 did not succeed in bringing forth new particulars. He apparently did not approve the use of weapons. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 65 f.) vdZ.

Jan Kerbusch, an otherwise unknown Mennonite preacher, who in 1566 preached and baptized at St. Winnoxbergen and other towns in the south of Flanders in Belgium. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Jan (de) Koopman (merchant), an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Cooman.

Jan van Leyden, also called Jan (Johan) Beuckelsz or Bockelszoon, Anabaptist leader at Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany. He was born at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland. He was at first a tailor, then a merchant, and later an innkeeper; as a rhetorician he liked to act the part of King David. He was in many ways a highly gifted man, but his conceit and his self-love betrayed him. Because he became an influential man with a large and devoted following, he founded an Anabaptist government at Münster, became king of this New Jerusalem, reigning there with absolute supremacy more than a year. Jan van Leyden, whose character was a mixture of shyness, ambition, and maniacal wickedness and yet not without germs of religious feeling, has been an enthralling mystery to the present. Certainly he was much more than an ordinary adventurer. His conduct and acts, his fanaticism, and his immorality did great harm to the growing Anabaptist movement of 1534 and the following years, first because he misled a large number of peaceful Anabaptists, especially of the Netherlands, winning them over to his revolutionary view that the kingdom of God was to be established on earth by the uprooting of the "ungodly," which included the use of weapons; secondly, because the world and especially the rulers of that time and later turned away with horror from Anabaptism, ignoring all distinctions between the outrageous disciples of Jan van Leyden and the peaceful followers of Obbe Philips and Menno Simons. Until the end of the 16th century the Dutch government was filled with fear that the Anabaptists might repeat the revolution of Münster, and non-Mennonite authors, Roman Catholic as well as Lutheran and Reformed, even in the 17th century insisted that the governments take action against the Mennonites in order to save the world from the horrors of Münster; the legend that Anabaptism and Mennonitism is derived from Jan van Leyden and Münster continues to this day, even in the books of serious historians. All this is the consequence of the deeds of Jan van Leyden, the evil genius of early Anabaptism.

In November 1533 Jan van Leyden joined the Anabaptists, being baptized by Jan Matthysz of Haarlem (q.v.). Soon his house in Leiden became a center of Anabaptist activity. Cornelis Pieters wt den Briel (q.v.) and other leaders preached and baptized there. In December 1533 Jan van Leyden was sent out by Jan Matthysz as an apostle to preach the Gospel, and first visited Alkmaar, Hoorn, Enkhuizen, then Den Briel and Rotterdam. Until this time the Anabaptist views of Jan van Leyden did not much differ from those of other Dutch leaders, who preached the coming of the kingdom of God, which the faithful had to wait and pray for, but under the influence of Jan Matthysz he abandoned the peaceful principles.

On Jan. 13, 1534, he arrived in Münster, where he had paid a short visit in July 1533. He soon obtained much influence in Münster, though then other leaders like Rothmann (q.v.) and especially Jan Matthysz, who came to Münster in February 1534, predominated. But after the death of Jan Matthysz at Easter 1534, Jan van Leyden's influence increased and before July 1534 he reigned with absolute power. He organized the defense of the city against the army of Franz von Waldeck, Bishop of Münster, who had laid siege to the city. Communism of goods had been practiced since February 1534; in July of this year polygamy was introduced and in early September Jan van Leyden was appointed King of Zion (or New Jerusalem). In the meanwhile Jan van Leyden tried to strengthen the defense forces also by inviting the Anabaptists of the Netherlands and elsewhere, first by promises, then by threats that the world would perish and only those in the holy city of Münster would be saved. With much exertion and a surprising skill he defended the city against the episcopal army until the city was taken on June 25, 1535.

Jan van Leyden, who had hidden in a cellar, was found and arrested. For a few months he was sent from one German dynastic residence to another as a curiosity. Then he was sentenced to death and executed in a very cruel way at Münster on Jan. 22, 1536. There is a portrait of Jan van Leyden in copper engraving by H. Aldegrever, and an oil painting both of Jan and Queen Divara (q.v.) by Herman tom Ring (now in the Museum of Schwerin, Germany). vdZ.

Some of the abundant literature dealing both with Jan van Leyden and the Münster period of Anabaptism in general is recorded in the article on Münster (q.v.); see also H. Detmer, Johann von Leiden, seine Persönlichkeit und seine Stellung im Münsterischen Reiche (Münster, 1903); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, especially 78-185, passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 52, 82, 141; H. v. Schubert, Der Kommunismus der Wiedertäufer in Münster und seine Quellen (Heidelberg, 1919); C. A. Cornelius, Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster, 1853). The numerous novels and dramas which have been written on this subject are surveyed by W. Rauch, Johann von Leyden, der König von Sion, in der Dichtung (Münster, 1912), and Hugo Hermsen, Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster in der deutschen Dichtung (Stuttgart, 1913); ML I, 240.

Jan Lievensz of Gent, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 18, 1550, at Antwerp, Belgium. This Jan Lievensz, of whom no further particulars were available, is not the same person, also called Jan, to whom reference is made in the song "Ick sal met vreugden singen" (I will sing with joy), of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, as Bibliographie II, 707, No. 338 reports. The Jan celebrated in the song is likely Jan de Oude Kleerkoper (q.v.). (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 389, 392; XIV, 18 f., No. 191.) vdZ.

Jan de Lindwercker, a martyr: see Jan van de Walle.

Jan Lubberts, an otherwise unknown Dutch Mennonite elder, who (according to Carel van Gent) was ordained by Dirk Philipsz. (BRN VII, 558.) vdZ.

Jan Lucas: see Luies, Jan.

Jan-Lucasvolk, a group of Mennonites in the Netherlands in the 17th century, followers of Jan Lucas or Luies (q.v.). They were the forerunners of the Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.). vdZ.

Jan van Lyere, from Lier in the Belgian province of Brabant, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned Sept. 6, 1561, at Antwerp in the Steen castle. His wife Lijntgen (Lijnken van Dale) (q.v.) was drowned at Antwerp on Nov. 14, 1562. Jan, a native of Brussels and a carpet weaver by trade, served the congregation as a deacon. A song celebrating Jan and Lijntgen is found in Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and inserted in Wackernagel, Lieder. It begins: "Lieve broeders, ick groet u met sanghen" (Dear brethren, I greet you with songs). vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 124, 133; XIV, 30 f., No. 344; Wackernagel, Lieder, 140; Wolkan, Lieder, 72.

Jan (Jehan) Maes, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on March 16, 1565, at Rijssel (Lille) in France. Jan, who was born at Bollezeele in Flanders and lived in Hondschoote (q.v.), was arrested on March 7, 1563, at Halewijn (q.v.), while he was visiting the preacher Jan de Swarte (q.v.). A number of the Mennonites of Halewijn, including Jan de Swarte, were also arrested by the inquisitor Titelman (q.v.). They all suffered martyrdom at Rijssel. (Mart. Mir. D 299, E 664; ML II, 711.) vdZ.

Jan Matthijsz van Haarlem (Matthys, Matthyssen, Mathis), an Anabaptist leader, originally a baker of Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. He had been baptized by Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), but left the way of love and peace preached by Hofmann to enter upon a course of hatred and violence against the ungodly. He did not follow Hofmann's command to wait two years before baptizing, but proclaimed himself a prophet sent by God to establish the kingdom by force. He left his wife and took another, Dieuwertgen, who after his death became the chief spouse of Jan van Leyden (q.v.) at Münster. She was then called Queen Divara. In 1533 he appeared in Amsterdam and won some followers there, whom he sent out two by two as apostles to proclaim to the world that Enoch had appeared and that the millennium was near its fulfillment. Two of them, Gerrit Boeckbinder (Gerrit tom Kloster) and Jan van Leyden (Johan Bockelson), who had been baptized by Jan Matthijsz, arrived at Münster in Westphalia on Jan. 13, 1534. This city now became the New Zion, elected to initiate the kingdom of God. In February Matthijsz also arrived, and the rebellious reign of the Dutch adventurers began. On April 5 Matthijsz met an adventurous death. In the midst of a merry company he arose, allegedly seized by divine inspiration, and cried, "Father, not as I will, but as Thou wilt." He immediately left the festivities; it had been revealed to him that he should go out to meet the enemy. On the next day (Easter) he chose ten or twenty companions and marched out of the city to its besiegers. He was surrounded and died fighting bravely. (See also Münster.) NEFF.

C. A. Cornelius, Historische Arbeiten vornehmlich zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1899); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 47; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim; DB 1919, 213-17; ML III, 60.

Jan Matthysz (Matthijsz) van Middelburg (also called Jan Matthijsz Blaeuwaert), a native of Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, a goldsmith, was an Anabaptist leader and martyr. As a preacher he was active in 1534 in Middelburg and the island of Walcheren; then he disappeared from Zeeland, where his possessions were confiscated. In the first half of 1535 he stayed in Amsterdam, where he and Jacob van Campen were the principal leaders of the large congregation. Here he forsook the peaceful Anabaptist view to become a follower of the Münsterite principles of Jan van Leyden. Together with Jan van Geelen (q.v.), the Münsterite ambassador, he prepared the attack on Amsterdam, May 10-11, 1535; the assault miscarried and a large number of Anabaptists were apprehended; Jan Matthysz, however, was not among those imprisoned; he must have escaped. In a revolt at Hazerswoude, Dutch province of South Holland, on Dec. 31, 1535, a Jan Matthijsz was found, who likely is identical with Jan Matthijsz van Middelburg. In early 1536 he lived in England. In the summer of 1536 he attended a meeting of Anabaptist leaders at Boekholt (Bocholt in Westphalia, Germany), where he defended the peaceful principles of Obbe Philips against the Münsterite leaders. Hence he must have been converted from his revolutionary views to his former peaceful grounds. Returning to England, he was arrested there and put to death on Nov. 29, 1538, at London. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 97, 145; Grosheide, Verhooren, 48, 193; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim; DB 1909, 17, 25; ML III, 60.

Jan van der Mersch, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Kortrijk (Courtrai), was burned at the stake on June 7, 1569, at Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium. He had been present at two meetings held in early 1569 in the vicinity of Kortrijk and had been a member of the congregation since 1566. His imprisonment lasted for 152 days. Jan van der Mersch, whose property was confiscated, apparently belonged to the van der Meersch (van Meersch, van der Mersch) family, some Mennonite members of which emigrated to the Netherlands in the following decades. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 40, No. 30.) vdZ.

Jan Mudder, an Anabaptist living at Appingedam, Dutch province of Groningen, a merchant, whose house in early 1534 was a center of Anabaptism, where a number of Anabaptists were baptized. Here Obbe Philips (q.v.) ordained his brother Dirk Philips (q.v.) elder in 1534. vdZ.

P. G. Bos, "De Wederdopers in Groningerland," Groningsche Volksalmanak 1909, 161.

Jan N., an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Christiaenz.

Jan de Nayer, a nickname of Jan van Leyden (q.v.), found in V.P., Successio Anabaptistica (BRN VII, 86). The word Nayer means "stitcher," because the later king of Münster had originally been a tailor. vdZ.

Jan Neulen, a citizen of Visschersweert, south of Roermond in the Dutch province of Limburg. The village belonged at that time to the Montfort district of the duchy of Gelre (q.v.). A circle of Anabaptists lived here, to whom Menno Simons preached in 1544 or 1545. On the morning following the preaching Jan Neulen took Menno by boat down the Maas to Roermond. About the same time Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.), visiting the Mennonites in this region, preached in Jan Neulen's home. Neulen was seized and tried at Montfort on Nov. 10, 1550. His house was confiscated, but he apparently escaped with his life. vdZ.

Nederl. Archief v. Kerkgesch. (n.s.) X (1913) 255, 264-66; DB 1890, 54; Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 2, 86 f., 242; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 307, note 1, 328, 330 f.; ML III, 306.

Jan (Hans) van Ophoorn (Ophooren, Ophoren, Ophorn), a Mennonite elder of Antwerp, Belgium, fled from the city and was then banished forever on April 10, 1570 (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 448, 451). By this time he was already living at Emden, East Friesland, Germany, from where he traveled to Cleve and Cologne in October 1569 to settle a schism in the Cleve congregation (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 466). He was a fanatic and at the conferences of Mennonite leaders held at Emden and Hoorn in 1578 he opposed the plan to make peace among the Dutch Mennonites, who were divided by schisms. By his stubbornness he prevented the "Humstervrede" (q.v.), a partial reconciliation achieved in 1574, from evolving more widely. He was so severe in keeping "the church without spot or wrinkle," that he is said to have banned not only all other Flemish and Frisian congregations, but also the members of his own congregations with the exception of his wife and himself. Ophoorn died in poverty at Norden. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 466; V. P., Successio Anabaptistica; BRN VII, 69 f., 551 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 428, 433; ML III, 306.

Jan de Oude Kleerkoper, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 21 or 22, 1551 (van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, erroneously reports October 2), together with Peter Bruynen, Pleunis van Hoevele, Martin du Petitz, and Jacob Peeters. About their imprisonment we are informed by two letters of Pieter Bruynen, found in the Offer des Heeren. Their names are celebrated in a hymn, "Tot lof des Vaders, soons, heyligen geest" (To the glory of Father, Son and Holy Ghost), found in the Offer and included in the Ausbund (q.v.). The confession of Jan de Oude Kleerkoper is found in the Offer and following martyrbooks, including the Martyrs' Mirror. From the records published by P. Génard in Antwerpsch Archievenblad it appears that his official name was Jan van der Wouwe(re)n, born at Westerloo, Flanders; he was charged with the crime of rebaptism and persisting in his "heresy." vdZ.

Offer, 177-86; Mart. Mir. D. 128, 130 f., E 500; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 405, 415; XIV, 18 f., No. 208; ML II, 389.

Jan Paeuw (Pauw, Pou), an Anabaptist martyr, a maker of blocks for ships. He was a deacon in the Amsterdam congregation, preached nonresistance, condemning all use of force, as opposed to Münsterite teaching. In his home meetings were often held and baptism administered, even after his arrest, which occurred at the end of December 1534. On the rack he betrayed what he wanted to withhold. On March 6, 1535, he was beheaded at Amsterdam with eight brethren. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 212, E 763; Grosheide, Verhooren, 45-53; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 89, 137, 151, 177; ML III, 338.

Jan (van) Parijs, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 30, 1568, on the Veerle square at Gent, Belgium, together with Pieter Aelbrechts (Pierken van Cleve), Hendrik Maelschap, and Laurens Pietersz, while at the same time seven non-Mennonite iconoclasts, who had destroyed the icons of saints in the Catholic churches, were hanged at the Veerle square. Jan van Parijs was born at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, in 1565 or 1566; he had received baptism on his faith; by profession he was a weaver. His name is found in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer, ende twee en tsestich mede" of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 367, E 723; Verheyden, Gent, 42, No. 136; ML II, 389.) vdZ.

Jan Pennewaerts, from Leuven, Belgium (or Loenen, Dutch province of Utrecht), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Amsterdam on March 20, 1549, together with five brethren and two sisters. The names of these martyrs are celebrated in the hymn "Tis nu schier al vervult ons broeders getal" (the number of our brethren now is nearly complete), found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1566 and later Dutch hymnbooks. Jan had been baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 82, E 483; ML III, 342.) vdZ.

Jan Pieter Eggesz, of Krommeniedijk, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 26, 1534, at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. In the sentence he is called "one of the principal preachers and baptizers." He was one of the Anabaptists who had sailed from Amsterdam to Bergklooster (q.v.) en route to Münster. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 744 f.; DB 1917, 115, No. 54, 151.) vdZ.

Jan Pietersz (Jan Pieterssen, Jan Piers), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1572 at Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant. Jan Pietersz was a weaver. In 1563 he was baptized during a night by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) at Leiden, where he then lived. Later he had stayed at Vlaardingen and then at Klundert near Breda. Anabaptist meetings were held in his house. A meeting of Aug. 5, 1571, where about 50 persons were present, was surprised and a number of persons arrested, including Jan Pietersz. He refused to take an oath and died steadfast. (Mart. Mir. D 603-5, E 629-31; DB 1912, 30-35; ML III, 372.) vdZ.

Jan Pieters(z) Vleyshouwer, a butcher from Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, participated in the meeting of Anabaptist preachers held at Alkmaar on Jan. 19, 1534, when the question of Münster (q.v.) was discussed, joined the party going to Münster, and later united with the Batenburgers (q.v.), lodged Anabaptists in Leiden, then joined the David-Jorists, and was finally sentenced to death. He was beheaded on Aug. 7, 1544. (DB 1909, 12-30; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; ML III, 372.) E.C.

Jan Pietersz Wagenmaker (John Wielmacker), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on July 22, 1575, at Smithfield in London, England. Jan Pietersz, who was a wagon builder, had emigrated, obviously because of persecution and also on account of lack of work, from Flanders, Belgium. Probably he had lived at Gent, where his first wife was put to death because of her Anabaptism. Jan Pietersz and 21 Flemish Anabaptist immigrants were apprehended when they held a meeting at Easter of 1575 in London, outside the Aldersgate. They were all arrested and after much tribulation Hendrik Terwoort (q.v.) and Jan Pietersz were put to death. In a letter to Queen Elizabeth they stated that they could not believe otherwise than that "they feel in their conscience." They remained steadfast and died loyally. When Jan Pietersz was led to the execution place, he said, "This way went all the pious prophets, and also Christ our Saviour."

Two letters of Hendrik Terwoort and Jan Pietersz are found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, where also detailed information is given about their fate and confession.

These two martyrs are celebrated in a hymn, "Aenhoort met neerstichden (neerstichheden), menschen verstaet wel mijn" (Hear attentively, ye people, understand me well), which is found in the very rare Confessio of Thomas van Imbroich, printed at Gent in 1579. Some fragments of songs composed by Jan Pietersz are found in the Martyrs' Mirror. (Mart. Mir. D 694-712, E 1008-24.) vdZ.

Jan Pipart, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Brussels, Belgium, on March 31, 1568. Jan confessed that he had regularly attended Mennonite meetings at Borgerhout and Antwerp, and loyally refused to recant. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 74, No. 41.) vdZ.

Jan Pompmaker, an adherent of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.), was (according to the confession of the latter in 1537) one of the principal Anabaptist leaders in the Netherlands. About Pompmaker and his activities, however, very little is known. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 188 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 343, 398.) vdZ.

Jan Poote (Poeten; Jan van Doornik in van Braght, Mart. Mir.), an Anabaptist martyr burned at the stake on March 19, 1569, at Antwerp, Belgium. He was born near Hasselt in the territory of Liége, Belgium, and was a tailor by trade. During his trial he confessed that he was about 50 years of age, that he had not attended the Catholic Church for 13 or 14 years. He had been baptized in the woods between Kortrijk and Doornik in Flanders, but did not name the elder who had baptized him. He had married his wife in a meeting of the congregation. Living at Dambrugge near Antwerp, he held Mennonite meetings in his house. He was apprehended with a number of members when such a meeting, attended by about 30 persons, was surprised. Even in torture Jan refused to inform his judges who were the preachers and members of the congregation, and what elders had come from abroad to perform baptism and marriages. He died as a true Christian. His confiscated property realized a considerable amount of money. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 338, 367, 397, 440, 477; XIV, 64 f., No. 712.

Jan Portier, born at Komen (Commines) in Flanders and by trade a fuller, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake in November 1568 at Meesen (Messines), Flanders. Several times he was cruelly tortured, but did not recant, dying loyally for his Lord. (Mart. Mir. D 367, E 722.) vdZ.

Jan Pouwelsz, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Jansz de Timmerman.

Jan Quirijnsz (Krijns): see Quirijn Jansz.

Jan (van) Raes, a weaver, born at Lauwe and living at Meenen, Flanders, was arrested there and burned at the stake April 30, 1569, at Kortrijk (Courtrai) Belgium, together with Fransoois de Timmerman, Pieter den Ouden, Jan Wattier, Wouter Denijs, and Kalleken, the widow of Anpleunis van den Berge. Jan had received (re)baptism in 1565. His property was confiscated. (Mart. Mir. D 408, E 759; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 39, No. 25; ML III, 425.) vdZ.

Jan van Reenen, a heretic in Amsterdam, who gave the inquisition much to do, was very active in revolutionary Anabaptist circles of Amsterdam, though he denied (November 1534) that he was an Anabaptist himself. His wife Leentgen and his daughters Adriana and Lysbeth died as Anabaptist martyrs. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 57; Grosheide, Verhooren, 29-33; Mellink, Wederdopers, 110-13, 145.

Jan Reynerszoon, an Anabaptist martyr, a schoolteacher at IJlst in the Dutch province of Friesland, who, according to tradition, suffered martyrdom at Leeuwarden, Friesland, probably in 1556 (information from H. J. Busé). vdZ.

Jan Rosensvolk, a congregation at Leiden, Holland, named after their leader or elder Jan Ro(o)se (q.v.). This small group, which was also called "Huiskopers" and had probably split off from the Flemish congregation in the early 17th century, probably merged with the Flemish congregation in 1663. vdZ.

L. G. le Poole, Bijdr. tot de kennis van . . . de Doopsgez. te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 11, 26 f.

Jan de Ruytere, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hans Corneliszoon.

Jan van Ryssele, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 14, 1571, at Antwerp, Belgium. Particulars are lacking. Jan was charged with rebaptism and having attended forbidden meetings. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 71, 76, 161; XIV, 86 f., No. 969.) vdZ.

Jan de Schaper, an Anabaptist martyr, according to van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766) burned at the stake in 1569 at Antwerp, Belgium. Génard, who studied the documents of Antwerp, did not find the name of Jan de Schaper. We suggest that Jan de Schaper is identical with Jacques Semou, not mentioned by van Braght, and burned at the stake at Antwerp on March 19, 1569. vdZ.

Jan van Schellingwou (Scellinckwoude), a Dutch heretical leader, active in Amsterdam in 1534-35; he belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism; it is rather curious that this man who had so much to answer for was not sentenced to death, but only banished from the territory of Amsterdam for five years. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 61, 80, 113, 121 f., 138; Grosheide, Verhooren, 13, 38; idem, Bijdrage 41, 47; Mellink, Wederdopers, 112, 150-52, 369, 380 f., 385.

Jan-van-Schellingwous-Gezinden, a group of Dutch Mennonites: see Jan van Schellingwou.

Jan van Schoonhoven, an otherwise unknown Dutch Anabaptist, who was present at a meeting of Anabaptist leaders in 1536 at Bocholt (q.v.) (Boekholt) in Westphalia, Germany. He may be identical with Johan van Utrecht, a former Catholic priest, who stayed in Münster in 1534. (DB 1919, 194; ML I, 239.) vdZ.

Jan Schut (Schutte), an Anabaptist martyr. A hymn composed by him, "O heer God ick magh wel clagen met suchten so menichfalt" (O Lord, I may well lament with many sighs), is found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, 1563 and following editions. This hymn in German translation, "Ach, Gott, ich muss dir klagen," is found in Ein schon gesangbüchlein Geistlicher Lieder of about 1565. This hymn shows that he held Menno's doctrine of the Incarnation. A song, "Godt, wilt ons salveren, het lijden coemt ons aen" (O God, wilt Thou save us, for suffering is near), commemorating the suffering of Jan Schut, is found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569. This song relates that Jan was tortured and put to death at Vreden, in the territory of Münster, Germany. The Dutch martyrbook of 1615 adds that he died in 1561 and the martyrbook of 1617 reports that he was executed by beheading. He had been baptized in 1543 by Leenhart Munsels. Both songs are inserted in Wackernagel, Lieder. vdZ.

Offer, 611-14; Mart. Mir. D 287, E 654; Wackernagel, Lieder, 144, 146; DB 1909, 106 f., 117; Wolkan, Lieder, 64, 78, 99, 104.

Jan Smeitgen (Smeiken, official name Jan Hoetz, also called Jan van Tricht, Johan (Jan) van Maastricht, Janne Sme(e)kens), a Dutch Anabaptist leader, bishop, and martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 24, 1537. At first Jan, who was a blacksmith, lived at Maastricht (q.v.), Dutch province of Limburg. Here he became the leader of the congregation after the death of Henric Rol (q.v.), September 1534. Soon after he seems to have been interested in the revolutionary Anabaptist views, for in the meetings of the congregation shortly after Christmas 1534 he read the booklet Van der Wraecke, sent from Münster. He is also said to have read from "a book of St. Paul," obviously one of the epistles in the New Testament. During this time he baptized in attics, in cellars and other hidden places, also outside the city in neighboring towns like Born, Dieteren, and Sittard. He is even said to have baptized at Leuven, Belgium, the center of most fanatical Catholicism. About his baptizing we are informed by the martyr Metken (q.v.), who was baptized by him. "With a cup he took water from a cask and poured it on her head."

During the persecution of the Maastricht congregation in January and February 1535, Jan succeeded in escaping and moved to Antwerp, Belgium. Here his activity in preaching and baptizing is testified to by the declaration of many martyrs. In 1536, at a conference of Anabaptist leaders at Bocholt (q.v.), Germany, he abandoned the Münsterite principles, for he and Jan Matthijsz van Middelburg are said "to have vehemently attacked" the Münsterite doctrines of polygamy and the visible reign of Christ on earth. Concerning his suffering and death no information was available. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 135-38 and passim; Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 434; XIV, 16 f., No. 163; DB 1864, 148; 1917, 113 (No. 36); 1919, 194; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 201; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim: see Index.

Jan de Smet (Smit) of Gent, Belgium, by trade a yarn twister, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on May 25, 1568, at Gent. His name is celebrated in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, edition of 1578 and later editions. Van Braght, who calls this martyr Jan de Smid, does not mention the date of execution. (Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 370, E 726; Verheyden, Gent, 45, No. 147.) vdZ.

Jan Smit, an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1572 by hanging near Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. Through the intermediation of Simon Fytsz, Mennonite preacher on the Dutch island of Texel, van Braght was enabled to give a number of particulars concerning Jan Smit: he was born in the earldom of Marck near Cologne, Germany, but later lived at Monnikendam, Dutch province of North Holland. Here he was arrested but liberated by a Protestant officer. Soon after, while he was in a boat on the Zuiderzee, he was apprehended again by a Spanish soldier, and brought to Amsterdam, where he was urged to assist the Spanish army, then besieging Haarlem, to fight their enemies; he refused to do so "because he had no enemies." He was sentenced to death by Don Frederick, son of the Duke of Alba (q.v.), and suffered martyrdom as a true disciple of Christ. (Mart. Mir. D 641, E 962.) vdZ.

Jan van Sol, of Danzig, West Prussia, came to Brussels, Belgium, in 1550, and visited Viglius van Aytta, chief president of the (Spanish-Catholic) Privy Council, and suggested a policy of combating Anabaptism, in which he would assist by checking that the newborn children were baptized and that no one in the Netherlands be allowed to move to another town unless provided with a certificate issued by the priest of his home church. If this project had been adopted, Mennonitism would have had a hard struggle, but Viglius distrusted van Sol. So he was put on trial. Van Sol was found to have at his disposal valuable information about the Mennonites. The Court of Holland, whose advice had been asked, opposed the project, fearing that it might seriously injure Dutch trade. So van Sol's plan miscarried. Moreover Jan van Sol proved not to be very reliable. It was revealed that he had lived at Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, where he had kept an inn. In 1530 he fled to Danzig, Prussia, for safety because of his many debts. At Danzig, where he called himself Johann (Jan) Solius, he had a prosperous business. In 1536 he left Danzig and bought the "Robitten" estate near Bardeyn in East Prussia. For a time he seems to have been a Melchiorite (q.v.) and even perhaps a member of the Danzig congregation. He later returned to Danzig and to Holland to win converts, and was apparently successful. But he had little influence among the Mennonites, who considered him untrustworthy. By 1550 he was no longer a Mennonite. He may have spent his last years from about 1556 in the territory of Preussisch-Holland. Mannhardt's assumption that he was a physician is probably untenable. vdZ.

H. van Alfen, "Documenten betreffende Jan van Sol en zijn voorstel tot vervolging van de Wederdopers," in Ned. Archief v. Kerkgeschiedenis, n.s. XXIV (The Hague (1931) 205-36; DB 1917, 136-38; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919) 39-41.

Jan (Johan, Janne, Jannes) Specke (or Johan Speckart, apparently identical with Hans Speck), a former Dominican monk of Groningen in the Netherlands, who about 1534 joined the Anabaptists and soon became a leader of the Batenburgers in the Netherlands (followers of the revolutionary Anabaptist Jan van Batenburg). Specke often stayed at Strasbourg in Alsace and was active in Groningen and Deventer. In 1537 he was apprehended at Antwerp, Belgium, and burned at the stake there in 1537, probably on May 24. vdZ.

Mellink, Wederdopers, 133, 264, 266, 286, 396; Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 434; XIV, 14 f., No. 162.

Jan Stevens, born at Saiffelen, was a custodian of the Catholic Church at Hoingen near Sittard, Dutch province of Limburg; he was won for the Reformation probably by Dionysius Vinne (q.v.) and soon joined the Anabaptists. On Aug. 23, 1533, he was imprisoned at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. He escaped from prison on Aug. 10, 1534, but was arrested again; about his further life nothing is known. By his preaching he had much influence in the eastern part of the duchy of Jülich and the bishopric of Liége. Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) in his confession in 1551 called him a deacon, assigned to take charge of the money of the congregation and to provide for the poor. vdZ.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 64-70; Mellink, Wederdopers, 298-300; DB 1909, 124.

Jan Stevensz: see Stevensz, Jan, of Nijeveen.

Jan Styaertsz and his cousin Pieter, Anabaptist martyrs, beheaded in 1538 at Vinderhout, near Gent, Belgium. They lived first at Meredor (Merendrée) in Flanders. Because they were dissatisfied with the Catholic Church and its doctrines, they traveled to Germany (to Münster?), because they had heard that there was "a better faith." They were baptized in Germany, but soon they were disappointed and returned to Flanders. Shortly after their return they were arrested. Their prison was a filthy pit full of vermin which ate their food and their clothes.

Van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, also reports that Jan, falling ill, was allowed to go home for nursing. He did not flee, but after his recovery obediently returned. (Mart. Mir. D 44, E 449; Verheyden, Gent, 4, No. 9-10.) vdZ.

Jan (Janne) de Suyckerbacker: see Joachim Vermeeren.

Jan de Swarte (de Zwarte), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in March 1563 at Rijssel (Lille) in France. Jan was a weaver, originally from Belle (Bailleul) in Flanders, chosen deacon and preacher by the congregation at Nijpkerke. He often moved, apparently because of persecution. Successively he lived at Hondschoote, Rijssel, Wervik, Meenen, and then in Halewijn, in all these towns serving the congregation. At Halewijn (Halluin), Belgian province of East Flanders, he was arrested in the night of March 7, 1563, together with his wife Claesken and their four sons, Claes, Christiaen, Hans, and Mahieu, besides two men who were staying with them and other members of the congregation of Halewijn. They were brought to Rijssel and all remained steadfast but Jacomijntgen, the wife of Pieter the Shoemaker. Jan de Swarte was executed on March 16, on the same day as his son Claes and his guests Jan Maes and Perceval van den Berge and also Pieter the Shoemaker and Hendrik Aertsz. A few days later his wife Claesken, Christiaen, Hans, and Mahieu suffered martyrdom. (Mart. Mir. D 299, E 664; ML II, 389.) vdZ.

Jan Tade (Jan Taet, also Jan Hermenss or Jan de Buidelmaker) was called "one of the principal Anabaptist leaders" by van Batenburg (q.v.) during his trial at Vilvoorde in 1538. Tade, born at Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, and living at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, was arrested at Utrecht in 1539, together with a number of Anabaptists, including Derckgen, the wife of David Joris (q.v.). By his persistent denial that he was ever rebaptized or belonged to the Anabaptists he was set free. A number of places are known in which he was active. vdZ.

J. de Hullu, Bescheiden betr. de Hervorming in Overijssel I (1899) 246 ff.; DB 1909, 23, 27.

Jan-Tammes-volk, a branch of Dutch Mennonites, followers of Jan Tammes of Groningen, who in 1688 was excommunicated from his congregation (Old Flemish) because he was a champion of baptism by immersion and free preaching by all members of the church, as practiced by the Collegiants (q.v.). He was also said to have believed that the Old Flemish branch was not the only true Christian church. Besides this, he was charged with laxity in shunning those who had married outside the group (buitengetrouwden).

It is not known whether Jan Tammes had many adherents. A small congregation of Jan-Tammes-volk was found at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, of which Jan Jansen Blaauw was chosen preacher in 1709. (DB 1877, 129; 1883, 75-85; ML II, 389.) vdZ.

Jan de Tasmaker, named in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, and still in prison at Antwerp, Belgium, when this song was made (1560), is not found in the martyrbooks nor in the official records. Maybe he is identical with Jan Cleeren (q.v.), executed at Antwerp on Aug. 9, 1560. (Offer, 568.) vdZ.

Jan Thielemansz (Tilemans, Thielsz, or Johan Tielens), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Dec. 18, 1568, at The Hague in the Netherlands. Jan was a preacher and is said to have preached at Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland. He may have lived there. (Mart. Mir. D 377, E 731; DB 1912, 39.) vdZ.

Jan Thomaszoon: see Jan van Delft.

Jan Thymansz (alias Dapper), an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on Sept. 15, 1534, at The Hague in the Netherlands. He had participated in the journey from Amsterdam to Münster in March 1534. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 122, No. 152.) vdZ.

Jan de Timmerman. This Anabaptist martyr, not found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, is likely identical with Jan Wiljoot (q.v.), named by van Braght but not found in official records. Jan de Timmerman was burned at the stake on April 2, 1569, at Antwerp. He was born at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders and was 26 years of age. He lived at Borgerhout, a suburb of Antwerp, and was a weaver. His two little children had not been baptized, because, as he confessed, "in the Scriptures nothing is found of children's baptism and (he) is of opinion that one should not baptize children." Jan had been baptized seven years before, at the age of about 19, by Elder Hans Busschaert (q.v.) in a hamlet near Armentières in Flanders. He had been apprehended at a meeting of the Antwerp congregation held in the house of Jan Poote (q.v.). (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 355, 370, 399; XIV, 64 f., No. 719.) vdZ.

Jan van Tricht: see Jan Smeitgen.

Jan Vaetz, from Sittard, Dutch province of Limburg, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on Sept. 6, 1561, at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on charge of being rebaptized and persisting in this "heresy." (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 124, 133; XIV, 30 f., No. 343.) vdZ.

Jan van den Velde, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on June 11, 1539, at Utrecht in the Netherlands, because he had been rebaptized. He was a native of Antwerp, Belgium, and a painter by profession. Further information was not available. vdZ.

Berigten Hist. Genootschap (Utrecht, 1851) IV, 2, p. 139; Mellink, Wederdopers, 237.

Jan Vervest (or van der Veste), an Anabaptist martyr, died in prison at Brugge, Belgium, on Aug. 24, 1558. He was a native of Gent, where he apparently made contacts with the Anabaptists in 1551. In this year because of persecution he fled with his family to the Netherlands, living at Amsterdam and Dordrecht. Being a rhetorician, he had no opportunity to earn his living in the Netherlands. So he returned to Gent, where he was baptized by Gillis van Aken in 1553. When a new persecution arose Jan and his family moved to Brugge. Here he regularly attended the meetings of the congregation; during one of these meetings he was apprehended together with his wife Livine Verwee and two other Mennonites, Jacob de Swarte and Hans van den Broucke. He refused to recant, even though he became dangerously ill, and died in prison. His wife also died in prison (September 1558). They had eight children. The oldest of them, a son of 18, Lievin, who had broken with the Catholic Church, was persuaded by the inquisitor to return penitently to the Church. The second, Hansken, a son of 15, refused to become a Catholic. He succeeded in escaping from the Gravensteen prison. Even little Betken of 13 was tried and forced to give particulars about the life and friends of her parents. (Verheyden, Brugge, 42, No. 25.) vdZ.

Jan de Vlascoper, an Anabaptist martyr, named in H. Alenson's Tegenbericht op de Voorreden van 't groote Martelaer Boek (Haarlem, 1630, reprint BRN VII, 248), who was in 1576 in prison with Hans Bret (q.v.) at Antwerp, Belgium. From the records studied by P. Génard and published in Antwerpsch Archieven-Blad it appears that this Jan de Vlascoper is identical with Hans (Jan) Corneliszoon de Ruytere (q.v.), a preacher of the Antwerp congregation. vdZ.

Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker (Tripmaker; he was a maker of "trips," a kind of wooden shoes), born at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, a Dutch Anabaptist leader, who founded the Amsterdam congregation. In 1530 Trypmaker was in Emden (q.v.), East Friesland, where Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) had founded an Anabaptist congregation, which he put under the care of Trypmaker when he left Emden; a few months later, about November 1530, Trypmaker also had to leave Emden, driven away by the intolerance of the Reformed preachers. Trypmaker then moved to Amsterdam, where he was active about one year. There is only scarce information about his activities. He is said to have baptized "many persons"; he also performed marriages; apparently his field of activity was also outside Amsterdam. In Amsterdam he was not much hindered by the city magistrates. So he could found and build up the congregation in the peaceful Anabaptist principles which he had learned from Melchior Hofmann. In the fall of 1531, when the Court of Holland at The Hague learned of his activities, the city magistrates of Amsterdam were summoned to arrest Trypmaker. Jan Hubrechts (q.v.), then a burgomaster of Amsterdam, had to obey the order from The Hague, but being opposed to persecution, he tried to save Trypmaker, but Trypmaker gave himself up to the police, confessing that he was rebaptized. Trypmaker was sent to The Hague and tried there. During his trial he reported the names of more than 50 Anabaptists in Amsterdam; seven of them then were arrested and also sent to The Hague. Here they died together with Trypmaker, being beheaded on Dec. 5, 1531. Their heads were afterwards sent to Amsterdam and exhibited there as a warning. Shortly before his execution Trypmaker had recanted as had all the seven other prisoners. For this reason they have not been included in the martyrbooks. vdZ.

C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II, 404 f., 409; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 6; DB 1917, 111, 159 f.; 1919, 135-39; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 64-68.

Jan Walen, an Anabaptist martyr, who (as can be stated on the basis of official records) was burned at the stake on April 15, 1534, at The Hague in the Netherlands, with Cornelis Luytgensz and Dirk Gerritz, all three from Krommenierdijk, Dutch province of North Holland. They had been among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam en route to Münster (q.v.), but were arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 13, E 424) erroneously states that this execution took place in 1527, and in another place (Mart. Mir. D 62, E 464) an account is found of the martyrdom in 1542 of a number of Anabaptists from Krommenierdijk. Obviously, as K. Vos has shown (DB 1917, 168-70), all these accounts belong together, Jan Echtwerken, Jan Dirksz, and Jan Walen being one and the same person. vdZ.

Jan van de Walle (Jan de Lintwerker), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Feb. 26, 1571, at Antwerp, Belgium. Jan, a ribbon maker, was born about 1531 at Eecke near Gent in Flanders. In 1553 or 1554, because of persecution, he fled to Antwerp, where in a wood near the city he had been baptized by Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.). In 1555 he fled to Gent, about 1557 to Holland, but after 1560 he lived again in Antwerp. He was chosen as preacher and deacon of the congregation in 1565 by the congregation at a meeting held in an attic in the city. He had not baptized "because he had not been chosen to this end," but sometimes he performed marriages. He refused to take an oath. In January 1571 he was arrested at Antwerp and several times tried and severely tortured. On the rack he gave some information about the congregation, which then numbered 200-300 members. The meetings usually were attended by about 50 persons. Obviously meetings were held in different quarters of the town. He also gave some information about some elders and leaders like Hans Busschaert and Herman de Timmerman. Jan van de Walle died loyal to his faith as did his wife Calleken Meevels on the same day as her husband. Calleken was his third wife; his first and second also had been Mennonites. A brother of Jan, Martin van der Walle, had suffered martyrdom at Brugge in 1558. In Jan's house two letters were found written by Hans de Wever, i.e., Elder Hans Busschaert, and one written from Emmerich, Germany, signed by Joost Janszen, August 1570. Van Braght gives only a short account on this martyr. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 506, E 846; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 449, 451, 456; XIII, 3, 11-13, 33, 35, 43, 62; XIV, 72 f., No. 843; Verheyden, Brugge, 46 f.; K. Vos, "De Doopsgez. te Antwerpen," in Bulletin de la Commission Royale d'Histoire de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920) 349-51; the letters found in Jan's house are reprinted here, pp. 382-86; ML II, 389.

Jan Wattier (Watier) de Jonge, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on April 30, 1569, at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Belgium, with four other martyrs. Van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, who gives the year of their martyrdom, but not the exact date, relates that they were arrested in Meenen and brought to Kortrijk, where they were kept incommunicado in prison for about three weeks. They were cruelly tortured on the rack, in order to obtain information for the magistrates, but the Lord gave them strength and they did not betray their fellow members. They died steadfast.

Verheyden has contributed some particulars to the general account by van Braght. Jan Watier had been born at Komen (Commines) in Flanders; he was a weaver living at Meenen. At the end of 1565 or at the beginning of 1566 he had received baptism upon his faith. (Mart. Mir. D 408, E 759; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 39, No. 26.) vdZ.

Jan Wermbouts (Jan de Coster), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at The Hague in the Netherlands on July 30, 1544. Jan was a revolutionary Anabaptist, an adherent of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). (Inv. Arch Amst. I, No. 280.) vdZ.

Jan de Wever, a Mennonite elder in Flanders, named in the Martyrs' Mirror (D 765, E 1070), is identical with Hans Bouwens Busschaert (q.v.). vdZ.

Jan (van) Wijnssen: see Johan van Wynssem.

Jan Wiljoot, an Anabaptist martyr, according to van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766) burned at the stake in 1569 at Antwerp, Belgium, together with 10 other martyrs. Van Braght does not give any particulars about this martyr. P. Génard, who studied the records of Antwerp, did not find the name of Jan Wiljoot. Perhaps he is to be identified with Jan de Timmerman (q.v.), burned at the stake at Antwerp on April 2, 1569. vdZ.

Jan Willems(z) (Wilhems), of Roermond (also said to be of Cleve), a revolutionary Anabaptist, "in whom Jan van Leyden seemed to have returned," as Kühler writes. His headquarters were near Wesel, Germany, but he was also active in the eastern part of the Netherlands. In 1574 he was arrested and imprisoned at Wesel. By bribing the jailer, he was able to lead his followers even while in prison, for a period of five years. On March 12, 1580, he was put to death at Wesel by burning at the stake. With him the Münsterites and Batenburgers (q.v.) died out. Charles de Nielles (q.v.), the Reformed minister at Wesel, in 1695 published a French translation of Obbe Philips' Bekentenisse at Leiden, adding an account of Jan Willemsz' career in order to alert the government against "the pernicious doctrines of the Anabaptists." vdZ.

BRN VII, 66 note, 101; DB 1900, 200; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 208-11.

Jan Willemsz (1583-1660), a minister of the Waterlander congregation at De Rijp, Dutch province of North Holland: see Willemsz, Jan.

Jan Willemsz (1533-88), of Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, a well-known Dutch Mennonite leader and elder. His father, living between Hoorn and Enkhuizen, turned from the Catholic Church to the Mennonites and then moved to Hoorn where the magistrates were tolerant and where he was safe. Jan Willemsz was appointed elder at Hoorn in 1557. After the outbreak of the Flemish-Frisian schism he joined the Frisian Mennonites (q.v.). Both Jan Willemsz and Lubbert Gerrits (q.v.), also a preacher of the Hoorn congregation, were invited in December 1566 to come to Friesland to settle the Frisian-Flemish quarrel. Jan Willemsz presided at the decisive meeting of Feb. 1, 1567, which, however, did not reconcile the divided body. In 1568, while he was on the way to visit Dirk Philips, who was then staying at Emden, Germany, Jan Willemsz and all the Frisians were excommunicated by Dirk Philips, who took the side of the Flemish. Jan Willemsz was rather moderate; he much deplored the schism that had arisen among the Dutch Mennonites and during his life he did as much as he could to maintain peace among the Frisians and succeeded in keeping them in one united body, but soon after his death the Frisians too divided into a moderate and a conservative group. Of the private life and special activities of Jan Willemsz almost nothing is known. De Hoop Scheffer (DB 1867, 58-65) gives some information about his descendants (see Sleutel family), many of whom were active in the Mennonite Church. vdZ.

BRN VII, 62 ff., 67 f., 340 f.; DB 1893, 26-79, passim; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim, see Index.

Jan Woutersz van Cuyck, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 28, 1572, at Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, together with Adriaenken Jansdochter van Molenaersgraef. The account of van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, about these martyrs is very detailed; obviously van Braght, born about 50 years after their execution in the same town of Dordrecht and living there, had at his disposal firsthand information.

Jan Woutersz was an artist, both a painter and etcher of glass. He was born at Dordrecht. Here he was arrested in February 1572; when the sheriff came to his house and asked him whether Jan van Cuyck was living there, he answered, because a Christian should always tell the truth, that he himself was Jan van Cuyck. He was imprisoned at the Vuylpoort. After some trial and torturing, both Adriaenken and Jan were sentenced to death and suffered martyrdom in faith and peace. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a rare booklet, Sommige belijdinghen, schriftelijcke Sentbrieven ende Testamenten geschreven door Jan Wouterszoon van Cuyck . . . (1579, n.p., but likely Gillis Rooman at Haarlem published this book). It contains the confession and eleven letters by Jan Woutersz, all found in the Martyrs' Mirror. The letters of Jan Woutersz in the booklet are followed by a letter by Adriaenken and a letter from her husband to her. Finally the volume has two songs, one with a puzzle title "Babel 8 my niet, veel min 8 x"; this means Babel acht mij niet, veel min acht icks (Babel, i.e., the Roman Catholic Church does not respect me; no more do I respect it); the other song begins, "Uut de woestijn roepen wy heer tot dy, die ons in ald' noot staet bi" (From the desert we call, Lord, to Thee, who helpest us in all distress). The author of the second hymn and maybe of both is Jan A. van Dort, Adriaenken's husband. Jan Woutersz' letters are addressed as follows: (1) to his brother-in-law and his sister; (2) to his brother and his sister; (3) to the congregation of Dordrecht; (4) to his wife; (5) to his wife and his daughter; (6) to his only daughter; (7) to his parents; (8) to his sister-in-law, who was still a Catholic; (9) to his three youngest sisters; (10) to his oldest brother-in-law and his sister; (11) to his youngest brother-in-law P. I. These letters are all written in an exquisite style; obviously Jan Woutersz was a man of good education. The letters to his wife and to his little daughter (only seven years old) are very striking; the letters to his brother and sisters, especially to his Catholic sister-in-law, who was a Mother Superior in a convent, are evangelistic, full of Christian love, pressing to conversion. Every letter gives a testimony of a strong, sound Biblical faith. When during the trial the sheriff proposed to Jan Woutersz that he should return to the old Catholic faith and be set free and live with his wife—he had been married only nine years—he replied that he would not recant. Then the sheriff asked him: "Don't you want to live?" and Jan answered: "Sure, I do, but not for anything in the world would I renounce my faith." (Mart. Mir. D 566-600, E 897-926; Bibliographie I, 93-107.) vdZ.

Jan (Janne) van der Wouwen (van den Wouwe), an Anabaptist martyr, is identical with Jan de Oude Kleerkoper (q.v.). vdZ.

Janjacobsgezinden, a branch of Dutch Mennonites, the followers of Jan Jacobsz (q.v.), who in 1599 separated from the Old Frisians (q.v.). This schism is described in Noodwendighe Verclaringhe van 't verscheel ende Questie geresen tusschen Ian Iacobsz van Harlinghen met sijne medehulpers ende tusschen Pieter Ielties van Collum met sijne medestanders. The Janjacobs group was a conservative, austere group, who did not allow their members to have contact, either in trade or in private conversation, with "worldly" people. They were severe in banning and for this reason they often had difficulties with the magistrates (Leeuwarden, Bolsward, Ameland, Terschelling). As in the days of Menno Simons their elders traveled around to administer baptism and communion. The names of most of them have been preserved: first Jan Jacobsz himself, then Zille Douwes, Hans Janssen, Seerp Sybrands, Cornelis Jarichs, Jacob Theunis, Laurens Jansen, Jacob Claassen, Jacob Gerrits, Sikke Tjerks, Jan Tjerks, Joris Jacobs, and Jacob Jansen. The baptismal lists of some of them, in which they noted down the number of persons they baptized in each congregation, have been preserved; Cornelis Jarichs baptized no fewer than 1,040 persons. Some of the elders also visited Prussia and baptized there, but it is not yet known which Prussian church belonged to the Janjacobs group. The Janjacobsgezinden adopted their own hymnbook in 1613: Eenighe Gheestelijcke Liedekens (q.v.) made by Jan Jacobsz, and a sequel to it, Eenighe Nieuwe Gheestelijcke Liedekens. This hymnbook was used until the 18th century. The Janjacobs group numbered at first about 20 congregations, all but two, Hoorn and Amsterdam, in the province of Friesland. Most of them were always small in membership, except Ameland, which as late as 1804 numbered 432 members. The total number of male baptized members in 1666 in Friesland is said to have been 643. By 1700 eight of their congregations had disappeared, and in the 18th century, when the Janjacobsgezinden were usually—erroneously—called Old Flemish Mennonites, all their congregations were dissolved but Ameland, which did not unite with the other Mennonites on this island until 1855. vdZ.

J. Loosjes, "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden" in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis XI (The Hague) 1914, issue 3, 185-240; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 311; BRN VII, 213-15; DB 1861, 87; 1874, 59; 1889, 6-13, 16, 18 f., 28-50; 1890, 1-38; S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet (Amsterdam, 1745) 71; Menn. Bl., 1890, 125 ff.; ML II, 389.

Janjgir Mennonite (GCM) Mission Station is located on the southeastern edge of the village Janjgir, in Bilaspur District, Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), India. It was opened by J. F. Kroeker, who visited this spot with P. A. Penner in April 1901. He procured land in December 1901, after which first buildings were erected. The Kroekers served only one year. In 1906 Annie C. Funk arrived from Hereford, Pa., served a term, started the first girls' school, sailed for furlough, perished on the Titanic. In 1909-37 (except for 1916-21) P. W. Penner served here, extensively developed the work, erected many buildings. Other missionaries who made distinctive contributions were the E. B. Steiners, Miss M. R. Burkhalter, Miss H. E. Nickel, Miss A. Schmidt, and the W. F. Unruhs. Unruh started the Bible School here in 1929. More recent workers included the S. T. Moyers, the F. J. Isaacs, and the J. R. Duerksens. The name of the Indian pastor M. Rufus Asna, who served 45 years, beginning 1903, will long be associated with Janjgir. The congregation was organized in 1912. The meetinghouse was erected 1909, replaced by a larger one in 1926. The present Indian pastor is Philip Lader. The baptized membership in June 1949 was 160.

Types of work include the A. C. Funk Memorial School for girls, the Chhattisgarhi Bible School, a small medical dispensary, a coeducational primary school. The Girls' School has in residence about 130 girls, with work up to VIIIth Standard. The enrollment of the Bible School is about 60. An extensive evangelistic work in 360 surrounding villages has been a feature of the work during the years. S.T.M.

Janjgir (India) Union Bible School was opened on July 3, 1930, as a training school for native pastors, evangelists, teachers, and Bible women of the Hindustani congregations of the General Conference Mennonite Church in central India, with a three-year course. The school began with six months of classroom work, conducted in the Sunday-school wings of the Janjgir Church, and two months of village evangelism, but soon increased to nine months of classroom work with one-month village evangelism. The first term had 14 students, with W. F. Unruh as principal. Succeeding principals were Martha Burkhalter, S. T. Moyer, J. R. Duerksen, and Curt Claassen. Under J. R. Duerksen the school became an inter-mission school, though the administration and staff remained G.C.M. In 1955 only 21 of the 47 students were of the General Conference Church; the remainder being distributed as follows: Churches of Christ 16, Mennonite Church (MC) in India 4, Mission Bands 2, Evangelical Christian Church (Allahabad) 2. H.S.B.

Jan(ne) de Hane, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp in 1537. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 434; XIV, 14 f., No. 161.) vdZ.

Janne de Snijdere (alias Jan Rotterdamme), an Anabaptist martyr burned at the stake on May 5, 1571, at Brussels, Belgium, together with his wife Elisabeth Bruyne. Janne was a native of Brouwershaven, Dutch province of Zeeland. Their six children were baptized in the Catholic St. Gudule cathedral at Brussels on the day their parents were executed. This Janne de Snijdere is probably not identical with Jan Snijder, an Anabaptist who (Mellink, Wederdopers, 217, 414) lived at Cleve, Germany, and who in 1544 sent two books by David Joris to Delft, Holland. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 102, No. 154.) vdZ.

Janneken, an Anabaptist martyr who was drowned in a tub in the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1558, together with Noële (q.v.). The identity of this martyr could not be established. (Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583.) vdZ.

Janneken, an Anabaptist martyr, who while in prison wrote the song "Verhuecht verblijt groot ende cleijn" (Be glad and rejoice, both ye great and small), found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer. des Heeren, 1563 and following editions, also Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583 and mentioned by Wolkan (Lieder, 62, 71). A notice in the margin of the page reports that the poet was a young woman called Janneken, who was drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp. It is not clear which Janneken is meant, either Janneken van Aken (Jenneken Eghels) (q.v.) or Janneken van Houtte (q.v.). Probably it was the latter. vdZ.

Janneken, daughter of Anneken Botson, burned at the stake about 1585 in St. Veit, in the duchy of Luxembourg, together with her mother and Mayken Pieters. (Mart. Mir. D 753, E 1,060; ML I, 250.) vdZ.

Janneken: see Janneken van Hout(t)e.

Janneken, an Anabaptist martyr, the wife of Dirk van Wesel (q.v.), was arrested with him and ten others March 11, 1571, at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, where she was burned at the stake between May 24 and June 16, 1571. (Mart. Mir. D 552 ff., E 885; DB 1919, 29-37.) vdZ.

Janneken, the widow of Melchior Simonsse: see Janneken Mels.

Janneken, the widow of the martyr Pieter Freerks (q.v.), was drowned at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on Dec. 19, 1537. vdZ.

J. Reitsma, 100 jaar uit de Gesch. der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Janneken van Aken (Jenneken Eghels), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned in a wine-cask, April 3, 1560, inside the Steen castle (prison) at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Lenaert Plovier and Mayken de Hont. Particulars about this martyr are lacking. We only know that she was born at Haerlebeke near Kortrijk in Flanders. Her name is celebrated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren; she may be the author of the song "Verhuecht verblijt groot ende cleijn" of this Lietboecxken. vdZ.

Offer, 552 f., 567; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 641; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 7, 12; XIV, 28 f., No. 316; ML II, 389.

Janneken Botson: see Janneken, daughter of Anneken Botson.

Janneken du Boys, wife of André Vanneaux, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Antwerp, Belgium, on April 22, 1558. Particulars are unknown. See also Janneken Walraven. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 444 f., 469; XIV, 22 f., No. 256.) vdZ.

Janneken Cabeljaus, wife of the martyr Hendrik Aertsz (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1564 at Rijssel (Lille) in France. The execution probably took place on Feb. 22. She was born at Ieper, and lived with her husband in Halewijn (q.v.), Flanders, when they were arrested in the night of March 7, 1563, at the same time as a number of Mennonites. She remained steadfast in trial and died loyally. (Mart. Mir. D 299, E 665.) vdZ.

Janneken Croecx, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Jan. 28, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Grietgen van den Steen and Jacques van Hulten, because she had been rebaptized and had attended forbidden meetings. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 100 f., 172; XIV, 88 f., 1003.) vdZ.

Janneken op Dextelaer, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned July 5 or 6, 1557, at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Klaerken (Claerken Boucket) and Margriete (Margriet Vanneau). Afterwards their naked corpses were thrown into the Scheldt River. Janneken, whose name is celebrated in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father) of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, is apparently identical with Janneken van Hout(t)e (q.v.), who is found in the official records. (Offer, 565; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569.) vdZ.

Janneken Dhanins, wife of Lievin van Booxtale and daughter of Jan van Sleidingen, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 19, 1573, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, together with two other women, Martinken Meere and Olyverynken 's Keizers. All three were gagged to prevent their speaking to the bystanders. The crowd, indignant at this precaution, assumed a threatening attitude against the executioner and his aids, so that the soldiers were charged to clear the market place, which measure nearly caused a revolt. (Verheyden, Gent, 64, No. 231.) vdZ.

Janneken van Hout(t)e, an Anabaptist martyr, not found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, but likely identical with Janneken op Dextelaer (q.v.), named by van Braght. She was born at Antwerp, Belgium, and belonged to the Mennonite congregation in this town. Janneken, a jonckmeyssen (a young or unmarried woman), was bound in a sack and drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp on July 5 or 6, 1557. This martyr may be the author of the song "Verhuecht verblijt groot ende cleyn" (Be glad and rejoice, both great and small) found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 553; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 434, 438; XIV, 22 f., No. 250.) vdZ.

Janneken van Hulle, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Nov. 7, 1570, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, together with Janneken van Rentegem and Hans van der Weghe, because she had been rebaptized and partaken in the meetings of the Mennonites. Two years before, both Janneken van Hulle and her sister Cateline, of whom nothing is known, then fugitives, had been banished forever from the territory of Gent, as Mennonites. Van Braght reports that Janneken was unmarried, and that with a gag in her mouth she died peacefully. (Mart. Mir. D 528, E 864; Verheyden, Gent, 56, No. 193; ML II, 365.) vdZ.

Janneken de Jonc(k)heere, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 21, 1562, at Gent, Belgium, together with her sisters Vyntgen and Goudeken and two other Mennonites. She was born at Merendree in Flanders. She was about 26 years of age. Further particulars were not available. Van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, mentions this martyr twice, once in 1562, without exact date and once in 1569, which is wrong. Janneken is celebrated in a song, "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaar, ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, 1578 and following editions. vdZ.

Offer, 650; Mart. Mir. D 289, 407, E 656, 759; Verheyden, Gent, 29, No. 93; ML II, 432.

Janneken Kinderkens, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 24, 1562, inside of the Gravensteen (castle and prison) at Gent, Belgium. She was a daughter of Adriaen Kinderkens, was born at Moerbeke near Geeraardsbergen in Flanders, and was 24 years of age. Further particulars are lacking. (See also Verkindert; Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 83.) vdZ.

Janneken Mels (Janneken Melchior Simonsse or Simonsdochter), from Brielle, Dutch province of South Holland, and baptized there in 1536 by Cornelis Pieters (Cornelis wt den Briel), an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on Sept. 4 at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland. Janneken and three other Anabaptists were apprehended early in the morning of July 20, 1536; after imprisonment, trial, and torture all four died loyally. During the trial one of the burgomasters had snarled to them: "We care not for your Word of God, but hold to the mandate of the Emperor, and shall ignominiously exterminate all those who act contrary to it." (Mart. Mir. D 38, E 445; Mellink, Wederdopers, 227, 317.) vdZ.

Janneken van Munstdorp, who in the documents is called Jenneken van den Velde(n), a native of Ieper, Flanders, wife of the martyr Hans van Munstdorp (q.v.), was burned at the stake on Oct. 6, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Maryken (Maeyken van Dissenbeke) and Lysken Luchtens. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror relates that Janneken was pregnant when she was arrested and in prison gave birth to a daughter, whom she named Janneken. Before the officials could take away the child, the baby was secretly given to "friends," i.e., members of the congregation, to bring her up. Janneken wrote a testament to her infant daughter Janneken, and two letters, one to her parents, who had not yet come to the true faith, and one to her sister. To her little daughter she wrote that they had been married only a short while when the martyr's death for the Lord's sake overtook them; she should not be ashamed of them, but follow them and live a godly life. The mother could not give her much earthly goods, but a good name; she should be industrious and good and fear God. In the letters to her parents and sister she thanks them for what they have done for her, and commends her little daughter to her sister. "Oh, that it had been the will of the Lord, that I could have brought her up, in what great regard I should have held her for my dear husband's sake; though I should have suffered want with her, I should not have parted with her; but the will of the Lord be done." She regrets that her long imprisonment has caused such great expense. She affectionately urges her parents to seek their salvation. She will precede her sister to the heavenly city, where they will be united.

Hans and Janneken van Munstdorp (according to van Braght) are commemorated in the hymn "Och vrienden al te samen, hoort, hoe wy op Bamisdagh verstoort" (O hear, all ye friends, how we were disturbed on St. Bavo's day), found in the Rotterdamsche Lied-boeck. This hymnal is no longer extant. NEFF, VDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 664, E 983; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 129 f., 179; XIV, 92 f., No. 1037; ML III, 183.

Janneken van Rentegem, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Nov. 7, 1570, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, together with Janneken van Hulle and Hans van der Weghe. She was charged with the crimes of rebaptism and attending the Mennonite meetings. According to van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, she was unmarried. (Mart. Mir. D 528, E 864; Verheyden, Gent, 56, No. 194.) VDZ.

Janneken Roelandts (in Lietboecxken, Roolants), an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1569 at Gent, Belgium (manner of execution and exact date unknown). She was the wife of Peter Stayaert, who was executed at the same time. She is celebrated in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer, ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, 1578 and following editions. This martyr is not found in official sources at Gent. The Bibliographie statement that she was probably the wife of Roelandt Stayaerds is wrong. (Offer, 653; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759; Bibliographie II, 760, No. 666.) VDZ.

Janneken Walraven, listed by van Braght as an Anabaptist martyr who was executed in 1557 at Antwerp, Belgium. Van Braght writes: "In the year 1557 on Pentecost eve there was burnt alive at Antwerp . . . Janneken Walraven, the mother of Jacques Walraven, who was a minister of the Word at Amsterdam among the Mennonites." Here van Braght is wrong, confusing two martyrs, Tanneken (Anneken) Walraven (q.v.), widow of Jan Verschelt, burned at the stake on May 22 (Pentecost), 1557, at Antwerp, who may have been the mother of the afore-mentioned preacher, serving 1588-1617, and Janneken du Boys (q.v.), wife of André Vanneaux, drowned at Antwerp on April 22, 1558. Thus Janneken Walraven did not exist. (Mart. Mir. D 178, E 563.) VDZ.

Jannes van Romershoven, an Anabaptist martyr, who was apprehended on May 31, 1538, and burned at the stake on June 14, 1538, at Curingen, Belgian province of Limburg (then bishopric of Liége). He was unmarried. In the accounts of his martyrdom he is called a Lutheran, and two "Lutheran" books which he possessed were burned with him. But Lutheran here does not mean adherent of Martin Luther, but heretic in general. The word Lutheran in this period often was used, even in cases of Anabaptism. From the account it is clear that Jannes was an Anabaptist, because he is said to have been the principal "Lutheran" of Gorsleeuw, that he had rebaptized many persons, not only at Gorsleeuw, but also at Antwerp, and that he died in his heresy (luthery) refusing to be converted and unwilling to renounce his rebaptism. VDZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 161 f.

Jannetgen Hendricxdochter, from Amsterdam, wife of Peter Dircxzn, had been among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam March 24, 1534, en route to Münster. She was arrested on the boat, but either was released or managed to escape. Jannetgen was arrested again in Amsterdam in August or September 1539, whereas her husband was imprisoned in The Hague, where he was put to death on Nov. 6, 1539. Jannetgen was sentenced to death on Nov. 4, 1539; since she was pregnant, the execution was to be postponed until after the birth of the child. It is not known whether the execution took place. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 103 f.) VDZ.

Jannetgen (Jannetje) Jansdochter, from Utrecht in the Netherlands, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on May 21, 1535, at Amsterdam, together with ten other women. She was married to Willem Dircxzn Tymmerman, and confessed that she had been baptized by Gerrit Ghijsen van Benschop (q.v.) in his house at Benschop. She did not repent this baptism. VDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 413, E 445, where the date of execution is given as May 15; Grosheide, Verhooren, 67, 70.

Jannetgen (Janneken) Matthijsdochter, an Anabaptist martyr of whom there is only scarce and questionable information. She is not found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror. According to the sentence books, Jannetgen Matthijsdochter was sentenced at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, on Nov. 21, 1552, to be drowned because of Anabaptism, but it is strange that her name is not found in the song "Eylaes, ick moch wel suchten Dat nu buert so groot ellent" (Alas, I must lament that now comes about so great misery), written by Adriaen Cornelis (q.v.) to celebrate the death of some martyrs, who according to the sentence book were sentenced to death at the same date as Jannetgen Matthijsdochter. Nor is she found in another hymn celebrating some martyrs of Leiden of 1552, "Ick mag wel droeflijck singen, in desen tijt van noot" (I must sadly sing in this time of distress). Both hymns are found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 and following editions. Perhaps the puzzle of Jannetgen Matthijsdochter can be solved in assuming that her execution was for some reason postponed. (Offer, 578, note 1.) vdZ.

Jannetje Matthysdochter, from Medemblik, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on Nov. 25, 1539, at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland. Details about this martyr were not available. Mellink supposes that she had fled from Haarlem, where there had been a recent persecution, to Leiden, and that she was an adherent of David Joris (q.v.). She was arrested together with two other Anabaptist women while reading Anabaptist books in an attic. Daniel Jansz, a schoolteacher, who had given them shelter in his attic, was banished from the city of Leiden. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 204.) vdZ.

Jannetje Thijsdochter, 35 years of age, wife of Pieter Thoniszn, a carpenter at Amsterdam, belonged to the Anabaptist congregation of Amsterdam. She had been baptized about Pentecost 1534 by Jacob van Campen (q.v.), the Anabaptist bishop of Amsterdam, in the house of the deacon Jan Paeuw (q.v.). She was apprehended, apparently at The Hague, on Jan. 22, 1535, when she was on a business trip to Delft. She recanted and renounced her faith, and for this reason she was not included in the martyrbooks. Apparently she was set free after her trial of Jan. 23. The report of this trial is very interesting, because Jannetje gave much and detailed information about the Amsterdam Anabaptist congregation and its leaders; between Pentecost 1534 and January 1535 more than 300 persons were baptized in the house of Jan Paeuw (q.v.). The total number of Anabaptists in Amsterdam was about 3,500; preachers from abroad always were lodged with members of the congregation; some preachers had come from England; a plan to capture the city of Amsterdam by weapons, toward Christmas 1534, of which Meynart van Emden (q.v.) was one of the promoters, was condemned and thwarted by Jacob van Campen; in a meeting of 32 Anabaptist leaders, held in December 1534 at Spaarndam, near Haarlem in the Dutch province of North Holland, the majority had rejected the revolutionary principles. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 79; Grosheide, Verhooren, 179-84; Mellink, Wederdoper, passim, see Index.

Jannijn Buefkijn (Hans Keeskooper), an Anabaptist martyr, born in Werwik, unmarried, baptized in 1547 by a certain Christiaen, burned at the stake on July 9, 1551 (van Braght erroneously gives the date as 1550), in Gent, Belgium. His death is sung in the hymn, "O Heer u wil ick loven" (O Lord, I will praise Thee), in Het Offer des Heeren and in the Ausbund in German, "O Herr dich will ich loben." It has 13 stanzas of eight lines. It is based on a letter written by the martyr in prison, stating the confession he made before his judges, especially on baptism and communion. He also describes how a young man who had not yet been baptized because he was not well enough established in the Christian life, joyfully witnessed to his faith and suffered death for it. Hans van Overdamme (q.v.) was also executed at the same time as Jannijn. They had arranged between them that Jannijn, when he reached the site of execution, would remove his stockings, in order to give Hans more time to address the crowd. NEFF.

Offer, 121-26; Wolkan, Lieder, 66, 127, and 147; Verheyden, Gent, No. 26, p. 14; Mart. Mir. D 95 f., E 493; ML I, 289.

Jans: see also Jansen and Jansz.

Jans, Cornelis: see Mandemaker, Cornelis Jans.

Jansen, Neb., a village (1950 pop. 244) in Jefferson County, in the southeastern part of the state, was named in honor of Peter Jansen (q.v.), one of the Mennonite pioneers. Today Jansen has one Mennonite church (Evangelical Mennonite Brethren) with 73 members.

The first major settlement in the Jansen community, the Kleine Gemeinde, came from Russia in 1874-75, and settled in Cub Creek Precinct in seven small, somewhat isolated "line villages" of Rosenort, Rosenhof, Rosenfeld, Rosental, Neuanlage, Heuboden, and Blumenort. The Jansen community at one time had six different Mennonite churches operating: Kleine Gemeinde (150; 1874-1908); E.M.B. (150; 1879 to present time); K.M.B. (50; 1880-1916); G.C.M. (popularly called Peter Jansen's Church, comprised largely of the personnel on P. Jansen's ranch, 6 to 8 families, 1890-1909); M.B. (50; 1901-47); Reformed Mennonites (four or five families who held services in homes were never formally organized. Some of this group still live in the vicinity of Jansen today). The community was predominantly Mennonite until shortly after the turn of the century when mass migrations away from Jansen began, which resulted in a sharp decline in Mennonite population and the eventual closing down of all but one of the Mennonite churches. The last Mennonite church to close was the M.B. in 1947.

Today (1953) the town of Jansen has five places in which alcoholic beverages are sold, in sharp contradiction to the "clause" which Peter Jansen was responsible for having inserted into the original deed of each town lot in Jansen which prohibited the sale of liquor in the town of Jansen. D.P.M.

Cornelius J. Claassen, "Peter Jansen—Pioneer, Leader and Philanthropist," Menn. Life II (October 1947) 41-

43; G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar; Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956); D. Paul Miller, "An Analysis of Community Adjustment: A Case Study of Jansen, Nebraska" (Ph.D. thesis, Nebraska, 1953).

Jansen (Neb.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church is a congregation of 73 members (1954) belonging to the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference of North America. It began in 1879, with the first services in the homes of the members. The first pastor was John Fast, the minister serving the longest was B. O. Kroeker; the present minister is Paul F. Goossen (1956). A church built in 1891 on the northwest corner of Jansen was destroyed by a tornado in 1929, and was replaced by a new building on the north edge of Jansen. This is the only Mennonite congregation in the area. E.R.

Jansen (Neb.) Kleine Gemeinde Mennonite Church was established after the arrival of 36 families of Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) Mennonites from Russia in Jefferson Co., Neb., in 1874 under the leadership of Abraham Friesen. After meeting in homes for a time they constructed a church two miles west and three miles north of the present site of Jansen. Because of the infiltration of other Mennonite groups and the scarcity of land, the entire Kleine Gemeinde, as far as its members had not joined other groups, migrated to Meade, Kan., in 1906-8. (See also Meade Kleine Gemeinde.) C.K.

D. Paul Miller, "The Story of the Jansen Churches," Menn. Life X (1955) 38; C. Krahn, "From Russia to Meade," Menn. Life VI (1951) 18 f.; G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar; Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956).

Jansen (Neb.) Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church was founded in the Kleine Gemeinde Mennonite settlement after a group of Krimmer Mennonite Brethren had come to this community from Russia in 1877. Originally this group associated with the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren founded by Isaac Peters (q.v.). But in 1880 they withdrew and under the leadership of J. A. Wiebe founded the Jansen Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church. In 1905 or 1906 a brick church was built one mile east of Jansen. The membership never exceeded 75. By 1950 only three families were left in the community, who attended the M.B. church. C.K.

D. Paul Miller, "The Story of the Jansen Churches," Menn. Life X (1955) 39; G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar; Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956).

Jansen (Neb.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, was organized in 1890 by Elder J. J. Regier. At that time Isaac Wall was chosen minister and leader. An old saloon was purchased and remodeled into a meeting place. Later a church was built. Through revivals the congregation grew and for some time numbered more than 100 members. Later most of these members moved to newer settlements, and the congregation at present consists of only two families. Other ministers who served the church are Adam Ross, G. H. Jantzen, Waldo Hiebert, and P. V. Balzer. H.E.W.

Jansen, Arrien, a member and in 1719-20 a deacon of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, who, after 1674, promoted the idea in this congregation that baptism should be administered by immersion and thus caused much dissension in the congregation. In 1720 he left the congregation with a number of adherents, but in 1725 he was again admitted into the congregation. (DB 1874, 60, 64-73.) vdZ.

Jansen, Claes (Klaas, Klaus, Nicholas) (1658-1745), one of the first Mennonite settlers in the United States, came to Germantown, Pa., from Crefeld, Germany, in 1685. Later he lived in the Skippack area where he became a trustee in the Mennonite congregation in 1708 and a preacher in 1717. The assertion (DB 1884, 75) that he was appointed minister in 1692 or shortly after to serve together with Rittenhouse (q.v.) is not attested by the old documents. It is very probable that Claes Jansen was the ancestor of the Johnson family which was very prominent in the Lower Skippack congregation in the 19th century furnishing three Henry G. Johnsons as ministers in succession and leading to the nicknaming of the congregation as the "Johnson Mennonites" (q.v.). vdZ.

H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown, 1683-1708," MQR VII (October 1933) 231, 234 f.; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Het Tweede Eeuwgetijde van de Vestiging der Duitschers in N.-Amerika," DB 1884, 75.

Jansen, Cornelius (1822-94), a leader in the Mennonite emigration from Russia to the prairie states in 1873, was born at Tiegenhof, West Prussia, on July 2, 1822, the son of Daniel and Anna Buhler Janzen. He lost his mother at the age of ten, and then lived with his uncle Gerhard Penner, elder of the Heubuden (q.v.) congregation, who helped him in his training as a merchant. He was baptized at Tiegenhof. He married Helena von Riesen on May 4, 1848. They were the parents of six children: Margaretha, Peter (q.v.), Anna, Johannes, Helena, and Cornelius. In 1850 the family emigrated to Berdyansk, Russia, returned to Schidlitz, a suburb of Danzig, in 1852, and went back to Berdyansk in 1856. He served as "the founder and for many years the representative of the Prussian and Mecklenburg Consulate" at Berdyansk. In the early 1870's when the Mennonites felt their way of life threatened by the new conscription law, Jansen was a tireless leader in the move of immigration to America, and was consequently banished from Russia on May 26, 1873. After visiting friends in Prussia and Quakers in England, he with his family arrived at Berlin (now Kitchener), Ont., on Aug. 13, 1873. They moved to Mount Pleasant, Iowa, in 1874, and then to their permanent home in Beatrice, Neb., in 1876. Here they joined the church founded by the immigrants from Russia under Elder Andres.

In the United States Cornelius Jansen and his son Peter continued their work in behalf of the brotherhood by petitioning the United States government for permission to settle the Russian Mennonites in compact groups and by helping the immigrants find new homes. He also influenced his Quaker friends to give financial aid to the poorer settlers. He was also an active crusader for temperance both in Europe and America. His published works (pamphlets) were: Sammlung von Notizen über Amerika (Danzig, 1872), Gedanken englischer und deutscher Friedensfreunde, Gedanken über die Pflichten der Christen, Gedanken über den indirekten Militärdienst, Ausschluss der American Paper als gegen Krieg zeugend, Gedanken über Religionsfreiheit. All were published at the author's expense by the printer Paul Thieme at Danzig, the first in April 1872, the others in August 1872. In 1873 appeared Adressen an die Christenheit, Edwin Groening, printer. Pamphlets three and four were also translated into English.

Cornelius Jansen died on Dec. 14, 1894, at his home in Beatrice and was buried in the near-by Mennonite cemetery. Some 112 letters and telegrams received by the family at this time indicated what he meant to his neighbors, friends, and the Mennonites whom he had helped. Through his deep convictions he became the Moses who led his people from Prussia and Russia to the "promised land" and inaugurated a migration movement to North America in magnitude far beyond his anticipation. G.R.G.

Cornelius Jansen Collection (Bethel College Historical Library); Gustav E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar; Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration 1874 (Newton, 1956); Memoirs of Peter Jansen (Beatrice, 1921); C. H. Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); C. Krahn, ed., From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949); Georg Leibbrandt, "Emigration of the German Mennonites from Russia to the United States and Canada in 1873-1880," MQR VI (October 1932) 205-26, and VII (January 1933) 5-41.

Jansen (Jantzen), Hans (b. 1690), preacher of the Mennonite church at Dannenberg (q.v.) in Prussian Lithuania, in August 1732 because of persecution moved to the Netherlands with a number of Mennonites. They were enabled (11 families) by the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs (q.v.) to settle on farming land at Wageningen, Dutch province of Gelderland. Here Jansen, also a farmer, became the preacher. In the next year his son Christian also moved from Prussia to Wageningen. Hans Jansen, like many of his members, dissatisfied with the quality of his land, moved to the island of Walcheren, province of Zeeland, in February 1735, where also a number of Prussian Mennonites had been settled by the committee. He then settled at Oostkapele, and stayed there until 1744. At this time most of the colonists, both at Wageningen and at Walcheren, had returned either to Königsberg or Danzig, conditions having improved in Prussia. Hans Jansen also returned to Prussia (June 1744). His son Christian had returned in 1743. Of Hans Jansen, who gave the Dutch Committee much trouble by his stubbornness and his slanderous letters, a large number of which are still found in the Amsterdam archives, nothing further is known after he left the Netherlands. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1924-73 passim, 2074, 2110, 2213, 2226, 2228 f., 2233 f., 2241; DB 1905, 122-58; 1906, 94, 98, 116-38.

Jansen (Jansz, Janse), Jacob: see Job Janze.

Jans(en), Michiel, who played a part in the Flemish-Frisian schism 1566: see Michiel Jans(en).

Jansen, Peter, a son of Cornelius (q.v.) and Helena (von Riesen) Jansen, was born in Berdyansk, South Russia, on March 21, 1852, died on June 6, 1923. In 1873 he emigrated to America, settling in 1876 on a ranch near Jansen (q.v.), Neb., a town named in his honor. In 1909 he sold the ranch and retired to Beatrice, Neb. He married Gertrude Penner on May 4, 1877, and had seven children: Helen, John, Anna, Katherine, Gertrude, Cornelius, and Margaret. Soon after his arrival in America he became a representative of the railroad companies in the midwest. He was a pioneer, farmer, rancher, politician, diplomat, and traveler. He and his father were instrumental in bringing many Mennonites from South Russia to Nebraska, had an interview with President Grant and General Custer in 1874 regarding the settlement of Mennonites in the West, and took an active part in the early development of the state. He started one of the first large-scale sheep farms in Nebraska, feeding 15,000 to 25,000 sheep a year; he founded the town of Jansen and organized the Jansen Bank, which has operated continuously since 1887. In 1884 he was chosen as alternate delegate to the Republican National Convention; in 1888 he was Justice of the Peace in Jefferson County; in 1896 he was delegate at large to the Republican National Convention; in 1898 elected to the Nebraska State Legislature representing the 34th district; in 1899 named by President McKinley as U.S. Commissioner to the Paris Exposition; in 1901 represented Nebraska at McKinley's funeral; in 1904 represented Nebraska at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis; and, in 1910 was elected to the Nebraska State Senate. He was urged to run for governor, but declined because of (in his own words) "my pronounced opposition to war and all that is military."

Although he became prominent in local, state, and national affairs he always remained a friend to people in the common walks of life and was a member of the Mennonite Church until his death. He was listed in Who's Who in America in 1913, and in 1921 published an autobiography entitled Memoirs of Peter Jansen. D.P.M.

Memoirs of Peter Jansen. A Record of a Busy Life (an autobiography, Beatrice, 1921); Cornelius J. Claassen, "Peter Jansen—Pioneer, Leader and Philanthropist," Menn. Life II (October 1947) 41-43; G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar; Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956); D. Paul Miller, "An Analysis of Community Adjustment: A Case Study of Jansen, Nebraska" (Ph.D. thesis, Nebraska, 1953); ML II, 391.

Jansen, Reinier, a Quaker of Sneek, Netherlands, a lace worker, emigrated to America after 1700, and founded a printing house at Germantown, Pa. He was not a Mennonite, as has been asserted. vdZ.

DB 1884, 76; W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore, 1935) 108-16.

Jansen, Wiger, author of the Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, De geestelijke Goudschaale (q.v.) (Leeuwarden, 1751). vdZ.

Janson, Abraham (1754-1823), the son of Gerhard Janson, was an outstanding Mennonite farmer, living at Harxheim, Palatinate, Germany. On June 17, 1782, he presented a vigorous petition to the University of Heidelberg for a reduction of his protection fee from 12 fl. to 6 fl. annually, threatening that he might be compelled to change his place of residence, and join his relatives at Crefeld, Neuwied, or Monsheim, "where the Mennonites are less burdened," especially since the university was also greatly benefited by his efficient farming. The petition was granted, and extended to the other Mennonite subjects of the university in the Zellertal. A formal statement by the university issued on April 11, 1785, gives him great praise and compares him to David Möllinger (q.v.) of Monsheim.

With his father Gerhard Janson (1702-61), who had leased half the Geispitz estate in Harxheim, Abraham Janson laid the foundation for the prosperity of the Janson families in Harxheim, Dirmstein, and Bockenheim (Palatinate). During the French occupation he served ably as mayor of the three towns, Harxheim, Zell, and Niefernheim. (ML II, 391.) NEFF.

Janson, Jean (1823-96), grandson of Abraham Janson (q.v.), was a farmer in Harxheim, and was for nearly 25 years a member of the Palatine legislature at Speyer and 1881-86 a delegate to the Reichstag. His service to the cause of agriculture was recognized by Bismarck in a letter dated Jan. 18, 1879 (found in ML II, 392). Jean Janson was the possessor of the Bavarian Order of St. Michael, second class. NEFF.

Jansoon, Claes, tot Haserswoude, obviously a preacher of the (former) Mennonite Flemish congregation of Hazerswoude, Dutch province of South Holland, published Een cleyn Tractaetgen van den val Adam, followed by two hymns (n.p., 1625), and Een Belijdenisse des Gheloofs, dat door de Liefde werckt (n.p., 1627). This book is a devotional work in which are included a number of hymns, apparently composed by the author himself. vdZ.

Janssen, Dirk, after 1719 a Mennonite elder of the Old Flemish congregation (called Klerkschen or Huiskopers) at Danzig, West Prussia, a brother of Elder Anthony Janssen (d. 1725), who in 1725, after the death of the Dutch Elder Adriaan van Gammeren, at the request of the Danzig Old Flemish congregations of Amsterdam and Rotterdam, moved with his family from Danzig to Amsterdam, where he served as an elder September 1725-November 1, 1733. Then he returned to Danzig, serving there until his death in 1750. vdZ.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennoniten-Gemeinde (Danzig, 1919) 89 f.

Jans(z), Arent, b. May 28, 1610, at Groningen, d. there Oct. 6, 1679, a Dutch Mennonite elder of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, serving in his home town from about 1636 until his death. He was a rather wealthy merchant and in 1636 was one of the founders of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation, then usually called Arent Jansgemeente. In 1677 he bought a plot behind his house "de Block" in the Boteringestraat, on which a meetinghouse was built for the congregation, which still stands (rebuilt in 1813-15); in 1678 he contributed liberally for this building. In 1664 at his expense a new edition of Veelderhande Liedekens was printed by I. van Wesbusch at Haarlem. This was used as a hymnbook in the Arent Jans congregation. Arent was married to Albertje Jans Mabé; he was a son of Jan Arents in't Block, and a grandson of Arent Cornelis, a Catholic priest who had left the Catholic Church about 1580 to join the Mennonites. Both Arent Jansz's father Jan Arents and his father-in-law Jan Jansz Mabé of Groningen were preachers or deacons in the Flemish congregation, and had attended the debate held at Middelstum (q.v.) in 1628 on the question whether the Flemish congregation should unite with the other Mennonites. Arent Jansz's daughter, Albertje Arends Blok, was married to Willem Hesselink (1648-1720), a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites at Enkhuizen and later at Groningen. vdZ.

H. Dassel Sr., Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d.) 24 ff., 33; Catalogus Amst., 267; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1921, 103.

Jansz, Cornelis, author of Nootwendigh bewijs, dat sij tegen die waerheit handelen, alle die daer leeren datter niemandt eenich Doopsel ofte sacramentelijck teecken der ghenaden Christi gebruycken ofte bedienen mach, tenzij dat hij eerst bij haer in hare Ghemeynten daertoe vercoren ende verordineert is (n.p., 1603, which was an answer and a refutation of a book by C. G., entitled Een grondich bewijs uyt der Goddelycken Schriftueren . . . , n.p., n.d.). In this remarkable book Jansz defends the opinion that every brother of the church is authorized to administer baptism and communion. About the author, who belonged to a tolerant branch of Mennonitism, either Frisian, High German, or Waterlander, no further information was available. He may be identical with Cornelis Jansz (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 483), to whom Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) wrote a letter in 1592 promoting the union of Waterlanders with the High Germans and the Frisians. Obviously the Cornelis Jansz (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 576, 590) who was in 1630 an elder in the Dutch province of Groningen is not the same person. vdZ.

Jansz, Geleyn (d. about 1668), a Mennonite printer and bookseller at Vlissingen, Dutch province of Zeeland, who, like his son Jan Geleynsz, published a number of Mennonite books, including 't Nieuw Geestelijck Kruyt-Hof, 1665, a hymnbook, and in 1666, Handelinge (q.v.) der Ver-eenigde Vlaemse en Duytse Doopsghesinde Gemeynten gehouden tot Haerlem in 1649, and also in 1666, Het Concept van Ceulen, De Belijdenis des Geloofs by Outerman, and Eenige Aanteyckeningen uyt de Ernstige Aenporringhe tot de Gemeynschap der Heyligen. vdZ.

Jansz, Hero, preacher of the Old Flemish Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, serving 1610-(?), who as appears from L. de Buyser's (q.v.) Verklaringe van den droevigen handel . . . (Amsterdam, 1616), was censured by the congregation because of his idea that the Flemish branch was not the only true church of Christ. After confession before the congregation he was maintained as a preacher. De Buyser, who was not satisfied with the decision and wanted Jansz to be excommunicated, indicates that Jansz was a spiritualist, who laid more stress upon the "inner word" than upon the Scriptures. (DB 1896, 99-107.) vdZ.

Jansz, Klaas, a Dutch preacher: see Man, Klaes Jansz.

Jansz, Mees (Meys), a Dutch Mennonite elder, serving in the 17th century in the Flemish congregation of Huisduinen (q.v.), Holland. He was one of the most conservative leaders of the Flemish Mennonites, later of the Zonists (q.v.). In June 1660 he attended a Flemish conference at Leiden (see Leidsche Synode), where he represented the Zaandam congregation, having in April of that year been in Hamburg, Germany, where he performed baptism and probably ordained the preachers Dr. Werner Jansz Colombier and Gerrit Roosen (q.v.). Particulars about his life were not available. vdZ.

Verhaal van't gene verhandelt ende besloten is in de By-eenkomste tot Leyden (Amsterdam, 1661) 7, 8, 11, 21, 23, 33; B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn.-Gemeinde Hamburg I (Hamburg, 1886) 46, 60; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1310-12.

Jansz, Pieter, a Dutch elder and author: see Twisck, Pieter Jansz.

Jansz, Pieter, a Dutch Flemish Mennonite elder of Leiden and Amsterdam: see Mo(o)yer, Pieter Jansz.

Jansz, Pieter, in the 17th century an elder of the Waterlander congregation of Wormerveer, Dutch province of North Holland, who published a new edition of Hans de Ries' Confession of Faith, which he revised and provided with a large number of Scripture texts. There are three editions of Pieter Jansz's edition, of 1654, 1660, and 1686, all published at Krommenie (Biogr. Wb. IV, 526 f.). The Pieter Jansz who was about the same time a Waterlander Mennonite elder at Harlingen, Friesland (DB 1901, 74, 77), was apparently not the same person as Pieter Jansz of Wormerveer. vdZ.

Jansz, Pieter, "van den Busch" (a hamlet near Krommenie), from 1665 a preacher and from 1675 until his death an elder of the Frisian Mennonite congregation of Wormerveer, Dutch province of North Holland (he was moderator of the North Holland Frisian Conference in 1698), proprietor of a paper mill, traveled to Friedrichstadt (q.v.) in Holstein, Germany, on business and also served the congregation there, which had no minister, with preaching, baptism, and communion. He died on this trip at Friedrichstadt in 1698. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. IX, 455; J. Aten, De Doopsgez. Krommenieër Zeildoekfabrikeursfamilie Kuyper (n.p., n.d. 1953) 25 f.

Jansz, Pieter (1820-1904), the first missionary of the Dutch Mennonite Missionary Association at Amsterdam, was born Sept. 25, 1820, in Holland, taught at Delft until 1851, when he was sent to the mission in Java (May 1851). At first he took a position as tutor on the estate of an Armenian, and there carried on evangelization; in 1854 he settled in Japara. After two and one-half years of work he baptized the first five natives. Slowly with great difficulty the work expanded. The mission stations Kedung-Pendjalin (q.v.) and Bondo were opened. In 1875 he wrote a booklet, Landontginning en Evangelisatie op Java, in which he suggested that Christian settlements be established, because young Christians living among Mohammedans were always in danger of losing their Christian principles, for in Mohammedan villages religious and social life are closely interwoven. The Dutch Missionary Association, however, did not at this time accept this proposal.

In 1881 Jansz resigned from the work on account of ill health, giving it over to his son P. A. Jansz (q.v.), and entered the employment of the London Bible Society; in 1888 he published the New Testament in Javanese, and in 1892 the Old Testament. In 1895 he published the second edition of the whole Bible, as well as several Javanese readers and a very valuable Javanese dictionary in two volumes, with the titles Practisch Nederlandsch-Javaansch Woordenboek and Practisch Javaansch-Nederlandsch Woordenboek, both published at The Hague. These literary efforts won him the distinction of the Order of the Knight of the Dutch Lion. The last years of his life (1902-4) he spent at Kaju-Apu (q.v.), at the home of his son-in-law, missionary Johann Fast, where he died June 6, 1904. Neff.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 527-29; Uit Verleden en Heden der Doopsgezinde Zending (n.p., 1947) 12-18; DB 1885, 59, 61-63; 1886, 73, 82, 85; 1887, 41 f.; 1891, 31; 1892, 37, 39, 41 f.; 1904, 236 f.; ML II, 392.

Jansz, Pieter Anton (1853-1943), a Dutch Mennonite missionary in Indonesia, son of Pieter Jansz (q.v.), was born May 29, 1853, in 1881 took over his father's work and carried out the idea his father had expressed in his booklet in 1874; namely, to form a settlement and integrate all activities such as instruction, clearing of the land, school, evangelization, community and church, in founding the mission colony Margaredjo (q.v.). The colony prospered, and in 1936, when P. A. Jansz resigned, the congregation numbered nearly 800 members. The school has also been blessed in its work, especially in training native teachers. After his resignation he left his beloved Margaredjo and lived in Ungaren, giving his full time to the revision of the Javanese Bible. He died in January 1943 during the Japanese occupation of Java. Neff.

"Levensbericht van den Zendeling P. A. Jansz," in De Kleine Medearbeider, 1910; Uit Verleden en Heden der Doopsgezinde Zending (n.p., 1947) 18 f., 35 f.; several Jaarverslagen (annual reports) of the Dutch Mission Association; DB 1892, 42-45; ML II, 392.

Jantz, Peter, was born at Jeziorka, Schwetz (at that time German; now Polish), June 3, 1744, and died Sept. 2, 1810. His parents were among the original settlers of Franzthal, Neumark, near Driesen. In 1765 he married Ancke Wedel. Jantz served the Przechovka Flemish Mennonite Church and the Brenkenhoffswalde Mennonite Church 48 years as minister and the latter as elder for a period of 34 years. He was instrumental in obtaining the land and the money to build the church in 1778, having appealed to the Mennonites in Holland for aid (see Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church). (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 853.) Ja.A.D.

Jantzen, Hermann, elder of the Flemish congregation at Elbing, published a book in 1741 with the title, Konfession oder kurzer Glaubensbericht, derer bekannten taufgesinnten Gemeinden in Preussen zur Erbauung der Jugend herausgegeben. It contains 92 questions and answers. (Menn. Bl., 1857, 62; ML II, 392.)

Janz, Heinrich Tobias, Elder of the Landskrone Mennonite Church in the Molotschna settlement, Taurida, South Russia, was born Jan. 17, 1887, at Landskrone, the son of Tobias Benjamin and Margarethe (Enns) Janz. In January 1912 he married Katharina Reimer (1893-1923) in Schönau, Zagradovka. Six children were born to them. In 1923 he married Käthe Ediger, to whom were born three children. Janz was educated in the Zentralschule at Gnadenfeld and the normal school at Halbstadt, and devotedly served his home village as a teacher from 1913 to 1922, when the Soviet government made this work impossible. Janz was a member of the Margenau-Landskrone Mennonite congregation. He was chosen as minister in 1922, and as elder in 1926. Janz was a clear thinker, an exceptional teacher, and a good leader. For a time he served on the executive committee of the Association of Citizens of Dutch Extraction (Verein Bürger holländischer Herkunft). His work as elder was fruitful, particularly during the periods of the great famine, when revivals were taking place in the congregations. But this activity was unfortunately of short duration. Janz performed his last baptism in 1931. He had baptized 56 young people. In 1932 he was banished with his family from the village; two years later he was compelled to flee to Caucasia, and spent the rest of his life homeless. In 1935 he was arrested there and after a long trial sentenced to death as a political criminal. For 99 days he awaited his execution in the death cell. Then came pardon and a review of his case. His son Heinrich was present when Janz and other Mennonite preachers were led out. Janz, though only a shadow of his former self, was the only one to defend his faith and religious work. He was then sentenced to ten years of hard labor in Siberia. The last word received from him came in 1940, saying that he was partially paralyzed by a cerebral hemorrhage and was facing death by starvation in a camp in the North. The date of his death is not known. J.J.Th.

Janzen (Jantzen, Janssen, Jansson, Jansen, Johnson, Jansz, Janz, Jantz, Jans), one of the most widespread Mennonite family names of Dutch-Prussian background, derived from Jan (Johann, John) a given name, to which is added "zon" (zen, sen, etc.), the combination meaning "son of John." The name was very common among the Dutch Mennonites and found its way into the congregations bordering the Netherlands such as Crefeld, Gronau, and East Friesland; also in Schleswig-Holstein and Prussia, where it was represented in the congregations of Elbing, Königsberg, Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Tiensdorf, Orlofferfelde, Schönsee, Jeziorka, Deutsch-Kazun, etc. The name appears first on record in Danzig in 1568. From Prussia it was transplanted to Russia and later to North America, where it is found in most of the settlements started after 1874, and to South America. A branch of this name was transplanted from the Lower Rhine to Pennsylvania, where it was changed into Johnson. For outstanding leaders of the name check the various forms of the name listed in the Mennonite Encyclopedia, Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943), and the ministerial lists of Mennonite yearbooks. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 111.) C.K.

Janzen, Heinrich (b. 1869), a teacher of the deaf at Tiege, South Russia, a son of Johann Janzen, the minister of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church, and son-in-law of P. M. Friesen (q.v.), the Mennonite historiographer, b. Sept. 11, 1869, at Gnadenfeld. In the spring of 1892 he passed the elementary teachers' examination at Melitopol. That winter he spent in Frankfurt, Germany, as an apprentice to Johann Vatter, the most renowned teacher of the deaf and director of the Frankfurt school for the deaf. In the fall of 1893 he was employed by the school for the deaf at Tiege, where he remained until 1924. Meanwhile he continued his own education, especially in the handicrafts, such as work in wood, metal, and basket weaving, so that in addition to the regular school subjects his 23 years of pedagogical service included training his pupils in practical arts. Incorruptible conscientiousness in carrying out his duties, persistence in articulation, and skill in preparing visual materials so vital in the education of the deaf, and his long experience made him an invaluable asset. Later, after he had retired from active school life because of his health, he kept up close connections with the institution, serving as corresponding secretary, treasurer, bookkeeper, teacher, and promoter of the school. (ML II, 392.) H.J.

Janzen, Heinrich Johann (1844-1904), a teacher and minister of the Gnadenfeld Church (Molotschna), born at Ladekopp (Molotschna), Jan. 25, 1844. He was employed as a teacher at a small school on an estate at Hochfeld. In 1865 he took over a school with 175 pupils at Waldheim, married Maria Dirks, a daughter of Heinrich Dirks (q.v.), a missionary in Sumatra. For reasons of health he resigned his position early in 1868. He was one of the first Mennonite teachers to pass the city teachers' examination, and he learned surveying. He conducted the Gnadenfeld village school 1880-84. In 1880 he was ordained as a minister by the Gnadenfeld church. He remained an active preacher here to the end of his life, though he was absent from the congregation for extended periods: 1884-91 he served as preacher at the Vladimirov forestry camp, and 1891-93 as housefather of the Tiege school for the deaf. He died in November 1904.

As an adviser he was much sought after. He was interested in science and art; his sketches and an oil painting have some artistic merit. His literary efforts include these extant works: detailed (fragmentary) autobiography, collected sermons, devotional material, poems, hymns, and a conversion story, Ein Gnadenwunder (published by P. Neufeld, Halbstadt). (ML II, 393.) H.J.

Janzen, Jacob H. (1878-1950), a Mennonite teacher, preacher, elder, and author, a man of rare gifts and rich understanding, and influential in the General Conference. He was born on March 19, 1878, in Steinbach, South Russia, and died on Feb. 16, 1950, at Waterloo, Ont. He was educated in the Zentralschule at Gnadenfeld, and by industrious private study he acquired a teachers' certificate in Melitopol and Kharkov; and in 1913-14 he studied philosophy and natural sciences at the universities of Jena and Greifswald in Germany. He served in Russia first as a village schoolteacher; in 1908-21 he was head teacher of the Girls' School at Tiege, Molotschna. He was ordained to the ministry on Nov. 19, 1906, at Gnadenfeld. Because he was a minister he was compelled by the Red government to give up his teaching position in 1921. From that time until his emigration he served the congregations with preaching and lecturing, and also represented the interests of the Mennonite Church to the government as a member of the KfK (q.v.). In the fall of 1924 he arrived in Canada and settled in Waterloo, Ont., where he was ordained as elder on Feb. 14, 1926, and where he lived until his death with the exception of 1935-37, when he was the head of the Girls' Home in Vancouver and elder of the United Mennonite Church in British Columbia. In Ontario he did a great work in gathering and organizing the new immigrants from Russia in 1924 and the following years into congregations, especially in the Kitchener-Waterloo area. In addition he did much work as a traveling evangelist and as a writer. At least 38 published writings have come from his pen. Bethel College, where he lectured repeatedly, awarded him a doctor's degree in 1944 in recognition of his services for the Mennonite brotherhood. Particulars about his life and work, as well as a list of his writings, are found in Mennonite Life (July 1951) and also in Der Bote (April 12, 1950). He was a pioneer Mennonite writer, his articles and short stories appearing in many European and American Mennonite papers and yearbooks. (The J. H. Janzen collection is located in BeCL.) N.N.D.

Janzen, Jakob W., leading minister of Sergeyevka-Alexandertal Mennonite Brethren Church of the Fürstenland Mennonite settlement in Russia. Janzen was ordained to the ministry in 1892 and had had charge of the congregational church records since 1889. The statistics of 1905 (H. Dirks) and the address book of Mennonite ministers (D. H. Epp) of 1913 list him as a minister of this congregation. Nothing is known about his later activities. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 239, 404, 449.) C.K.

Janzen, Johannes Heinrich (1868-1917), a teacher at the Ohrloff Zentralschule in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement of South Russia and minister of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church, b. Jan. 6, 1868, at Waldheim (Molotschna), the eldest son of Heinrich Johann Janzen (q.v.). After studying for three years at the normal school in Theodosia (Crimea), he taught at the Ohrloff Zentralschule until his death in 1917, a period of 28 years. His pedagogical methods led away from dry teaching in the direction of real life situations, and his literary work, Das goldene Zeitalter der Zukunft, clearly shows his leaning toward technical schools. In religious matters he was a doubting seeker and a rationalist until 1906, when he was converted to a somewhat pietistic view. From that time on he was an active and fruitful worker in the Mennonite churches, enjoying unusual popularity and respect.

Like his father, he was an amateur artist; although his work is imperfect in technique it reveals a deep love and understanding for the Molotschna landscape. His sketches, not yet published, form a valuable contribution to the study of the Russian Mennonite milieu. Some have found their way to Canada.

His literary works are for the most part also unpublished. Among them are children's stories like "Das Märchen vom Weihnachtsmann," "Die Geschichte van Miez, Mauz, Murr, und Hinz," lyric poems and prose, pedagogical and philosophical essays and articles. In addition, a few stories have been published in periodical literature—"Der David," and "Das Falkennest." He also kept a diary. H.J.

H. Goerz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950); ML II, 393.

Janzen, Peter (1857-1918), elder of the Memrik Mennonite Church, was born in the village of Rudnerweide in the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, the son of Wilhelm Janzen and Agnes Siebert. He was the second child in the family and had two brothers and two sisters. Peter Janzen married Margaretha Isaak and became the father of three sons and five daughters.

In 1885, when the Memrik Mennonite settlement was founded in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Peter Janzen was one of the settlers, locating in the village of Michailovka. In August 1885 Janzen was one of four preachers elected by the settlers, and two years later he was chosen as leading minister of the Memrik Mennonite Church. On June 28, 1888, Peter Janzen was ordained as elder by Elder Goerz. His oldest son Peter became a preacher in the Memrik church in the later 1920's but he emigrated to Mexico.

Peter Janzen served his church faithfully and was loved and respected by his congregation until his death by typhoid fever on Nov. 17, 1918. Because of the civil war raging in Russia, the funeral had to be conducted under great difficulty in the school building of his home village Michailovka, interment taking place in the cemetery of the same village. J.A.D.

Japan. Japan proper is composed of an archipelago of four main islands and hundreds of smaller ones. Honshu, the largest and centrally located, is also culturally and economically the center of the country. Tokyo, ranking third in world population, is located centrally in this island, and is the very heart of Japan. To the south of Honshu lie the larger island of Kyushu and the smaller Shikoku. These two islands and the southern two thirds of Honshu are caressed by the warm Kuroshio currents from the south, making these areas subtropical in climate. Intense tropical typhoons sweep up from the south and lash these areas in late summer and early fall, often bringing intense suffering and destruction from strong winds, floods, and tidal waves. Hokkaido lies

MENNONITE MISSIONS IN JAPAN
MENNONITE CHURCH (MC)
1. Nakashibetsu
2. Kushiro
3. Hombetsu
4. Kamishihoro
5. Obihiro
6. Taiki
7. Tokyo
MENNONITE BRETHREN CHURCH (MB)
8. Osaka (3 centers)
GENERAL CONFERENCE MENNONITE CHURCH (GCM)
9. Kobe
10. Hyuga
11. Miyakonojo
12. Miyazaki
13. Kobayashi-shi
14. Nichinan-shi
Scale of Miles
0 25 50 75 100 200 300
HOKKAIDO
1
2
Kushiro
4
5
3
6
SEA OF JAPAN
HONSHU
7
Tokyo
SEA OF JAPAN
Kyoto
Nagoya
9
8
Osaka
Hiroshima
SHIKOKU
PACIFIC OCEAN
10
11
KYUSHU
13
12
14

far to the north, separated from the main island by the Tsugatu Straits. Hokkaido's shores are swept by the chill currents originating in the Arctic, and its prevailing winds are northwesterly, sweeping down across the vast Siberian and North Manchurian plains, so that climate in Japan varies more than her 1300 miles from north to south would indicate.

Into this archipelago, comprising only 147,707 square miles (a little less than the state of California) and lying just off the coast of the Asiatic mainland, are crowded over 80 million people. Since farming is still the main occupation, and since the country is extremely mountainous, only 17 per cent of the country being arable, farm land is at a premium and farms are of necessity small, varying from ¾ of an acre in the south to as high as 40 acres in the newly settled northern island of Hokkaido. Though rich in gold, copper, and sulphur, Japan lacks the basic natural resources for modern heavy industry, and so finds her economic life dependent largely on the often not too considerate whims of the western world.

Japanese history loses itself in old, prehistorical legend. Jimmu Tenno, the semihistorical founder and first emperor of the Japanese nation, supposedly lived about 600 B.C. He is said to have been a direct descendant of the sun-goddess, and the direct ancestor of a long line of two and one-half centuries of emperors, culminating in the present Emperor Hirohito. The Japanese are proud of this old history, and much of the religio-patriotic fervor that made possible the recent and terrible Pacific conflict grew out of this semi-mythology.

The Mennonite witness to this ancient land is not old. Though modern Protestant missions in Japan will soon be 100 years old, the Mennonite participation numbers only seven summers. After an exploratory trip by J. N. Byler, the MCC sent its first workers, Henry and Lydia Thielman, to Japan in April of 1949. With the help of Ruth and Rhoda Ressler, who arrived later in the same summer, a relief and rehabilitation work was established in the completely devastated Konohana-ku section of the city of Osaka. In December of the same year the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) sent two missionary families to Japan, the Carl Becks and the Ralph Buckwalters. A year later, in August 1950, the Mennonite Brethren Church sent their first missionary, Miss Ruth Wiens. Later that same winter the General Conference Mennonite Church's first representative, Miss Lenore Friesen, arrived also to begin language study. In the summer of 1953 the Brethren in Christ Church sent their pioneer couple, Peter and Mary Willems, to Japan.

These four groups have worked independently, yet with a very close sense of fellowship and cooperation. The M.C. missionaries went to the northernmost, neglected island of Hokkaido, G.C.M. missionaries to the southernmost tip of the southern island of Kyushu, the Brethren in Christ to the Yamaguchi prefecture in the southwestern part of the main island of Honshu, and the M.B. group stayed in and around the city of Osaka, where they have absorbed the plant and program of MCC in that city. The MCC has moved to Tokyo, where it hopes to become more active in a direct peace witness and in literature production, and where it has the Norman Wingerts and the Melvin Gingerichs as workers.

American personnel now in Japan numbers as follows: M.C. 17, G.C.M. 18, M.B. 12, and Brethren in Christ 2. A Mennonite church has arisen from the native soil of Japan which now numbers approximately 250 active members. Though many of these are young in years and all of them are young in Christian experience and come out of a religious culture foreign to Christianity, many of them seem willing and anxious to give themselves to the work of the church. Almost the entire burden of the Sunday schools is borne by the national church. Home and hospital visitation, street evangelism, Bible study, summer Bible camp, winter Bible school, village tent evangelism, personal witnessing, and a variety of other activities depend largely on this young church for personnel and support. A number of young men from the various missions are now away in Bible schools and seminaries in preparation for giving a fuller ministry to their local congregations. C.C.B.

Japara, a district of the Indonesian island of Java, formerly the center of the Dutch Mennonite missions, since 1940 an independent congregation (membership in 1953, 27 baptized, 42 children): see Java. vdZ.

Jaques Mesdagh, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jacob Mesdag.

Jasper de Schoenmaker (shoemaker), official name Gaspard Deken or de Decke, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Hondschoote (q.v.) in Flanders, Belgium, on April 4, 1562. Six other persons suffered martyrdom with him. Jasper was born at Hasebroeck (French Flanders). (Mart. Mir. D 298, E 663; Bibliographie II, No. 688; ML II, 394.) Neff, vdZ.

Jasper de Taschringmaker (official name Jaspar Hermansz), an Anabaptist martyr burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 22, 1569. He was living at Borgerhout near Antwerp and was a weetdoener of the congregation; i.e., he had to announce the place and time of the meetings. His property was confiscated and sold, realizing a rather considerable amount. His wife Maeyken Janssens van der Goes (q.v.) and his youthful daughter Nelleken Jaspers (q.v.) both died as martyrs. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 406, E 758; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 365, 370, 385, 402, 405, 477; XIV, 66 f., No. 730; ML II, 394.

Jasper Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located about four miles east of Jasper, Mo., was organized in 1883 with about 20 members when Elder John Holdeman and Preacher Frank Seidner moved to that place from New Pittsburg, Ohio. During its time of about 15 years, services were held in the homes and in the Mayflower school. The racial background of the members was Pennsylvania German. John Holdeman was the elder, and later Amos Seidner was ordained to the ministry. About 1898 John Holdeman moved to Moundridge, Kan. Nearly all the members soon afterward moved to other organized congregations.

A.L.Y.

Jater, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Aug. 9, 1550, at Arnhem, Dutch province of Gelderland. In the sentence this martyr is called Jater Willem Libresdochter, wife of Goirt Raeymakers. She was 40 years of age. From about 1529 to 1547 she had lived at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. She had been baptized about 1542 at Maastricht by Lenart (Lenaert van IJsenbroeck, q.v.). One of the principal charges against her was that she possessed a book written by Menno Simons. She frankly confessed her faith and even tried to win over the judges to her principles. She stated that true Christians are obliged to live according to "the way and doctrines of the apostles"; they do not defend their faith with worldly weapons, and in the congregation they aid one another and do not let any starve. Jater was arrested by the bailiff of Montfort at Illikhoven (q.v.) in the duchy of Upper-Gelre, where she had been living for three years, and from where she was brought to Arnhem.
vdZ.

Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 86, 242; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 328-30; the trial and sentence are published in Nederl. Archief v. Kerkgeschiedenis X (The Hague, 1913) 261-63, 268; ML II, 394.

Jaussling (Jaussle, Jausel), Ulrich (1573-1621), was the successor of Sebastian Dieterich (q.v.), as the leader of the total Hutterite community in Moravia and Hungary. Concerning Jaussling's origin nothing is known. Bossert surmises that he came from Grossgartach near Heilbronn, where there were several Josslin families after 1570. By trade he was a coppersmith. On March 14, 1599, he was made a preacher, on Feb. 24, 1602, an elder, and on Dec. 18, 1619, leader of the total brotherhood. As such he had by no means an easy position. At that time the Thirty Years' War was raging in the country, causing the brotherhood enormous losses by murder, plundering, and arson. Jaussling fled to Hungary with many helpless brethren. The strains and responsibilities of the care of the brotherhood apparently undermined his health. At the age of 48 he died at the Pränitsch castle in Hungary, April 8, 1621, 22 years after his first ordination and a little more than two years after becoming leader. The chronicles describe him as a God-fearing, zealous, and faithful leader, who left many good teachings to the brotherhood. His successor, Rudolf Hirzel (q.v.), was chosen on May 9, 1621; he was, however, not equal to the strenuous task, and was deposed a few months later.
Hege.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; G. Bossert, "Wiedertäuferbischöfe aus Württemberg," Schwäbischer Merkur, June 19, 1920; ML II, 394.

Java, the second largest island of Indonesia with 50,000 square miles and approximately 40 million inhabitants, is the seat of a century-old Dutch Mennonite mission work and two organized Mennonite conferences. The island is divided into 23 districts, of which one of the smallest, Japara, lying on the north coast, is one of the most thickly populated, and is the center of the Mennonite work on the island. After June 1898 the Mennonite mission was the only mission in this territory since the Dutch Reformed mission turned over to the Mennonite board the stations of Pati and Kaju-Apu.

The Javanese people are almost exclusively Mohammedans. Originally they were Animists, but about the time of Christ they accepted Buddhism as their national religion. In the 13th century the first Mohammedan missionaries arrived and in a short time they had overthrown the Hindu religion. Though outwardly the Javanese people accepted Mohammedanism, in their real nature they remained Animists. To this day they offer sacrifices to the spirits, whose number is reckoned at more than one thousand. The outward formality of the Mohammedan religion and its moral indifference correspond more with the Javanese character than the moral earnestness of Christianity. With their indifferent, somewhat dull character, and being given to the gross sins such as lying, stealing, and immorality, they are difficult to win for the Christian faith, which demands a more earnest, moral manner of life. The missionaries have had a hard task and have secured fruits from their labors only slowly and after much difficult and sacrificial work.

After the Mennonite Mission Society in Amsterdam decided in 1847 to establish a mission in the Dutch East Indies, the first missionary, Pieter Jansz (q.v.), sailed in August 1851 to Java. At first he located in Semarang, but in 1854 moved to Japara, a city which was not far from Semarang on the north coast. Jansz had earlier been prepared as a teacher and missionary by learning the Javanese and Malay languages and by studying the anthropology and culture of the Dutch East Indies. His work under the Mohammedan Javanese turned out to be very difficult. The first converts were baptized in 1854. In addition to preaching, he devoted himself to teaching the children of the natives. In 1856 a second missionary was sent out, H. C. Klinkert, who remained only a short time in Java. In 1857 Th. Doyer followed him, but died in 1861. Thereafter N. D. Schuurmans came out to the field in 1863 to work with Jansz. Schuurmans then took over the teaching work, while Jansz devoted himself to literary work, translating various writings into Javanese which were very useful in evangelization and teaching. In 1877, after 30 years of work, the church had only 39 members, and only 8 to 20 persons took part in the Sunday services. In 1875 the first stone school building was erected and five pupils of Schuurmans were at work as teachers in the neighborhood of Japara. In 1881 Jansz resigned from the mission field but remained in Java and translated the Bible into Javanese for the British and Foreign Bible Society. He died in 1904 at Kaju-Apu near Japara.

In 1878 P. A. Jansz (q.v.), the son of Pieter Jansz, began a new epoch of work. He had come to the Netherlands in 1867, where he secured his license as a teacher in 1871, and was appointed missionary in 1878. He inaugurated new methods of work on the mission field, basing his work on the insight that the religious and economic life of the natives was very closely related. It is almost impossible for the Javanese to be Christians within the Mohammedan cultural pattern, so Jansz combined the development of new land for agriculture with evangelization. On Aug. 26, 1881, he secured a tract of land in permanent possession (hereditary lease) for the yearly payment of 2 guilders per acre. This tract had 192 Javanese acres (one Javanese acre equals 1.9 American acres) and was later enlarged to 233 (433 U.S.) acres. The whole annual rental therefore was about 500 guilders. Jansz moved the congregation to this tract after he had established conditions which the settlers agreed to submit to. The chief requirements were the following: (1) only those who had good moral character would be accepted; (2) those who transgressed morally after acceptance would be expelled; (3) the smoking of opium as well as its ownership and sale were forbidden; (4) strong drink was also forbidden, both in use and in sale; (5) all idolatrous and superstitious practices had to be given up; (6) polygamy was forbidden, and gambling or similar practices would not be tolerated; (7) all inhabitants were obliged to attend the Sunday services faithfully, to send their children to school, and to observe Sunday as a rest day; (8) all inhabitants were to maintain their land, roads, bridges, and waterways themselves and pay regular contributions into the colony treasury; (9) the only requirement which they had to deliver to the government was a part of the rice harvest and a small annual cash payment for the land. Jansz had described these methods in a book entitled Evangelization Through Colonization in Java (Landontginning en Evangelisatie op Java, 1877). The first actual occupancy of the colony was in February 1881, which may be taken as the date of founding. The first colony (village) was given the name of Margaredjo, which means "the way to happiness." In 1901 a second colony was established with the name Margokerto, with 320 acres (608 U.S.). In 1910 a third colony was established with the name Bumiardjo, with 47 (89 U.S.) acres. And in 1925 another tract was secured with 197 (374 U.S.) acres, called Pakkies. These colonies became strong centers of Christianity in a Mohammedan land. They were the home base from which the neighboring villages could be evangelized.

Jansz devoted himself also with great consecration to teaching. When he began his work in 1878 the mission school had only 19 pupils. In 1932 the school program included a normal school, 5 intermediate schools, and 15 elementary schools, with a total of 1,264 pupils. In addition, there was established at Kudus a Chinese school with 151 pupils. A "seminary" for the training of native teachers was established at Margoredjo, which was given financial support by the government beginning in 1903, and in 1931 was designated as a normal school.

After 1878, additional missionaries were sent out to Java to work with Jansz. All of them, with the exception of a few Germans, were of Russian origin. Among them were Johann Fast who went out in 1888, Johann Hübert in 1893 (d. 1944), and Johann Klaassen in 1899 (died 1950), all from Russia. Daniel Amstutz from Switzerland served 1934-46. Hermann Schmitt and Otto Stauffer, who served in 1929-41, and Maria Klaassen, 1929-50, were all from Germany. Schmitt and Stauffer died in 1942.

The Japara mission field was divided into four districts. (1) Kedung-Pendjalin, near Japara, was the location of the first congregation. To this district belonged the colonies of Margokerto and Pakkies. In 1932 the number of Christians in this territory was 627 adults with 649 children. (2) The second district was Margoredjo, together with Bumiardjo, with 1,203 Christians and 1,189 children in 1932. (3) The third was Kaju-Apu, a location which was taken over from the Rotterdam Reformed Missionary Society in 1899. In this district, with 159 Christians and 91 children in 1932, are also located the towns of Kudus (since 1929) and Pakkies. (4) The fourth district is Kelet, where the central hospital and the leper asylum of Donorodjo are located; it had 145 Christians and 94 children in 1932. The total of the four districts was 2,130 Christians and 2,023 children. The congregation of Margoredjo was made independent in 1928, with its own native preacher named Roebin.

A third new kind of mission work was medical missions. In 1894 a hospital was built at Margoredjo, and in 1902 another at Kedung-Pendjalin. Dr. H. Bervoets, who had been sent out in 1894 as the first missionary doctor in the service of the Dutch Missionary Society, was transferred to Java in 1908 and attached to the Mennonite Mission field. He was given by the government a tract of about 50 acres of oak forest lying between Margoredjo and Kedung-Pendjalin which he was allowed to use tax-free for the medical mission program. Kelet lies some 2,000 feet above the sea level and has a pleasant climate and much natural beauty. A hospital was built here which contained four halls and numerous apartments and side buildings including a school and a church. It also had a laboratory, a drug department, two operating rooms, and a darkroom. It had good equipment, including an X-ray. The hospital also served the leper colony of Donorodjo and maintained policlinics at Keling, Bangsri, Wedaridjaska, Taju, and Pati. The hospital itself had 50 beds and was normally staffed by 4 native helpers. In 1931 it had a total of 408 patients with 12,040 days of occupancy. At the Kedung-Pendjalin hospital there were 38 beds with 3 native helpers with a total in 1931 of 280 patients and 8,204 hospital occupancy days. In Kelet, the hospital had 367 beds, 2 European doctors, 2 European nurses, 64 native helpers, and in 1931 had 1,748 patients with 108,495 occupancy days.

The leper colony of Donorodjo was opened in 1916. It was established with the help of a considerable sum of money which had been collected in 1909 on the occasion of the birthday of Princess Juliana, from people living in the Dutch East Indies, and which was granted by the queen to be used for the leper work. The name Donorodjo actually means "gift of the princess." It is a leper village in which each leper has the free use of a piece of ground which he cultivates. The patients can establish their dwellings where they wish. They have their own coinage and a store in which everything can be purchased. They also have their own administration and their own organizations under their own leadership. There is here also a school and a church. The celebration of the Lord's Supper, in which many lepers are not able to take the bread in their own badly damaged hands, is a very impressive service. Donorodjo was always under the leadership of European directors.

The mission reached deep into the life of the natives. The appearance of a Christian village is very different from that of a Mohammedan village. An official report prepared under the direction of the Dutch Minister of Health and Welfare before 1931 reported five points in which the influence of the mission could be observed, and where it had reached very deeply into the life of the people. These were, housing and house furniture, clothing, cultivation of the fields, livestock, and payment of taxes and all financial obligations. In eleven other aspects of the life of the people various favorable results were noticed as the consequence of the influence of the mission, such as the establishment of permanent marriage relationships, the resistance to native fanatics, the elevation of womanhood, better teaching and attendance at the schools, more industriousness and economy, less spending of money for worthless purposes, less gambling and less use of opium, prostitution and polygamy, and more concern for the cultivation of gardens and fields. It is generally known that the native Christians have practically nothing to do with the police, that they always perform their obligations punctually whether financial or otherwise, that they remain in their locations permanently and therefore cause very little trouble to the authorities.

The financial support of the mission program included a subsidy from the government, which in 1928 amounted to approximately 35,000 guilders. The contributions to the mission treasury from the various Mennonite countries of Europe in that year were as follows: Holland 23,000 guilders, Germany 14,500 guilders, France and Switzerland together 2,000 guilders.

World War II led to catastrophe for the Dutch Mennonite Mission in Java. When the German army occupied the Netherlands in May 1940 contact with the congregations and missionaries in Java was broken. Two German missionaries, Hermann Schmitt and Otto Stauffer, were interned. After the Japanese attack on Indonesia in 1942 they were to be taken with other internees to Singapore. On the way the boat was torpedoed by a Japanese U-boat and both missionaries lost their lives. The remaining missionaries, Daniel Amstutz and Dr. K. P. C. A. Gramberg, reached an agreement with the Javanese Mennonite leaders that all the congregations should now become completely independent of the mission. In Kelet a union of Javanese Christian congregations in the Muria area was founded on May 30, 1940, with the name "Brotherhood of the Javanese Evangelical Christian Churches in the Vicinity of Pati, Kudus, and Japara," directed by a committee of five Javanese together with Amstutz and Gramberg. The eleven autonomous congregations later elected a synod for the general management of the church with Soehadiweka Djojodihardjo, the son of Sardjoe Djojodihardjo, a former student at the University of Djahathas (Batavia) and pastor of the Pati congregation, as chairman. The church is founded on the Bible and the Apostles' Creed. Baptism upon confession of faith and the rejection of the oath, as well as congregational autonomy, are Mennonite characteristics. In November 1940 five competent Javanese preachers were ordained. Each congregation usually has an elder, several preachers, and several meeting places.

Supervision of the schools was made the responsibility of Sardjoe Djojodihardjo, and the direction of the colonies was given over to Soemjar. In Donorodjo P. J. Bouwer was replaced as director by H. C. Heusdens, a missionary formerly in the Celebes. Since it was not possible to send money from the Netherlands, some financial support was given by Dutch Mennonites in Java and the Emergency Committee of the Reformed Mission in Batavia.

In 1942, when Java was occupied by Japan, terrible disorders broke out, especially in the Muria area. Fanatical Moslems waged a "holy war." They attempted to destroy all mission property and compel all Christians to accept the Mohammedan religion. The mission hospital at Taju and the Gramberg home were completely destroyed, as were also the churches in Margoredjo and Tegalambo; several schools and churches were partly destroyed. The leper establishment at Donorodjo was plundered and the inmates fled, but Heusdens, refusing to become a Moslem, was bestially killed. Kelet was liberated after a sort of siege. Unfortunately several Javanese Christians in their distress became Mohammedans, but they later returned to the Christian church. Others, like Sardjoe Djojodihardjo and Roebin, held unwaveringly to their Christian faith.

During the Japanese occupation there were many difficulties for the congregations. Europeans were no longer permitted to work with the Javanese. The Japanese took over responsibility for the Germans on the island, and in time transferred the Schmitt and Stauffer families to Tsingtao, China, from where after the war, with the help of the Mennonite Central Committee, they were taken to Reedley, Cal. The church union took upon itself all the responsibility for as well as the possession of the former mission properties. The schools could again be opened on condition that the teachers swear an oath of loyalty. This the teachers refused to do, and the schools remained closed. Donorodjo and Kelet were supervised by the Japanese; the German Mennonite head nurse, Maria Klaassen, was allowed to remain. Without the assistance of a physician she managed the hospital with extraordinary skill until 1950. On a return trip to Germany in June 1950 her father Johann Klaassen (q.v.) died at Djakarta. Maria Klaassen is now living in California with the family of Hermann Schmitt. Gramberg tried to continue his work in Djuwana, but he was interned in Kudus. Amstutz worked for a time in secret, but he was then also interned in Kudus with his family. In 1943 the aged missionary Jansz died and in 1944 Hübert's wife died, all of whom had remained in Java. Fast had died in 1941.

The Christian churches worked on under difficult circumstances, especially because the Japanese favored the Mohammedans. Famine resulted when the Japanese confiscated all the supplies of rice. In August 1945 came fortunately the Japanese surrender and liberation. Meanwhile Indonesian nationalism awakened, and after the revolution and the declaration of independence from Holland all contacts with Europeans became impossible. The Mohammedans considered themselves the true nationalists; they did not trust the Christians because they belonged to a "western religion." Therefore the Javanese Christians organized a Christian political party, which declared itself in favor of an independent state of Indonesia.

Because of the political confusion in Java and two military missions of the Netherlands, there was for a long time not a single contact with the Dutch Mission Society. To be sure, the Amstutz and Gramberg families returned (1946) to their home countries from the concentration camps. Mrs. Gramberg had died in the internment camp after long suffering. Not until 1949 was it possible to re-establish contact.

Meanwhile a group of workers of the Mennonite Central Committee appeared in Java in 1949, which did much relief work "in the Name of Christ," first in Djakarta, and soon also in Pati and vicinity, with headquarters later in Kelet. Amstutz was sent back to Java as an MCC worker 1949-50. Beside direct relief the MCC program included a medical clinic, financial aid to the Bible school, and to the local churches. It became clear that the congregations had well survived the emergency. The congregation in the Muria area had endorsed a resolution which had been proposed at a Kwitang conference in Djakarta in 1947. The larger Javanese congregations had all declared themselves independent, and had said that the proclamation of the Gospel in Indonesia was in the first place the task of the national congregations; foreign churches including the Dutch could carry on missions in co-operation with the Indonesian churches; since the national churches were not yet in a position to assume all the responsibilities for the work they had to ask the foreign churches to assist them with workers and with money; but these churches were to understand that the situation in the new state was entirely changed: the missionaries were no longer as formerly to be the leaders of the congregations and of the work, but should rather work in more specialized vocations as needed by the Javanese congregations. In this manner the Muria congregation also asked for help. It had established in Pati a secondary theological school in 1950 to train its preachers. This school was to be the center of spiritual work, for example, for the training of church workers and for the Sunday schools and the spread of Christian literature. For this purpose they asked for three workers. In 1951 Jan F. Matthijssen and his wife went from Holland to Java, Matthijssen becoming a teacher in the theological school and an adviser of the synod. Mrs. Matthijssen organized Sunday-school work. At a synod held at Kelet in December 1951 the foundation was established for medical work, with the hope that it would receive from the Indonesian government the right to administer one or more hospitals. A missionary council was also appointed, with Matthijssen as secretary. In 1952 a second missionary, R. Kuitse, was called by the Pati congregation as a teacher in the theological school. The director of the school is Pastor S. Djojodihardjo. It has now been decided to combine the Pati school with the theological school of the Reformed Church of East Java in Malang in 1955 under a combined board and with Reformed and Mennonite (Kuitse) teachers. For the medical work the Muria church appointed the French Mennonite physician Dr. Marthe Ropp, who with a German Mennonite nurse, Liesel Hege, has already worked in Java for several years under the MCC. Daniel Amstutz is engaged as an itinerant preacher in Europe in the interest of the mission.

The theological school at Pati has proved a real center for evangelization, for example, through contact with Javanese intellectual circles and library work. An evangelistic periodical, Kabar Baik, is published in the Javanese and Indonesian languages. The Muria church is a member of the ecumenical council of Indonesia.

Since 1951 the Dutch Missionary Society and the Mennonite conferences of France, Germany, and Switzerland have been working together in support of the work in Java in the organization known as the European Mennonite Evangelization Committee (EMEK). In 1953 EMEK spent 30,887.79 guilders for the work in Java. For the work in New Guinea in co-operation with the Dutch Reformed Church the Dutch Mission Association contributed an additional 34,525.06 guilders. The chairmen of the mission association, now called the Doopsgezinde Vereniging tot Evangelie-verbreiding, since the death of Pastor Nijdam (1946) have been Mrs. A. J. Meerdink-van den Ban until 1952, W. F. Golterman 1952-54, and since 1954 Pastor H. Bremer. The present secretary is C. M. Roggeveen, and the treasurer S. J. Keyzer.

In 1953 the Malay Mennonite Church had 11 congregations, 2,410 members (plus 2,850 children), and 19 ministers, of whom 11 were elders. Following are the statistics by congregations:

	Membership
Names	Baptized	Children
1. Pati	176	122
2. Margoredjo	970	1144
3. Kelet	167	262
4. Bandungardjo	100	91
5. Margokerto	132	229
6. Bondo	103	172
7. Kedung-Pendjalin	451	469
8. Japara	27	42
9. Petjanga'an Ngeling	84	100
10. Kudus	124	132
11. Kaju-Apu	76	107

The Chinese Mennonite Church in Java, which in 1954 had approximately 1,500 members in 9 congregations, arose independently from the Dutch mission program and the Malay church, but as a result of the influence of the mission. It was organized in 1921 and has always been independent. Its center has always been Kudus (q.v.). Whereas the Malay churches are composed of 95 per cent of small farmers and laborers, relatively poor, the Chinese church is composed more of urban people who are relatively well-to-do.

Both Malay and Chinese churches were represented at the Fifth Mennonite World Conference in August 1952 at Basel, Switzerland, by their respective presidents, S. W. Djojodihardjo for the Malay church, and Tan King Ien for the Chinese church. Both men toured the Mennonite churches in Europe and North America before and after the World Conference. Herman Tan, Jr., and his wife of the Chinese church spent three years in theological study at North American Mennonite institutions in 1952-55. C.N., W.F.G.

Annual reports of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board, called Jaarsverslag, 1848 ff.; T. Kuiper gives a condensed history of the mission in DB 1885 (54-67), 1886 (73-87), 1887 (32-48), 1889 (54-63), 1890 (39-52), 1891 (30-41), 1892 (30-45), 1893 (106-20); S. Coolsma, De Zendingseeuw voor Ned. O. Indie (Utrecht, 1901); J. Klaassen, De Doopsgezinde Zending op Java (Wolvega, n.d.); C. Nijdam, De Doopsgezinde Zending (Wolvega, 1931); D. Amstutz et al., Verslagen van het Doopsgezind Zendingsveld op Java 1940-1947 (n.p., n.d.); A. Mulder, "A Century of Mennonite Missions," Menn. Life III (January 1948) 12-15; Daniel Amstutz, "Dutch Mennonite Missions During the War," Menn. Life III (January 1948) 16-19; Robert Miller, "Mennonite Churches in Java," Christian Living III (August 1956) 16 f.; Uit Verleden en heden van de Doopsgezinde Zending 1847-1947 (n.p., n.d.); Gerhard Hein, "Johann Klaassen, Das Lebensbild eines Missionars," Gem.-Kal. 1952, 19-40; ML II, 395-97.

Jay County (Ind.) Old Order Amish Mennonite settlement, near Portland, established in the spring of 1937 when seven Amish families, including Bishop Isaac E. Gingerich, moved there from Buchanan Co., Iowa. Recently several families have left the settlement, Preacher Enos Bontrager and Jacob Mast with their families moving to Tennessee in 1946, and Preacher Jacob Miller and family moving to Missouri in 1947. The 1953 membership was approximately 58; Isaac E. Gingerich was the bishop. His adopted son (ord. 1948), Perry Gingerich, is serving as a minister. N.Z.

Jazykovo: see Yazykovo Mennonite Settlement.

Jebba, a city of 12,000 located on the Niger River, Nigeria, West Africa, in which the United Missionary Church is conducting missionary work. A station was opened at Jebba in 1910 under A. W. Banfield, F.R.G.S. On May 17, 1913, C. T. Homuth held the first baptismal service, baptizing 22 converts. The present church, completed in 1926, seats 500. The station includes a Bible college, a four-room dispensary, and a school which occupies three buildings; it has 16 teachers and an enrollment of 420 (1957). There are five outstations. E.R.S.

Jedelshauser, Hans, a needlemaker from Ulm, who in 1579 had joined the Hutterite brotherhood in Moravia (most likely in Nikolsburg) together with his wife and children, but who five years later, in 1584, left this group together with his family and turned Catholic, probably under the influence of Christoph Erhard (q.v.), then a priest in Nikolsburg. He signed a Widerruf (Recantation) in which he gave 12 reasons why he could no longer tolerate the Anabaptist way. This writing, very slanderous and artificial, is in the main the work of Erhard himself, who, although well familiar with the Hutterites from personal contact, did not hesitate to accuse them of the worst vices. Three years after the event, Erhard published a small pamphlet entitled Zwelf wichtige und starke Ursachen Hansen Jedelshauser . . . warumb er mit seinem Weib . . . von den Widertauffern, so man Hutterischen Brüder nennt, sey abgetretten . . . sich aber zu der Catholischen Kirche bekehrt habe . . . (Ingolstadt, 1587, about 100 pp.). The name of Erhard appears only in the dedicatory preface. The Zwelf Ursachen covers only the first 28 pages; the rest is a similarly venomous slander against Luther, who is made mainly responsible for the origin and rise of Anabaptism. The pamphlet served a propaganda purpose in the fight of the growing Counter Reformation (q.v.) against both the sectarians and the Lutherans (copy in GCL). (ML I, 607.) R.F.

Jedwilleiten, a village in the Memel district of East Prussia, formerly Prussian Lithuania, where Mennonites settled in the early 18th century. The tradition that Mennonites from Switzerland settled here in 1713 has not been proved, but by 1722 Mennonites from West Prussia were found here. In this year a man called Berend Jenson (Jansen), who had been a member of the church, but had been banned because of his bad life, made a complaint about the Mennonites of this village to Frederick William I, King of Prussia, accusing them of having persuaded a number of Lutherans to join their Mennonite congregation. Thereupon the king issued a decree forbidding them to proselytize among the members of the Lutheran Church. vdZ.

H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 43, 69, notes 1, 5, 6, 8.

Jeens, Wytze: see Brouwer, W. J.

Jehan de la Beecke, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake after having been strangled at Brugge, Belgium, on Oct. 15, 1558. Jehan was born at Komen (Commines) in Flanders and had married at Wervik. By trade he was a mutsenscheerdere, but when he was unemployed he worked on farms. He was 24 years of age; in 1557 he had been (re)baptized. He was put to death with Pauwels Vermaete, Martin van de Walle, and Hansken van den Broecke. A man called Jan van de Beke from Komen, burned at the stake at Gent in March 1557 because of heresy (Verheyden, Gent, 23, No. 46), may have been a relative of Jehan de la Beecke. (Verheyden, Brugge, 47, No. 23.) vdZ.

Jehan Bertheloot, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Cassel, Flanders, was burned at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on Dec. 10, 1561. He is not mentioned in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. He may be identical either with Hansken Parmentier (q.v.) or Hans Lisz (q.v.), both found in the Martyrs' Mirror (D 288, E 655). (Verheyden, Brugge, 51, No. 43.) vdZ.

Jehan (Hans) Cant, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of St. Winnoxbergen, Flanders, burned at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on Dec. 11, 1561, is not named in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. He is perhaps identical either with Hansken Parmentier (q.v.) or Hans Lisz (q.v.), both found in the Marytrs' Mirror (D 288, E 655). (Verheyden, Brugge, 50, No. 42.) vdZ.

Jehan (Jan) (van) Moyaert, a rather unknown Mennonite leader, was active in Flanders about 1564. He was then about 40 years of age and a textile merchant at Rijssel (Lille) or Doornik (Tournai). Was he a relative (or ancestor) of the Dutch Flemish Moyer family, to which the elder Pieter Jansz Mo(o)yer (q.v.) belonged? (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Jehan Toulet, an otherwise unknown Mennonite preacher, who about 1564 was active in Armentières, Brugge, and other towns in Flanders. According to a letter from the margrave of Antwerp to the regent Margaret of Parma, he was a native of Armentières, a middle-aged merchant, who attended the fair at Frankfurt, Germany. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Jehanne du Boys, wife of Andries Vanneaulx, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Antwerp, Belgium, on April 22 (or 25), 1558. She was born at Antwerp and lived at Doornik (Tournai). From there she fled to Antwerp because of persecution. She was charged with "the crime of being rebaptized and persisting in the error of the sect of the Anabaptists." Her husband, also a member of the congregation, was fugitive. Probably the martyr Janneken Walraven, found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 178, E 563), is the same person as Jehanne du Boys. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 444 f., 469; XIV, 22 f., No. 256.) vdZ.

Jehring, Joachim Christian (1691-1729), a Lutheran preacher at Reepsholt in East Friesland, author and editor of a book which is an important source of Mennonite history, Gründliche Historie von den Begebenheiten, Streitigkeiten und Trennungen, so unter den Tauffgesinnten oder Mennonisten von ihren Ursprung an, bis auf das Jahr 1615 vorgegangen, anfänglich von einem Mennonisten selbst, der sich I. H. V. P. N. genennet, in holländischer Sprache beschrieben, jetzund aber . . . übersetzet und mit einigen Anmerckungen, Zugaben und Vorbericht, worinnen von denen nachhero gefolgten Streitigkeiten und jetzigen Zustande derselben gehandelt wird, vermehrt von Joachim Christ. Jehring mit einer Vorrede von Jo. Francisco Buddeo (Jena, 1720). (See Buddeus.)

This book of 336 pages has the following contents: pp. 1-73 are an introductory account of the history and doctrine of the Mennonites, in which Jehring defends them against false charges; pp. 74-188 give a German translation of the book named in the title of Jehring's book, which was written by the anonymous I. H. V. P. N., Anfang und Fortgang der Trennung der Taufgesinnten (original title, Het beginsel der scheuringen . . . , reprinted in BRN VII; see Beginsel); pp. 189-221, Obbe Philips' Confession; pp. 222-26, Menno Simons' letter to the church at Franeker; pp. 226-29, Menno Simons' letter to the church at Emden; pp. 230-32, closing comments of Carel van Gent; pp. 232 and 233, Wahrhaftiges Geschichts-Register; pp. 234-36, additions which serve to explain Mennonite history and doctrine: (1) Doctrinal statements of Uko Walles; (2) Verdict of the consistorium at Groningen concerning Uko Walles; (3) Reply of Uko Walles and his followers to the council of Groningen; (4) Baptism and communion among the Ukowallists; (5) Baptism among the Mennonites (with brief catechism and formulary); (6) Information concerning a dispute of the Mennonite church at Emden (1691); (7) Public prayers of the Mennonites; (8) Formulary for the installation and ordination of preachers among the Mennonites; (9) Agreement and union reached by the Mennonites in 1664; (10) Intercessory letter written by the States General to the canton of Bern in 1710; (11) Information concerning disputes in the church at Amsterdam and Rotterdam; (12) Concerning the Münsterites (in Latin); it is the pamphlet by A. Corvinus (q.v.). This view of the contents indicates its importance, which has not lost its significance even today. (ML II, 401.) Neff.

Jelis de Backer, an Anabaptist martyr, seized with Adriaen Jansz, a fellow believer, because of his faith. Because they refused to leave the brotherhood they were burned at the stake in 1571 at Rijssel (Lille). (Mart. Mir. D 549, E 884; ML I, 102.) O.H.

Jelis (Gillis, Gieles, Michiel), Bernaerts (Gielis van Gent), an Anabaptist martyr, was imprisoned and suffered martyrdom at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 18, 1559, with Adriaen Pan (q.v.). He was a native of Thielt, Flanders. He had been a preacher in Gent (Offer, 379). In 1556 a price of 100 Caroli-guilders was placed on his head. He apparently then moved from Gent to Antwerp. His will, two letters to his wife, and a letter which he wrote to his brothers and sisters after he had been sentenced to death are found in the Martyrs' Mirror. These letters testify to his courage and constancy, indeed to the spirit of the Anabaptists of the time. In the Offer des Heeren (1562) there is a hymn of seven stanzas which commemorates his death: "Gebenedyt God in des hemels pleyn, Verbreyt zijn wercken goet." (See also Gielis van Gent.) O.H., vdZ.

Offer, 373-92; Mart. Mir. D 251, E 624; Antw. Arch.-Blad. IX, 2, 8; XIV, 26 f., No. 291; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML I, 196.

Jelis Claversz, an Anabaptist martyr found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 536, E 871) with the information that he was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1571 with a large number of fellow martyrs. This martyr is, however, not found in the Antwerp records. Bibliographie suggests that Jelis Claversz is identical with Gillis van Havre, executed at Antwerp on May 9, 1571. This may be true. He may have been the same person as Jelis de Metselaer (q.v.), who (according to Mart. Mir. D 506, E 846) was burned at the stake at Antwerp on May 2, 1571. (Bibliographie, No. 148; ML I, 360.) vdZ.

Jelis Matthijsz, a martyr: see Gielis Matthysz.

Jelis de Metselaer (mason), an Anabaptist martyr, found in van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 506, E 846) with the information that he was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 2, 1571. Apparently the information by van Braght is not correct. This martyr is not found in the official records. He may have been identical with Jelis Claversz (q.v.), officially called Gillis van Havre. If this is true, the date of execution was May 9, 1571. vdZ.

Bibliographie, No. 540; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIV, 70 f., No. 899; ML II, 402.

Jelis (Gielis) Outerman (Aefterman), an Anabaptist martyr who was seized with eleven other Anabaptists while they were assembled for a religious service. After a lengthy imprisonment the others were executed on Dec. 10, 1561, and he on the next day, at Brugge, Flanders. Jelis was a native of Dixmuide, Flanders. His name is found in the hymn "Genade en Vrede moet Godvreesende sijn," found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 50, No. 39; Wackernagel, Lieder, 130; ML III, 330.

Jelis Potvliet, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Wervik, Flanders, with Jelis Strings and his brother Pieter Potvliet (q.v.). They were all weavers, originally from Thielt in Flanders. They were sentenced to die at the stake, but because heavy rains had made the wood too wet to burn, they were beheaded. (Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; ML III, 386.) vdZ.

Jelis Strings (Strinx), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Wervik, Flanders, with Jelis and Pieter Potvliet. For particulars see Jelis Potvliet. vdZ.

Jelles, Jarich, a native of Friesland, apparently from Harlingen, was a member of the Amsterdam Lamist Mennonite congregation. He was unmarried and the well-to-do owner of a grocery store in Amsterdam. About 1650 he retired from business to devote himself to "acknowledging the truth which is after godliness" (Titus 1:1). He was a deacon in the Lamist church from 1653. He died in 1683. After his death his Belydenisse des Algemeenen en Christelyken Geloofs was published at Amsterdam in 1684. In the appendix to this confession is found a short biographical sketch of Jelles, probably by the editor and printer of the book, Jan Rieuwertsz (q.v.). This confession is deeply influenced by the principles of Spinoza and Descartes, of whom Jelles was a devoted adherent. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 535 f.; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs II (Haarlem, 1902) 212-42; K. O. Meinsma, Spinoza en zijn kring (The Hague, 1896).

Jellys Ballam, a follower of the revolutionary Anabaptist leader Jacob van Antwerpen (q.v.), was beheaded on Feb. 17, 1535, at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel. (DB 1919, 8-10.) vdZ.

Jena, a city in Thuringia, Germany (pop. 82,722). Here the preacher Martin Reinhard, supported by Gerhard Westerburg (q.v.), opposed infant baptism without, however, ceasing to practice it. In March 1524 Reinhard had republished a book of A.D. 1430 with the title, Anzeigung, wie die gefallene Christenheit wiedergebracht mög werden in ihren ersten Stand; it contains the demands made by the Bohemian Brethren "who held to the evangelical doctrine" at the Council of Basel in 1430 (Keller, 202). After Luther's dispute with Carlstadt at Jena, Reinhard was banished in 1524. He went to Nürnberg, whence he was again banished on Dec. 17, 1524 (Keller, 227).

Several years later some events took place which were to be decisive in the suppression of the Anabaptists in Thuringia. On Nov. 20, 1535, 16 Anabaptists were seized at a meeting in Kleineutersdorf. Four men of this group, Hans Peissker, Heinz Kraut, Jobs Möller, and Lorenz Petzsch, were taken to Jena; Petzsch had not yet been baptized, and since he seemed inclined to recant he was separated from the others. The cross-examinations were begun on Dec. 1 by the city pastor and several councilors; Kaspar Cruciger and Philip Melanchthon also took part; but all attempts to make them recant failed. Melanchthon reported to Elector John Frederick the fruitless course of the investigation and advised him to apply serious penalties against the prisoners. He wrote on Jan. 19, 1536, "Although some may not in other respects be obstinate people, yet the dangerous sects must be resisted in which is so much terrible, shameful error" (Corpus Reformatorum III, 16). The three prisoners were then put on the rack. Since nothing could be pressed from them beyond what they had already said, they were sentenced to death on Jan. 26, 1536, on the strength of an opinion of the law school of the University of Wittenberg, which had been transferred to Jena because of the plague. They were executed on the same day. Lorenz Petzsch, who had been kept alone in a cell, escaped before the execution.

At the urging of Melanchthon, John Frederick issued a mandate on April 10, 1536, in which the statements of the executed were compiled and proved erroneous, unchristian, and deserving of punishment. At the same time Melanchthon wrote a booklet, Verlegung etlicher unchristlicher Artikel, welche die Wiedertäufer vorgeben, which was sent to every pastor in their jurisdiction, with orders that it be read from the pulpit and explained every third Sunday, so that every one might avoid severe punishment. It was published in Wittenberg in 1536. Hege.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Thüringen; Ludwig Keller, Johann Staupitz und die Anfänge der Reformation (Leipzig, 1888); ML II, 403.

Jenneken de Beaucoup, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Jan. 31, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Jacques Verbruggen and Hans der Weduwe. Particulars about this martyr are lacking. She was sentenced to death because of having been rebaptized and having attended forbidden meetings. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 102 f., 172; XIV, 88 f., No. 1006.) vdZ.

Jenneken de Cantere, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on May 28, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium. She was a native of Brussels. During the trial she at first denied, but later admitted that she had attended the forbidden meetings of the Mennonites. For this crime she was sentenced to death.

Apparently she was not (yet) a member of the congregation. Lynken Groffels was put to death with her. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 119 f., 178; XIV, 90 f., No. 1031.) vdZ.

Jenneken Jan Diericx (Jenneken van Diericx), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on Jan. 31, 1573, at the Steen castle of Antwerp, Belgium. P. Génard, who studied the documents at Antwerp, found the following note, the meaning of which is not quite clear: "was condemned to the stake, but since she was not willing to go to the fire, she has been executed with water" (i.e., has been drowned). (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 102 f., 173, 188; XIV, 88 f., No. 1007.) vdZ.

Jenneken Peeters, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Aug. 14, 1571, with Jan van Rijssele and two Calvinists. She was an unmarried woman, apparently rather young. She was charged with the crimes of "having joined the sect of the Anabaptists, having attended their meetings, and persisting in her heresy." (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 71, 73, 161; XIV, 86 f., No. 968.) vdZ.

Jenneken Pots, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on Jan. 28, 1576, at Antwerp, Belgium. It is unknown how this martyr and Lynken Clercx, who was executed on the same day, were put to death. Jenneken was sentenced for rebaptism, attending forbidden meetings of the Mennonites, and possessing a number of heretical books. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 198; XIV, 98 f., No. 1104.) vdZ.

Jenneken van den Velde(n), an Anabaptist martyr, is identical with Janneken (van) Munstdorp (q.v.).

Jensma, a Dutch Mennonite family of farmers, found in the Bildt area in the province of Friesland since the 17th century; many members of the family have served as deacons in the St. Anna Parochie congregation. vdZ.

Jenyn (Viviaen) Reechove (van Redichove), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on June 12, 1536, in front of the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium. No further information was available. (Verheyden, Gent, 2, No. 6.) vdZ.

Jeroen Tinnegieter, a Mennonite, probably from the Belgian province of Henegouwen (Hainaut), who had emigrated from Belgium because of persecution, and lived at Franeker, Dutch province of Friesland, after about 1560. As a member of the congregation he was chosen preacher, but in this capacity he was not accepted by the elders of Franeker, Harlingen, Leeuwarden, and Dokkum, who had ratified the Verbond (q.v.) van de vier Steden (Pact of the Four Towns). At first Jeroen respected this decision, but soon after, supported by his fellow immigrants from Flanders, he took up his office and severely attacked Ebbe Pieters (q.v.), the elder of Harlingen. A complicated quarrel arose in 1566, which in 1567 ended with a schism between the Flemish and Frisian Mennonites. (DB 1893, 12-80, passim.) vdZ.

Jeronimus (Jeronymus van der Capellen or Jerosme de la Chapelle), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 22, 1557. Jeronimus was a native of Brussels; by trade he was a maker of tin pots. He lived at Gent, Belgium, with his wife Margriete (q.v.). Here in 1555 their marriage was performed "according to the customs of the Mennonites." From Gent they fled to Antwerp, where, both being Mennonites, they hoped to live more safely. But soon they were arrested and both sentenced to death, Margriete being executed about six weeks after her husband on July 5. They died loyally; their names are celebrated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, God, heavenly Father), found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Jeronimus' property was confiscated and sold. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 433, 437, 469; XIV, 22 f., No. 242; Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.

Jeronimus Cleermaker, an Anabaptist belonging to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism. He was a native of Egmond aan Zee, Dutch province of North Holland, and was involved in a revolt at Poeldijk near The Hague (Netherlands), where he was beheaded on March 14, 1536. vdZ.

E. van Bergen, "De Wederdoopers in het Westland," in Bijdrage voor de Geschiedenis van het Aartsbisdom Haarlem XXVIII (Leiden, 1903) 275 f.

Jeronimus Pael, an Anabaptist martyr, one of the first to die at Antwerp, Belgium, where he was beheaded on Feb. 17, 1535. He seems to have agreed with the revolutionary principles of the Münsterites (q.v.). vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 137; Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 316; XIV, 12 f., No. 129.

Jeronimus Schepens, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, a shipbuilder, was burned at the stake July 14, 1576, on the Veerle square at Gent, Belgium, together with Raphael van de Velde (q.v.). The proceeds of his goods sold after confiscation indicate that he was well-to-do. (Mart. Mir. D 715, E 1026; Verheyden, Gent, 66, No. 237.) vdZ.

Jeronimus Segersz (Jeronimus Woutersz), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Sept. 1, 1551. His wife Lysken Dirks (q.v.), who had been arrested at the same time, was executed on Feb. 19, 1552, after she had given birth to a child. All the Dutch martyrbooks, from the Offer des Heeren of 1562 to van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, contain several letters which the pair exchanged while both were imprisoned at the Steen castle of Antwerp. Ten letters were written by Jeronimus, three by his wife. These letters give a striking presentation of both martyrs' fate and piety. They also contain considerable information about congregational life in those days as well as about the practices of the inquisitors. No other documents give us such a deep impression of the "faith of our fathers" as these letters. In the Offer des Heeren the letters are followed by a hymn to commemorate the steadfastness of this couple, beginning "God de Heere is ghetrouwe, hij troost de zijne vroech en spaey" (God the Lord is faithful, He comforts His own early and late). Jeronimus by trade was a tinker or coppersmith. One of his descendants was Herman Zegers, Mennonite preacher at Utrecht, Netherlands, who in 1632 signed the Dordrecht Confession. vdZ.

Offer, 126-76; Mart. Mir. D 107-27, E 504-22; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 402, 414, 417; XIV, 18 f., No. 202; DB 1864, 82-102.

Jersey City (N.J.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church was organized Dec. 15, 1940. In 1953 the congregation had 62 members with H. D. Yarrington serving as pastor. D.E.T.

Jerusalem, New, or the New Zion (Sion), a name given to the city of Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany, after Jan van Leyden (q.v.) had founded here his Anabaptist "kingdom." vdZ.

Jesse, Willem, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, was born on Nov. 1, 1833, at Rotterdam, and died on Feb. 23, 1912, at Amsterdam. After studying at the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam Willem Jesse served the congregation of Giethoorn 1858-62 and Zaandam-Oost 1862-99. He also was a permanent delegate on the board of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite General Conference) and trustee of the Mennonite Seminary. During his pastorate Jesse turned to radical liberalism. After he had resigned he gave catechetical instruction for a number of years in the "Vrije Gemeente" (non-confessional liberal congregation) founded by his friend P. H. Hugenholtz at Amsterdam. He was one of the compilers of the hymnbook of the Dutch Protestant Union, which was much used also in Mennonite congregations. The Jesse family were among the pillars of the Rotterdam Mennonite congregation: Adrianus Arnoldus Jesse (1834-1900), a brother of Pastor Willem Jesse and owner of a drugstore, served the church of Rotterdam for many years as a deacon and as moderator of the church board. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 541-43; DB 1901, 215; 1912, 209-12; De Zondagsbode, 1911-12, 70, 72.

Jesuits, members of the Society of Jesus (abbreviated "S.J.," always found after the name of a member), a Catholic order founded by Ignatius of Loyola (1481-1556), a Spanish nobleman who during an illness experienced a conversion and founded this order in 1534. Its main purpose was to assist the papacy in the fight against all foes of Catholicism, first Lutherans, later Calvinists, and all sectarians generally called "heretics." Absolute obedience to the pope was a major point of this new order, which distinguished itself from the older monastic orders in that its members did not necessarily live in monastic houses but could be active at any place where their work was needed. In 1540 the pope confirmed this new "Society," which from then on was the very spearhead of the reform of the Roman Church and of the fight by all kinds of means to regain those areas which had been lost to Protestantism and (to a lesser degree) Anabaptism (see Counter-Reformation). By 1560-70 Jesuit activity began to show some success, and 17th-century Europe was definitely shaped, at least in part, by the activities of the Jesuits.

The Jesuit activities were manifold: they were representatives of the new type of dedicated parish priests, the lack of which had worked in favor of Protestantism and Anabaptism; they found entrance to many princely courts in France, Spain, Austria, and later Poland (but were forbidden in England, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Russia), where they became father confessors of the rulers and their families, and thus exerted a definite political influence. The same holds true for smaller courts such as those of Catholic dignitaries (archbishops, bishops, etc.). Then we find Jesuits in the entire educational program of many states, from the elementary grades up to universities.

From the point of view of Anabaptist-Mennonite history only a few countries require attention: the Rhineland (Cologne, Jülich), the bishopric of Speyer, Bavaria (always a pillar of the Catholic faith), and above all the Hapsburg countries—Austria, Tirol, Moravia, and from the 18th century on also Hungary. Poland, too, was an important field of Jesuit activities but here, besides Lutherans, the Socinian or Unitarian Church was their main target.

(A) The Sixteenth Century. The Jesuits had considerable success in converting Anabaptists on the Lower Rhine, especially in Cologne, from 1557 to 1566. The details are given in a book by Joseph Hansen (q.v.), Rheinische Akten zur Geschichte des Jesuitenordens 1542-1582 (Bonn, 1896). They "converted" some, delivered many to the executioner, and had most of them expelled from the land (Rembert, 536-41). Ernst Müller reports (Berner Täufer, 195) that the Swiss Brethren who settled in Jülich-Berg in 1653 were driven out by the Jesuits.

As to the bishopric of Speyer we hear of the imprisonment (1568) of the Hutterite missionary Hans Arbeiter (q.v.), formerly a "Swiss brother" of the Rhine area congregation. From the Hutterite Geschicht-Buch (Wolkan, 327) we know of the vain attempts of a Jesuit preacher of the cathedral church (Domprediger), Dr. Lamprecht, to convince the brother of his errors and to bring him back to the old church. The story is most dramatically told by Hans Arbeiter himself. After seven months, the brother was released. The Geschicht-Buch reports once more of such an incident in Speyer. In 1612 two brethren were caught and imprisoned in Kierweiler castle, where again Jesuits worked upon them but to no avail. After having passed through much tribulation, they were finally freed (Wolkan, 506-10).

As to Bavaria, we know very little about Jesuit activities during the 16th century, although such work might be assumed. Since 1549 Jesuits were teaching at Ingolstadt (q.v.), where later a great center of Jesuit activities developed with a great university and a Jesuit press. But Anabaptism had already been weak here in the second half of the century, and died out completely around 1580-90. We know of one Hutterite brother, Christian Gasteiger, who was imprisoned in Ingolstadt in 1586, and again worked upon by Jesuits, but his final martyrdom came not in Ingolstadt but in Munich. "The Jesuits pressed hard" to achieve his death sentence (Wolkan, 423-24). In Ingolstadt also a number of polemical books against the Anabaptists were published, such as the books by Christoph Erhard (q.v.), Christoph Fischer (q.v.), Caspar Franck, and Jacob Gretser, although Erhard was not a Jesuit.

A real life-and-death struggle was experienced by the Hutterian Brethren in southern Moravia under the growing influence of the Jesuits who promoted the Counter Reformation there as strongly as possible. When the Dietrichsteins (q.v.) bought the manorial estate of Nikolsburg in 1575, hard days for the brethren were ahead. Adam Dietrichstein for the first time installed a Jesuit, Michael Cardaneus (1541-90) of Vienna, as parish priest in Nikolsburg 1579. He was called "the Nikolsburg apostle." It was the time of the papacy of Gregory XIII (d. 1585), who took a particular interest in the Jesuit activities in the Hapsburg lands as they put an end to the tolerant period under Maximilian II (d. 1576). Cardaneus also published a polemical booklet, Orthodoxa Solatiique plena nova . . . (now lost) against the heretics. Yet in spite of complaints (see Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 391-92) the pressure was still bearable and the "golden period" of the Brethren continued for another ten or fifteen years (Loserth, 186-88). Cardaneus' successor was the more aggressive Erhard (q.v.), himself no Jesuit, who, however, published his books in Ingolstadt. His time in Nikolsburg was 1583-89. By far the most dangerous of all was Christoph A. Fischer, S.J. (q.v.), parish priest at Feldsberg 1595-1607, whose venomous polemics hurt the Brethren so much that from that time on a serious decline set in. Among other sources Fischer quotes another work of Jesuit origin, the Postilla in Festis Trinitatis, by George Scherer, S.J. (written in 1586 or 89; printed at the monastery of Bruck in Moravia about 1604).

The Hutterite decline is also due to the activities of the head of the Counter Reformation in Moravia, Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.), active from 1599 on. He was strongly supported by both pope and emperor. It is interesting to learn that his official historiographer and biographer, Georg Dingenauer, S.J., was also a Jesuit and most likely of great influence upon the course of action in Moravia. He was the Cardinal's father confessor. His report of the fight against the Hutterites and of their final expulsion in 1622 is called Memoria piarum rerum gestarum a dilatione religionis catholicae in Moravia ab anno MDCXXI (1631). It was never printed, and the manuscript finally came into the Vatican Library at Rome (Bibl. Ottobononia, No. 827). In 1628 the Cardinal had asked Dingenauer to prepare a report concerning the restoration of all of Moravia to the Roman faith, in which the expulsion of the Hutterian Brethren should become the very climax, since the Cardinal was particularly proud of this his achievement (Hruby, 103-4).

(B) The Eighteenth Century. In this century the Palatinate had as its only Catholic ruler the prince elector Karl Theodor (q.v.) (ruled 1742-99), who had been educated by Jesuits and who now tried to carry out their principles. Of some renown is the case of the three children of a Mennonite widow Maurer who were taken away from their mother, baptized in a Catholic church, and kept in a Catholic orphanage. One child died there, but the others, having been released after confirmation, soon thereafter were baptized into the Mennonite (Amish) Church by the Bishop Johann Nafziger. Thereupon the children were again put into jail; an opinion of the University of Heidelberg even advised the death penalty. After prolonged actions back and forth, they were eventually released, but the minister Nafziger was exiled forever (Gem.-Kal. 1906, 54-78).

The effect of missionary activities of the Jesuits had wider repercussions again in Hapsburg territories, this time in Slovakia and Transylvania. Here the Hutterites had been able to survive on a rather reduced scale (community of goods had been given up in 1685 or 1695), as long as the government in Vienna had not singled them out as an obnoxious segment of the population. When Empress Maria Theresa (reigned 1740-80) eventually consolidated her empire, she gave special orders to Jesuit missionaries to convert the Anabaptists still extant in her realm. We read in the Geschicht-Buch and in archive records published by Beck what happened. An elaborate confiscation of books took place (Beck, 563-642), which books then were transferred to Jesuit houses in Skalitz, Tyrnau (Trnovo), and Bratislava, Slovakia, whence they were taken over by Budapest (University Library), Esztergom, and Bratislava. Actually the earliest confiscation had taken place already in 1692: the codex A b 18 of the University Library of Budapest, bearing an ex libris "Coll. Soc. Jesu Posonii," i.e., Bratislava.

Much more dangerous was the enforced "conversion" to the Catholic faith. Children were taken away and put into orphanages, men were removed into Jesuit houses either to change their minds or to die there eventually. Catholic services were held on the Bruderhofs, and everyone was compelled to attend. To all this the Empress had given her consent, and Jesuits carried out the orders, using both harsh and mild methods. One advice was to put all stubborn men into the army, but that was not carried out. In Sobotiste, Slovakia, the Jesuit missionary Emerich Rotari was active around 1760; in Levar (Velky Levary) the priest Heinrich (Henricius), a former Jesuit, was active around 1780 (the Society of Jesus having been suppressed in 1773). Even the general of the Society of Jesus himself expressed interest in this work and ordered the dispatch of more missionaries into this field in 1760 (Beck, 584-86, 587, 601, and passim, also Klein-Gesch.-Buch, 233-34). The final result was a complete conquest in Slovakia (see Habaner). Those few who still opposed tried emigration; only very few succeeded in it.

In Transylvania it was the ill-famed Father Delpini or Delphini, S.J., who carried out similar activities among the old Hutterites around Alvinc and the new Hutterites (from Carinthia) around Kreutz and Stein in 1760-67. Here the story of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch is most detailed, since Johannes Waldner, the writer, remembered it from his own youth. While Delpini's work at Alvinc was somewhat successful (e.g., conversion of Märtl Roth, the former Vorsteher), it was without any result at Kreutz and Stein (among the Carinthian newly converted brethren). "Nun steht es freilich nit in der Wölfen Gnaden, dass noch Schaf leben, also stund es auch nit in der Jesuiten Macht mit den Schäflein des Herrn nach seinem tyrannischen Herzen zu handeln" (Klein-Gesch.-Buch, 295). Delpini traveled to Vienna (taking Märtl Roth with him) to receive special permission from the Empress to use all means deemed necessary for his "conversion" work. In 1767 he established the ill-famed Catholic orphanage in Hermannstadt (today Sibiu, Rumania), and prepared to send all Anabaptist children to this place. When the Brethren recognized this ultimate danger (some adults were at that time in prison, but the brotherhood would accept that as part of their fate as a suffering church), they decided to risk a nearly desperate step—the flight from Transylvania across the mountains, uncertain of their goal and future state. Thus the intended conversion never took place. In 1767 the brotherhood moved quietly away at night. Some years later those jailed in Hermannstadt were able to reach the rest of the brotherhood in Russia, having been finally released.

In the Netherlands there was little Jesuit activity against the Mennonites, and that only in literary form. Franciscus Costerus, S.J. (q.v.), wrote a polemic on the calling of Mennonite ministers, Toetsteen van de Versierde Apostolische Successie eens Wederdoopers Jacob Pieterssen van der Molen (Antwerp, 1603).

The transfer of membership by a number of Dutch Mennonites to the Catholic Church in the 17th century, particularly at Amsterdam, including Joost van den Vondel (q.v.), was not due to secret Jesuit activity, as was assumed by some writers, e.g., H. J. Allard, in his Vondels Gedichten op de Sociëteit van Jezus ('s Hertogenbosch, 1868, pp. 3 ff.). Reyer Anslo, however, a nephew of the Waterlander preacher Cornelis Anslo, was converted by the Jesuits.

In recent times one Jesuit priest-scholar, Dunin-Borkowsky (q.v.), has made early Anabaptism the object of an erudite study claiming that the greater part of the first generation Anabaptists tended toward anti-Trinitarianism (q.v.). He has been fully refuted in that point by more recent research. R.F.

H. Boehmer, The Jesuits (Philadelphia, 1928); R. Fülop-Miller, Power and Secret of the Jesuits (1931); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Loserth, Communismus; F. Hruby, Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren (Leipzig, 1935); also the works by Beck, Wolkan, and the Klein-Gesch.-Buch; ML II, 403-5.

Jeugd-oefening in de ware Gods-dienst. Zo als de zelve onderwezen werd in de gemeente Christi (die men de Waterlandsche Doops-gesinde gemeente noemd) binnen Leiden. Of this Dutch Mennonite catechism there have been four editions: Leiden, 1675, 1683, 1704, and Alkmaar, 1726, the last with the note that it was reprinted for the Mennonite congregation of de Rijp. The titles of several editions have a somewhat modified spelling. This catechism in a modified and augmented edition was also reprinted under the title Jeugd-oeffening voor de Kinderen der Christenen, gelijk als de zelfde onderwezen worden in de vereenigde Doops-gezinde Gemeente tot Haerlem (Haarlem, 1683, 1691, 1726), the last edition much modified. vdZ.

Jeuriaens (Joriaensz), Thys: see Thijs Joriaensz.

Jever, a district in Oldenburg (q.v.), Germany. The Anabaptist movement in Jever is very closely connected with that in adjacent East Friesland (q.v.). With varying success Lutheranism vied with Zwinglianism for supremacy after 1525. The religious convictions of Count Enno (q.v.) were determined by many motives, least of all by religious motives, and swung back and forth between Luther and Zwingli. Carlstadt's great influence in the region about 1530 led Enno to take decisive steps against the Sacramentists, to expel Carlstadt, and to adopt a Lutheran church order based on the Marburg articles. But the vacillation continued.

Anabaptists from East Friesland and Holland were probably in Jever at a very early period. It is difficult now to determine what was meant by the term Anabaptist; they all agreed, however, on the rejection of infant baptism. At any rate, after the fall of Münster in 1535 and the appearance of Menno Simons they formed the main stock of the Mennonites, which fact shows that there were among them not only extreme spiritualists, but also real Täufer. Because of the confusion of confessions they did not find it too difficult to maintain their position upholding simplicity and apostolic Christianity.

Maria, who was for many years the regent of Jever (1515-75), advised by Remme of Seedieck, made several attempts to resist the Anabaptists, but never completely gained the upper hand over them. In contrast to the edicts, the measures actually adopted were very mild, expulsion being the highest penalty. The attitude of the city preachers shows the same spirit; the strong conflict of religious movements among the free Frisians did not remain fruitless. The Erklärung der Prediger Jeverlands zum Interim (1549) and the undated and anonymous Confessio Jeverensis contain Anabaptist ideas to a greater degree than do the Augustana and Apologie.

Yet the Anabaptist movement cannot have been strong. The village of Jever was, to be sure, an open town (until 1536) and as such offered transit, but probably no more, since police supervision intentionally gave this aspect emphasis. At any rate, in 1576 only six Anabaptists are mentioned, in part with their residences, at the colloquium held with them and the Calvinists, which resulted in the expulsion of the Anabaptists from Jever. (See also East Friesland.) O.S.

C. A. Cornelius, Der Anteil Ostfrieslands an der Reformation (Münster, 1852); L. Schauenburg, Die Täuferbewegung in der Grafschaft Oldenburg-Delmenhorst und der Herrschaft Jever (Oldenburg, 1888); idem, Beiträge zur Kunde der Ref.-Geschichte (1888, popularized version of the above); H. Reimers, Die Gestaltung d. Reformation in Ostfriesland (Aurich, 1917; No. 20 of Abhandlungen und Beiträge zur Gesch. Ostfrieslands); ML II, 405.

Jeyesz, Jeye (Jaye Jayesz), a preacher of the Amsterdam Mennonite Lamist church, 1648-71. After at first having opposed the progressive views of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), a preacher of the same congregation, he soon became his friend and follower and sided with him during the quarrel and schism between the moderates or Lamists and the conservatives or Zonists. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) passim, see Index.

Jeziorka (German, Kleinsee), a village near the Vistula in the district of Schwetz, former territory of Polish Prussia (q.v.). Some 13 Mennonites of Dutch origin, from Przechovka (q.v., Wintersdorf), settled there in 1727 to cultivate the land which had been laid waste by soldiers. The Mennonite group increased in 1732, when 12 families of the territory of Culm, persecuted by the Catholic bishop of Culm, also moved to Jeziorka. Like their mother church in Przechovka the Mennonite group of Jeziorka belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. Apparently they never formed an independent congregation, but were in one congregation with their brethren in Przechovka and Konopath, although a church was built in Jeziorka in 1743. They sometimes were financially supported by the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam. Though in the land leases of 1727 and again 1767 freedom of religion was granted to them, there were many difficulties with the Roman Catholic officials. Besides this the soil was too wet for profitable agriculture. For these and other reasons some of the Mennonites in 1765 moved to Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) and Franzthal (q.v.) in Neumark. In an official list of inhabitants of Jeziorka the following family names are found: Nagtigal (4), Ratzlaw (3), Becker (2), Unrau (2), Baller (1), Fott (1), Schmidt (1), Schultz (1), Pantzer (1). Again about 1813 a number of them emigrated to Deutsch-Wymysle (q.v.) in Poland. In the 19th century nearly all Mennonites disappeared from this territory. vdZ.

Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal . . . (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 30 f., 42, 45, 47, 71 note 6, 81; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1091, 1601, 1607, 1702, 1713-36.

Jheronimo Droochscheerder (cloth shearer), an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, born "bij Colm" (near Cologne?), was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1535 (date unknown), by burning at the stake after he had been beheaded. He is called "one of the principal Anabaptists." (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 366; XIV, 14 f., No. 144.) vdZ.

Jisp, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland near Krommenie (q.v.). The existence of an Anabaptist congregation here at a very early date is attested by the fact that in 1533 there were a number of Anabaptists in the town and that in 1581 the Jisp congregation was represented at a conference meeting at Amsterdam. It belonged to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch. In 1673 it seemed to be united with the Waterlander congregation of Wormer; it may later have been independent, for in 1833 a new union was made with Wormer. In 1793 the membership was so small that a decision had been made to sell the meetinghouse and to dissolve the congregation; but these plans were not carried out. The membership was 2 in 1825, 13 in 1847, and about 30 in 1900. Now (1954) the membership together with Wormer numbers 104, of which about one fifth live at Jisp. Until about 1850 services were held both at Wormer and Jisp, from then on only in Wormer, the meetinghouse in Jisp having been sold. In 1923 the congregation of Wormer-Jisp made a union with that of Krommenie (q.v.) and has since then been served by the pastor of Krommenie.

From about 1637 until the 19th century Jisp was an important whaling center. Many whaling boats were owned by Mennonites of Jisp, particularly by members of the Mol (q.v.) family; Jan Jacobsz Mol was from 1728 one of the directors of the Dutch Greenland fishery. In the 17th and 18th centuries cod-liver oil rendering and biscuit baking (for the whalers and other ships) were important Mennonite industries at Jisp. Some members of this Mol family served as preachers, elders, and deacons in the 17th and 18th centuries. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 10, 98, 253, 708, 896; DJ 1837, 16; 1941, 40; DB 1877, 80; ML II, 406.

Jo Daviess County, Ill., the northwesternmost county in the state, to which came a few immigrant German Mennonite families with the names Baer, Duerrstein, Heer, Musselman, and Neuenschwander, beginning about 1840. Johannes Baer, ordained minister and bishop in Europe, served the congregation until his death about 1863 and was succeeded as minister by Michael Musselman. Services were held in a schoolhouse until a small church building was erected south of Scales Mound near the present Hammer Cemetery, which was originally a Mennonite cemetery. Soon after 1878 the congregation became extinct. N.P.S.

Herald of Truth XV (December 1878) 211; H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931) 94 f.

Joachim of Floris (Joachimus Calaber) (ca. 1132-1202), founder and first abbot of the Cistercian monastery in Calabria, an Italian mystic, the originator of the prophecy concerning the approach of the age of the Spirit (in 1260), which was to follow upon the age of the Father in the history of Israel and the age of the Son in the history of the Catholic Church, as the third and final era, and bring about a renewal of the Spirit in secularized Christendom. Joachim's ideas became widely spread. In some respects he prepared the way for the Reformation and Anabaptism; for the former in his antipapal attitude, which became more and more pronounced among the rigorous Franciscans, and for the latter in his demand for the renewal of life and his apocalyptic view of history and of the Bible.

Thus apparently Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) was influenced by Joachimite ideas in his exegesis of Revelation, in which he has the two witnesses of Rev. 11 appear before the dawn of the new age and oppose the anti-Christian papacy, and prophesy for 1,260 days in the spirit of Elijah and Enoch. The Joachimites understood these witnesses to be St. Francis and St. Dominicus, whereas Hofmann's followers saw their Elijah in Hofmann himself. Hofmann's analysis of history deviates from Joachim's in that he divides the period after Christ into three ages. A division of world history into three parts is again encountered in the exegesis of the High German Anabaptists, who call the Old Testament time yesterday, New Testament time today, and future time tomorrow, but here all extra-Biblical speculation is absent. G.H.

E. Benz, Ecclesia Spiritualis (Stuttgart, 1934); H. Bett, Joachim of Flora (London, 1931); G. Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie (Frankfurt, 1703) XII, 3, 5; XIII, 2, 3, c. 3, 2; F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885) 93 and 195 ff.; J. Loserth, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert (Vienna, 1929) 583; ML II, 427.

Joachim Ooms (Janssens), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned in the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 9, 1560, with Joris Leerse (q.v.). Joachim was a native of Curingen in the bishopric of Liége. There is little information about these martyrs. They were pious men; after the trial they sang. Standing at the stake Joachim said, "O Father, forgive them that they inflict this suffering upon us; but we thank Thee that Thou hast made us worthy to suffer for Thy name; therefore, O Lord, assist us, and succor us with Thy help in this last extremity." At the end they sang together a farewell. In commemoration of their death the hymn was written, "O Heere God eeuwich Vader verheven," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 and in Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. NEFF.

Offer, 560; Mart. Mir. D 275, E 644; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 115, 121; XIV, 30 f., No. 334; ML II, 427.

Joachim Vermeeren (Joos or Hans or Janne), called "(de) Suyckerbacker," a Mennonite elder who lived at Antwerp, Belgium, and who baptized there as well as at Gent and other Flemish towns a large number of people, and also performed many marriages. From which year Joachim was active could not be ascertained, but in 1557 he was already an elder. He also visited the Dutch province of Zeeland and in 1565 he was in Cologne, Germany. Here, apparently together with Matthys Servaes (q.v.), he was arrested. Under the persuasion of the Catholic priest Georg Cassander, who visited him in prison, Joachim recanted. About his further fate nothing is known.

Joachim's wife was also a Mennonite; Elder Dirk Philips (q.v.) wrote a letter to her, presumably in 1559, while she was in prison at Antwerp (this letter is found in BRN X, 675-88). According to van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror D 269, E 639 the name of this woman was Adriaentgen (Jochem's Wijf). In the letter by Dirk Philips her exact name is not found. Shortly after, this woman with four other Anabaptists succeeded in escaping from the Steen castle prison. It is not clear whether she was later rearrested and put to death (as the superscription of Dirk Philips' letter suggests) or not. No documents about her are available. vdZ.

K. Vos, "De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen," in Bulletin de la Commission Royale d' Histoire de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920), reprint 338-43; Mellink, Wederdopers, 310, 399; Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.

Job (Jacob) Janze (Jansen, Jansz), an Anabaptist martyr of Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland. He left Harlingen in May 1567 and settled in a village near Den Briel, Dutch province of South Holland. Here he lived quietly for some months, but in the fall of that year he was arrested and taken to The Hague, where he died at the stake on Dec. 18, 1568, with Jan Thielemansz (q.v.). He played a role in the Flemish-Frisian schism as one of the six men who banned Ebbe Pieters (q.v.). But later he asked Ebbe's pardon, adding, "How we poor human beings have let ourselves be misled to examine the Scripture in a spirit of discord and dissension instead of love, peace, and unity." Before his death he wrote a letter to Jan Willemsz (q.v.) and Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) concerning his part in the "Compromise." A letter he wrote was published in 1609 (n.p.) with a letter by Thijs Joriaens (q.v.). NEFF, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 377, E 731; BRN VII, 542; DB 1893, 48 f.; Catalogus Amst., 100; ML II, 390.

Jobs, Jacob, a Dutch Mennonite elder, serving the congregation of the Jan-Jacobsz group (q.v.) on the island of Ameland (q.v.). In 1765 he was chosen preacher, in 1769 appointed elder, serving until his death in 1804. He was a lay preacher, having received no special theological training and governing the congregation "according to God's Word and the Mennonite usage," maintaining the old principles and even the ban, which was then quite unusual in Dutch congregations. By this maintenance of old customs he sometimes came into conflict with his congregation, especially with his coelder Cornelis Pieters Sorgdrager (q.v.), who introduced some new practices in the congregation like the "audible prayer," only silent prayers then being usual. Jacob Jobs was one of the last elders in the Netherlands who strictly maintained the Mennonite principles and customs of the 17th century. (DB 1889, 18, 31-43; 1890, 1-30.) vdZ.

Jobst, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist, who became a Hutterite elder and baptized Elisabeth, the wife of Hans Beck (q.v.), among others, apparently in South Germany about 1533. (Wolkan, Lieder, 30.) vdZ.

Jochem (Joachim) Joosten, an otherwise unknown Dutch Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 5, 1545, at The Hague, is said to have been the author of some Anabaptist books, which, however, have been lost. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 745; L. Knappert, Anabaptistica (Leiden, 1905) 149 f.

Joes Mennonite Brethren Church, located 1½ miles east of Joes, on Highway 36, Yuma Co., Col., a member of the Southern District Conference, was organized in 1892 in a schoolhouse. A sod church was built in 1893 under the leadership of Henry Bergthold, replaced in 1918 by the present building which seats 200. The present (1953) membership is 61, with Eldo Ratzlaff as pastor. Ministers who have served are Henry Bergthold, Elder David Dyck, Jacob Friesen, Abraham Heinrichs, David Strauss, Peter Fleming, and Roland Wiens. P.C.H.

Joest Jacops (Jacopssoen), author of some hymns of the Dutch Mennonite hymnary Het Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583, viz., "Jubileert met vreuchden te samen" (Jubilate with joy all together), "Ick ben seer bedroeft int herte mijn" (I am much afflicted in my heart), and perhaps also of "In druck lijden en groot torment" (In distress, suffering, and great oppression). No further information about him was available. (Wolkan, Lieder, 70, 79 f.; ML II, 386.) NEFF, VDZ.

Johan Andries(sen): see Aken, Johan Andries van.

Johan van Essen, an Anabaptist of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, who is said to have been handed over by the city magistrates to the Supreme Court in 1542, apparently was executed for the fact that he had been rebaptized. VDZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 224.

Johan Lubelei (Loebeleie), an Anabaptist belonging to the revolutionary Münsterites (q.v.), was beheaded on Feb. 6, 1535, at the Brink square at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel. (DB 1919, 7 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.) VDZ.

Johan (Jan) van Utrecht: see Jan van Schoonhoven.

Johan (Jan) van Wynssem (called Johan de Jonge), an Anabaptist belonging to the patrician van Wynssem (q.v.) family at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, who like some other members of this family joined the Anabaptists and shared the revolutionary principles of Jan van Leyden (q.v.), who baptized Johan at Münster about Feb. 17, 1534. Johan van Wynssem was arrested on Jan. 28, 1535, and after a trial beheaded at the Brink square at Deventer on Feb. 6, 1535. (DB 1919, 5, 7 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 25, 28, 79, 272 f.) VDZ.

Johann von Jülich: see Jan van Gulik.

Johann von Maastricht, an Anabaptist leader, who was present at the Anabaptist conference at Boekholt (Bocholt) in Westphalia, Germany, in 1536, is obviously identical with Jan Smeitgen (q.v.). VDZ.

Johann Nikolaus, an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded at Amsterdam in 1544: see Jan Claesz.

Johann, Sankt (Johanniskirchen), a former Mennonite congregation in the Rhenish Palatinate, which embraced the localities of Queichhambach, Böchingen, Ramberg, and Flagelstock, where services were held in rotation. In 1840 the congregation still had a membership of 100. It was greatly weakened by emigration to America, and has died out. (ML I, 74; II, 428.) NEFF.

Johann von Schoenhofen: see Jan van Schoonhoven.

Johanna van Kent, an Anabaptist martyr: see Boucher, Jane.

Johannestal Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located 15 miles from McClusky, N.D., was founded in 1904. In 1906 a meetinghouse was built. Early ministers and leaders were George Sattler and Ludwig Seibel. The latter was the leader of the Mennonite Brethren Church at McClusky. In 1924 the membership was 24. Its members have joined other Mennonite Brethren churches in the vicinity and in California. C.K.

J. F. Harms, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten Brüder-Gemeinde (Hillsboro, n.d.,-*ca.*1924).

Johannestal Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Hillsboro, Kan., was organized in 1882 by Mennonites who had come from the Deutsch-Wymysle (q.v.) and Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) congregations near Warsaw, Polish Russia. They began worshiping in private homes and in schools after their arrival and officially organized in 1882, joining the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1896. The first building was erected in 1884 three miles north of Hillsboro. In 1898 a new church was built which was later enlarged and replaced by a new one in 1922, to which a brick addition was added in 1951. The congregation was first served by John S. Hirschler. In 1886 John Gerbrandt and John Ewert were elected ministers. Gerbrandt (q.v.) was ordained elder in 1890.

There was a schism and for a time there were a First and a Second Johannestal Church, the latter being served by John D. Bartel as elder. Both groups used the same church. When John D. Bartel moved to North Dakota in 1897 John Plenert was elected elder, having been ordained to the ministry in 1893. After John Gerbrandt moved to Saskatchewan in 1905 the two groups reunited under Elder Plenert, who was succeeded by S. M. Musselman in 1937; Musselman died in 1938 and was succeeded by J. M. Regier, who served the congregation 1939-51. Roy Henry became the elder in May 1951 and was succeeded in 1954 by Delton W. Franz, and in 1956 by Esko Loewen. In 1956 the congregation had a membership of 199. C.K.

Sixtieth Anniversary of the Johannestal Mennonite Church (Hillsboro, Kan., 1952).

John Casimir (1543-92), Count Palatine at Rhein, administrator of the Palatinate 1583-92. He was the fourth son of Elector Palatine Frederick III. After the death of his brother, the Lutheran-minded Elector Louis VI, he assumed the rule of the Palatinate as the guardian of his minor nephew, who later became Elector Frederick IV, in accord with the testamentary provision. It was his aim to win the populace to the Calvinist faith, which his father was the first German prince to enter. Since the Lutheran church council did not bow to his demands, John Casimir had it removed from office; the Lutheran preachers who refused voluntarily to join the Calvinist church were also dismissed.

The Anabaptists were also required to accept the Calvinist creed, but they resisted the demand. A tense struggle ensued, which affords an interesting glance into the religious life of the populace. John Casimir saw in the Anabaptists "poor straying people," who must find their salvation in the Reformed Church. They, on the other hand, pointed out to him the corrupt conditions in his own church, which prevented their joining it.

In 1583 John Casimir then issued a severe mandate against the Anabaptist leaders as "obstinate, misleading, and seditious corner preachers," who spread an "offensive, poisonous, treacherous doctrine, harmful to eternal and temporal welfare." Their preaching and meeting were severely interdicted under threat of stiff penalty. If an Anabaptist was found out, he would have to state the grounds of his separation before the magistrate (Amtmann), and in the presence of the Reformed preacher. Whoever would not be instructed in church doctrine would be thrown into prison and put on a meager diet. The pastors must from time to time try to convert them and must meanwhile baptize their as yet unbaptized children. Anyone who still persisted in his faith would then be exiled, and his property would be managed by the city; his wife and children would receive the income from it.

The mandate admits that the Anabaptist movement was strongest where no sound doctrine was preached and where the people lived wicked lives. This fact was also the reason for the Anabaptist refusal to attend church. In the future they must have no occasion to take offense at the manner of life of a fellow citizen. The pastors were urged to "live a Christian life" and to refute and overthrow Anabaptist doctrine with arguments from the Holy Scriptures. Officials and persons in authority must support the pastors by urging the Anabaptists to go to state church services and by giving a good example in word and deed, "so that it might be said in truth that by their conduct our Father in heaven is praised." Officials were obliged to attend the sermons; special chairs should be assigned to them in the churches. No citizen would be permitted to neglect church attendance without good reason. Whoever disobeyed this injunction would be punished by imprisonment. Officials must diligently seek out Anabaptists.

But outward compulsion did not bring about the desired inward change. Five years after the mandate was enacted, the Anabaptist movement was still not suppressed, but had even spread. Banishment from the country could no longer be carried out because it harmed the state economically. Government pressure relaxed.

The state church council tried the more zealously to suppress the movement, but in 1588 confessed that without the outward political compulsion and the support of temporal authorities they could accomplish nothing. This was easy to understand in view of the offensive conduct of the people, as the pastor of Wiesloch, Nussloch, and Leimen reported to the church council; there was no hope of winning the Anabaptists into the church. They would see in the members "nothing but what pains the heart and causes offense, namely, a free, unrestrained epicurean manner with swearing, cursing, gluttony, drinking, dancing, quarreling, fighting, fornication, immorality, and the like."

In the last years of John Casimir's life, the Palatinate was hard pressed by foreign powers. A part of the population was drafted for military training in 1588; thus Johann Casimir was one of the first rulers to introduce a popular militia. Death put an end to his goal of setting up a Protestant emperor. In the last years of his reign only one act of government is mentioned that deals with the Anabaptists. In 1591 his subjects were forbidden to employ them for money. HEGE.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Martha Brandt, Johann Kasimir and die pfälzische Politik in den Jahren 1588-1592 (Berlin, 1909); ML II, 430.

John II, Casimir, King of Poland 1648-68, confirmed the privileges of the Mennonites in a document of June 16, 1650 (found in Mannhardt, pp. LXIII-LXV), which states that the Mennonites were not to be suppressed for their religion, that they should be released from the obligation of paying a protection fee, and remain in "full possession of their property, rights, privileges, justice, and all their customs."

When the Mennonites were later made suspect of Arianism in order to have them expelled from the country, the king again protected them ("in order that our income may not suffer serious loss") in an order dated Nov. 20, 1660, for "the law of 1558 against Arians cannot be applied to the Mennonites, who are farmers, and whose religious services are not public, but are held as the religious dignitaries permit them. We promise for ourselves and our successors that we intend to preserve in freedom these subjects and Mennonites in Tiegenhagen together with their descendants, and we command our officials to protect the Mennonites in accord with this order and to see that they are protected by others." NEFF.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); ML II, 431.

John III, Duke of Jülich, Cleve, and Berg, 1511-39, a vacillating prince, who especially in the regulation of religious matters was led by his advisers. In 1529 he gave the delegates from his cities strict orders to carry out the imperial mandate, which commanded that all "Luthryanen" who ventured to baptize anew should be "without hesitation punished, burned, beheaded, or drowned" (Rembert, 19). In 1533 he had a church inspection (Cornelius, 216-48) made, which was to pay particular attention to the sects, inquiring into the residence and activities of "corner preachers," time, place, and organization of their meetings, and the nature of their books. The results revealed that there were Anabaptists in many places, and strict measures were undertaken to combat them. On March 14, 1534, John issued an edict against the Anabaptists, ordering that "the leaders and inciters be brought to suitable punishment; . . . those who persist in their error be executed with fire, and those who recant, with the sword; but those simple ones who have been misled and will take upon themselves penitence and public confession shall receive grace" (Monatshefte, 161 ff.). NEFF.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer; C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs I (Leipzig, 1855); Monatshefte für rheinische Kirchengeschichte, 1917; Otto R. Redlich, Jülich-Bergische Kirchenpolitik am Ausgange des Mittelalters und in der Reformationszeit, 2 vv. (Bonn, 1907-11) in Publikationen der Gesellschaft für rheinische Geschichtskunde XXVIII; ML II, 428.

John Frederick I, the Magnanimous, Elector of Saxony, 1532-54, the elder son of John the Steadfast (q.v.), followed closely in the steps of his father. He demanded of Philip of Hesse that he execute Fritz Erbe (q.v.), the Anabaptist prisoner at Eisenach, and obtained the verdict of the Leipzig jurists, which also required Erbe's death. Nevertheless Philip was reluctant to carry out this sentence (a letter dated May 22, 1533, to John Frederick). In the reply of May 25, John Frederick insisted that Fritz Erbe be punished by death, supporting his opinion on the imperial mandates and on the opinion his father had received from the Wittenberg theologians. Still Philip did not yield; on May 28 he replied that he could give his consent only to further imprisonment or expulsion. The dispute nearly ended in a rupture between the two princes, for John Frederick intended to have Erbe executed on his own responsibility (letter of July 28, 1544); nevertheless consideration for Philip saved Erbe from a martyr's death; he died in prison.

The 19 Anabaptists imprisoned at Berka (Hausbreitenbach district), who were cross-examined on June 19-21, 1533, were treated better. In this case also, John Frederick wanted to apply the death penalty according to the imperial mandate; the chancellor Brück agreed. But Philip refused, and out of respect for him the prisoners were released.

On Jan. 26, 1536, John Frederick had three Anabaptists sentenced to death and executed upon the advice of Melanchthon (report to the elector of Jan. 19, 1536) and the opinion of the legal scholars at Jena (q.v.) (Wappler, Stellung, 149). Two additional executions followed. On April 10, 1536, John Frederick issued a new mandate against the Anabaptists, drawn up by Melanchthon. The first part repeated the mandate of Jan. 17, 1528. Then as a warning to all, and pointing out the recent executions, follow the Anabaptist articles of faith, by which they were misleading and poisoning the soul and body of the simple populace. At the same time the elector sent to every parson in the electorate of Saxony a copy of Melanchthon's book, Verlegung etlicher unchristlicher Glaubensartikel, welche die Wiedertäufer fürgeben (Wittenberg, n.d.) to be read and explained on every third Sunday.

In 1543 John Frederick had the steadfast Peter Erbe executed (Wappler, Inquisition, 90). In 1545 he wished to apply the imperial mandate to some Anabaptists in Mühlhausen. In a joint letter with Duke Maurice of Saxony (July 24) he tried to gain Philip's consent. But the latter made a decisive reply (Aug. 19, 1545), which is a beautiful memorial to his religious tolerance and magnanimity. At the end of January 1530 the court of Wittenberg had two Anabaptists put to death, causing an unfavorable reaction. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse zur Reformationszeit (Leipzig, 1908); ML II, 429.

John Frederick II (1529-95), Duke of Saxony, the son of Duke John Frederick the Magnanimous. After the capture of his father in the Battle of Mühlberg in 1547, he shared the government of Saxony with his brother John William and in behalf of his minor brother, John Frederick III; when the latter died childless in 1565, John Frederick II became the ruler of Gotha.

Like his father John Frederick II fought the Anabaptists. But after the Battle of Mühlberg his father became more lenient; on Sept. 15, 1551, he wrote from prison to his son John Frederick II: "To threaten heretics with the fear of fire and not to instruct them in the Scriptures, we cannot consider Christian or right" (Schmidt, 135). And on March 7, 1559, Philip of Hesse wrote to the duke, "We should not look only upon ourselves, but also upon other Christians, that they also may fare well, and if they perhaps err in one article, they should not therefore be consigned to the slaughtering bench" (Corpus Reformatorum IX, 759).

But these admonitions made no impression on John Frederick II. Soon after the opening of the University of Jena, which he had founded in 1558, he had his Lutheran theologians work out a confessional statement, known as the Weimar Refutation, in which he damns without differentiation all the sects: Servetus, Schwenckfeld, the Antinomians, Sacramentists, Osiandrists, Stankarists, Majorists, Adiaphorists, as well as the "Anabaptists who are an unchristian sect." The Refutation appeared in 1559, a booklet of 84 pages with the title, Des Johans Friderichen, Hertzogen zu Sachsen, für sich selbs und von wegen seiner Brüder, Hertzog Johan Wilhelm und Hertzog Johan Friderich in Gottes Wort prophetischer und apostolischer Schrift gegründete Confutationes, Widerlegungen und Verdammung etlicher Corruptelen, Secten und Irrtumen.

Duke John Frederick II was placed in the imperial ban in 1563, and arrested in 1567 at the surrender of Grimmenstein near Gotha. He died May 9, 1595, in a castle at Steyr in Upper Austria. HEGE.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); G. L. Schmidt, Justus Menius, der Reformator Thüringens II (Gotha, 1867); ML II, 429.

John Miller's Mennonite Church, former name of the River Corner Mennonite Church (q.v.).

John III, Sobieski, King of Poland 1674-96, protected Mennonite privileges and rights. When the voivode of Pomerelle promoted the expulsion of the Mennonites in the Marienburg parliament (1676) and in the Polish parliament, the provincial judge reported to the king the injury that would accrue to the economic welfare of Marienburg if this should happen. The king was convinced, and commanded that the constitution which had already been passed opposing the Mennonites, be destroyed, and in a rescript of 1678 gave them special protection. In addition to their original lands, others were now assigned to them. In 1694 the king reaffirmed all these rights, expressly designating that all the privileges granted by earlier kings should be extended to all the Mennonites living in the Werder. The regulation of Aug. 22, 1694, reads, "Since the Mennonites have shown great zeal to prove themselves deserving, it is fitting and proper to preserve to them all their rights, privileges, and customs, . . . and we will grant the free exercise of the Mennonite religion." In 1681 he saved the lace makers from oppression by the Danzig magistrates by reaffirming their former privileges. NEFF.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) 87 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 697; ML II, 431.

John the Steadfast, Elector of Saxony 1525-32, an ardent friend and patron of Luther, headed the evangelical estates in Germany and was an active promoter of the Reformation. On Feb. 26, 1525, he issued a public order for Koburg, "that no one, be he citizen, peasant, or whoever, except regular pastors, preachers, and chaplains who have charge of pastoral work at each place and are authorized to do so, shall be permitted to preach, baptize, or perform other offices of the kind at his home or anywhere else." This regulation was extended to Thuringia and Franconia on March 31, 1527.

On Jan. 17, 1528, the elector issued a new mandate against the Anabaptists (Wappler, 165), extending the scope of the previous one. All who, without office, preach or baptize, shall be arrested. Likewise all writings and books of the Anabaptists, sacramentists, and enthusiasts shall be confiscated. This mandate was to be posted on the church doors and announced every Sunday at the close of the services.

As early as February 1527, the first Anabaptists in the electorate of Saxony were seized, racked, and beheaded. They were Beutelhans (q.v.) of Königsberg, and Wolf Schreiner (q.v.). Hence it is not surprising that John the Steadfast readily gave his assent to the decree of Charles V, April 23, 1529, condemning Anabaptists to death with fire and sword. This position he stubbornly maintained in opposition to Philip of Hesse (q.v.). On Dec. 4, 1529, he wrote Philip, demanding that he have Melchior Rink (q.v.) executed, and if he could not agree to do it, he should at least have him banished, lest he lead other subjects astray. Thus he managed to have Rink exiled from Hesse and Saxony. He also wrote a warning to Count Günther of Schwarzburg, on March 27, 1530, concerning the Anabaptists, requesting that he arrest Valentine Ickelsamer (q.v.) and deliver him to Gotha. On Jan. 18, 1530, he had six Anabaptists executed at Rheinhardsbrunn, an act which caused considerable unrest.

On Oct. 9, 1531, some Anabaptists seized in Hausbreitenbach were brought to Eisenach and tried on the rack. What should be done with them? John requested an opinion of the Wittenberg theologians, which was sent in late October. It recommended the death penalty. Since the Anabaptists were no doubt revolutionary, the elector might with a clear conscience apply the death penalty against them. But though John agreed, he lacked authority to do so, for Hausbreitenbach was held in joint jurisdiction with Hesse. Thus a long-continued quarrel arose between John of Saxony and Philip of Hesse. The suggestion was made that all the Anabaptists under joint jurisdiction be equally divided between them, allowing each to proceed as he saw fit. But there were serious objections to this course.

The matter was then presented for discussion to the League of Schmalkalden in session at Nordhausen (early December 1531), but without result. Saxony insisted on the death penalty; Hesse resisted. Meanwhile Rink had again been seized. John insisted on the supreme penalty; in a letter dated Dec. 21, 1531, he expressed the hope that Philip would now have the dangerous prisoner executed in accordance with the law of April 23, 1529. But the landgrave refused. Instead he sentenced him to "eternal imprisonment." He informed John of this fact and stated that he could not sentence anyone to death by the sword for a matter of faith. The elector, defeated in the case of Rink, in a letter of Jan. 15, 1532, begged the landgrave to come to an agreement with him in the punishment of the Hausbreitenbach Anabaptists; the laws should be strictly obeyed. But the landgrave was unwilling to accede, and the earlier suggestion of dividing the Anabaptists in the area was carried out. Of the Anabaptists falling to Saxony three were killed (1532). NEFF.

G. Berbig, "Die Wiedertäuferei im Ortslande zu Franken . . ." in Deutsche Zeitung für Kirchenrecht XII, 386-88; XIII, 337-41 (contains the mandates issued by John); ML II, 428.

John William (1658-1716), Elector Palatine 1690-1716 was a strongly Catholic ruler, who was not interested in the needs of his non-Catholic subjects. Not until eight years after the death of his father, Philip William, was the "concession" granted the Mennonites renewed. Repeated petitions were ignored, largely because of the distress caused by the war Louis XIV made on the Palatinate. On Feb. 10, 1698, the Mennonites presented their petition again, and were heard. On Feb. 18 the elector issued an order to his magistrates to grant the request and carry out its requirements. On Nov. 3, 1698, followed the decree renewing the concession.

In John William's reign occurred the forcible evacuation of the Mennonites from Rheydt (1694), which attracted much attention. At the intervention of the Dutch Mennonites the States-General and King William III of England each wrote a letter of intercession (q.v.) to the elector, requesting not only that the Mennonites be granted complete freedom to carry on trade and crafts, but also that their confiscated property be restored. The States-General also wrote to Emperor Leopold, requesting his intervention with the elector to have the persecution of the Mennonites ended. Reluctantly John William yielded to the pressure of the States-General, the emperor, and the king of England. On April 12 and Aug. 17, 1697, he decreed that the Mennonites should be permitted to carry on free trade and that their property and books be restored to them at once (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 530-33).

On the whole the Mennonites were given reasonable consideration under John William. The request of a Mennonite named Schnebely to settle in Mannheim was refused, although the mayor had approved it (May 10, 1706). On the other hand, the petition of all the Mennonites in the Palatinate to be released from all military service was granted (Jan. 27, 1712). Two years later the fee they were paying the state was increased by a considerable sum. Their request to have it reduced, supported by the Dutch Mennonites (Jan. 15, 1715), was rejected. NEFF.

A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung, und Schicksale der Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (Norden, 1884); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1427 f., 1749-53, 1755; ML II, 431.

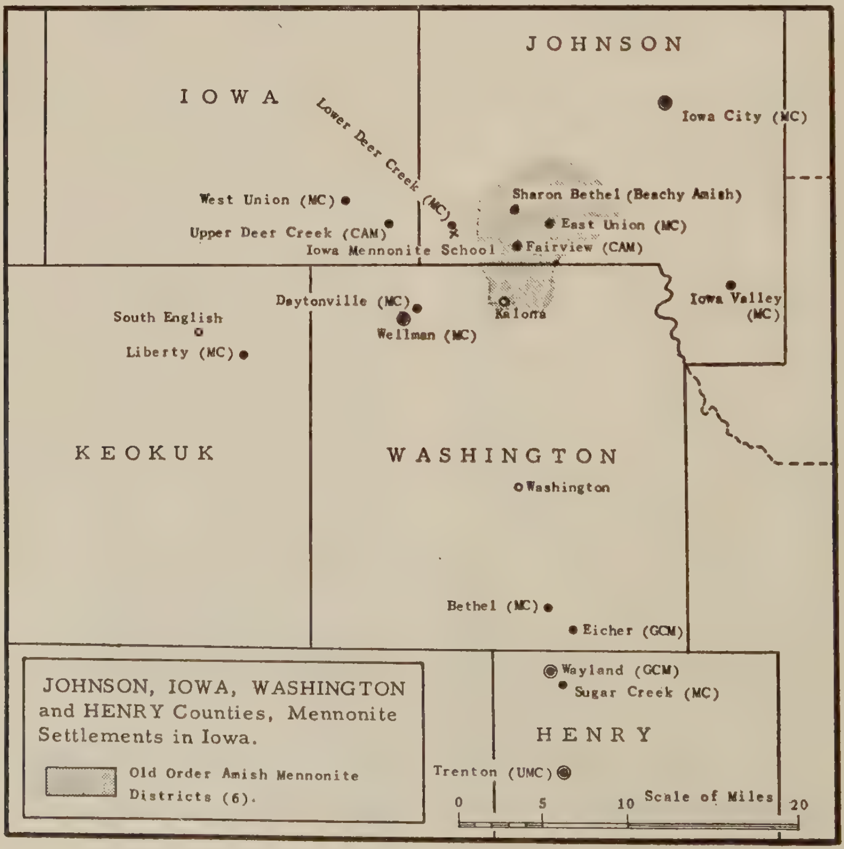
Johns, Daniel J. (1850-1942), one of the outstanding leaders in the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference and later of the entire Mennonite Church (MC). He was a great-grandson of Joseph

Schantz (q.v.), a Swiss Amish immigrant to America of about 1765, who first located in Berks Co., Pa., but later removed to Somerset Co., Pa., where he laid out building lots for the city of Johnstown, which was named in his honor. Daniel J. Johns was born in Somerset County on Sept. 8, 1850, the son of John Johns. In 1865 John Johns removed to Lagrange Co., Ind., with his family, partly because he had been elected sheriff of Conemaugh Township, an office which he could not accept because of his faith —although he felt that his brethren in the faith had helped elect him. Daniel taught school successfully for seven years. He married Nancy Yoder in 1875. Two of their six children are Bishop O. N. Johns of Louisville, Ohio, and Ira S. Johns (d. 1956) of Goshen, Ind. D. J. Johns united with the Amish Mennonite Church in 1876, and six years later was ordained preacher on the basis of a congregational vote, by the visiting bishop, Joseph Stuckey (q.v.) of Illinois. In 1887 Isaac Schmucker, who was the first Amish Mennonite bishop in Indiana, ordained D. J. Johns to the office of bishop. He was a vigorous and progressive leader. He helped organize the Indiana-Michigan A.M. Conference in 1888 and served for more than 25 years in the united conference after it merged with the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference in 1916. He helped arrange for the first Sunday-school conference (MC) in 1892, helped organize the Elkhart Institute Association in 1895, helped arrange for the first session of the Mennonite General Conference in 1898, and helped organize the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1906. As a bishop he was rather mild in his discipline as a middle-aged leader, but became more strict in his later years. He died May 22, 1942, about 60 years after his ordination as preacher. J.C.W.

Johns, Joseph (Schantz) (1749-1813), a Swiss Amish immigrant of 1769 who located in the angle formed by the converging Stony Creek and Conemaugh River on the present site of Johnstown, Pa., in 1793. In a charter of Nov. 3, 1800, he deeded most of his farm, together with a plot of 141 lots (with instructions for public buildings including a school and courthouse), for a town, Conemaugh. The name was later changed to Johnstown in his honor, made legal in 1834. The city now has a population of 67,000. Johns, like other Amishmen, moved away from the growing town to a farm nine miles south, near the present village of Davidsville (named after Amishman David Stutzman), in 1807, where he and his descendants, including his son John and grandson, also named Joseph Johns (Amish members), are buried. A statue of Joseph Johns (by J. Otto Schweizer) was erected on the town square in 1913 on the occasion of the first centennial of Johnstown. J.A.H.

Somerset County Deed Book II, 246-47; Maurice A. Mook, "Amishman Who Founded a City," Christian Living II (July 1955).

John's Lake Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the M.B. Central District Conference, formerly



JOHNSON, IOWA, WASHINGTON and HENRY Counties, Mennonite Settlements in Iowa.

JOHNSON
IOWA
Lower Deer Creek (MC)
Iowa City (MC)
West Union (MC)
Upper Deer Creek (CAM)
Iowa Mennonite School
Sharon Bethel (Beachy Amish)
East Union (MC)
Fairview (CAM)
Daytonville (MC)
South English
Liberty (MC)
Wellman (MC)
Kalona
Iowa Valley (MC)
KEOKUK
WASHINGTON
Washington
Bethel (MC)
Eicher (GCM)
Wayland (GCM)
Sugar Creek (MC)
HENRY
Trenton (UMC)
Old Order Amish Mennonite Districts (6).
Scale of Miles
0
5
10
20

known as Johannesthal, located at Regan, Burleigh Co., N.D., was organized by Ludwig Seibel. A church was built in 1916. The congregation is affiliated with the McClusky M.B. Church, and has been served by its pastors. The membership of 24 was listed under McClusky only in the 1954 Central District Conference Yearbook. Lillian Schafer, missionary to Colombia, South America, and Elsie Schafer, a Christian worker, have come from this church. A.A.D.

Johnson County, Iowa, in the eastern part of the state, lies approximately 50-70 miles west of Davenport. It is an agricultural county with only one large city, Iowa City (q.v.), within its borders. Located within the county are six Mennonite churches; East Union, Lower Deer Creek, Iowa Valley, and Iowa City are members of the Iowa-Nebraska (MC) Conference, while Fairview is Conservative Amish Mennonite and Sharon-Bethel is Beachy Amish. All but Iowa City and Iowa Valley are located in the southwest corner of the county. In the same general area are six Old Order Amish districts with 464 members, most of whom live in Johnson County. The Johnson-Iowa-Washington county settlement contains 2,821 Amish and Mennonite church members in 16 congregations of whom approximately 1,800 live in Johnson County. Of the 2,821 members, 1,835 belong to the Mennonite Church (MC), 470 to the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference, 52 to the Beachy Amish, and 464 to the Old Order Amish.

The first Amish to move into the county came from Ohio and Pennsylvania in 1846. The settlement was one of the most successful established by the Amish in the central states and has grown steadily during the past century. As the home of three generations of Swartzendruber bishops—Jacob, Frederick, and Jacob F.—as well as of Samuel D. Guengerich (q.v.) and his publishing enterprise, the community has been unusually influential in Amish Mennonite circles. Recently the Iowa Mennonite School (q.v.) was established in the heart of the Johnson County Mennonite community. Unusual also is the fact that from this Amish community have come at least nine Mennonites who have earned the doctor of philosophy degree. At least 12 Elkhart Institute and Goshen College faculty members were born in this settlement. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939); E. G. Swartzendruber, Amish and Mennonite Church Centennial near Wellman and Kalona, Iowa (Wellman, Iowa, 1953).

Johnson County, Mo., approximately 50 miles southeast of Kansas City, with Cass County (q.v.) on its western border, at one time contained an Amish Mennonite settlement, located in the southwestern part of the county near Holden. The first Amish settlers in the community were Joseph Gerber and his family, who moved here from Indiana around 1870. The first church was built in 1889 and was located six miles southwest of Holden. By 1893 the congregation, named Pleasant View, had 53 members, who were served by the preachers David Morrell and Andrew Miller, both old men. Later in this decade Henry Rychener was ordained to serve the church. Under his leadership the church changed from German to English services. At its highest membership, the congregation numbered approximately 100. After Rychener moved to Ohio, D. B. Raber was ordained to serve the congregation. About 1908 members began to move from the community to Cass Co., Mo., Aurora, Ohio, and other places. When Raber moved to Portage Co., Ohio, in 1911 the church was without a minister and eventually became extinct. M.G.

Johnson, Francis, born at Richmond, England, in 1562, died at Amsterdam, Netherlands, Jan. 10, 1618, was a Puritan minister banished from England in 1590 because he had offended the queen. He then successively was a pastor of an English emigrant group at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, converted to Brownism (q.v.) in 1592, became pastor of the Brownist congregation of Islington near London, England, in 1592, was in prison at London 1593-97, and after 1598 served as pastor of a Brownist congregation at Amsterdam with Thomas Ainsworth (q.v.), with whom he fell into discord, so that Ainsworth and a large number of members separated from Johnson and his followers, called Johnsonians or Francisites, in 1610. In 1612 Johnson was ordered by the magistrates of Amsterdam to leave the city; he then moved to Emden, Germany, but soon was back in Amsterdam, where he died. Johnson, an ambitious and a quarrelsome man, is of interest for Mennonite history, because he, in the period in which there were many contacts between Mennonites and Brownists and a number of Brownists had intended to join the Mennonites (see Smyth, John), fervently tried to prevent this union. Some of his other writings were: A Brief Treatise Containing Reasons Against Two Errors of the Anabaptists (n.p., 1609-10, reprinted 1645) and A Christian Plea, Conteyning Three Treatises Touching the Anabaptists and Others (n.p., 1617). vdZ.

J. G. de Hoop Scheffer-W. E. Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, N.Y., n.d.-1922) passim; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 461-63.

Johnson, Nicholas (1787-1873), a resident of Fayette County, Pa., near Masontown, ordained deacon in 1809, then minister and finally bishop in 1840 in the Masontown Mennonite (MC) Church. A progressive leader, he has the credit of introducing in 1842 the first Mennonite Sunday school. H.S.B.

Johnson Mennonites. The original Skippack Mennonite congregation and meetinghouse were located in what was then Bebber's (now Skippack) Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa. The Mennonite settlement was begun there in 1702. The first meetinghouse, erected about 1725, was replaced by a new meetinghouse in 1844. Three years later came the Oberholtzer schism in the Franconia Conference, and a portion of the congregation seceded with him. The other portion of the congregation, which remained in the Franconia Conference, rather than to resort to litigation withdrew and erected the Upper Skippack meetinghouse in 1848. The old Skippack meetinghouse and congregation then came to be called Lower Skippack. The Lower Skippack congregation passed through some trials after the division of 1847, one of which was the lack of harmony between its preacher, Henry G. Johnson, and the new Oberholtzer Conference. For instance, Johnson wished to promote the observance of footwashing, whereas the conference wished to allow congregational freedom on the matter. As a result the Lower Skippack group ceased attending the sessions of the conference. The conference then passed a resolution on May 15, 1859, declaring the ministers and delegates of the group to be out of order, since they had ceased to attend the conference. Most of Johnson's congregation stood by him and withdrew from the conference, the group retaining the ownership of the meetinghouse. A small part of the congregation, however, maintained connections with the conference and conducted separate services in the meetinghouse until they were denied the use of the building in 1865. By resolution on May 4, 1886, the conference officially declared that the congregation had ceased to exist. Among the ministers ordained by the Johnson group were Johnson's son, Henry H. Johnson, in 1878, and his grandson, Henry M. Johnson, in 1915. The group was therefore commonly known as the "Johnson Mennonites." It has continued as a congregation with a membership (1954) of 300, with Henry M. Johnson as bishop, Frank Crall as minister, and Warren B. Anders as deacon. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 96-99, 359, 360.

Johnstown, Pa., is a city (pop. 67,000) in Cambria County, adjacent to a large Mennonite (MC) settlement in northern Somerset County and southern Cambria County. Johnstown was named after Joseph Johns (q.v.), an Amishman who settled here in 1793 and platted part of his farm for a town in 1800. The Mennonites (MC) settled in this area about 1790. The area has a membership of 850 with eight churches, one of them a mission church located in the city, all belonging to the Allegheny Conference. Only a small percentage of the membership ever lived in the city before 1939, when the mission was started there. Johnstown is the shopping center of this area. Johnstown is known as the "flood city," having been destroyed in 1889 by the breaking of a dam near South Fork about 13 miles above the town. It has large steel mills, and large coal workings in the surrounding area, making it an important industrial city. A.KA.

Johnstown Bible School, Johnstown, Pa., a six-week winter Bible school, held annually in January and February in the Stahl Mennonite (MC) Church near Hollsopple, Pa., was begun in 1922, as a result of urging by S. G. Shetler, the minister of the Stahl church. It is controlled by an autonomous board of ten, including three Allegheny Conference appointees. Its enrollment has never been large, in 1955 being 24 for the day school, 70 in the evening school. The principals have been S. G. Shetler 1925-35 and 1940-42, E. C. Bender 1937-39, Lloy Kniss 1942-44, Sanford G. Shetler 1944-47, Paul Roth 1947-54, Harry Y. Shetler 1954-56. The day school was discontinued in 1956. H.S.B.

C. Y. Fretz, "A History of Winter Bible Schools in the Mennonite Church," MQR XVI (1942) 51-81, 178-96.

Johnstown First Mennonite Church (MC) was founded in 1939 as a mission under the district mission board of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Mennonite Conference (now Allegheny Mennonite Conference), which still sponsors it. The services were held in rented dwelling houses until 1949. In 1945 a lot with house was purchased close to the center of the city; the house was converted into a parsonage. A brick meetinghouse was built on an adjoining lot, and dedicated in 1949. The membership was 66 in 1955, with John E. Gingrich as pastor and bishop (ord. 1955). J.E.G.

Johnstown (Col.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, had its origin in 1906, when a number of Mennonite Brethren families who had moved from Kirk to Loveland, Col., organized a congregation with Henry Nickel as leader. By 1924 the membership numbered 37. In 1926 the Loveland church was relocated in Johnstown, Col. In the following years attendance ran as high as 100; however, being unable to buy or rent land, more and more people left for other Mennonite areas, especially in California. By 1943 the membership had dwindled to 21. After several years the remaining members joined the Evangelical Free Church and the Baptist Church in Greeley. At the 1948 Southern District Conference the church was officially dissolved. O.HA.

Johnstown Mennonite (MC) School, a church high school located at Hollsopple, Pa., five miles south of Johnstown, founded in 1944, is operated by an independent board representing chiefly the Mennonite (MC) congregations of the immediate vicinity. In 1955 it had four teachers, with an enrollment of 39. Operated as a part of the same institution is an eight-grade elementary school with an enrollment of 67, and a total of six teachers, including the high-school staff. Sanford Shetler has been principal from the beginning. H.S.B.

Jonas, Justus (1493-1555), a humanist and theologian, co-worker with Luther. In 1521 he was appointed professor of canon law at the University of Wittenberg, accompanied Luther to the Reichstag at Worms, and supported him in his translation of the Bible and in church inspection. He introduced the Reformation at Halle in 1541.

In his views on the Anabaptists, Jonas shared fully the view prevailing at Wittenberg. When Emperor Charles V issued his edict against the Anabaptists on Jan. 4, 1528, which became the pattern for similar laws in many countries making adherence to an Anabaptist group punishable by death, and Melanchthon published his booklet, Adversus Anabaptistas Judicium, Jonas at once translated this attack on the Anabaptists into German, with the title: Unterricht Philip. Melan. Wider die Lere der Widerteuffer aus dem latin verdeudschet, durch Just. Jonas. He dedicated the book to Michael Meienburg, city secretary of Nordhausen, to whom Jonas wrote on Feb. 3, 1538, that he hoped it would aid many pious hearts and consciences disturbed by such false doctrine, and that lovers of the Gospel would gladly read it and thank God for such powerful, gracious preservation of the pure doctrine and divine truth (Kawerau, 118). In 1539 he was one of the instigators of the church inspection in Saxony and wrote the local Kirchenordnung.

Melanchthon's arguments were not accepted in all theological circles. The Swabian reformer Johannes Brenz (q.v.) wrote a reply to the book, which denies the government the right to punish the Anabaptists with death for their faith.

Jonas did not play an important part in the further opposition to the Anabaptists. HEGE.

G. Kawerau, Der Briefwechsel des Justus Jonas I (Halle, 1884); A. Weingarten, Zeittafel zur Kirchengeschichte (1905) 117; Th. Pressel, Justus Jonas (Elberfeld, 1862); ML II, 432.

Joncker, Roelof Agge, a Dutch Mennonite preacher (d. 1730), who served at Oldemarkt (q.v.) 1699-1712 and at Cadzand (q.v.; also called Nieuwvliet) 1712-30. Joncker published his Mennoniste Vrageboeck (Steenwijk, 1708), and in 1709 a hymnbook with the title: Eenige psalmen des propheten Davids. Op sodainige wijsen als bij de Boeren en Zeeluy veel bekent zijn; nieuwelijcks in dicht gestelt. His conduct caused deep offense. VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1642-56, 2184; II, 2, Nos. 595, 598; DB 1878, 12; 1889, 110 f.; ML II, 432.

Jonckhans, Dirck, a martyr: see Dirck, Cleynen.

Jong, Arnoldus de, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, b. April 14, 1802, at Leeuwarden, d. May 22, 1854, at Dantumawoude, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served the congregation of Surhuisterveen 1826-27 and Dantumawoude 1827-54. He is the author of some poetical works. He was married to Anna Fontein of Harlingen. His son Dirk Fontein de Jong was a promoter of the Frisian dairy industry, having also a keen interest in church matters; in 1896 he was president of the Friese Sociëteit (Mennonite Conference in Friesland). A grandson of Arnoldus de Jong, also called Arnoldus de Jong (1873-November 1946), was a Mennonite minister of the following congregations: Noordhorn 1898-1910, Hindeloopen 1910-14, and Broek op Langendijk 1914-38. VDZ.

Jong, Pieter Claesz de, a manufacturer of canvas, who was about 1740 a Mennonite preacher of the Waterlander congregation of Krommenie, Dutch province of North Holland, published Kort Begrip van de Christelyke godsdienst (Amsterdam, 1742; this work formerly was ascribed to R. Buitenpost, q.v.), and Godvruchtig levensgedrag van Trijntje Klaasd. Heynes (Amsterdam, 1743). De Jong was an ardent Collegiant (q.v.) and often attended the meetings of this group at Rijnsburg. He addressed these meetings a number of times in 1738-80. VDZ.

DB 1877, 130; Biogr. Wb. IV, 558; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 470; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 70.

Jonge Vlamingen, formerly a branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Flemish Mennonites.

Jonge Vriesen (Friezen), formerly a branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Frisian Mennonites.

Jongejan Cornelisz: see Jan Cornelisz.

Jongerenbond: see Doopsgezinde Jongeren-Bond and Friese Doopsgezinde Jongeren-Bond.

Jooris (Joost) de Backere, a Mennonite of Gent, Belgium, who, at the age of 80, died in prison at Gent on June 10, 1573. By trade he was a thread-twister. (Verheyden, Gent, 63, No. 222.) VDZ.

Joos: see also Joost.

Joos Baten, an Anabaptist martyr beheaded on Jan. 26, 1536, at Antwerp, Belgium. He is said to have been one of the leading Anabaptists. He was a weaver of satin, originally from Nyenhoven (?). (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 381, 426, 428; XIV, 14 f., No. 150; Mellink, Wederdopers, 388.) VDZ.

Joos van Beke, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on March 19, 1569, together with Hans Vermandele, Jan Poote, and Jan Semou. Joos was unmarried, 32 years of age, and a native of Denterghem in Flanders. He was a belt maker, and had lived at Antwerp since 1563, the last two years in the house of Jan Poote. Twice he was tortured. He had been baptized at Antwerp by Joos de Cruysere (q.v.). He said that infant baptism was idolatry. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 336, 368, 398, 440, 477; XIV, 64 f., No. 710.) VDZ.

Joos Casteels (or Josse van den Casteele, called Joost Kasteel by van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, on Nov. 8, 1567, together with Jaques (Jacob) Mestdach, Willem Aertsz, and Karel Hannebeel. Joos, born at Reckem, was arrested at Zwevegem in Flanders. He had been a member of the church since 1563. (Mart. Mir. D 358, E 715; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 37, No. 18.) VDZ.

Joos de Cruysere, an Anabaptist elder and martyr: see Joos Verbeek.

Joos de Hoymaekere (Hatmaker), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on June 22, 1569, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Jasper Hermansz. He had been rebaptized, attended Mennonite meetings, and participated in their communion service six months before he was arrested. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 385, 401; XIV, 66 f., No. 763.) VDZ.

Joos Inghelbijl, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Sept. 26, 1569, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium. (Verheyden, Gent, 55, No. 181.) VDZ.

Joos Jansz, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland, on Oct. 11, 1561 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously 1563, without further date). Joos, who was born at Krabbendijke, was arrested at Somerdijk (probably Sommelsdijk, q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 301; E 666; Bibliographie II, No. 374.) VDZ.

Joos Kint (Joos Kindt, Jooskint, Joos Kind, Josse 't Kindt), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium, on July 16, 1553 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., does not mention the date). Joos was a citizen of Kortrijk. He was charged with the following heresies: Jesus Christ did not assume His human nature from the Virgin Mary (doctrine of Incarnation as also believed by Menno Simons); the sacrament is not the true flesh and blood of the Saviour; confession of sin to the priests is not necessary; denying all doctrines of the Catholic Church.

Joos was tried five times and tortured several times. He died loyal to his faith, which he had fairly and cleverly defended against the inquisition officials. An account of his trials is found in his own letters written from prison. These two letters are found in the Dutch martyrbooks, from the Offer des Heeren, edition of 1570, until van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. A song composed to celebrate this martyr, "De meeste vruecht coemt door Godts woort" (Most gladness emanates from the Word of God), is also found in the Offer des Heeren, and inserted in some later hymnbooks. vdZ.

Offer, 219-37; Mart. Mir. D 150-56, E 540-46; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 31, No. 2; BRN VII, 166-68; Wolkan, Lieder, 66, 128; ML II, 432.

Joos Meeuwens, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Obignies near Doornik (Tournai), Belgium, with five other martyrs. For particulars see Adriaen van Hee. (Mart. Mir. D 203, E 584.) vdZ.

Joos de Suyckerbakker: see Joachim Vermeeren.

Joos (Josse) de Tollenaere, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Gent, Belgium, on April 13, 1589, with Michiel Buyse and Joosyne Swyntz (Sijntgen Wens). The execution took place secretly in the Gravensteen castle at Gent, where the victims were strangled; their corpses then were hanged outside the gate. Joos was a prominent member and deacon of the congregation at Gent. He corresponded with the congregation of Haarlem, Holland, which had sent money for the poor members of the church at Gent. He had received baptism on faith about 1563. When he was arrested on Jan. 13, 1589, in a house on the Corenmerct at Gent, he was about 50 years of age. The Dutch martyrbooks (first, Offer des Heeren, edition of 1599) contain some letters Joos wrote in prison. As early as 1599 a collection of his letters had been published at Harlingen: Sommige Brieven ofte Belijdingen . . . . Van Braght (Mart. Mir., ed. of 1660) prints the same collection, three letters, two obviously to the congregation of Gent and one to his daughter, Betgen, born in 1574. In this striking letter he writes that after his death her mother should give her as a keepsake a "testament," a "Dirick Philips Fondament-boeck," a "Liedboeck" (hymnbook), and a booklet of Jacob de Keersgieter (q.v.), which books obviously had belonged to Joos himself. He commends her to diligent reading of these books "because there are fine exhortations in them." Joos died faithfully as he had loyally served the congregation. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 764-77, E 968-1080; Verheyden, Gent, 68, No. 246; BRN II, 622, 625; Bibliographie I, 395-403.

Joos Vermeer(en): see Joachim Vermeeren.

Joos de Vinck(e), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 2, 1580, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, with four others. Joos was born at Poperinge in Flanders and was 27 years of age. (Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 68.) vdZ.

Joos (de) Vlaminck, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 2, 1560, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, with four others. Joos was 21 years of age and a native of Brugge, Flanders. (Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 69.) vdZ.

Joos van de Walle, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, on March 2, 1560, together with four others. Joos was a citizen of Gent, and was 32 years of age. It could not be ascertained whether Joos van de Walle belonged to that van de Walle (q.v.) family of which a number of members died as Anabaptist martyrs. (Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 71.) vdZ.

Joost Ewouts, one of the leaders of the Old Frisian Mennonites in the Netherlands, who, together with Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) and others, banned Lubbert Gerritsz in 1589. Joost Ewouts was the son of Ewout Pieters, who was a mayor of Hoorn. (Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 38; BRN VII, 67 f.) vdZ.

Joost Goethals, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1569. There are no particulars about this martyr, neither the exact date of execution nor the way in which he was put to death. Verheyden, in his study of the sources at Gent, did not find this martyr. His name is found as No. 31 in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer, Ende twee en tsestich mede," in the 1578a edition of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 653; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759; ML II, 134.) vdZ.

Joost (Josse) Joosten, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Veere, Dutch province of Zeeland, in December 1560. He was born at Goes, same province. A student familiar with Latin, 18 years old, he was seized, cruelly racked, and burned at the stake "on Monday before Christmas" in 1560. At his death he sang the last stanza of a hymn he had composed; it begins, "Och Heere Ghi staet altijt in mijnen sinne" (Lord, Thou art always in my mind). The song is found in a number of old Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks. The confession of faith he wrote has unfortunately been lost. Neff.

Mart. Mir. D 282, E 651; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 73; F. C. Wieder, Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 178, 196; ML II, 432.

Joost Meerssenier, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed in Gent in Flanders in 1569 with two brethren and a sister. "But in all this they courageously persevered, and could in no wise be induced to apostatize, so that they finally had to lay down their lives for the name of Christ." The exact date and manner of execution are unknown. Verheyden, who studied the documents at Gent, did not find this martyr. Joost's name is No. 37 in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer, Ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the appendix of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 653; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759; ML III, 65.) vdZ.

Joost van Pecuwe (Pecuven), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded in 1535 at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. While being tortured he confessed having been rebaptized. Further particulars were not available. (DB 1917, 153; Mellink, Wederdopers, 179.) vdZ.

Joost (Josse) van der Straten, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Shrove Tuesday of 1571. At first he had lived at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders; later he lived at Antwerp as a chairmaker. He was arrested outside Antwerp by Spanish soldiers and without trial or sentence cruelly put to death by the soldiers on the market place of Antwerp in front of the town hall. This irregular execution makes clear why his name was not found in the documents of Antwerp studied by P. Génard (q.v.). According to Verheyden (Gent, 60), Joost van der Straten was an old man of about 70 years. Van Braght mentions that his wife and his daughter did not belong to the brotherhood. At least two of his sons died as martyrs, Hans van der Straten (q.v.) at Brussels on March 28, 1571, and Martin van der Straten (q.v.) at Gent on Dec. 4, 1572. (Mart. Mir. D 540, E 1010.) vdZ.

Joost Verbeeck (Joos de Cruysere, i.e., Kruisheer), also called Meester Joos, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 21, 1561. He had been arrested at Antwerp on June 7, at eleven o'clock in the evening. He was tortured several times, even twice in four days, and as a result of this severe torture he could not write with his right hand because this hand was broken. Of his private life it is only known that he was a native of Asperen, Dutch province of South Holland. In prison he wrote a short letter to his wife. Van Braght (Mart. Mir.) mentions that he was a dienaer of the Word of God and of his congregation. This means that he was a preacher or an elder. It is known that he baptized at Utrecht (Netherlands) in February or March 1561, and also at Antwerp. In the old documents he is often confused with the Elder Joachim Vermeeren (q.v.).

Joost, who during his trials and tortures refused to betray his brethren, also steadfastly went to his cruel death. When he was conducted to the little house of straw in which he was to be burned to death, four brethren out of the crowd cried to him, "Fight valiantly, dear brother!" While burning in his little hut of straw, the bystanders heard him pray: "O heavenly Father, into Thy hands I commit my spirit." Of his suffering and death a song was composed, beginning "O God, ick moet u claghen mijns herten droevich leyt" (O God, I must complain to Thee the sad affliction of my heart). This hymn is found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562, in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563, and other old Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks. In Joost Verbeeck's trial recognition is given to Mennonite trustworthiness, even by their enemies, the judge saying to Joost, "I know that your people are telling the truth." vdZ.

Offer, 538-44; Mart. Mir. D 283 f., E 651 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 137; XIV, 32 f., No. 360; K. Vos, "De Doopsgez. te Antwerpen," in Bulletin . . . d'Histoire de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920) 333, 344-49; Wackernagel, Lieder, 136; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 70.

Joost (Joos, Josse) Verkindert (Ver Kindert, Verkinderen), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Sept. 12 or 13, 1570, with Laurens Andries, after they had been arrested there during the night of May 30-31. In prison Joost wrote 28 letters, which have been collected in Sommige Brieven, Testamenten ende Belijdingen geschreven door Joos Ver Kindert, and published in 1572 (likely printed by Gillis Rooman at Haarlem, Holland); a copy of this 1572 edition is found in the Library of the Leiden University. The volume was reprinted 1577 (no place nor name of printer); a copy of this second edition is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. The first letter is dated June 3, 1570, the last Sept. 12, 1570. Eighteen letters were written to his wife, eight to his mother or his brothers and sisters, one to his congregation of Antwerp, and one to all the brethren and sisters in (the congregation) of Harlingen and Franeker (Dutch province of Friesland).

Of these letters only the following eleven were included in the Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror: No. 3 (to his wife, mother, brethren and sisters), No. 7 (to the church of God at Antwerp), No. 10 (to his brother Willem), No. 12 (to his wife), No. 15 (to his mother), No. 19 (to his wife), No. 21 (to his brother W.), No. 22 (to his wife and to all the brethren and sisters in the Lord), No. 23 (to his wife), No. 26 (to his brothers and sisters), No. 28 (farewell-letter to his wife, after he had been sentenced to death). vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 509-27, E 844-63; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 11, 61; XIV, 76 f., No. 866; Bibliographie I, 447-61.

Joost de Wielmaker (wheelwright), an Anabaptist martyr, was seized at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1570 with his wife and four other Anabaptists. Joost and Jan de Posamentwerker were executed there in the same year. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 506, E 846) states that his wife was executed with him. This is a mistake, as Génard found in his study of the sources. (Antw. Arch.-Blad, 74 f., No. 827; ML II, 432.) vdZ.

Joosyne Swynts, an Anabaptist martyr: see Sijntgen Wens.

Jordan, a small village in Louth Twp., Lincoln Co., Ont., on the east bank of Twenty Pond, near the present Highway 8, where services were held probably in 1840-70 by the Mennonites (MC) when they were strongest in this county. It never was an organized congregation. The Moyer church three miles west was the central church. Early ministers near the Jordan church were Daniel Hoch (1806-78), who after 1850 led the Canada-Ohio (GCM) movement; Abraham Rittenhouse (1840-1919), ordained in 1871, and Daniel Honsberger (1835-1914), ordained in 1875. Early deacons were Christian Honsberger (1781-1831) and Philip Wismer (1810-97). J.C.F.

Jörg Friese (Juriäen Friesen, Jurriaen Lademaker): see Friesen, Georg.

Jörg vom Hause Jakob: see Blaurock.

Jorg vom huss Jacob (not the same person as Jörg Blaurock, q.v.), an Anabaptist preacher, who was active in Schaffhausen (q.v.), Switzerland, in 1535. He is identical with Marti(n) Lingg (q.v.), also called Mathi Weniger. (Paul Peachey, Soziale Herkunft, 47.) vdZ.

Jörg of Ingersheim: see Leserlin.

Jörg, Josef Edmund (1819-1901), a Catholic writer, publisher of Historische politische Blätter, and author of Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode von 1522-1526 (Freiburg i. Br., 1581); and Geschichte des Protestantismus in seiner neuesten Entwicklung (2 vv. Freiburg, 1858), in which he discusses the Anabaptists. This is especially true of the former book, which contains much valuable, authentic archival material, but which he evaluates uncritically and one-sidedly. He considers the Anabaptists to have been the logical representatives and defenders of Luther's doctrine of Christian liberty. Their cardinal doctrine, viz., "be taught only by God," they took from Luther. The right of free investigation and interpretation of the Bible must lead to unrestrained arbitrariness. Also their common possession of property and wives could be traced to this doctrine. The most peculiar charge Jörg makes is that they made a treaty with the Turks to destroy the German government, but that this was averted by the withdrawal of Soliman II from Vienna; for the Anabaptists this was a severe defeat. Jörg bases his assertions on statements forced on the rack. The historical value of his work cannot be rated high. (ML II, 433.) Neff.

Jörg von Passau: see Nespitzer, Georg.

Joriaen van Goor: see Joriaen Ketel.

Joriaen Heyns of Franeker, Dutch province of Friesland, was a partisan of Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.) against Leenaert Bouwens and Menno Simons, and insisted on lenience in maintaining the ban and avoidance. vdZ.

BRN VII, 54 f., 460, 464 f.; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 132 note.

Joriaen (Jurriaen, Jurrien, Jurjen) Ketel (Ketelaer), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Aug. 9, 1544, on the Brink square of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel. He was born about 1511. Joriaen had been an Anabaptist since 1533, when he was rebaptized. His first wife, Elsken (q.v.), also an Anabaptist, was drowned at Utrecht, Netherlands, on June 18, 1539.

Joriaen Ketel, a tailor by trade (or a cloth or silk merchant), is said to have been of high rank, his father being a nobleman and he himself being educated in the upper circles. During or soon after the Münsterite (q.v.) troubles he joined the Anabaptist leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). At that time Joriaen was called Joriaen (Hendricksen) van Goor. After Batenburg's death (1538) Joriaen was converted from his profligate life by David Joris (q.v.), whose loyal follower he remained until his death. On the order of David Joris he visited the Landgrave of Hesse; he also accompanied David Joris to Antwerp, Belgium, and to Basel, Switzerland. He provided for the printing of David Joris' Wonderboeck, which had appeared in 1542 without mentioning place and printer; he also had intermediated in the publishing of other books by David Joris since 1539. At Pentecost of 1544 he was arrested at Deventer. Four or five times he was tortured; he confessed that he did not approve the revolutionary principles of Batenburg; he frankly confessed his following of David Joris, saying that this leader had taught him nothing but good things. In his last hour he wrote a striking letter to his wife.

Joriaen is the author of the following booklets: (1) Heilsame Leere (n.p., n.d.) followed by a song, "In lijden end noot heb ick, o Godt, Dijn guede ende Genede ervonden" (In grief and distress I have experienced, O God, Thy goodness and mercy). This book was reprinted at Groningen in 1634. (2) Ein edel Duerbaer Testamenth; (3) Belijdinghe, Een Brief tot sijnder Huysfrouwen geschreven; and (4) Ein Suyverlijcke Schone Korte Leeringe. (All of these are found in the AML; the last three are extant only in a manuscript of about 1700.) vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 209, 211, 263, 271 f., 276; DB 1917, 141; 1919, 20-22; L. Meihuizen, "Overzicht van de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Arnhem," in Een eeuw Doopsgez. Gemeente (Arnhem, 1952) 19-23; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index; Bibliographie I, 233-46; Catalogus Amst., 58.

Joriaen Simonsz, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, on April 26, 1557, together with Clement Dirksz (q.v.). Mary Joris (q.v.), who had been imprisoned with these two men, died in prison. Joriaen was a native of "Hallmen uyt Vrieslandt," which obviously means Hallum (q.v.). According to Bibliographie Joriaen was a weaver, but van Braght (Mart. Mir.) calls him a bookseller, which is more likely. For it is related that after Joriaen had been executed the officials also intended to burn his books. But this plan could not be carried out because the assembled crowd eagerly took possession of the books. Joriaen and Clement died faithfully as may be seen from two songs composed to celebrate their death: "Hoort vrienden al, hier in dit aertsche dal" (Hear all ye friends, here in this earthly dale), inserted in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 and other Dutch hymnbooks, and "Hoert toe, gy Christen scharen" (Hear ye Christian hosts), found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. The oldest edition of the Dutch martyrbook Het Offer des Heeren of 1562 contains a "testament" and three short letters and a song, composed by this martyr. The song begins "O Vaders, wilt ghy eenen schat, U kinderen nalaten" (O fathers, if you would leave a treasure to your children). Joriaen also composed at least two other songs, both found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1566: "Hoort vrienden altesamen, ghy die daer vreest den Heer" (Hear ye friends all together, who fear the Lord) and "Hoort doch nu al te samen, die te Haerlem binnen woont" (Now hear ye all who live in Haarlem). vdZ.

Offer, 257-67, 586-91; Mart. Mir. D 178, E 563; Bibliographie II, 767; Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lectuur II (1856) 336-50; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 78; Wackernagel, Lieder, 133.

Joris, an Anabaptist martyr: see Goris Cooman.

Joris (Joris Christiaensz), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned in a tub in the Steen castle prison at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 27, 1560, with Jan (Hans) Gielis (or de Backer), Anthonis Cleys (Claesz), and Thielman Naeberchs. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror does not mention Joris Christiaensz or Thielman Naeberchs, but gives an account on Hans de Backer, Anthonis Claesz, and Joris Tielemans. Obviously van Braght has confused Joris Christiaensz and Thielman Naeberchs, making of these two persons only one martyr. The facts are made clear by P. Génard in Antwerpsch Archievenblad. Joris is celebrated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), which is found in Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 61 of the 16th hymn). vdZ.

Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 5, 10; XIV, 26 f., No. 305; Bibliographie II, No. 774; Offer, 567; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 640; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Joris, David: see David Joris.

Joris Leerse (called only Joris in the Martyrs' Mirror) an Anabaptist martyr, who was drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 9, 1560, with Joachim Ooms (q.v.). When they were being led to the execution site they sang: "O Heere, gy staet altijd in mijnen sine" (Lord, Thou art always in my mind). At the stake they began to sing the farewell hymn, "Oorlof aen broeders en susters gemeyn" (Farewell to all the brethren and sisters). Joris said, "Lord, Thou knowest that I have sought Thee and my salvation; and for this cause I must now die. Therefore, O Lord, receive me graciously." He also said, "Citizens of Antwerp, fear not; though we die for the truth, Christ our Lord went before and we must follow Him." To commemorate their death the song "O Heere God eeuwich Vader verheven" (O Lord, our God eternal and mighty Father), was written, which is found both in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 and the Nieu Liedenboek of 1562. This song and also the Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, state that these martyrs were burned at the stake, but the official documents say they were drowned. Joris Leerse was a native of Lier in the Brabant, Belgium. Neff, vdZ.

Offer, 560-62; Mart. Mir. D 275, E 644; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 115, 121; XIV, 30 f., No. 333; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 72; ML II, 435.

Joris van (der) Meersch (in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror van Meesch), an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Gent, Belgium, on Nov. 22, 1570 (method of execution unknown), with Jacob (Jacop) Lowijs. The Martyrs' Mirror states that they were executed "about 1570." Particulars are lacking. The Dutch martyrbook Historie der Warachtige getuygen Jesu Christi (Hoorn, 1617) contains two accounts on these martyrs, both incomplete; the second account was used by van Braght. Joris and Jacob are celebrated in a hymn, "Broeders en susters al ghemeyn, fondeert alleen op Christum den Steijn" (Brethren and sisters all together, build only on Christ, the Stone, as foundation), found in the Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583. (Mart. Mir. D 506, E 845; Verheyden, Gent, 57, No. 198; Wolkan, Lieder, 72; ML III, 65.) vdZ.

Joris Oud-Kleer-kooper, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 30, 1557, with Pieter de Backer. They faithfully suffered their cruel fate. Joris' name is found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), included in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563. In the official records this martyr is called Joris van Koevoorden; he was a secondhand clothes dealer. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 184, E 568; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 433, 436; XIV, 22 f., No. 237; ML III, 330.

Joris from Paris, an Anabaptist martyr, burned in England on April 24, 1551. He was a Dutchman. Further particulars are not available. vdZ.

De Hoop Scheffer and Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, N.Y., n.d.-1922) 175 f.

Joris Tielemansz, according to van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned in a tub in 1560 at Antwerp, Belgium. Here van Braght has made a mistake; by incorrect reading of a song in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (Offer, 567) he confused two martyrs who were executed at Antwerp on Jan. 27, 1560, viz., Joris Christiaensz (q.v.) and Thielman Naeberchs (q.v.). vdZ.

Joris (Joostenszoon) Wippe, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, on Oct. 1, 1558. He was a native of Meenen in Flanders, Belgium. Van Braght's statement that he had formerly been a burgomaster of Meenen has proved incorrect; in the list of burgomasters of Meenen his name is not found. After his conversion he emigrated to Dordrecht in the Netherlands, adopting the trade of cloth-dyeing. He was a charitable man who dealt generously with the poor, widows, and orphans. On April 28, 1558, he was arrested at Dordrecht and soon sent to The Hague for trial. After some time he was returned to Dordrecht, where he was sentenced to death by drowning on Aug. 4, 1558. The execution was postponed because the executioner refused to put to death a man who was renowned for his goodness. Not until October, after much hesitation, was he secretly drowned in a wine cask. The Dutch martyrbooks have preserved three letters by Joris Wippe: the first two were written to his wife from prison in The Hague; the third, a striking letter to his children, was written from the Vuylpoort prison at Dordrecht after he had been sent back to Dordrecht. All the letters are undated. (Mart. Mir. D 203, E 551, 584, 926; Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Jorists, followers of David Joris (q.v.): see Davidjorists.

Joss, Gottlieb, Protestant pastor at Herzogenbuchsee, Switzerland, author of the book, Das Sektenwesen im Kanton Bern (Bern, 1881), in which he gives the Mennonites friendly treatment, though not always with historical accuracy. The rise of the Neutäufer (Fröhlichianer) is carefully recounted. (Gbl., 1885, 38 ff.; ML II, 435.)

Josse Tam, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Hondschote in Flanders, Belgium, on Oct. 20, 1571. (E. de Coussemaker, Troubles religieux IV, 211 f.) vdZ.

Jossine Andries, an Anabaptist martyr: see Stijntgen Vercoilgen.

Jösslin, Philipp, an Anabaptist participant in the disputation at Frankenthal (q.v.), Palatinate, in 1571; he, however, was not active as a speaker. He came from Heilbronn, Württemberg, and was apparently the representative of the Württemberg Anabaptists. (Menn. Bl., 1894, 89; ML II, 435.) HEGE.

Jost, Lienhard, of Illkirch, an Anabaptist of Strasbourg, a follower of Melchior Hofmann. He proclaimed himself a prophet; his first wife, Ursula, was also a prophetess in the group. Their history has not yet been uncovered. NEFF.

F. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885) 310 ff.; A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525-1557 (Amsterdam, 1905) 173, 199, note 204; ML II, 436.

Josyne Schricx, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 20, 1538, at Brugge, Belgium. Josyne, who was born at Brussels, was the widow of Jacob van der Mose. She had been baptized upon her faith in 1534. Her children had not been baptized. When Josyne was arrested, one of her children had died; the other, four years of age, was immediately baptized by order of the magistrates. Josyne was given a good testimony of Christian living by the Anabaptists of Gent; obviously she had lived there before she moved to Brugge. She was the first Anabaptist woman to suffer in Brugge. She was burned alive without the usual mitigation of being previously strangled, a method of execution seldom applied to women. (Verheyden, Brugge, 31, No. 5.) vdZ.

Josyne Steeghers, an Anabaptist martyr: see Sijntgen.

Jouckes, Age, preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites at Knijpe (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, was excommunicated in 1687 because of "his strange opinions and his disobedience," which consisted in his view that other Mennonites like the "Twiskers" (followers of P. J. Twisck: Old Frisians) and others were good Christians just as well as the Groningen Old Flemish. This opinion, differing from the general views of the Groningen Old Flemish, who thought their brotherhood to be the only true Christian church, originated from Collegiant (q.v.) principles, to which Age Jouckes was won over. The ban was pronounced after a vote by the brethren. Age Jouckes now joined the Waterlander Mennonite congregation of Heerenveen-Knijpe, in which congregation he soon became a preacher. The year of his death is unknown. In 1706 he was still a preacher. (DB 1870, 108-18; 1879, 2; 1883, 76, 82.) vdZ.

Joure, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, has since earliest times been the seat of a Mennonite church. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 9 persons here in 1551-54 and 8 in 1563-65, a total of 17 at Joure. It can be assumed that a congregation was established here then, though its existence is not mentioned until the end of the century. In the 17th century there were two congregations: the one belonging to the Old Flemish (q.v.) branch was extinct by 1700, when the two remaining members, Wolter Beerends and his wife, moved to Sneek and joined the Old Flemish at IJlst, to which they handed over the treasury of the dissolved church. The only congregation remaining, which took a rather moderate position, built a new meetinghouse in 1664. It seems to have had a stained glass window, probably a memorial of the founding.

In 1760 a division occurred in this church on the question of choosing a new preacher. Eight brethren and sisters left the church, formed the "small congregation," and soon had a church on Botersteeg, called "Nieuwe Huis," previous meetings having been held in the homes of members, most of whom lived in Broek, a hamlet near Joure. Their first preacher, untrained, was Barre-Hiddes (Gorter) from 1763 until his death in 1804. He was followed by a trained and salaried preacher, Govert Jan van Rijswijk, serving 1808-17. In 1817, with a membership of 52, it returned to the mother church. On August 24 the first sermon was preached in the "Oude Huis" to the combined congregation. Until then the "Oude Huis" congregation had been served by lay preachers, like Gjoldt Hylkes (Brouwer) 1743-1804, and Inne Wouters (Cath) 1780-1814. The last lay preacher, the strict but also sensitive Ulbe Durks Bakker, who had served the church since 1780, felt himself too old to serve the combined church. He was succeeded in 1818 by Abraham Doyer of Zwolle. In 1823 K. Ris of Makkum followed. The old church became too small for the growing membership; the new one, built on the same site and dedicated on Sept. 26, 1824, is still in use; a pipe organ was added in 1858. A new parsonage was acquired in 1919 and again in 1946. K. Ris served until his death in 1852. The following ministers have served the congregation since that time: J. Hartog 1853-54, F. Born 1854-86, J. Pottinga 1886-90, M. L. Hartog 1891-1928, N. van der Zijpp 1928-40, J. Meerburg Snarenberg 1941-47, A. G. van Gilse 1947-51, and J. Krijtenburg 1951- . The baptized membership in 1695 was about 100; in 1817, when the congregations merged, 210; in 1861, 239; 1900, 356; 1916, 384; 1955, 250. Members live in town (pop. about 4,000), and a number of surrounding villages, even at a distance of 16 miles. Members in town are mostly businessmen or workingmen; members in the vicinity are usually farmers. In winter services are also held monthly in Langweer (q.v.). Church activities include a Sunday school for children; Menniste Bouwers (youth group 12-18 years); weekly church services of the youth 12-16 years; young members' group 18-35 years; ladies' circle. The congregation possesses six large silver communion cups of about 1770 in rococo style of high artistic value. vdZ.

Archives of the congregation; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim, see Index; Naamlijst 1829, 50 f.; DB 1879, 2; 1890, 88 note 1; 1892, 90 f.; 1895, 12, 24; 1910, 21; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 222; ML II, 436.

Judenplan, the name given by the Chortitza Mennonites to an agricultural Jewish settlement attempted by the Russian government in the Kherson province. In order to give the Jewish settlers thorough training in agriculture, German farmers, mostly Mennonites, were settled among them. The settlement comprised six villages: Novopodolsk, Novovitebsk, Kamenka, Izluchislaya, Novokovea, and Novo-Zhitomir.

The position of the master farmers in the Jewish villages was very unfavorable. They were usually in the minority in the ratio of 1 to 5, and were therefore completely subject to the arbitrary will of the village in cultivating the fields. The fields of the master farmers were scattered among those of the Jews. To the right and left of well-cultivated fields there were neglected fields. Furthermore, the Jews let the Russian peasants pasture their cattle on these uncultivated fields, and consequently the cultivated fields of the Mennonites were trampled. Not until 30 years later was the land of the Mennonites separated from the rest.

At the head of the Jewish settlement was a Mennonite superintendent; in 1851 Dietrich Epp, a young man of 32, took over this task. At his death, April 3, 1900, at the age of 80, the Jewish author Zinov described his work as follows in a graveside address: When Dietrich Davidovitch was appointed superintendent of the Jewish settlement he at once undertook to organize the settlement put in his care. The villages had just been established and the residents were completely inexperienced in agriculture. The superintendent spared no pains or energy in his benevolent instructions. While they were working on the steppes, he was continually riding from one to the other, directing the Jewish farmers by precept and example, showing them how to cultivate their land; he also taught them how to plant trees around their houses. His work received repeated grateful recognition from the government. (ML II, 439 f.) D.H.E.

Judicium, a polemic written by Caspar von Schwenckfeld (q.v.) in reply to Pilgram Marpeck's (q.v.) Vermahnung, which had appeared anonymously in 1542. Marpeck's booklet, called the Taufbüchlein, since it is an exposition and guide to the churches for the proper observance of baptism and communion, rejects all mystical interpretation of these two signs of union, but demands the highest standards of faith and life on the part of the members. The Vermahnung, of which only two copies exist, in libraries in London and Stuttgart, but which was reprinted in the Gedenkschrift zum 400-Jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten (Ludwigshafen, 1925, 178-282), was used by Schwenckfeld in attacking Anabaptist teaching. (He had for many years been in friendly intercourse with them.) He presented his views in a writing to the Anabaptists which contains 100 "talks" and carries the title, Über das neu Büchlein der Taufbrüder im 1542 Jahr ausgangen Judicium; there is a manuscript copy in the library at Wolfenbüttel.

In Anabaptist circles the Judicium produced great disquiet. Marpeck said it contained untrue charges, false interpretations and inferences, "as if we did not properly understand and observe communion with Christ, baptism, ban, and communion, did not know God nor Christ, made a god of the creature and a creature of God, confused one thing with another, and finally did not know ourselves where we stand." These charges created deep concern among the Anabaptists with their striving for holiness; to the external pressure of persecution by church and state was added misunderstanding on the part of hitherto like-minded circles. The seriousness of this worry is indicated by Walpurga of Pappenheim, who said 30 years later that "Schwenckfeld had caused great anxiety among the believers."

The Judicium discusses dogmatic questions on which the views of the Anabaptists, now in written form, differed from those of Schwenckfeld; they did not agree on the Incarnation, baptism, or church organization. Schwenckfeld was of the opinion that believers no longer had the power to keep unity in the Holy Spirit, in baptism, ban, discipline, and communion, but that the sending of a prophet was needed; also that the O.T. fathers, the patriarchs, prophets, etc., had also been Christians. On other questions previous discussions had already proved fruitless.

Lutheran divines also took note of the Judicium. Matthias Flaccius wrote a reply to it with the title Matthiae Flacii Antwort auf das Stenckfeldische Büchlin, Iudicium genannt, a copy of which is said to be in the library of Count Palatine Ottheinrich (Schottenloher, 38).

The opposite conceptions of these questions, which had not been so clearly evident until they were written down, led the elders of the South German and Swiss Brethren under the leadership of Pilgram Marpeck to reply in a comprehensive statement, which circulated among the Brethren in manuscript form, a copy also being given to Schwenckfeld. He did not reply. The Verantwortung, as Pilgram Marpeck called this reply, is still extant in various libraries (Munich, Zürich, and Olomuce) and was published in 1929 by Johann Loserth (in Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert). It had previously been only occasionally mentioned in the literature. It is today considered the most important source for the evaluation of the doctrine and views of the High German and Swiss Brethren in the middle of the 16th century. (ML II, 440.)

HEGE.

Jugendwarte: see Mennonitische Jugendwarte.

Jülich. The territory of Jülich between the Meuse and the Lower Rhine, including a part of what is now the Dutch province of Limburg, was in the 14th century united with the territory of Berg east of the Rhine and the smaller and more remote territory of Ravensberg (the area of Bielefeld) and in the early 16th century also with that of Cleve (q.v.), which had been since the 14th century united with that of the Mark (more to the east). The united territories —large and influential in Northwest Germany— were governed by the dukes John III (1511/1521-39), William V the Wealthy (1539-92), and John William (1592-1609). From 1614, Cleve-Mark-Ravensberg belonged to the Elector of Brandenburg, Jülich-Berg to branches of the Palatine Wittelsbachs. Jülich itself was divided into 29 districts (Aemter), whose bailiffs were called "Amtmann" or "Drost," and besides included a number of small subordinate territories (Unterherrschaften). These magistrates as well as the owners of these small subordinate territories belonged to the hereditary nobility and were rather independent, especially in church affairs, often combining legal jurisdiction and church patronage. Ecclesiastically the duchy of Jülich-Berg-Cleve belonged in the 16th century to the Catholic bishoprics of Cologne and Liége.

Exiled preachers or adherents of non-tolerated churches could easily find shelter here. This fact was of benefit to the Anabaptists, who had come here very early. As useful workers and craftsmen as well as competent farmers they often found protection from persecution on the estates of the nobles. Especially in the north and west of the country there were many of these nobles. Among them Werner von Pallant (q.v.), bailiff of Wassenberg, is prominent, who sheltered the Wassenberg preachers (Predikanten) (q.v.).

Also the indecision of Duke John III (q.v.) favored the rise of non-Catholic tendencies. He tried to preserve the unity of the church by way of individual regulations. After publishing the Kirchenordnung of 1532 he called a meeting of the councillors of his territories. Here it was explained to him that it was necessary to have the help of the temporal sword to put an end to the "abuses that plunge the country into insurrection"; to that end a church inspection should be ordered. This inspection, held the following year, revealed that Anabaptism had numerous followers in the country. Three tracts of Anabaptist origin were confiscated: a treatise on communion and baptism, a letter of consolation, and an open epistle (Rembert, Wiedertäufer). Sometimes the councillors argued with those who did not attend church services. But finally with ruthless severity the authorities began the work of eliminating them. The prisons were filled.

Jülich became a mission field for the Münsterites. They were in 1535 planning to "let the banner fly" at four places in Holland, Friesland, Limburg, and Jülich (here at Eschenbroich near Wassenberg) at once. But after the suppression of the kingdom of the Anabaptists in Münster in the same year 1535 a general Anabaptist persecution flared up in the duchies of Jülich, Berg, and Cleve. Without regard for religious or social position the victims were committed to the executioner; until the middle of 1536 he carried out his bloody office in the various districts. "Justified" is the laconic comment at the edge of a long list of names. In Born 30 persons, mostly men, were executed after September 1534. In Bergheim the case was similar. In 1537 (not 1532, the date given in the Martyrs' Mirror) Veit tho Pilgrims was executed in Gladbach. The Martyrs' Mirror records executions at Born, Linnich, and Sittard in 1550-52.

"The mandate of Speyer was applied in its full severity: the obstinate were burned, the recanters killed with the sword" (Rembert, 422). But church inspections of 1550 and 1559-60 showed that the movement persisted through all the storms of persecution. When certain places and districts were declared free of Anabaptists, they had increased in others, as in Dremmen, Hückelhoven, Susteren, and Millen. Lambrecht Kremer (called Lembgen) and Hermes of Aachen were now their leading preachers. (As to the duchy of Cleve, an edict of Duke William issued to the officials of Cleve and Mark on March 9, 1560, ordered that Anabaptists should be taught by orthodox clergymen to bring them back to the church. The obstinate should be brought to trial and await sentence by the duke. The old local and imperial laws were to be renewed and enforced; offenders were to be expelled from the country. On July 10, 1560, Duke William issued further orders that all pictures and books held for sale which represent the party of Anabaptists or the Sacramentists should be confiscated. This edict was repeated on Feb. 25, 1562. On Jan. 23, 1565, a sharp decree was issued against Anabaptists, Sacramentists, Davidjorists, etc.) The magistrate of Brüggen and Tegelen was severely reprimanded in 1567 for tolerating Anabaptists and giving them shelter. In 1574 the abbot of Gladbach lamented that the Anabaptists numbered no less than 150 families. (As to the duchy of Cleve: On Aug. 30, 1577, objection was made to a proposed church inspection by the representatives of all the towns of Cleve meeting at Rees; the group, however, admitted that the secular government must see to it that false sects would not slip into the country; but the present inspection seemed to them to have the character of an Inquisition, especially since it was managed by such as seemed questionable to the adherents of the true and blessed doctrine. The Landtag decided on Sept. 26, 1577, that the inspection should be dropped except against obvious Anabaptists. A list of 1622 shows 151 families; a list of 1654, 38 families; it may be assumed that they numbered 500-600 souls.) The Concept of Cologne (1591) was signed by Theunis Comes as the representative of the church at Gladbach, Diderich Verwer for all congregations in the country of Millen and at the Meuse (i.e., country of Born), Franz of Rheinbach for the congregation at Flamerse (Flamersheim), and by several other representatives of churches on the Lower Rhine. In 1611 the preachers of the church at Gladbach wrote a letter to Holland (Catalogus Amst., No. 536).

For a time the Anabaptists enjoyed a certain degree of toleration. An edict of Count Palatine Wolfgang in 1610 to the magistrate of Sittard ordered him henceforth not to molest them for their faith. The situation was reversed when Count Palatine Wolfgang William, who had turned Catholic, came into power in 1614. On Feb. 19, 1619, Anabaptist meetings were prohibited. (As to the duchy of Berg: On April 19, an edict was sent to the magistrate of Löwenburg to arrest all the Anabaptists who attended their forbidden meetings. On Sept. 1, 1622, followed a strict command to all magistrates and the clergy, not to allow any Mennonites to live in the country; their schools or churches should be torn down and their property confiscated. A further edict of Feb. 20, 1624, softened some of the provisions; nevertheless negligent officials were reminded of their duty, and the Mennonite meetinghouses continued to be razed.)

The Mennonites, who made their living mostly by weaving, spinning, the linen trade, selling thread, making spinning wheels, and the like, had excessive levies made on them, frequently amounting to one fourth of their income. Their expulsion from Rheydt (q.v.) in 1694 evoked much adverse comment. In spite of patriotic love of their country, a sense of duty, and willingness to sacrifice they were not tolerated; they decreased in number and finally the churches became extinct. Most of the refugees settled in cities like Crefeld (q.v.) and Dutch towns like Maastricht (q.v.) and particularly Nijmegen (q.v.). A large number of weavers from Jülich, most of whom had formerly come from Gladbach, were allowed to settle in Nijmegen in 1642-57. For the Mennonites of Jülich the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs organized some collections. In 1694 William III of Orange (q.v.), stadholder of the Netherlands and king of England, at the instance of the Dutch Mennonites wrote a letter of intercession to John William (q.v.), Elector of the Palatinate and Duke of Jülich, requesting full toleration for the persecuted Mennonites in Jülich, but not until the beginning of the 18th century were the few remnants in Jülich given recognition.

NEFF, E.C.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 37-75, 300-23; Heinrich Forsthoff, Rheinische Kirchengeschichte I. Die Reformation am Niederrhein (Essen, 1929); L. Keller, Die Gegenreformation in Westfalen und am Niederrhein, Part I (Leipzig, 1881); Otto R. Redlich, Jülich-Bergische Kirchenpolitik am Ausgange des Mittelalters und in der Reformationszeit I and II, 1, 2 (Bonn, 1907-11) (Publikationen der Gesellschaft für rheinische Geschichtskunde 28); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; W. Risler, "Täufer im bergischen Amt Löwenburg, Siebengebirge," Gesch.-Bl. XII (1955); E. Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit VIII (1955) 155, 170 f., 186 f.; IX (1956) 10 f., 26; idem, "Von Täufern zu Mennoniten am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 74-76, 90 f., 106-8, 122-24; W. Risler, "Duisburg," Gesch.-Bl. VIII (May 1951); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 536, 1141, 1146, 1194 f., 1205, 1305, 1400-4, 1419, 1427, 1432, 1749; DB 1909, 120-26; P. C. G. Guyot, Bijdr. tot de Gesch. der Doopsgez. te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1845) 13-19, 43-75; ML II, 445 f.

Julius, a Swiss Anabaptist elder, otherwise unknown, baptized in South Germany about 1530. (Wolkan, Lieder, 30.) vdZ.

Junge Gemeinde is a 16-page, 6 x 8 in. monthly periodical, edited by Gerhard Hein and published by the Youth Commission of the South German Mennonite Conference, first issue January 1948. It appears as a supplement to the biweekly Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten (q.v.). Alexander Prieur became the editor in January 1957. H.S.B.

Jungheim of Geyssen, called "young John," a Hessian Anabaptist, who with Peter Tasch (q.v.) and others signed the "Bekenntnis oder Antwort etlicher Fragstücke oder Artikel der gefangenen Täufer und anderer im Lande Hessen," of December 1538. Nothing more is known of him. (ML II, 447.)

NEFF.

Jung-Stilling, Johann Heinrich (1740-1817), Pietist, physician and economist, b. Sept. 12, 1740, in Grund near Hilchenbach, Westphalia, Germany, the son of a tailor and schoolmaster. At the age of 15 he became a schoolteacher at Litzel, where he came in contact with religious separatists, and worked as teacher and tailor, learned the treatment of the eye from a Catholic priest, and studied this science at Strasbourg (1770-72), where he made the acquaintance of Goethe and Herder, practiced medicine in Elberfeld, acquired fame for his operation on cataracts (1773-78), lectured on technical subjects in the Kameralschule at Kaiserslautern (1778-84), and became professor at Marburg, then at Heidelberg (1784-1803), was made councilor of Charles Frederick, Grand Duke of Baden, in Heidelberg (1803-7), and was finally pensioned by the duke and spent his last years at Karlsruhe (1807-17). Throughout his life his first interest lay in serving the kingdom of God.

Through his numerous writings, his extensive correspondence, and frequent journeys, Jung-Stilling left traces of his influence in many places, including the Mennonite communities. Among his works, his Lebensgeschichte, particularly Jugend and Wanderschaft, the novel Heimweh, the periodical Der graue Mann, Biblische Erzählungen, and the novel Theobald oder die Schwärmer, were read widely in Mennonite families, especially in the Palatinate. In his autobiography, Heinrich Stillings Wanderschaft (Berlin and Leipzig, 1778, 47 f.), he relates that he worked for a tailor Isaak (I. Becker) at Rade vor dem Walde (Waldstätt) and was beneficially stimulated in religious thought by him. This man was apparently a Swiss Mennonite emigrant (Menn. Bl., 139; Heimweh I, 77). Jung-Stilling speaks in some detail about the Mennonites in his Taschenbuch für Freunde des Christentums, publishing a picture of Menno Simons, defending them against unjust accusations, and praising their Christian foundation and character (Menn. Bl., 1890, p. 62; Gbl., 1899, p. 83).

He also makes an interesting remark about the Palatinate Mennonites in Heimweh: "The pastor in Kaiserslautern (q.v.) was called to account, because he had permitted a Mennonite woman to be buried in the churchyard, and had attended the funeral." Obviously these words refer to the case of religious intolerance described in detail in Gem.-Kal. 1909, 63 ff. In this allegorical novel, Heimweh, he pays a tribute to the Swiss Mennonite way of life by having his hero Eugenius meet his bride-to-be in a Swiss Mennonite home, where he also receives his most impressive lessons on faith.

In May 1785 Jung-Stilling and his wife visited the Mennonite David Möllinger (q.v.), the "father of clover culture in the Palatinate," at Monsheim, whose album contains the following entry in verse: "Certainly the man does not live in vain, who always knows his intentions, himself, and his duty.

In memory of Salome Jung, nee St. George" (d. May 25, 1790).

"Friend Möllinger! Here I cannot make verses; for my heart is too full of thanks to the heavenly Father, too full of bliss to think of rhymes; Möllinger and Stilling, two brothers whom the Lord has raised from the dust, should be filled with nothing but thanks and praise to their Creator and Preserver." Jung-Stilling signs himself "Möllinger's brother, Dr. Johann Heinrich Jung, grand ducal councilor and professor at Heidelberg, Monsheim, May 2, 1785."

With the Palatine Mennonites, Johann Risser of Friedelsheim, B. Eymann of Kindenheim, and Jakob Krehbiel of Weierhof, Jung-Stilling carried on an extensive correspondence. The occasion for the correspondence was probably the conversion of a young Jew, Heinrich Wilhelm David Hamann, who was won for Christianity by his contacts with the Mennonites. Jung-Stilling became interested in him and arranged his journey to England, where he was trained as a missionary to the Jews (in Basel, 1844-73).

Jung-Stilling's hymn, "Vater, deines Geistes Wehen," was adopted in the hymnal of the South German Mennonites of 1910 (No. 170).

Jung-Stilling also had some influence on the Mennonites of Russia. Some of the Mennonites in Russia were so impressed by his description in Heimweh (to some extent also by other similar literature) of an imaginary oriental theocracy near the Aral Sea that they founded a colony there, expecting to find in it the refuge from the antichrist pictured allegorically by Jung-Stilling. Franz Bartsch (Unser Auszug, 8) says: "The reading of Jung-Stilling's writings, e.g., his Heimweh, had given the first impetus [to the idea]." (See also Epp, Claasz.) NEFF, E.H.B.

HRE XIX, 46 ff.; RGG III, Col. 468; G. Stecher, Jung-Stilling als Schriftsteller (1913); A. Vömel, Briefe J.-St. an seine Freunde Wiegand und Grieber (1905); H. R. G. Günther, Jung-Stilling (1928); E. H. Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925) 112 ff.; Chr. Neff, "Jung-Stilling über Menno Simons" (contains 3 letters from J.-St. to Johannes Risser) in Gem.-Kal. 1937, 49-53; idem, "Jung-Stilling und die Mennoniten," Menn. Jugendwarte XVIII (1938) 36-45, 56-66, 80-88 (contains letters from J.-St. to David Möllinger, J. J. Becker, and Jacob Krehbiel); Fr. Bartsch, Unser Auszug nach Mittelasien (Halbstadt, 1907) 8; ML II, 446 f.

Juniata, a county in central Pennsylvania having four Mennonite congregations, two M.C., one G.C.M., and one Old Order Amish. Among the Mennonite settlers to locate here in 1774 were the Krehbiels from central Europe by way of Lancaster and Franconia districts. One of the M.C. congregations worships alternately at Cross Roads and Lauver, the other at Lost Creek and Delaware. These two congregations have 300 members. Near-by Susquehanna and Locust Grove (a mission) in Snyder County and Buffalo in Union County are part of the same settlement. All Mennonite (MC) congregations are affiliated with the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. The General Conference Mennonite congregation at Richfield was organized in 1884; its membership is 312. A few Amish families came to the county as early as 1760, and there were three congregations in the 19th century, but they all moved away by 1890. Amish families from Mifflin County and from adjoining states again moved into the county in 1950, establishing one congregation. Juniata County is the birthplace of several noted leaders; Daniel Kauffman (1865-1944) (q.v.) was born here. J.A.H.

Junior Messenger, a children's paper of the General Conference Mennonite Church, began publication as a biweekly on Jan. 1, 1939, changed to a weekly in 1943, and enlarged to its present size, 8 pages, and further enlarged to 7½ x 10½ in., in 1951. In 1956 it was enlarged to its present size, 9 x 12 in. It is printed by the Mennonite Press, North Newton, Kan., for the Board of Education and Publication and is an official organ of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Editors have been Mrs. H. J. Andres, Mrs. T. A. van der Smissen, Mrs. Arnold Regier, Mrs. Henry Funk, and Griselda Shelley. The circulation of the paper is approximately 4,000. W.C.

Junius, Jacobus, author of Eenige Zedige doch korte aanmerkingen over de Broedertwist van vier Doopsgezinde leeraren . . . (Amsterdam, 1717). This pamphlet gives some information about a conflict between two preachers of the Amsterdam Zonist congregation, Harmen Reynskes van Overwyk and David van Heyst, and the preacher Douwe Douwensz Muys, of Hindeloopen in Friesland, who were accused by Cornelius van Huyzen (q.v.) preacher of Emden, of being followers of Spinoza and perverting the Christian truth of salvation. Jacobus Junius (likely a pseudonym) took the side of van Huyzen. vdZ.

Jura, a system of mountains and faults in Central Europe, which reaches the height of 5,600 ft. in France. This forest-covered ridge with its many gorges was the most favorable possible place of refuge for persecuted Mennonites. Of the Swiss Jura mountains, it is the Bernese Jura and the Neuchâtel Jura that were principally used in this way. Solothurn and the Basel Jura sheltered them in passing through. In the French Jura Mennonite refugees from Bern and Alsace began to settle at the beginning of the 18th century.

A large part of the Swiss Jura belonged to the prince bishopric of Basel. In 1528 the bishop transferred his seat to Pruntrut. When the Bernese government persecuted the Mennonites they found refuge on the heights of the Jura in his domain. For economic advantages to the country the Mennonites were tolerated here. There was, of course, no lack of complaints on the part of the native population against the Mennonites, or of orders banishing them. But these orders were at first laxly carried out. Since the south Jura was in the political sphere of Bern, and under its influence accepted the Reformation, Bern demanded of the prince bishops that they pursue the Anabaptists more vigorously. Continued disturbance drove many Mennonites to further emigration to the French Jura, and finally to America. When the bishop was driven out by the French in 1792, the bishopric became a part of the Republic of France as Departement Mont Terrible. A petition presented by the Mennonites asking exemption from military service was denied.

In 1815 most of the bishopric was incorporated in the canton of Bern, which at that time valued its woods less highly than its "granary" (canton of Aargau) and its "wine cellar" (canton of Waadt or Vaud). Thereby the Jura Mennonite congregations suffered the same lot as the Emmental churches (q.v.). In the course of time several churches became extinct through emigration, as Tscharner, Vanne, Monto, Chaluet, Münsterberg, and La Ferrière. Here and there fragments of masonry and neglected fruit trees indicate the former Mennonite settlements (viz., on the south slope of Monto). These places have for the most part become pasture. Other congregations endured and are today active: Sonnenberg, Kleinthal, Cortébert-Berg, Chaux d'Abel-Berg, Porrentruy-Courgenay, Lucelle (Grosslützel), and Les Bulles. The total baptized membership is about 1,000.

The religious development of the Jura Mennonites is like that in other regions. Originally their services were held in concealed clefts and caves. The "Geiss Chilchli" in the Kleinthal congregation, a small cave along the road to the present church in Perceux, recalls those days. Later they met in private homes; at the end of the 19th century meetinghouses were built everywhere. Faithful ministers maintained contact with the scattered members, admonishing and strengthening them in the faith. Contact with the Emmental church, the Evangelische Gesellschaft, and the "Free Churches" kept spiritual life awake, and about 1910 brought forth new life.

In economic life the Mennonites in the Jura have been proverbial for faithfulness in word and deed, industry and frugality. Thus they have again and again as renters won the good will of the owners and thereby that of the prince bishops. Even the government at Bern appreciated their pioneer work. Toward the end of the 19th century they began to acquire ownership of the land. This trend was promoted by the prosperity of World War I.

Whereas the German-speaking members of the Reformed Church who settle here lose their German completely in the second and third generation, the Mennonites have throughout the centuries retained it, constituting little islands of German in the French-speaking region. The reason for this lies in their religious isolation and their private schools. The great distance to the public schools justifies the government in supporting private schools on these isolated farms. Nevertheless these schools have repeatedly led to heated debates in the Grand Council at Bern as well as in the newspapers. The number of schools is decreasing, and the larger ones are trying to become state schools. (See Bern.) A.-T.

Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1932); H. L. Lehmann, Das Bisthum Basel (Leipzig, 1798); P. Bridel, Chourse de Bâle à Bienne, par les Vallées du Jura (Basel, 1789); C. F. Morel, Abrégé de l' histoire et de la Statistique du ci-devant Evéché de Bâle (Strasbourg, 1813); V. Rossel, Histoire du Jura Bernois (Geneva, 1914); P. O. Bessire, La Question Jurasienne (Porrentruy, 1919); C. Junod, L'ancien Evéché de Bâle à l'époque napoléonienne 1800-1813 (Tavannes, 1918); Emmentaler Blatt, No. 42-43 (1909), No. 33 (1914), No. 31 (1923); Der kleine Bund (literary supplement of Der Bund in Bern) 1928, No. 21; Der Sonntag (supplement of Neue Berner Zeitung) 1929, No. 30; Gem.-Kal. 1924 and 1925; D. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953); S. Gerber, "Die Mennonitengemeinden im Berner Jura," Der Mennonit I (1948) 36 f., 47 f.; S. Gerber, "Swiss and French Mennonites Today," Menn. Life VII (April 1952); ML II, 447 f.

Juriaen Friesen: see Friesen, Georg.

Juriaen Libich, a martyr: see Liebich (Lübich) Jörg.

Juridical Procedures Relating to the Anabaptists (German, Rechtsprechung). I. General. Legal action against Anabaptists developed in a natural way out of the juridical practice concerning heretics in general. In the 12th century when ecclesiastical defection or nonconformity led to the rise of Albigensian and Waldensian sectarianism, the Roman Church undertook stern measures of repression. Pope Gregory IX, 1227-41, creator of the first compilation of Canonical Law, established the Inquisition (q.v.), and Emperor Frederick II, 1220-50, in his Sicilian Law Code put the temporal arm of imperial law at the disposal of the church in all cases against heretics. In the 15th century, when the old Roman Law was assimilated into the German Law, the Civil Code of the Holy Roman Empire renewed the old laws of the emperors Gratian, Valentinian II, and Theodosius I (all of A.D. 380) concerning the exclusive right and authority of the Catholic Church, and that of the emperors Honorius and Theodosius II (A.D. 413) concerning the capital crime of rebaptism, punishable with death (Corpus Juris Civilis I, 1 and VI, 2). In criminal law, trials by torture (to obtain confessions incriminating to the accused) had been in use for various crimes against general security ever since the 13th century. In the trials of Anabaptists in particular the questionnaire set up before cross-examination was easily manipulated in such a way that it would influence the outcome of the trial. The first Anabaptist to die thus as a "heretic" on Catholic soil was Eberli Bolt (q.v.), executed in the canton of Schwyz on May 29, 1525, the first on Reformed soil was Felix Manz (q.v.) at Zürich on Jan. 5, 1527, and the first on Lutheran soil were two men and four women at Reinhardsbrunn (q.v.) on Jan. 18, 1530 (see also Gotha for names).

In the course of the persecution of the Anabaptists a double change is evident on the part of the government, due to a considerable extent to the Peasants' War; the charge shifted more and more from heresy to sedition; and on the part of the Reformers the sentencing of heresy grew more bitter to the extent that in heresy they were no longer attacking a hostile church, but defending their own. E.C.

II. Jurisdictional Practices of Ferdinand I in all of Austria, Bavaria, and the Territories of the Swabian League. Ferdinand I (q.v.), Archduke of Austria, King of Bohemia and Hungary, and later also Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, "the prince of darkness" as Jakob Hutter called him in his epistle of 1535, the "tyrant and enemy of divine truth who has had many of ours innocently and mercilessly murdered," was a staunch fighter for the undisturbed integrity of the Catholic Church. With the mandate of Aug. 20, 1527, he ushered in a systematic persecution in his domain by publishing a list of heretical doctrines, adherence to which would lead to capital punishment (see Mandates). The Anabaptists were charged with only two obnoxious articles: rejection of infant baptism and abuse of the Sacrament of the Altar. In the Ordinance of Feb. 26, 1528, to the Austrian Government he complained about laxity in the proceedings against Anabaptists (see Austria). But very soon he transformed these heresy-proceedings into extraordinary proceedings against "rebels."

South German influence on Ferdinand's mandates is very probable. Bavaria (q.v.) had already proclaimed martial law (Standrecht) against Anabaptists. "The ducal secretary Pernöder testified that no proper court session was held for the prisoners but that the sentence was simply read to them, whereupon they were led to execution" (Wiswedel, II, 55). The Swabian League (q.v.) with its practice of martial law shows again the governmental ideas regarding those who deviated from the old church. Many were sentenced to death without recourse to any juridical process, e.g., Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.). On March 7, 1528, the Swabian League issued a mandate against the Anabaptists which expressly said that "it can easily be estimated even by a simple Christian with little understanding" to what an extent Anabaptism will lead to "new revolts and rebellions," unless torture is undertaken and earnest punishment (Klüpfel, II, 319).

The specter of the Peasants' War (1525) was constantly in Ferdinand's mind. Like other princes of the time he too saw in Anabaptism a real threat to governmental authority. To be sure, this was not the only reason for his ruthless persecution of the Anabaptists; another was the presumed Christological heresies. Blasphemous words against "the Mother of God," for instance, were to be punished "in body, life, and property according to the occasion and the degree of guilt." Anyone who administered Holy Communion without having been consecrated as a priest was to be punished with "fire, sword, or water according to the judgment of the judges" (Nicoladoni, 259). Ferdinand argued that since seditious acts would surely ensue from heretical teachings (considered even more serious than a criminal act), extraordinary procedures should be pursued in all such cases, disregarding general legal practices. Ferdinand's policy concerning Anabaptists had, no doubt, also a significant influence upon the ill-famed mandate against Anabaptism of the Diet of Speyer, passed April 22, 1529. On the basis of this mandate Anabaptists were to be condemned to death by fire and sword, "without previous inquisition by spiritual judges." As it is generally known, the Reformers (Luther, Melanchthon) gave their consent to this basic mandate. The motivating force behind Ferdinand was no doubt his confessor, the Court Preacher Johann Faber (q.v.), who also played an important role at the Diet of Speyer. It was he who one year earlier cross-examined Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) and otherwise engaged in literary activities against the Anabaptists.

III. Luther and Melanchthon. Luther's (q.v.) views on heretics and their punishment have been thoroughly investigated by Sohm (q.v.), Köhler (q.v.), Wappler (q.v.), Paulus (q.v.), and more recently by John Oyer (see Bibliography). Until about 1524, Luther definitely rejected the idea of governmental intervention in matters of faith. In his letter "To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation" (1520) he states that heretics should be conquered "with Scripture not with fire, as the forefathers did. If it were an art to overcome heretics with fire, then the executioners would be the most learned doctors on earth." He urged lenience toward the Zwickau Prophets, and did not even want them to be imprisoned (Luther's Correspondence, ed. De Wette, Letter of Jan. 17, 1522, II, 135). In his book Von weltlicher Obrigkeit (1522) he sharply opposed government interference in spiritual matters. Also in a letter to his Prince of Saxony he admonished that the office of the Word should not be resisted. "Just let them preach confidently and vigorously what they can and against whom they will, for . . . there must be sects" (Luther's letters, ibid., Aug. 21, 1524 (?), II, 547).

In 1525, however, a change took place in Luther's opinion. In a letter dated March 4, 1525, to Spengler, the city clerk of Nürnberg, concerning the "three ungodly painters" (against whom the city council was conducting a trial) the concept of "blasphemy" occurs for the first time. For this particular offense it was necessary for the temporal powers to step in automatically. As to punishment, Luther does not express himself yet. In the years 1526-28, the concept of "sedition" takes the more prominent place. This idea had been drilled into the national consciousness during the Peasants' War, mainly by the weight of Lutheran publicity. Now, on Feb. 9, 1526, Luther declared to the Prince Elector that in order to prevent sedition and a mob spirit, "there shall be one kind of preaching only at one place" (Luther's Letters, ibid., III, 88 ff.). The word "sedition" was also utilized in connection with the newly established Lutheran church inspections (the Electoral Instructions for the inspectors of June 16, 1527, use this term expressly. Sehling, I, 142 ff.). Hence, anyone who did not agree with the Lutheran Church on a point of doctrine, was subject to the temporal authorities also on the suspicion of sedition. It should be emphasized, however, that with the by far greatest number of Anabaptists there was no evidence of seditious tendencies whatever to justify the intervention of the government, even though great divergencies existed in points of doctrine. The task of church organization, however, made it imperative now to find a justification for proceedings against all those who showed any anti-Lutheran mind. Since, as was generally assumed, the suspicion of sedition was not a sufficient ground for proceeding against deviators, it became necessary to find a new weapon. That was the concept of "blasphemy," used by Luther for the first time in the above-mentioned letter to Spengler of 1525.

Apparently Melanchthon (q.v.) was the first to draw the logical conclusions from this situation and demanded of the government that it punish false teachings. The occasion for this was given first by the exceedingly embarrassing results of the church inspections in Saxony which seemed to indicate a threat to the very existence of the new church (Corp. Reform.; Opera Melanchthoni, I, col. 941). It was also Melanchthon who became instrumental in the formulation of the official "Opinion" of the theological faculty of the University of Wittenberg concerning the legal aspects of the punishment of deviations in all matters of church discipline. Here the idea of blasphemy is clearly stated as the main argument for the death penalty. According to the study by Meissner, the Wittenberg theologians seemed to have arrived at this idea of blasphemy as the most serious criminal fault by all opponents by pointing to the concept of "ingratitude to the Gospel" (Luther's letter of Nov. 22, 1526, loc. cit. III, 135) as well as by reference to the Electoral Instructions of June 16, 1527 (Richter, I, 78). In a letter of Feb. 15, 1530, Melanchthon promoted the idea that blasphemous articles of faith, even if they have nothing to do with sedition, must be punished with the sword. By this procedure an extraordinarily effective legal device was now found for the persecution of all "heretics" and at the same time for the defense of the new church.

Luther bestowed his sanction upon this device in his Exposition of the 82d Psalm. The background of it is as follows: Around 1530, a new party had arisen in Nürnberg which advocated toleration and liberty of conscience in matters of religion. Thereupon, on March 17, 1530, Spengler wrote to Veit Dietrich at Wittenberg asking him to persuade Luther—then just working on an Exposition of Psalm Deus Sedet in Synagoga—to put into this new booklet a condemnation of the new party and its philosophy, all the more as this party defended its stand by reference to the "booklet by Doctor Luther addressed to the Elector of Saxony, against the fanatical Thomas Müntzer." Veit Dietrich then looked Luther up and expounded to him the principles of the prevailing criminal law of the time. Luther then developed these ideas further in his Exposition of the 82d Psalm (Hausdorff). In this Exposition Luther stressed first of all the high dignity of all authorities (or magistrates), which at one place he calls outright "gods." Seditious heretics are to be "punished straightway and without compunction." But likewise also those who teach only contrary to a published article of faith should be punished as open blasphemers who "are not to be tolerated." Against them he recommended quick justice, on the basis of Lev. 24:16 and also the Church Fathers, who had no more patience with false doctrines than Moses.

That Luther's Exposition of the 82d Psalm was actually considered as a declaration of principles to guide legal practices can be proved by numerous references (see Meissner). The courts of Saxony only too willingly concurred with the suggestions and opinions of the Wittenberg theologians. "They followed the opposite course from Ferdinand's juridical practice, namely, turning from the persecution of sedition to a secular trial of heretics" (Meissner). One might also mention the Imperial Cities of Germany, which followed in general also the direction of the Wittenberg theologians in their administration of justice in all cases of Anabaptism.

IV. Brenz. Johann Brenz (q.v.) of Württemberg for many years had defended toleration as a matter of principle. In his booklet, Ob eine weltliche Obrigkeit mit göttlichem und billigem Recht möge die Wiedertäufer durch Feuer und Schwert vom Leben zum Tode richten lassen (1528), he taught that mere heresy not associated with revolt should be fought only with the spiritual sword, the Word of God, inasmuch as it does not belong to the concern of the temporal powers. Furthermore this booklet proved that the accusation against the Anabaptists was definitely unjustified. Through this booklet Brenz' influence on the juridical practice in Württemberg and elsewhere was quite beneficent: there were at least no death sentences in Württemberg. But later on, unfortunately, Brenz drifted into the current of Luther and Melanchthon. In 1557, he became a signatory of the declaration of several theologians entitled Prozess wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern, durch etliche Gelehrt so zu Worms versammelt gewesen, gestellt (see Bedenken). This gloomy document deals in patricular with juridical questions concerning the proper course of trials of "heretics." The heads and seducers were to be put to death as blasphemers, for God had clearly commanded secular authorities to punish blasphemy. For that reason it had been right to punish Servetus [the Anti-Trinitarian, 1553]. The concept of blasphemy, as developed by Luther and Melanchthon, is interpreted as formal only (as Meissner has shown), i.e., it does not define particular non-orthodox teachings but in general means simply opposition as such; i.e., rebellion against the new church. It should, however, be mentioned that in the Stuttgart copy of this document (here called "Bendenken, etc.") the passage about Servetus' execution as well as another passage advocating death penalty for heresy is crossed out. Gustav Bossert, Jr., assumes that either the Duke of Württemberg or Brenz deleted these passages, and concludes accordingly that both the duke and the Württemberg theologians agreed basically with Brenz' earlier stand opposing the shedding of blood (Blätter, 25).

V. Bucer and Capito. These two reformers of Strasbourg were entirely dependent on Wittenberg. In a document called Reformationsprogramm (Program for the Reformation) of 1535 sent in the name of the Strasbourg clergy to the Count Palatine Rupprecht, the establishment of a formal inquisition, ruthless intervention of the government in family life with respect to the baptism of children, and the sharpest measures against all foes or deprecators of the Gospel are demanded (original copy of this document in the State Library in Munich). Bucer believed that the government had the right to introduce Christianity among its subjects and to eradicate any false worship. "Unorthodox teachers are to be punished by body and life." . . . "The power of the government over the conscience of its subjects is most harshly represented by Bucer" (Hagen).

VI. Zwingli and Calvin. Like Luther also Zwingli (q.v.) went through a certain change in his ideas concerning the punishment of heretics. In the earlier period of his reformatory activities he was possessed by the same optimism as Luther that the pure Gospel would renew everything and turn it to the good. But when in 1525 Anabaptism appeared in Zürich and tried to establish congregations on a New Testament pattern, he lost more and more the feeling that the norm of the Gospel and the new "Christian State" do not absolutely coincide. He began teaching the identity of Christianity and civil order, and committed to the "Christian" government of Zürich not only the supervision of general morality but also the care for the particular discipline of the new reformed church. He is said to have recommended the beheading of Anabaptists "on the strength of imperial law," as Balthasar Hubmaier claimed (Ein Gespräch Balthasar Hubmörs von dem Kindertauff, 1526). The Swiss authorities only too willingly acted upon his advice and opinion in all Anabaptist trials.

Calvin (q.v.) at first intended to have the spiritual office exclusively take charge of church discipline without any participation by the state. But soon developments in Geneva (q.v.) likewise went far beyond this initial program; the state police now also began to become involved in matters of church discipline. "We have sharpened the sword that they may accomplish their blood work" (Corp. Ref., Opera Calvini, VIII, 477). He expected from the state unconditional subjugation of all heretics and deviators. The execution of Michel Servetus in 1553 is a clear illustration of Calvin's enormous influence upon the temporal authorities of Geneva. (See also article Punishment of Anabaptists.) W.W.

G. Bossert, Jr., "Aus der nebenkirchlichen religiösen Bewegung der Reformationszeit in Württemberg," in Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte XXVIII (1929) 1-41; Corpus Reformatorum, Opera Melanchthoni; Corpus Reformatorum, Opera Calvini; Carl Hagen, Deutschlands literarische und religiöse Verhältnisse im Reformationszeitalter (Frankfurt, 1886); Urban Gottlieb Hausdorff, Lebensbeschreibung eines christlichen politici Lazari Spengler's (Nürnberg, 1741); Heinrich Hermelink, Der Toleranzgedanke im Reformationszeitalter (1908); K. Klüpfel, Urkunden zur Geschichte des Schwäbischen Bundes 1488-1533, Part 2 (Stuttgart, 1853); Walter Köhler, Reformation und Ketzerprozess (Tübingen and Leipzig, 1901); Robert Kreider, "The Anabaptists and the Civil Authorities of Strasbourg, 1525-1555," Church History XXIV (1955) 99-118; Wilhelm Martin Leberecht de Wette, ed. Martin Luther, Briefe, Sendschreiben und Bedenken II and III (Berlin, 1826-27; Erich Meissner, "Die Rechtsprechung über die Wiedertäufer und die antitäuferische Publizistik" (Ph.D. dissertation, Göttingen, 1921; this dissertation forms the basis for the material in the present article): A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden in den Jahren 1525-1531 (Berlin, 1893); John Oyer, "The Writings of Melanchthon Against the Anabaptists," MQR XXVI (October 1952); idem, "The Writings of Luther Against the Anabaptists," MQR XXVII (April 1953); Nikolaus Paulus, Protestantismus und Toleranz im sechzehnten Jahrhundert (Freiburg i.Br., 1911); A. L. Richter, Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jahrhunderts, 1, 2 (Weimar, 1846); Emil Sehling, ed. Die Evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jahrhunderts I, Part 1 (Leipzig, 1902); Paul Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Reformationszeit (Leipzig, 1908); Wiswedel, Bilder I, II, and III; Horst Schraepler, "Die rechtliche Behandlung der Täufer in Württemberg, Hessen, Baden, Kurpfalz und der deutschen Schweiz in den Jahren 1525-1618" (Tübingen doctoral dissertation, 1956); ML III, 433-39.

Jurjen-Thomas-volk, a branch of Dutch Mennonites, followers of Jurjen Thomas (q.v.), who in 1637 was excommunicated by the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, because of his conflict with Jan Luies (q.v.) and Uko Walles (q.v.). The small group of Jurjen Thomas' followers, which was found only in the province of Groningen, and was still in existence in 1681 (DB 1870, 114), may soon thereafter have merged either with the original Groningen Old Flemish from which they had separated, or with some other group. (N.N.B.Wb. III, 800.) vdZ.

Jus retractus (Auslösungsrecht), the right of redemption, used against the Mennonites in the Palatinate. By this phrase is meant the right of all Catholic and Protestant subjects in the Palatinate, for all time, to buy back from the Mennonites at the original selling price any piece of land which the Mennonites bought. On Jan. 18, 1726, the elector issued the decree "that the jus retractus was to be applied against the Anabaptists, in favor of Catholic and Protestant subjects, and that from now on Anabaptists were to yield without any further delay the above-mentioned property upon receipt of the original purchase price." Upon a moving petition from the Mennonites a further electoral decree followed on April 25, "whereby the right of redemption would apply only to future purchases," and was therefore not retroactive. By an electoral decree of April 1, 1737, the right of redemption was limited to three years. It remained at this stage until it was repealed by Elector Max Joseph IV, on April 17, 1801. (Gem-Kal. 1912, 120-34; ML II, 98.) NEFF.

Juschanlee: see Yushanlee.

Just, Martin M. (1866-1919), elder and conference leader of the M.B. Church, was the oldest of the 12 children of William and Wilhelmine Leitke Just. The parents, of German-Lutheran background, lived in a settlement in the Don River Valley, South Russia, where Martin was born July 14, 1866. In 1873 the family joined the Mennonite Brethren Church, and in 1880 emigrated to America, settling on a farm three miles west of Aulne, Marion Co., Kan., where their children grew up. After his elementary schooling Just attended a Bible School during the winter 1885-86 at Canada, Kan., which J. F. Harms (q.v.) was conducting.

On Oct. 27, 1887, Just married Anna Schapanski and established a farm home. After her death he married Hannah Patzkowski Aug. 22, 1894. Of the nine children born to the family, the two sons died in infancy and the seven daughters survived him. The family moved to a homestead at Isabella, Major Co., Okla., in 1895 where they lived for the rest of Just's life.

In 1888 Just was converted and joined the Ebenfeld M.B. Church. When he settled in Oklahoma he joined the South Hoffnungsfeld M.B. Church southeast of Fairview. He at once became active in the church, was elected deacon in 1896 and a year later to the ministry. In 1900 he was ordained as minister and in 1905 as elder. In addition to his effective ministry in the local church, which extended over a period of 22 years, he was much used in the churches of the M.B. Conference, especially in Oklahoma.

Just rendered a remarkable service in the M.B. General Conference. He was secretary of the Home Missions Committee, 1903-9, and served on the Foreign Mission Board, 1909-19. He was moderator of the Conference from 1915 until his death in 1919. In the Southern District Conference he was also very active from its beginning in 1909, serving as secretary of the Home Mission Board for ten years. The Conference elected him moderator for three consecutive one-year terms. Just also showed keen interest in the educational efforts of the M.B. Church, serving on its educational committee for some time. After the establishment of Tabor College, he was also a member of its Board of Directors.

Elder Just died at his home at Isabella, Aug. 22, 1919; interment was at the South Hoffnungsfeld M.B. Cemetery. J.H.L.

Justice Mennonite Brethren Church, fomerly called Brookdale, a member of the Canadian Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized by Jacob A. Loewen in 1930 with 8 members. In 1940 a church was built 3½ miles northeast of Justice, Man. The membership in 1952 was 57. Jacob J. Loewen has been its leader and minister since 1937. J.J.L.

Jut, a former Dutch Mennonite family, found from the 17th century at Amsterdam, where some of the members were deacons of the Zonist (q.v.) congregation. An important member of this family was Pieter Nicolaas Jut van Breukelerwaard (Amsterdam 1786-Laag Soeren 1874), at first a stock dealer at Amsterdam. Staying at Hanau, Germany, for recovery from a serious disease, he was won over to nature cure, and after his return to Holland bought a country place at Laag Soeren, which was later set up as a nature cure establishment. He translated a number of books and pamphlets on nature cure. He willed a sum of money to the Mennonite conference of Friesland (F.D.S.), which is administered as the Fund-Jut van Breukelerwaard. vdZ.

Jutte Eeuwouts, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, who was hanged at The Hague on March 17, 1536. Jutte Eeuwouts was a wealthy lady living at Poeldijk in the Dutch province of South Holland near The Hague. Her house was a center of Anabaptist activity; here a number of fanatical and revolutionary Anabaptists used to meet, among whom was Adriaen Adriaensz, known as "the king of Israel." On March 8-9, 1536, the magistrate surprised a meeting of about 40 persons in the house of Jutte Eeuwouts; some were killed, including Adriaen Adriaensz; others, including Jutte, were arrested. The whole group was put to death at The Hague. Jutte was executed in a specially cruel way. vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 118 f.; E. van Bergen, "De Wederdoopers in het Westland," in Bijdragen v.d. Geschiedenis v.h. Bisdom Haarlem, 1903, 269-88; Mellink, Wederdopers, 218 f., 221.

Jutzi (Judtzi, Judzy, Yutzy), a Mennonite family name, originally found in Switzerland. Some members of this family migrated to France (Alsace) and Germany (Baden and Palatinate) in the 17th and 18th centuries because of oppression. Both from Alsace and Baden some Jutzis emigrated to America in the late 18th and early 19th centuries, chiefly to Ontario.

Peter Judzy was a preacher of the Gerolsheim (q.v.) congregation in the Palatinate from 1765 until after 1802, and Jacob Jutzi served as an elder at Neuwied (q.v.), Germany, 1759-92 (or 93) and from then until after 1802 as elder of the Mannheim congregation. In America the family has been exclusively Amish or only recently turned Mennonite (MC). D. S. Jutzi of Tavistock, Ont., has long been a bishop in the Ontario Amish Mennonite Conference, while Rufus Jutzi of Elmira, Ont., is secretary of the Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference. Three men bearing the name Yutzy are serving as Mennonite ministers in Michigan, Iowa, and Kansas.

Jutzi, George (1800-81), one of the few Amishmen who wrote a book. He was born in France, came to America as a young man, and settled in Pennsylvania. Later he moved west to Stark Co., Ohio, and died in Wilmot Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont. In 1853 Alexander Stutzman of Somerset, Pa., published a volume with Jutzi's Ermahnung an seine Hinterbliebenen, together with his poetry and other material. The "Letter of Exhortation to his Posterity," originally written in 1842, covers the first 88 pages; then follow 237 pages of rhymed verses, again addressed to his children and containing admonitions, warnings, and instructions in the proper Christian conduct of life. The concluding rhymed Abschieds Wunsch covers not less than 55 pages. Generally speaking the spirit of these writings is very characteristically Amish: the sturdy and concrete Biblical faith without much emotion, but with the determination to carry out this faith in all fields of practical life. The rest of the book is taken up by a brief history of the Mennonites and Amish, partly taken from Gerhard Roosen (q.v.) and written by Sam (Shem) Zook of Mifflin Co., Pa. R.F.

K

Kaaden, Peace of, a treaty of peace signed at Kaaden on the Eger in Bohemia on June 29, 1534, by Philip of Hesse and King Ferdinand of Austria, by which Duke Ulrich of Württemberg regained his land. This treaty was of great importance to Lutheranism by sanctioning for Württemberg the achievements of the peace of Nürnberg; "but all Sacramentists, Anabaptists, and all other new unchristian sects . . . shall not be tolerated in the land." Thereby Anabaptists were for several centuries prohibited from living in Württemberg, although this law was not strictly enforced. NEFF.

J. Witte, Philipp der Grossmütige von Hessen und die Restitution Ulrichs von Württemberg 1526-1535 (Tübingen, 1882) 205; Bossert, TA I: Württemberg, 11 and 37; Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909) 415-29; Ztscht für Kirchengesch. XI, 215 ff.; ML II, 449.

Kaan, a Dutch Mennonite family, numerous representatives of which are found from at least the 17th century in a number of congregations in the province of North Holland, such as Barsingerhorn-Kolhorn, Wieringerwaard, and Zijpe. They usually were farmers. Many of them served as deacons. Now they are scattered all over North Holland. vdZ.

Kaars, a Mennonite family found in the Dutch province of North Holland. The earliest representatives of this family are found in the small congregation of Krommeniedijk, where in the late 17th century they were manufacturers of canvas. Some of them were deacons of the church. A lateral branch of this family is the Kaars Sijpestein family of Krommenie (q.v.), where they were manufacturers of canvas and where now are found the world famous linoleum and oil manufacturing plants of the Kaars Sijpesteins. The founder of this big business was Hendrik Sijpestein (1773-1835), married to Bregje Kaars (1775-1803). He was a son of the (non-Mennonite) schoolteacher, later public notary, Willem Sijpestein. Most members of the Kaars Sijpestein family have been Mennonites. Willem Kaars Sijpestein of Krommenie is at present a member of the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (General Dutch Mennonite Conference). (Ned. Patr. XVIII, 1927, 339-44.) vdZ.

Kaaskooper (Caeskooper), a Dutch Mennonite family, found in the province of North Holland. Jan Janse Kaeskooper (1627-99), whose family was living at Alkmaar by 1580, was a preacher of the Flemish congregation at Alkmaar 1654-74 and from then until his death of the Alkmaar Waterlander congregation. He was commemorated by his colleague Jan Bosch in Zedige Redenvoering (Alkmaar, 1699). Claas Arentse Kaaskooper, a member of the Koog-Zaandijk (q.v.) congregation, was active in behalf of the persecuted Swiss Mennonites in 1710. In the 18th century some members of the Kaaskooper family were active in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement. vdZ.

J. de Lange CJzn, Beknopte Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Alkmaar (n.d., 1927) passim, see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 918, II, No. 1909.

Kaege (Kaegy, Kaegi), a Mennonite family name. Klaus Kaegi, of Wald in the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was subjected to a cross-examination on Jan. 30, 1616, in which he definitely acknowledged himself to be an Anabaptist. Apparently he was expelled because of this. In 1683 Felix came from Switzerland to the Palatinate and settled on the Bolanderhof near Kirchheimbolanden, Palatinate, Germany. He had six sons and a daughter (who married a Neef). His son Philipp remained on the Bolanderhof, which is now in the possession of the eighth generation of descendants. At present the name is found only here, at Weierhof, and at Ibersheim. Jakob Kaegy (1861-1940), Bolanderhof, was an agricultural expert and for many years the principal of the Weierhof (q.v.) school.

In 1715 Hans (John Rudolf) Kägy migrated to Lancaster Co., Pa., where he located in the Conestoga settlement. He was married to a daughter of Martin Kendig. One of his sons, Henry, migrated to Page Co., Va., in 1768, and in the following year to Shenandoah County. Two other Kägy families, all of whom can be traced back to Switzerland, emigrated to Lancaster Co., Pa. A Johannes Keagy arrived in 1739; a Rudolph Kägy arrived in 1764. The family, however, never became prominent in American Mennonitism, and apparently early transferred to other denominations, among which the Dunkard (Church of the Brethren) Church was prominent. A grandson of Hans, John Keagy, was a Dunkard preacher, one of the earliest of that group in western Pennsylvania. NEFF, P.S.

C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916) 92; Franklin Kaegy, A History of the Kägy Relationship in America from 1715 to 1900 (Harrisburg, 1899); ML II, 449.

Kaege, David (1767-1846), an outstanding Mennonite farmer of Offstein, Rheinhessen, Germany. With great ingenuity he increased his paternal inheritance (Backhaushofgut), by raising anise, rape, and cabbage, besides grain, potatoes, and clover, by distilling whisky and vinegar, and by purchasing farms in the vicinity. He also owned ten Morgen of vineyard, which he cultivated by advanced methods. He was always ready to help his neighbors, friends, and relatives with advice and deed, always striving to raise the agricultural level. He urged the raising of cattle and horses. He was known for his benevolence, and was respected by all. Though he was open to the world socially and intellectually, in church affairs as deacon of the church at Heppenheim a.d.W., he opposed all innovations and with Johann Galle (q.v.) he resisted the progressive course of the churches in the Palatinate and Hesse, including the employment of trained, salaried preachers. (Gem.-Kal. 1925, 39-63; ML II, 449.) NEFF.

Kaerl (van Yperen): see Laurens van de Walle.

Kager (Kag), Hans, a revolutionary in Augsburg, Germany, who was executed there in August 1524 with Hans Speisser. G. Uhlhorn writes, "It is characteristic that the martyr lists of the Anabaptists include these two men, though with some difference in spelling, among their blood witnesses, perhaps an indication of the type of elements now beginning to stir in Augsburg." There were, however, no Anabaptists before 1525. Nor does Uhlhorn cite an Anabaptist martyr list, but quotes Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici, who in turn does not list Kager. Kager does not appear in the Anabaptist martyr lists. Their identity is not clear. (See Koch, Hans.) HEGE.

G. Uhlhorn, Urbanus Rhegius (Elberfeld, 1861) 62.

Kager (Karger), Man(n)g (van Braght, Mart. Mir., has Mankager), a journeyman shoemaker of Füssen, Bavaria, a Hutterite martyr, was seized in 1529 with two brethren and four sisters in Fill (q.v.) in the Adige, Austria. On Nov. 19 they were cross-examined and then executed. Mang Kager confessed that he had been baptized by George Blaurock (q.v.); he considered the Mass, infant baptism, transubstantiation, worship of the saints, and the confessional worthless. Christ is the mediator between God and man. "What he confessed with his mouth he would also testify to with his blood; he would not abandon his faith, but would persist in it to the end." NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 55; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 89; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74, 76; Mart. Mir. D 27 f., E 435 f.; ML II, 449 f.

Kai Chow, one of the six counties on the southern tip of Hopei province, China, where the General Conference Mennonite Church conducted mission work. Kai Chow is more commonly known by the name "P'u-yang," which is the proper government designation. This county is the largest of the six counties occupied by the mission and is central geographically. It has a population of approximately one-half million and an area 1,000 square miles. Besides the county seat there were some 50 larger market towns and hundreds of small villages.

In 1911 H. J. Brown and his wife purchased property in Kai Chow and started independent mission work, which in 1914 was taken over by the General Conference Mennonite Mission Board. In 1916 the first boys' school buildings were completed, and in 1918 a large church building, seating 800, was erected and a girls' school begun. In 1940 the mission property consisted of about 20 acres of land in the city and east suburb, on which were located two church buildings, five missionary homes, two primary schools, a coeducational middle school, and a Bible school. The total student enrollment exceeded 500. There was also a hospital with 80-bed inpatient capacity and a daily outpatient count of about 100. The total church membership in the six counties was 2,273 in 1940, organized into 24 congregations. Thirteen of these, as well as nine preaching places, were in P'u-yang County. With the Japanese occupation, schools and hospital were overcrowded and relief work among refugees taxed all resources. By 1941 the missionary families with children left the station and the following year the five who remained were interned. Attempts were made to reopen the work after the war but the renewal of civil war between the Communist and Nationalist sides made this impossible. (ML II, 450; ME I, †.) S.F.P.

Kaiser, Appolonia, an Anabaptist martyr of Mühlhausen in Thuringia, Germany, baptized in 1535 by Peter Reusse (q.v.), was drowned in the Unstrut on Nov. 8, 1537, with Jakob Storger and seven other Anabaptists between Mühlhausen and Ammern. (Wappler, Thüringen, 158, 162, et passim; ML II, 451.)

Kaiser (Käser, Keser, Kayser, Keyser), Leonhard, a Lutheran martyr, a former chaplain, was burned at Schärding on the Inn on Aug. 16, 1527, because he would not recant. The trial and execution caused much excitement in Germany. Reports concerning his death grew in the manner of legends. The publication of the execution was very painful to Johann Eck (q.v.), who had participated as prosecutor in the trial at the orders of Bishop Ernest of Passau (a younger brother of dukes William and Louis of Bavaria). He therefore replied in his booklet, Warhafftige handlung, wie es mit her Lenhart Käser zu Schärding verbrandt, ergangen ist. Luther published a counterreply.

In the older accounts Leonhard Kaiser is called an Anabaptist martyr. But this was an error. The steadfastness of the martyr made a deep impression on the bystanders. The judge who pronounced the death sentence was so moved that he soon resigned his position. His assistant, Leonhard Mittermaier, emigrated to Moravia and joined the Hutterian Brethren. The Hutterite chronicle states that he reported the execution to them and apparently took Kaiser to be an Anabaptist. It is very likely that he did not know the difference, since the charge was presented in Latin, and Kaiser answered in German; it is also strange that the chronicles of the Moravian Hutterites record only the outward events, and do not discuss his faith.

Two Anabaptists died later as martyrs in Schärding: in 1529 Virgil Plattner (q.v.), who had also been a priest, and in 1571 Wolf Binder (q.v.).

As the heirs of his considerable estate Kaiser named his brothers and the schoolmaster Ulrich. The latter he admonished to continue to teach the boys; but if he could not stay there because of tyranny, then one of his relatives should take him and his boys to some place where "the Word of God is preached pure" (Roth, p. 27). Only four days after this execution Ferdinand I issued his first mandate against Zwinglians and Anabaptists for his Austrian hereditary lands, which threatened severe penalties for all who deviated from the Roman church on any point. Therefore schoolmaster Ulrich probably had occasion to leave the country with a relative and his charges.

A Dutch family tradition has it that the descendants of Leonhard Kaiser fled to Holland, and called themselves Keyser (q.v.) there. HEGE.

Fr. Leeb, Leonhard Käser, Ein Beitrag z. bayr. Ref.-Gesch. (Münster, 1929); Fr. Roth, Leonhard Kaiser, ein evangelischer Märtyrer aus dem Innviertel (Halle, 1900); Th. Wiedemann, Dr. Johann Eck (Regensburg, 1865);

V. A. Winter, Geschichte der Schicksale der evangelischen Lehre in und durch Baiern (München, 1809); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 25; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 42; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 58; Mart. Mir. D 9 f., 47, E 420-22; ML II, 104, 451.

Kaiserslautern, the second largest city (pop. 80,000) in the Palatinate, Germany, since 1896 the seat of a Mennonite congregation which in 1954 numbered 67 baptized members. It is united into a single church with Zweibrücken (q.v.), Kühbörncheshof (q.v.), and Saarland (q.v.).

In Kaiserslautern there were Mennonites in the 16th century. In 1566 the preacher Sylvanus notified the council that some Anabaptists had slipped into the city, especially a master cooper, Balthasar Bender, who should be questioned. In the hearing Bender refused to take the oath, and said he would not take part in war. He had also taken a wife who did not attend church here. They were banished from the city. "He thanked God that he must suffer somewhat for His name, and would leave the city" (Küchler, 11 and 12). On April 18, 1595, the Anabaptist Barthel Lorch said he would let himself be hanged on a tree before he would go to church. In 1730, in the procession through the city forest, some Anabaptists from Aschbacherhof, Christian Knebel, Hannsz Jacob Hirsch, and Clauss Ochsel, were lashed by the city authorities. In 1740 Kaiserslautern was instructed to raise a troop of militia to serve six years; but the city was to send no Anabaptists, Jews, "or other rabble," for such would not be accepted (Küchler, 615).

The Mennonite lists in the Karlsruhe archives state that in 1724 a Mennonite was living as owner at the city mill. In 1738 Heinrich Jordan, Ulrich Gindelsberger, and Jakob Guth were living in the city, but nothing more is said about them. They were perhaps from the near-by Eselsmühle, where there was an Amish congregation until the middle of the 19th century. The Dutch Naamlijst (1775 ff.) mentions a congregation near Kaiserslautern with Christian Schenck and Christian Imhoff Jr. as preachers. The Amish congregation held services alternately at Obermehlingen, Willensteinerhof, Horterhof, Ingweilerhof, and Schallodenbach; in the 50's they rented a hall at Eselsfurth, in which they held services every three weeks. The elders were Johann Maurer of Obermehlingen (d. 1850) and Johann Imhof of Willensteinerhof near Trippstadt (d. 1857). The preachers were Jakob Ehresmann of Dörrmoschel and Daniel Schönbeck of Ingweilerhof. In 1772 the Mennonite Christian Raque acquired the Lichtenbrucherhof near Kaiserslautern for 115 guilders (Zink, 272).

The families of Jakob Oswald, Lorenz Walter, Joh. Chr. Höfli, Jakob Latscha, and Hans Joder were living on neighboring farms as for instance the Mückenhof, and Christian Lichti in Rothselberg near Wolfstein.

In 1744 the administration still ruled that no public service or permission to marry be granted them, and that they should not be permitted to stay in Kaiserslautern (Küchler, 642).

In 1780 the council inquired by what plan the dead of the three Christian creeds were buried in the common cemetery. The answer was given that all the dead were laid strictly in the order of their death and that there were no separate plots. But that there were exceptions is shown by the magistrate's order that the exhumed Mennonites were to be reburied at once in the original place (Küchler, 745). This probably refers to the following shocking instance of intolerance in 1780. Among the laborers in a yarn spinnery were two Mennonites, J. Dietrich and Johann Strohm. The wife of the former died and was buried in the common cemetery. When the Catholic clergy learned that an Anabaptist had been buried there with the honors of the church, they set all wheels in motion to punish this crime. They managed to have the body exhumed at night and buried outside the cemetery. All efforts of the management of the factory and their attorney to have the deceased given an honorable burial were futile (Gem.-Kal., 1900, 63-78).

In 1878 the three congregations in the neighborhood of Kaiserslautern (Neudorferhof, established in 1700, meetinghouse 1866; Kühbörncheshof 1832, meetinghouse 1832; and Ernstweiler 1680), which until that time had been independent congregations with lay preachers, united to employ a trained and salaried preacher, who assumed pastoral care of the three groups as a circuit and preached at the three places in rotation. Although none of these older congregations was located in the city they jointly assumed the name Kaiserslautern for their circuit of three groups. In 1896, however, a congregation was organized in Kaiserslautern and added to the group, enlarging it to four units. The Ernstweiler group united with Ixheim in 1936 and took the congregational name of Zweibrücken. In 1949 the remnants of the former independent Saargebiet congregation organized themselves into a "Saarland" congregation and affiliated with the Kaiserslautern circuit. In 1951 Neudorferhof detached itself from this circuit and affiliated with the Sembach congregation. The circuit was served by the following ministers: S. Blickensdörfer 1878-80; Abraham Hirschler 1880-1931; A. Harder 1931-37; Hugo Scheffler 1937-51; Theo Hotel 1951- . The baptized membership of the four units of the circuit in 1954 was as follows: Kaiserslautern 67, Kühbörncheshof 159, Zweibrükken 201, Saarland 61; total 488, plus 163 unbaptized children. The meeting places were rented halls in the cities of Kaiserslautern and Zweibrücken, and the rural meetinghouse of Kühbörncheshof.

The Mennonite Central Committee began a relief program in Kaiserslautern in early 1947, which has developed into permanent social welfare work. In gratitude for this help, the city government named one street "Mennonitenstrasse" and donated a plot of ground in the center of the city, on which in 1955 the MCC erected a permanent building containing administrative offices, a residence for workers, and a meeting room for church services. The MCC program in Kaiserslautern began with child-feeding, added a home for the temporary care of undernourished children from Berlin, and in 1949 a neighborhood center (Nachbarschaftsheim, q.v.) in a building supplied by the city. Neff, H.S.B.

J. Küchler, Chronik der Stadt Kaiserslautern aus den Jahren 1566-1798 (Kaiserslautern, 1905); Th. Zink, Kaiserslautern in der Vergangenheit und Gegenwart (1914); Menn. Bl., 1859, 15; ML II, 452.

Kaju-Apu, one of the three oldest stations of the former Dutch Mennonite mission in Java, Indonesia. It is located south of Mt. Muria, four miles from Kudus. Some Javanese Christians on an evangelizing tour found at Kaju-Apu some persons desirous of instruction. On July 26, 1853, four men were baptized by Hoezoo, a missionary working at Semarang under the Dutch (Reformed) mission board. By 1875 this beginning had increased to 92 members. After Hoezoo's death in 1896 the Dutch Mennonite Missionary Society took over the station on July 1, 1898. By that time there had been some loss of members to the Catholic Church and also by members moving away. The remaining 54 members were served alternately by Johann Hübert and Pieter Anton Jansz. In December 1901 Johann Fast took charge of the mission and built a residence, a school, and a dispensary in addition to the chapel which was built by Hoezoo. Outstations were built at Pati (15 miles away) and Taju (30 miles away). When Fast returned to Europe for his health in 1909, the stations were served by Johann Klaassen (q.v.) until he had to return to Europe for his health. The work was then in charge of J. Siemens, who was also compelled to return to Europe in 1914. Meanwhile the congregation had grown to 105 souls, with 55 baptized members. The mission school had three teachers and 100 pupils. The dispensary served 80-100 patients daily.

In 1904-21 Kaju-Apu was unoccupied, the work being carried on by N. Thiessen from Margoredjo. This period was the time of the revival among the Chinese in Kudus (q.v.). It was continued when Fast returned in 1921 and established a subsidiary station in Karangrava. In 1928, in his fortieth year of service, Fast was compelled to leave for a cooler climate.

In June 1929 Hermann Schmitt took over Kaju-Apu, living in Kudus, since there were greater opportunities for work there. Kaju-Apu became a subsidiary with extensive autonomy. Gersom, who had faithfully assisted in the work for more than 40 years, retired in 1932. Most of the members are poor farmers. Since the voluntary contributions of the members and the small income from the rice fields bought by the missionaries at a former time were insufficient to cover the essential expenses, the congregation received aid from the mission treasury.

In 1933 the Kaju-Apu congregation had a membership of 70 adults and 84 children. Sunday services were attended on an average by 66 adults and the Sunday school by 68 children, and the catechetical instruction by 34 young people. Shortly after 1930 this congregation became to some extent independent. Excellent native teachers and preachers, like Tirtoadi, Radija Nitiardjo (until 1936), Wigeno Mororedjo (since 1936), had charge of the congregation, which became completely independent on Nov. 24, 1940. World War II, the Japanese invasion (1942), and the political alterations in Indonesia put the congregation to a severe test, but it stood the test. In 1949 the membership numbered 65 baptized members and 146 children. In 1955 these figures were 76 and 107. The preacher (now elder) of the congregation since 1941 is W. Moroedjo. (Reports of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association; ML II, 450 f.) H.Sc., vdZ.

Kalamazoo State Hospital Civilian Public Service Unit, No. 120, Kalamazoo, Mich., was operated by the Mennonite Central Committee. It was approved Nov. 3, 1943; closed June 22, 1946; had a capacity of 30 men; and assisted in the care of the mental patients. A unit of I-W men was assigned to the Kalamazoo hospital under the new draft law following World War II. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 239.

Kalamazoo (Mich.) United Missionary Church had a membership of 81 in 1953. F. I. Rouse was serving as pastor. M.G.

Kalamba, a former station of the Congo Inland Mission in Africa, was established in 1912 among the Baluba-Lulua people, located on the Kasai River about 150 miles south from Charlesville. The work at this place went forward with good results for many years, but in time factors developed which hindered the work so that in 1946 the Board granted the request from the field to terminate the work and establish a new station at a point some distance westward. The new station was named Mutena. The statistics for Mutena in 1949 were: missionaries, 8; native pastors, 2; baptisms, 86; church members, 967; awaiting baptism, 400; communities where services are conducted regularly, 106; native leaders in training, 14; rural schools, 43; rural teacher-evangelists, 45; average attendance of all schools, 1,103; native medical helpers, 4; new cases treated, 3,327. R.L.H.

Kaldenkirchen, a town (pop. 5,700), earlier called Kaldekerk, in the Brüggen district of Jülich, Germany. In 1533 there was much disputing in the vicinity concerning the Mass and communion. A hatter named Venlo preached. When Herr Anthonius preached in Bracht the bells rang. In 1550 the Merchenarius Johann Backhuys was deposed from his position in the church by the bishop of Liége. There were a number of Anabaptists in the Brüggen district: in 1638 seven in Dülken and seven in Kaldenkirchen; in 1652 six in Dülken, one in Bracht, and eight in Kaldenkirchen. Shortly after this last listing they had to leave the district. We meet a number of them again in Crefeld, from where they emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1683. Of particular interest is the fate of Theisz Dohr (Doermans or Peterschen), which is given at length in the records contained in the state archives at Düsseldorf, Jülich-Berg II, 252. His sons and sons-in-law were in the group that emigrated to America in 1683. Kaldenkirchen was also the home of the brothers Jan and Willem Streypers, who played a role in the emigration to Pennsylvania. They had originally been Reformed, but became Quakers and were Quakers in Germantown. The Quaker church was established by English missionaries at Kaldekerk as early as 1680. Jan Streypers returned to Kaldekerk permanently in 1706. H.S.B.

W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore College, 1935).

Kalender, a Dutch Mennonite calendar, which appeared under different names: Doopsgezinde Kalender, Zendings-Kalender, Broederschapskalender, containing a page for every day of the year, was issued for the first time in 1937. For the years 1943-47 no Kalender appeared. In 1956 the calendar for the first time does not contain a page for each day, but has a page with a picture for every 14 days. vdZ.

Kalff (Calff, Kalf), a Dutch Mennonite family of Zaandam, province of North Holland, which played an important part in the economic prosperity of this town. They were merchants and shipowners, often engaging in whaling as far away as Greenland. Cornelis Michielsz Calff (1652-1721), who was a shipbuilder and equipped a number of boats for his own business in whaling grounds near Greenland, and who was consulted by Peter the Great of Russia when he visited Zaandam in 1717, was a preacher of the Flemish congregation of Zaandam from 1680, and of the United Flemish and Waterlander Nieuwe Huys congregation 1687-d. 1721. His son Nicolaas Kalf (Claes Cornelisz Calf, 1677-1734), who was a wholesale dealer, shipowner, and manufacturer of Zaandam, and was known for his excellent collection of coins and other art treasures, was a promoter of the founding of the West Zaandam Mennonite orphanage in 1713-14. J. Kalff, a lawyer, was one of the founders of the congregation at The Hague in 1880-81. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 31, 35 f., 48, 65, 115 f., 141, 186; DB 1896, 64, 69 f.

Kalker (Calcar, Kalker), Hendrik Jans van (1683-?), a Dutch Mennonite of Deventer who left the Old Flemish congregation of his home town to join the Swiss Mennonite congregation of Sappemeer. He published at Groningen in 1744 a Confession drawn up by his father-in-law, Jan van Komen, and wrote a preface for this book. It is not clear whether an appendix to this book, entitled: Korte Redengevinge van den dienst der Oudsten, which contains a number of particulars about the Swiss Mennonite ministry in the Netherlands, was written by van Komen or by van Kalker. Van Kalker was married 1703 to Grietje van Komen. (DB 1919, 75; Biogr. Wb. IV, 645; N.N.B. Wb. IX, 487; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1887.) vdZ.

Kalker (Calcar), Izaak van, of the old van Calcar (q.v.) family of Deventer, b. there about 1678, d. in August 1756 at Zaandam, was 1712-56 a (lay) preacher, of the Old Flemish congregation of Zaandam Oost. He is also said to have preached for the New Swiss (q.v.) Mennonite congregation of Sappemeer (q.v.), who met in a small private house on the former Sapmeer (reclaimed lake). Van Kalker published Belijdenis en Lofgezangen (1737), Zedelijke en Stichtelijke Gezangen (Zaandam, 1737), Geestelijke Lofzangen (Zaandam, 1739), and Israels Verdrukking en Verlossing in Egipten (Zaandam, 1739). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 644 f.; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 21.

Kalker, Jan van, b. 1760, d. 1834 at Heerenveen, a Dutch Mennonite lay preacher, who served the congregation of Noordbroek 1776-83, Neustadt-Gödens 1783-88, and Heerenveen 1788-1821. He was not the same person as the Jan van Calcar (q.v.) who was preacher of the New Swiss (q.v.) Mennonites of Groningen and Sappemeer in 1755-78. vdZ.

Kalkwijk, a canal near Hoogezand in the Dutch province of Groningen, Netherlands, where there are a number of small farms. This hamlet, originally called Oude Friesche Compagnie (Old Frisian Company), was founded in 1631 by some peat-farmers, mostly Mennonites, who had come from the environs of Heerenveen, Friesland. During the 17th century, about 1670, a number of Mennonites from the Palatinate, Germany, are said to have settled here, but concerning these "Palsters" no further information was available. The name Kalkwijk, according to an old tradition, is derived from the Swiss Mennonite Kalken family, which settled here in 1711. Others are of opinion that the name Kalkwijk originated from a lime (Dutch: kalk) kiln found here, which was owned by a Mennonite family, later called Calkema. It was at Kalkwijk, too, that the Swiss emigrant Samuel Peter (Maihusen), the ancestor of the Dutch Mennonite Meihuizen (q.v.) family, settled in 1714. vdZ.

Müller, Berner Täufer, 322; J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 43, 54 f.; DJ 1932, 71.

Kalleken: see also Calleken.

Kalleken, widow of Anpleunis (q.v.) van den Berge, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on April 30, 1569, at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, where her husband had suffered martyrdom on Nov. 17, 1568. Kalleken, whose official name was Cathelijne Saelins, or Calleken Stalins, had been (re)baptized in the fall of 1567 or in the spring of 1568 and was arrested at Meenen, Belgium, to which town she apparently had moved after her husband's arrest. She died faithful. Her goods were confiscated. With her were executed Pieter den Ouden (Oudeghodt), Fransoois de Timmerman, Jan van Raes, Jan Wattier, and Wouter Denys. (Mart. Mir. D 408, E 759 f.; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 40, No. 28.) vdZ.

Kalleken Claes, an Anabaptist martyr: see Cathelijne Claes.

Kalleken N., an Anabaptist woman who was arrested in July 1592 at Gent, Belgium, together with Bartholomeus Panten and Michiel de Cleercq. The two men suffered death at Gent on Sept. 15, 1592. Van Braght's statement (Mart. Mir. D 779, E 1082) that Kalleken was put to death with the two men is an error; Verheyden (Gent, 70, note 1) found in the documents that Kalleken did not suffer death but was released after she had renounced her faith. (ML II, 453.) vdZ.

Kalleken Strings (Strincx, Stryngs), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Ieper (Ypres) in Belgium on Oct. 18, 1561. She was arrested with some other members of the Ieper (q.v.) congregation. Kalleken is celebrated in the song, "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert eenentsestich Jaer" (No. 21 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren).

This song informs us about her strong faith, but does not give any particulars about her. Somewhat more instructive is another song, "Geroert ben ick van binnen" (I am moved in my heart), No. 23 of the Lietboecxken, which is also found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. On the basis of this hymn the Dutch martyrbook of 1615 gives an account of this martyr, which is repeated in the following martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, which states that Kalleken was a young and well-educated woman, who, notwithstanding a number of attempts to make her renounce her faith, remained steadfast. She was executed secretly because the officials feared a revolt of the populace. This execution took place some time after the death of her fellow members of Ieper. vdZ.

Offer, 591, 605; Mart. Mir. D 285, E 652; Wolkan, Lieder, 64, 72; Wackernagel, Lieder, 141.

Kallenberg, Hans, a priest, was in 1526 among the first Täufer (Anabaptist) group at Aarau (q.v.), Switzerland. Further information about Kallenberg is lacking, Kallenberg apparently soon having left the Anabaptists. vdZ.

P. Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 24-26, 90, 109, No. 9.

Kalona, Iowa, is situated in the eastern part of the state, in northern Washington County, 19 miles southwest of Iowa City. It has a population of 1,015, a considerable number of whom are Mennonites (MC). Amish and Mennonite farmers live in the areas surrounding the town, although the center of their community lies to the northwest. The nearest Mennonite church, East Union (MC), is located two miles north of Kalona, and the nearest Conservative Mennonite church, Fairview, is a mile farther north and two east. Six Old Order Amish congregations are located near the town. A considerable number of the members of the Lower Deer Creek Mennonite Church (MC) have a Kalona address. See map of Johnson County. A.L.S.

Käls (Kels), Hieronymus (Jeronimus, Jerome), a Hutterite martyr of Kufstein, Tirol, Austria, a schoolmaster of the "church in Moravia." That there were still numerous Anabaptists in Lower Austria, especially in Vienna, in spite of the severe persecution resting on them in the 1530's is revealed in the trials conducted in Vienna in 1536. The men involved were Jerome Käls and his comrades, Michael Seifensieder of Wallan in Bohemia and Hans Oberecker of Affers in the Adige Valley, Upper Austria.

The trials are of more than ordinary interest, for here it can be seen that the continuous executions were a horror to the judges as well as to the population, and that the unheard-of courage of their faith and their readiness to die amazed the judges. The judge's attitude to these three men is outspokenly friendly; their brethren have access to them, bring them letters of consolation from the churches, and carry their epistles back to the churches; indeed, the prisoners are engaged in so lively a correspondence that the guards must have closed their eyes to it. We are not surprised when Hans Käls wrote that it "would be a comfort if the Brethren had a woman living here who could bring us a good letter of comfort, even if she did it as if she were bringing us food or wine."

The course of the trial against the three Brethren was as follows: In the first days of 1536, Hans Amon (q.v.) had sent the three to the church in the Adige. But they did not get beyond Vienna, for they were seized there. On Feb. 3 Käls wrote to Hans Amon, who had just sent him a letter of consolation: "When we had come into the horrible sodomitic city of Vienna, we turned in at an inn where the Neustadt coaches have their lodging. While we were eating, the people wanted us to drink, as is their devilish custom. We showed them that we would have no communion with such abominations. Thereupon they began to slander your name, but we fearlessly defended your piety. Then one who sat at the table asked for paper and ink; he wrote a Latin note: Sunt hic tres personae. Videntur mihi esse Anabaptizatores. (Here are three persons who I think are Anabaptists.) He did not know that I knew Latin. I told this to the brethren, and we agreed in God's name to await what might come.

"After about two hours the bailiffs came and led us bound to the judge. When he learned that we were from Jakob Hutter's church, he said we were probably the right ones. We answered, Yes, thank God, we are the right ones. Then he had us put into a common prison. There we had to suffer much disgrace and shame. To us this was a great joy; we were only pained when they slandered you. After seven days we were summoned before the judge, who admonished us to desist. We declared that we wanted to confess the truth to our death and admonished the judge to desist from his unbelief.

"In a week the judge summoned us again. Serpents were sitting with him: three selected, treacherous, learned priests. When these made light of our calling, mocked our faith, and said they were sent to lead us away from our error, I replied joyfully: We are on the right way and have our calling from God. He has taught us not to listen to the voice of strangers. We are all willing to give an account, but not to such monks and priests who are sent by the pope, the true antichrist."

For two and one-half hours Käls now defended "his teachings on hereditary sin, infant baptism, the call, and the idolatrous sacrament." The kindly admonition of the judge of his life and body to think of his wife and children was in vain. The prisoners could not complain about the severity of the judge: "We heard," writes Käls, "two days ago that the judge told some of the councilors and men high in this world, that we were too obstinate, and he was sorry. He praised us before them. He will question us once more with kind and friendly words, but then deal with us in severity."

In his second letter to Amon Käls says, "We have learned that many pious Christian hearts here in Vienna have bravely witnessed the truth to the Lord—brethren and sisters who remained steadfast and undismayed in the greatest tribulation." He is referring here to some Austerlitz brethren, from whom the Hutterites had separated in 1531.

The prisoners even succeeded in winning new members to their faith. Käls writes, "A man came to us in prison, bade us the peace of God, and brought us gifts. To him we wrote that we are surprised that he could live a Christian life in this idolatrous, cruel, and bloodthirsty city. We begged him to go to you at once and give an account to you. When he comes to you, instruct him in a friendly spirit; for he risked his life for us, brought us paper and writing materials, and did good to us."

Amon is requested to take the members of the church who are still living in Tirol at once to Moravia. "May Oberecker's wife and child," writes Käls, "be commended to your care. His wish to be imprisoned either with me or with Hutter is now fulfilled." He asks in conclusion that his mother and brother be taken to Moravia; they are willing to suffer all things, but alone they cannot stand. Among those to whom he sends greetings are Hutter's widow and Jörg Fasser.

In view of the fact that the Hutterite group had separated from the Austerlitz group, Käls's testimony concerning members of the Austerlitz group who sealed their faith with death at about the same time as he, is noteworthy. "I know the Austerlitz group very well, and know that they do not live according to the command of Christ. Nevertheless I must report that many pious Christians have bravely testified to the truth here in Vienna. We hear only good of them, and testify that through them God has given great Christian signs."

In prison Käls was apparently quite noisy. "To the priest I cried out, how long would he blaspheme with his unprofitable yelling. Then Huetstöck came to me in prison and said, Jerome, you must stop your yelling. I said I would not, for then the stones in the wall would cry out. To the priest who came to indoctrinate me I said: You ungodly fellow, throw away your fool's cap, take a hoe and work." All three of the prisoners finally handed the judge an account (Rechenschaft) of their faith. They wrote, "We are compelled to write to you, since we are unworthy to speak to you, and not skillful enough. We have now appeared before you many times and have answered your questions and requests with the truth as we want to answer for it before God; thus we still stand and will persist therein until our death. Therefore we beg you, for God's sake not to trouble yourself any further."

Like Käls, Seifensieder (Hans Mändl) and Oberecker also sent letters to their fellow prisoners or to the brotherhood in Moravia. Seifensieder (or Beheim as he is called here) explains that he had at first been with many sects and false brethren "now and again in Beheim," all of whom boast and have a good outward appearance, until God finally drew him out of this terrible darkness.

The last letter Käls wrote to his wife, "his dearest Treudl," has moving tones: "I send you a hymn. I sang it in my prison through God's Spirit with a sincere heart. May the Lord also teach you to sing it to His praise and glory. I send it to you with sincere love. Remain God-fearing and faithful and constant in the truth. I thank God, who gave you to me in mercy. I pray God that He may preserve you to your children. Always be obedient to the dear brethren and sisters, be of lowly, humble heart, always esteeming others better than yourself. . . . Greet my son David. Ask my brother Lienhard Sailer (Lanzenstiel) to teach you the tune, greet him for me and tell him to learn it too and sing it for my sake."

Among his brethren Käls had the reputation of being an excellent, learned schoolmaster, who wrote many good teachings and prayers for the children. In prison he wrote in addition to the song mentioned above also: "Ich freu mich dein, o Vater mein"; "Ich reu und klag den ganzen Tag"; "Ich will dich Herr und mein Gott loben" (Die Lieder, 61-71).

The Rechenschaft of these three brethren is important if for no other reason than that they contain the earliest testimony to Hutter's teaching, "to whom Jerome was an intimate brother." Strangely there is no reference to the community of goods, which was the center of Hutter's doctrinal edifice.

On March 31, 1536, the three prisoners were burned in Vienna. LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 106, 118-22, 296; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 143, 158, 390 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 128; R. Friedmann, "Die Briefe der österreichischen Täufer," ARG XXVI (1929) 80; Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter I (Leipzig, 1938); Mart. Mir. D 39, E 445; ML II, 453-55.

Kaltern, a town (pop. 4,000) in southern Tirol, Austria, on the right side of the Adige Valley, 10 miles south of Bozen. In the vicinity of Kaltern Jörg Zaunring worked in 1528; in 1533 he suffered martyrdom near Bamberg (q.v.). According to a register of the Hutterite congregations of 1581, four Anabaptists were executed for their faith in Kaltern. HEGE.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 64, 73, and 182; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 89, 233; ML I, 613; II, 455.

Kalva-Kurthy, a Mennonite Brethren mission station in India, was begun by Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Lohrenz in 1922. Sanction for land and for building a mission station near Kalva-Kurthy village, 60 miles due south of Hyderabad, Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), was procured in 1933. Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Wiebe were the first resident missionaries and erected a dwelling house and several smaller buildings. Other missionaries who have worked in this station are Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Dick, and Mr. and Mrs. J. N. C. Hiebert; Mr. and Mrs. Herman H. Warkentin and Mary Doerksen were in charge in 1949. The work done from this station as center includes mainly itinerating evangelism in the villages. The field has an area of 1,000 square miles and a population of 160,000. The native church numbers 800 members. A primary school has at times been conducted on the station. J.H.L.

Kalverboer, Simon (d. March 1892), was a lay Mennonite preacher of Krommeniedijk (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, serving 1786-1829. He wrote a history of this congregation, which is found in manuscript in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. Because of his conservatism and his obstinacy many members left the congregation during his ministry to join either the Mennonite congregation of Krommenie or the Reformed Church. (Naamlijst 1829, 28; DJ 1837, 17; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 224.)

vdZ.

Kamenka, a village in the Orenburg Mennonite settlement in northeast Russia, founded in 1894. The M.B. Church of Orenburg in the Urals was founded in 1895 as a subsidiary of the M.B. Church of Einlage in the province of Ekaterinoslav. On Dec. 17, 1901, it became an independent congregation with its seat at Kamenka, where in 1894, four of the 41 families were members of this church; by 1926 there were only six families in the village who were not members. A church was built in 1900. In 1905 Kamenka was organized as a subsidiary of the Orenburg M.B. Church. In 1901 Kornelius DeFehr was ordained as elder of the congregation, succeeded as minister in 1918 by David D. Päthkau. DeFehr died in 1919 or 1920. The congregation was actively engaged in evangelization among the Russians of the vicinity. The following ministers were exiled after 1929: Abram Teichröb, Jakob D. Rempel, Gerhard D. Rempel, Isaak D. Redekopp (all of Kantserovka), Aron J. Heyde and David D. Päthkau of Kamenka, and Abram D. Rempel of Petrovka. Also about 18 Sunday-school teachers and the choristers Abram Falk (Kamenka), Bernhard Falk (Kantserovka), and Hermann Neufeld (Kamenka) were exiled. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 473 ff.; ML II, 455.)

W.Q.

Kamensky, Peter Valerioanovitch, a Russian nobleman living in the district of Bachmut, province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, a member of the Second Duma, chairman of the Legislative Commission on Religion of the Third Duma, member of the Imperial Council, who unselfishly defended the Mennonites in word and writing during the end of the 80's and beginning of the 90's of the 19th century, when the Moscow newspaper Novoye Vremya (with its special reporter Velitsyn) and other prominent Russian newspapers attacked the German colonists in Russia. He knew the Germans in the Bachmut district where he was their neighbor and maintained constant relationship with them.

In 1895 he published his book Problem or Misunderstanding, Regarding the Foreign Settlements in Russia, which brought him into serious disrepute in the highest circles and called forth many opponents. In the book he proved that the many accusations against the colonists were based on ignorance, misunderstanding, or wrong interpretation. He acted as a true nobleman, seeking only justice. In the matter of the working out of the new law on the sects as well as in the matter of the liquidation of the German landholdings the accused always found in Kamensky a faithful friend, representative, and supporter of all legal and just right and claims. (Menn. Bl., 1896, p. 74; ML II, 455.)

D.H.E.

Kämmerli (or in some Pennsylvania-German congregations "Schtüvli," and known in English as the "anteroom") is the small room inside and near the entrance to many Mennonite (MC) or Amish Mennonite meetinghouses, formerly more common than now since the change from a plural to single ministry makes the room now unnecessary. It is usually the room at the right, another at the left being reserved for mothers caring for their infants. The Kämmerli provides a meeting place for the ministers before the opening of the regular worship service. Here they plan for the morning service—who is to read the Scripture, who is to preach. On occasion they also discuss disciplinary problems before entering the auditorium to begin the service. Another function of the Kämmerli is to serve as a place for taking the counsel of the congregation. After explaining the matter on which the ministers desire the counsel, advice, or opinion of the members, they retire to this room while the members come in one by one to report their wishes. The Kämmerli also is used for the half-hour instruction period for the class being prepared for baptism. The instruction periods usually begin in late winter and continue until summer. In Old Order Amish congregations which hold their services in a private home the ministers usually use an upstairs room for these purposes. The use of the Kämmerli gradually declined at the turn of the century in those congregations which adopted the open counsel. It then became a cloakroom and Sunday-school classroom.

A similar function was performed by the Ohm-Stübchen (q.v.) in the Dutch, North German, and Russian Mennonite groups.

J.S.U.

Kampen, a city (1947 pop. 23,025, with 251 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Overijssel. Soon after 1530 there were many Anabaptists here. Since many Flemish fled from their homes for the sake of their faith and settled in Kampen, the church here developed into a flourishing congregation in the second half of the 16th century. Between 1584 and 1620 the government issued a number of public notices against the "secret conventicles of the Anabaptists," thus indicating their numerical strength. Banishment was the penalty for attending their meetings. But on the whole the Kampen authorities were more tolerant toward the Mennonites than toward Remonstrants, Catholics, or Lutherans. In 1625 a notice was posted that Mennonites could be married only in Reformed churches, or the marriage would be considered void. In 1658 this notice was changed to read that the Mennonites could perform their weddings before the mayors. In the meantime (1644) they had furnished a house on Boven-Nieuwstraat as a meetinghouse. It was rebuilt in 1677.

Release from military service met with fewer obstacles here than elsewhere. In 1665 (war with England) the Mennonites were assigned to the extinguishing of fires. Repeatedly the government inquired into the finances of the church.

At the beginning of the 18th century there were in Kampen two congregations, the larger one Flemish (Waterlander), which in 1674 joined the Zonist (q.v.) conference, the other (Groningen) Old Flemish. In 1711 a new congregation was formed by a number of Swiss refugees (others at Groningen, Sappemeer, and Deventer). Not only because of the language, but also because of the strict discipline of the Swiss Mennonites, they wanted their own organization. The Swiss Mennonites (86 persons arrived here on Aug. 24, 1711, most of whom were farmers living near Kampen) at first held their meetings in the homes of the members, but in 1768 they acquired a meetinghouse Achter de Nieuwe Muren in town. Their elders were Daniel Ricken 1712-36, Jacob Staalen (Stähly) 1736-57, Peter Teune (Thöne) 1736-63, Hans Hupster 1769-92, and Jan Jans Hoosen (q.v.) of Giethoorn 1805-22. The Old Flemish congregation, which had only 23 male members in 1710, was soon dissolved, and in 1767 had only a few members left. In 1781 these joined the Flemish. The Swiss church, though it had at first been strengthened by many new arrivals, gradually declined, and in 1822 the 25 remaining members joined the other congregation. After the merger the Nieuwestraat meetinghouse was too small; therefore a new church in the Broederstraat was rented in 1823, and purchased in 1847. This church is still in use by the congregation; it is a historic building, erected about 1480; until the Reformation it had been the chapel of St. Anna convent and later a Walloon Reformed Church. The congregation possesses two beautiful engraved silver communion cups from the 18th century. Its pulpit, kept from the Walloon church, dates back to 1611.

The membership numbered 104 in 1834, 110 in 1861, 173 in 1900, 127 in 1956. During the last century the congregation was served by the following ministers: J. Sybrandi 1851-86, H. Ens 1886-1909, Corn. Vis Jzn 1909-30, F. van der Wissel 1932-37, A. F. L. van Dijk 1938-47, Miss H. C. Leignes Bakhoven 1947- . The church activities include Sunday school for the children, and a ladies' circle. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 69, 84, 147, 267, 886, 1180, 1225, 1350, 1366, 1903-20; II, Nos. 2016-31; II, 2 No. 223; DJ 1840, 44; 1850, 37-39; DB 1875, 57; 1881, 78-105; 1882, 117; J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 65-68 and passim; ML II, 455 f.

Kampen, van, a Mennonite family at Leer (q.v.), East Friesland, Germany, which had two (lay) Mennonite ministers, e.g., Kornelis van Kampen, at Leer, who served his home church from 1729-d. 63, and his son Kornelis van Kampen Kornzn, who was a minister at Emden 1739-56, and in the Zon (q.v.) congregation at Amsterdam 1757-d. 81. In the northeast of the Dutch province of Groningen there is also a Mennonite van Kampen family, many members of which have served the congregation of Mensingeweer (q.v.) as deacons. vdZ.

Kampen, Johann Jakob van, the last unsalaried minister of the Danzig Mennonite Church, b. 1803 in Schottland near Danzig, d. Nov. 8, 1867. He stemmed from an old Mennonite family in Elbing (q.v.). Jost van Kampen, who acquired citizenship there in 1585, placed a plot of land at the disposal of the congregation, on which the first chapel was erected in 1590. In 1835 Johann van Kampen was made a director of the Danzig church, and in 1861 was chosen minister to support Jakob Mannhardt (q.v.). He served faithfully in this capacity until his death. He arranged the archives, collected books for the church library, and conscientiously continued the church records begun by Anton Schreder; after his death Wilhelm Mannhardt (q.v.) continued them. For several years van Kampen was a member of the city council and chairman of the city Poor Commission (Armenkommission) as well as of an orphanage in Danzig. Neff.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); ML II, 456.

Kampen, Nicolaas Godfried van (b. 1776 at Haarlem, d. 1839 at Amsterdam), was a Dutch Mennonite, a son of Willem van Kampen and Maria Stetius (of Crefeld). Young Nicolaas was intended to continue the florist business of his father and his grandfather near Haarlem. After his father's accidental death in 1783 and his mother's remarriage, Nicolaas was educated by his uncle at Crefeld and at the Mühlheim Commercial School. In 1795, when the florist business was about to be liquidated, Nicolaas moved to Leiden, intending to go into the book business. But instead he became an editor of the Leidsche Courant in 1801. In 1798 he had been baptized, and in 1805 he married Jacoba van Duuren of Leiden. For many years van Kampen lived in impoverished circumstances, earning his living by giving private lessons. In the meantime he became a student of literature and history and published a large number of writings, including a history of the French domination of Europe (1810-23, eight volumes). In 1829 van Kampen, who had never been a university student, was honored by a call to teach Dutch literature and history at the Athenaeum (university) of Amsterdam. He was frequently given awards by learned associations such as Teyler's foundation at Haarlem. During his Leiden period he was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation 1812-15, 1818-19, 1821-29. vdZ.

S. Muller, Levens- en Karakterschets van N. G. van Kampen (Haarlem-Leiden, 1840); N.N.B.Wb. III, 661-63.

Kampen, Willem Abraham van (b. 1811 at Leiden), a son of the foregoing, was a preacher of the Dutch Mennonite congregation of Wormer and Jisp. In 1841 he resigned to go into business. He published a collection of sermons (Leerredenen) (Amsterdam, 1841). (DJ 1850, 22; Biogr. Wb. IV, 656.) vdZ.

Kamphuyzen, Dirk R.: see Camphuysen, Dirk Rafaelsz.

Kampner, Agatha and Elizabeth, Anabaptist martyrs, natives of Braidenberg in the Adige Valley, Austria, who were seized in 1529 with three brethren and two sisters in Fill (q.v.) in the Adige, and executed on Nov. 19, 1529. Agatha confessed that she had been baptized before Christmas, 1528, by a preacher named Töbich, in a village near St. Gall, Switzerland; she did not consider infant baptism valid; for even if children die without baptism, they die in innocence and are the Lord's. The Mass she considered nothing; for Christ had not said to His disciples: Go ye and hold Mass, but go ye and preach the Gospel. Concerning communion she said, because one confesses in the faith that He is seated at the right hand of the heavenly Father, whence He will come to judge the quick and the dead, she did not believe that He permits the priests to put Him into the host. Concerning holy days she said no day is holier than another; Sunday was ordained in order that people may meet, preach, and speak about the Gospel; it is now misused for gluttony and other evil. With the help and grace of God she would stand by her faith.

Elizabeth confessed that she had been baptized by Georg Blaurock (q.v.) in the summer of 1529, in accord with the command of Christ in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. On other points she expressed herself like her sister.

With them were executed two other women, Christine Tollinger of Penón and Barbara of Thiers (q.v.), and four men, Wolfgang von Moss of Teutsch-Noffen, Thoman im Waldt from Aldain, Georg Frik of Wirtsburg, and Mang Kager (q.v.) of Füssen. NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 65; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 64 f., 89; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74, 77 f.; ML I, 325; II, 456.

Kanagy (Kenagy, Kenege, Gnaeg, Gnaegi, Gnagy, Gnagey, Genegy), an Amish Mennonite family name found in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Colorado, Oregon, and other states. Hans Gnaegi was a member of the Amish Mennonite church at Montbéliard, France, in 1723. Johannes Gnaeg arrived in Philadelphia in 1742 with a group of Amish immigrants. Barbara Kenege arrived in Pennsylvania from Switzerland in 1749. Christian Gnaegi from Switzerland came to Pennsylvania between 1750 and 1760 and settled in Somerset County, where many of his descendants still live. Joseph Kenegy with his five sons, Ulrich, John, Yost, Joseph, and Jacob, migrated from Switzerland to America in 1770 and settled in Berks Co., Pa. The Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary is authority for the statement that "later John and Yost moved to Somerset Co., Pa., and from there to Ohio, and still later Yost moved to Illinois. From these five brothers, there came a numerous family, scattered from coast to coast." Joseph had a brother John who came to America in 1754, whose descendants live in Ohio. An Ulrich Keneagy, born in Berks Co., Pa., settled in Lancaster County in 1795. His Amish ancestors came from Switzerland.

Among the church leaders bearing this family name were Jacob C. Kenagy (1821-94), a bishop (MC) at East Lynne, Mo., and S. M. Kanagy (1869-1941), teacher at Hesston College, superintendent of the Mennonite Home Mission in Chicago, and bishop in the Wanner Church (MC) at Blair, Ont. Nelson Kanagy is a minister in the Oak Grove Mennonite Church (MC), West Liberty, Ohio. J. Forrest Kanagy, Biglerville, Pa., is secretary of the Mennonite Board of Education (MC). M.G.

E. Gnagey, A Complete History of Christian Gnaegi (printed at Elkhart, Ind., 1897).

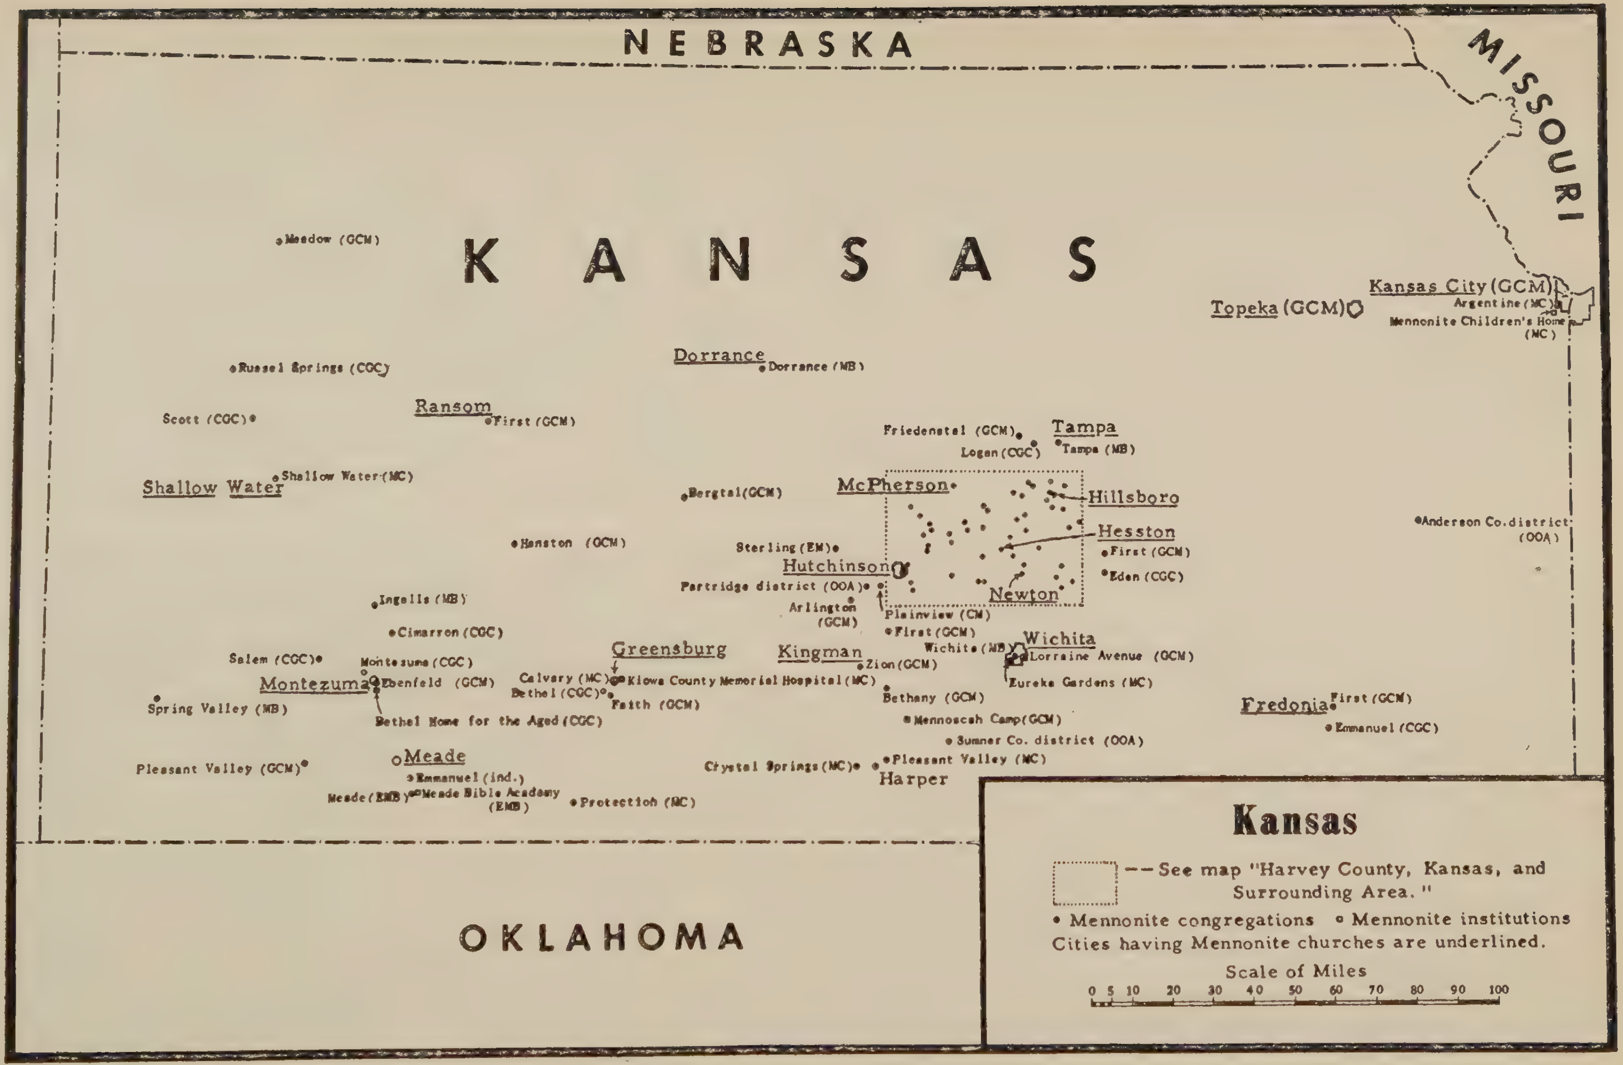
Kansas, central state of the United States, pop. (1950) 1,905,229, organized as a territory in 1854, admitted to the Union in 1861, has a larger Mennonite population than any other state west of the Mississippi, most of whom came to America during the great Mennonite migration of the 1870's from Russia, Poland, and Prussia. The first Mennonites, however, to settle in Kansas came from the eastern states at an earlier date. M. W. Keim and his friends from Pennsylvania in 1869-70 purchased from Case and Billings 5,000 acres near Marion Center. Attracted by the Homestead Act of 1862, Daniel, Christian, and Margaret Kilmer of Elkhart Co., Ind., settled in the southeastern part of McPherson County in 1871. This became the nucleus of the Spring Valley Mennonite Church (MC), located on the western end of the "twenty-three mile furrow," which connected the scattered farms of the Pennsylvania-German Mennonites of this area. The east of the twenty-three mile furrow (q.v.) bordered on the Brunk farm and cemetery located on Highway 50 between Hillsboro and Marion. Here R. J. Heatwole and Henry G. Brunk located, coming from Virginia. Soon others followed from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. The beginnings of this settlement preceded the great Mennonite migration to the prairie states and provinces from Russia by two years. Later Pennsylvania Mennonites (MC) established the following congregations: Catlin (q.v.) in Marion County in 1877, West Liberty (q.v.) in McPherson County in 1883, Pennsylvania (q.v.) in Harvey County in 1885, and Pleasant Valley (q.v.) in Harper County in 1897. The Amish of Yoder and Partridge in Reno County near Hutchinson came to Kansas starting in 1883, and an Amish Mennonite congregation was established at Crystal Springs (q.v.) in Harper County in 1904.

The Beginning of the Settlements of Mennonites from Russia, Poland, and Prussia. When the Mennonites settled in Russia in 1789 and the following years they were given written guarantees by the Czars that they could settle in solid communities, conduct their own schools, and have their own administration and also that they would be exempted from any form of military service. When rumors regarding a general conscription law came into circulation among the Mennonites in Russia around 1870 they were alarmed. Soon for some individuals of deep-rooted convictions, America appeared on the horizon. Among them was Cornelius Jansen (q.v.). He was in touch with Russian and foreign authorities at Berdyansk, from whom he received information regarding Canada and America. Benjamin Warkentin and three friends came to the United States in 1872, making their headquarters at Summerfield, Ill. Railroad agents tried to interest Warkentin in various settlement possibilities. Faithfully he reported all his experiences and findings to David Goerz (q.v.) of Berdyansk, who circularized the information among the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement.

The first settlement by Mennonites from Russia in Kansas took place in 1873 when Peter and Jacob Funk bought land from the Santa Fe Railroad near the present site of Marion for $2.50 per acre. Christian Krehbiel, who was present at the time of the purchase, reports: "With this land purchase the die was cast for Kansas" (From the Steppes, 31). This was the beginning of the Brudertal Mennonite Church (q.v.).

Meanwhile the Summerfield Mennonites also became interested in the land of the prairies. As a



NEBRASKA
MISSOURI
KANSAS
OKLAHOMA
Meadow (GCM)
Russel Springs (CGC)
Scott (CGC)
Ransom
First (GCM)
Shallow Water
Shallow Water (MC)
Dorrance
Dorrance (MB)
Bergtal (GCM)
Hanston (GCM)
Ingalls (MB)
Cimarron (CGC)
Salem (CGC)
Montezuma (CGC)
Montezuma
Ebenfeld (GCM)
Spring Valley (MB)
Bethel Home for the Aged (CGC)
Pleasant Valley (GCM)
Meade
Emmanuel (ind.)
Meade (EMB)
Meade Bible Academy (EMB)
Protection (MC)
Greensburg
Calvary (MC)
Bethel (CGC)
Kiowa County Memorial Hospital (MC)
Faith (GCM)
Friedenstal (GCM)
Logan (CGC)
Tampa
Tampa (MB)
McPherson
Hillsboro
Hesston
First (GCM)
Eden (CGC)
Sterling (EM)
Hutchinson
Partridge district (OOA)
Arlington (GCM)
Newton
Plainview (CM)
First (GCM)
Wichita
Wichita (MB)
Lorraine Avenue (GCM)
Eureka Gardens (MC)
Kingman
Zion (GCM)
Bethany (GCM)
Mennoscah Camp (GCM)
Sumner Co. district (OOA)
Pleasant Valley (MC)
Crystal Springs (MC)
Harper
Fredonia
First (GCM)
Emmanuel (CGC)
Topeka (GCM)
Kansas City (GCM)
Argentine (MC)
Mennonite Children's Home (MC)
Anderson Co. district (OOA)
Kansas
See map "Harvey County, Kansas, and Surrounding Area."
• Mennonite congregations
∘ Mennonite institutions
Cities having Mennonite churches are underlined.
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20 30 40 50 60 70 80 90 100

result of investigation trips they chose land near Halstead, Kan. For $2.00—$15.00 the Santa Fe reserved for the Summerfield Mennonites land in townships 21, 22, 23, and 24, in McPherson and Harvey counties. Warkentin built a mill on the Arkansas River near Halstead. The first Summerfield Mennonites moved to Kansas in the spring of 1875, where the Halstead Mennonite Church (q.v.) was organized March 28, 1875.

Although the official delegates did not favor Kansas, and even Cornelius Jansen, who initiated the imigration to America, chose Nebraska, Kansas became the preferred state by most of the immigrants, in spite of the fact that Warkentin was not considered a delegate and was not specifically consulted by the delegation. One reason why some Mennonites preferred Canada above any of the prairie states was the fact that they were offered large compact areas such as the East Reserve (q.v.) and the West Reserve (q.v.) on the Red River, on which they could live just as they had in Russia, with their own schools and self-government. This none of the states could offer. After debating this question, the U.S. Congress felt that Mennonites would have to be satisfied with settling on alternate sections of land offered by the railroads. Regarding nonresistance the Canadian promises were also more specific than those of the United States.

While Congress was still debating the petitions the movement of the Mennonites from Russia, Poland, and Prussia to the United States set in. Wilhelm Ewert, the Prussian delegate, arrived in Peabody May 16, 1874, accompanied by a number of Prussian Mennonites. He joined the Funk brothers of Brudertal near Marion Center. Elder Jacob A. Wiebe and Johann Harder leading the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, crossing the Atlantic with their group on the City of Brooklyn, arrived in New York on July 15, 1874. They settled on 12 sections of land in Marion County, establishing Gnadenau (q.v.) village and the Gnadenau Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.).

In the midst of the Mennonite migration from Russia to Kansas A. E. Touzalin, land commissioner for the Santa Fe, became agent of the Burlington and Quincy Railroad. In this capacity he made considerable effort to divert to Nebraska the immigrants which he had solicited for Kansas, since the Burlington ran through Nebraska. The Santa Fe secured C. B. Schmidt as agent (q.v.), who immediately contacted the Mennonites.

Meanwhile the movement from Russia continued. The large Alexanderwohl group arrived in New York aboard the Cimbria on Aug. 27, 1874, and the Teutonia on Sept. 3, 1874. It was met by David Goerz, Wilhelm Ewert, and C. B. Schmidt of the Santa Fe, all boosters for Kansas. The Teutonia group with Dietrich Gaeddert and Peter Balzar as leaders followed them to Kansas, while Jacob Buller and his group proceeded to Nebraska. Jacob Buller had refused to see Kansas as a delegate. Now he and his group soon went from Lincoln, Neb., to Kansas, where they bought land in Marion and McPherson counties north of Newton. This became the large Alexanderwohl (q.v.) settlement and church. The immigrants settled in villages similar to those they had left behind in Russia. The settlers who had come on the Teutonia under the leadership of Dietrich Gaeddert chose to settle 20 miles west of the Alexanderwohl settlement, purchasing about 35,000 acres of railroad land in the adjoining corners of Reno, McPherson, and Harvey counties. This settlement and church became known as Hoffnungsau (q.v.). The town of Buhler was founded in the heart of the settlement.

Another group of some 109 families from Russian Poland arrived in Topeka about the same time. During the middle of the winter of 1874-75, 265 more families followed. These were Swiss Volhynian Mennonites under the leadership of Jacob Stucky, one of the delegates, who settled along Turkey Creek in McPherson County in the vicinity of the present Moundridge. They organized the Hoffnungsfeld Church (q.v.), the mother church of the Eden (q.v.) and other congregations.

The "Polish" Mennonites, led by Tobias Unruh, a delegate from Ostrog, Poland, left Antwerp late in November on three ships, Nederland, Vaderland, and Abbotsford. The group consisted of 265 families. The poorest 50 families remained in Pennsylvania for the winter while the others continued their trip to Kansas. The Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.) gave them aid and distributed them for the winter in the vicinity of Newton, Florence, and Great Bend. Most of them were settled on small farms in the spring, in the vicinity of Canton, later joining the Church of God in Christ, Mennonites (q.v.), founded by John Holdeman. The Emmanuel Church (q.v.) and the Pawnee Rock Bergtal Mennonite Church (q.v.) also belong to this group. Later others moved to Oklahoma. Still others never came to Kansas but settled in Dakota. Only some 1,400 persons came to Kansas during 1875, the migration to Manitoba being much greater during this year.

C. Henry Smith reports that 1,275 families arrived in the United States and Canada during 1874. Of these, 600 families came to Kansas. In addition to these, 150 families temporarily remained in the east, some in Pennsylvania, some in Ontario. Thus about half of the total number of immigrants of 1874 came to Kansas. The next largest group went to Manitoba, after which followed the group to the Dakotas. The passengers used the Inman, Allen, Red Star, Hamburg-America, and Adler lines. Some arrvied in New York and others in Philadelphia. C. B. Schmidt, the most enthusiastic agent, who secured some letters of introduction from Mennonites who had arrived in Kansas, left New York on Feb. 1, 1875, and went to Russia to win more immigrants for Kansas. Yet 1874 remained the peak year for Mennonite immigration to Kansas. According to Shipley, the total number of Mennonites immigrating to North America in 1874 was 6,402, of whom it was estimated that about 5,300 came to the United States, with nearly 3,000 coming to Kansas (p. 87).

The Prussian Mennonites, founding the Emmaus Mennonite Church (q.v.), the First Mennonite Church of Newton, and the Zion Mennonite Church at Elbing, began to come to Kansas in 1876 and the following years. Among them was Leonhard Sudermann of Berdyansk, who had originally not been

Religious Life. Out of the Kansas Conference came the Western District Conference (q.v.) of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Of the 66 congregations of the Western District, 53 are located in Kansas, which is by far the largest number of General Conference congregations in any of the states or provinces. The membership was 11,118 in 1955 and the total population including children, 15,552. The Mennonite Brethren have 10 congregations in Kansas (2,000 members, 1951); the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren 3 (449 members, 1955); the Church of God in Christ Mennonite, 14 (1,917 members, 1954); the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren 2 (297 members, 1955); Mennonite Church (MC) 13 (1,575 members, 1954); the Brethren in Christ 5 (240 members, 1955); the Evangelical Mennonite Church 1 (143 members, 1955); the Old Order Amish have 6 districts (386 members, 1954); the Conservative Mennonites 1 (113 members, 1954). Regarding the more conservative groups it can be said that through the contact with other Mennonite groups in Civilian Public Service and in relief projects, their spiritual life and their forms of worship have been revitalized and as a rule they have developed an active program of missionary and evangelistic outreach. Interest in education is growing continually. Kansas, with its three Mennonite colleges and many secondary schools, is not only the center for the Mennonites of the prairie states as far as education is concerned, but also a center for Conference organizations and publications. The General Conference headquarters are located in Newton, where the various boards of the Conference do their business. The Conference maintains a bookstore in Newton, and together with Bethel College, a Mennonite Press in North Newton. In North Newton there is also a clothing center of the MCC for the prairie states. At Newton is the Prairie View Hospital, a mental hospital operated by the MCC.

Hillsboro, located some 28 miles north of Newton in Marion County, has become the national headquarters for the Mennonite Brethren. It is the location of the largest Mennonite Brethren congregation east of California, the Mission Board of the Mennonite Brethren, the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House and bookstore, and Tabor College. Hesston and Hesston College, six miles northwest of Newton, has become a center for the Mennonite Church (MC) in Kansas. All three college campuses are being used extensively by their constituencies for conferences, and religious and cultural programs sponsored by the respective colleges. Bethel Deaconess Home and Hospital (q.v.) at Newton, Bethesda Hospital at Goessel (q.v.), and Salem Hospital at Hillsboro (q.v.), as well as the Mercy Hospital (q.v.) at Moundridge, and a number of homes for the aged are Mennonite-sponsored institutions. The Hertzler Clinic of Halstead was originally also sponsored and supported by the Mennonites. Midland Mutual Fire Insurance (q.v.), the oldest fire insurance of Kansas, was originally a Mennonite organization, founded by David Goerz.

The total Mennonite church membership of Kansas is 18,294 (1955). This should make a total Mennonite population (including children) of about 30,000. Many Kansas Mennonites have migrated to Oklahoma and the Pacific Coast to establish settlements of various Mennonite branches in these areas. C.K.

C. C. Janzen, "A Social Study of the Mennonite Settlement in the Counties of Marion, McPherson, Harvey, Reno, and Butler, Kansas" (Ph.D. thesis, Chicago, 1926); Helen B. Shipley, "The Migration of the Mennonites from Russia, 1873-1883, and Their Settlement in Kansas" (M.A. thesis, Minnesota, 1954); Ed. G. Kaufman, "Social Problems and Opportunities of the Western District Conference Communities of the General Conference of Mennonites of North America" (M.A. thesis, Witmarsum Seminary, 1917); Gideon G. Yoder, "The Oldest Living American Mennonite Congregations of Central Kansas" (M.A. thesis, Phillips University, 1948); C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); Gustav E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar: Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956); Cornelius J. Dyck, "Kansas Promotional Activities with Particular Reference to Mennonites" (M.A. thesis, Municipal University of Wichita, 1955); G. D. Bradley, The Story of the Santa Fe (Boston, 1920); Ernst Correll, "The Congressional Debate on the Mennonite Immigration from Russia, 1873-74," MQR XX (February 1946) 174-88; G. Raymond Gaeddert, The Birth of Kansas (Lawrence, 1940); Herald of Truth, Elkhart, 1873 ff.; Herold der Wahrheit, Elkhart, 1871 ff.; Cornelius Krahn, "Some Letters of Bernhard Warkentin Pertaining to the Migration of 1873-1875," MQR XXIV (July 1950) 248-63; Georg Leibbrandt, "The Emigration of the German Mennonites from Russia to the United States and Canada in 1873-1880," I, MQR VI (October 1932) 205-26, and II, MQR VII (January 1933) 5-41; Abraham Albrecht, "Mennonite Settlements in Kansas" (M.A. thesis, Kansas, 1924); James C. Malin, Winter Wheat in the Golden Belt of Kansas (Lawrence, 1944); Arthur E. Hertzler, "What Kansas Mennonites Have Produced," Kansas Magazine, 1939, 87; Alberta Pantle, "Settlement of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren at Gnadenau, Marion County," Kansas Historical Quarterly XIII (February 1945) 259-85; L. L. Waters, Steel Trails to Santa Fe (Lawrence, 1950); P. P. Wedel, Kurze Geschichte der aus Wolhynien, Russland, nach Kansas ausgewanderten Schweizer-Mennoniten (n.p., 1929); Zur Heimath, Halstead, 1876-81; Cornelius Krahn (ed.), From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949); see also articles on Kansas in Mennonite Life; ML II, 458 f.

Kansas City, a city of over 585,000 population, located at the junction of the Kansas and Missouri rivers, approximately three fourths of which is situated in Missouri and one fourth in Kansas. Mennonites (MC) opened the Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.) at 200 South 7th St. (Kansas City, Kan.) in May 1905. Later extension work was carried on in Argentine, a section of southern Kansas City, Kan. A building at 3105 Strong Avenue was purchased and used for a mission hall. As a result of mission activity in this area the Kansas City Argentine Mennonite Church (q.v.) was built in 1924 at the corner of 37th and Metropolitan Avenue and dedicated in 1925. Previous to this the 7th Street building was sold. In 1946 the Argentine Mennonite Church was organized out of the original Mennonite Gospel Mission congregation. This congregation now has a membership of 102. An outgrowth of Mennonite mission activity in this area was the Mennonite Children's Home (q.v.) in 1917. It is located at 1620 South 37th Street. In 1946 the Mennonite Gospel Center (q.v.) was established. It is located at 1238 Washington Street and has a membership of 25. All of these institutions were established by the Mennonite Church (MC). A Voluntary Service program (MC) known as the Kansas City Hospital Unit is located at 2512 Holmes St., Kansas City, Mo. This is also the I-W center for men doing their alternative service in Kansas City. In 1956 the Western District (GCM) purchased a church at 40th and Rainbow Streets, Kansas City, Kan.; it is used by the Mennonite fellowship, which has been meeting in Kansas City. M.G.

Kansas Conference of Mennonites (Kansaskonferenz) was the forerunner of the Western District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church, founded through the initiative of David Goerz in 1877, who proposed in Zur Heimat (Aug. 15, 1877) to have a meeting with teachers pertaining to their profession. The meeting took place in the home of Heinrich Richert (q.v.), Alexanderwohl, at which teachers, ministers, and elders were present. W. Ewert was chosen chairman and David Goerz secretary. A committee was elected to work out a plan by which the conference could successfully conduct an educational program.

The first official Kansas Conference meeting took place Dec. 14-15, 1877. In the invitation it was suggested that all congregations were entitled to send one delegate for every 30 members. Ten congregations (including the Mennonite Brethren of Marion County) sent delegates totaling about 70 persons. On the agenda were chiefly educational matters, such as the establishment of a secondary school (Zentralschule) and also questions pertaining to songbooks, home missions, foreign missions, and relief. It was recommended that Mennonites aim to establish their own school districts and if there were sufficient Mennonites in a community, to establish a Mennonite parochial school. Questions pertaining to curricula and textbooks were discussed in detail. The minutes of this and the following meetings were regularly published in Zur Heimat.

At the second meeting (Nov. 6-7, 1878) the school committee presented a report. David Goerz was sent as a delegate to the Middle District Conference (at the time Western District Conference) meeting in Berne, Ind., and to the General Conference meeting at Wadsworth, Ohio. At the third session (Oct. 27-29, 1879) such questions were discussed as to whether it is sufficient for a congregation to maintain its numerical strength by having the children join the church or whether a congregation should demonstrate its spiritual life by reaching out into communities where the Gospel is not preached. This session was also attended as guests by Jakob Wiebe and Johann Harder of the Gnadenau Krimmer Mennonite Brethren and Abraham Schellenberg of the Mennonite Brethren. The fourth conference (1880) was also attended by delegates from the Salem Mennonite Church, South Dakota. At the sixth conference the school committee presented the constitution of the proposed secondary school (Fortbildungsschule).

The regular reports of the conference deal with questions pertaining to education, home missions, and publication efforts, for all of which committees had been created. Numerous problems of a general nature and those pertaining to congregations and individuals were discussed in brotherly and orderly manner. The meetings were held in various congregations. At the sixteenth session, held Oct. 26-27, 1892, the Kansas Conference was dissolved and its work and business transferred to the newly organized Western District Conference (q.v.). This name had been in use by the present Middle District Conference until 1888. The chief concern of the Kansas Conference had been matters pertaining to education on the elementary and secondary level. Bethel College (q.v.), organized at this time, was one of the results of these efforts. The interests in education were now in the hands of the German Teachers' Association (q.v.) and a special education committee of the Western District Conference. Until then the Fortbildungsschulen, first at Emmatal (q.v.) and later at Halstead (q.v.), were supported and owned by the Kansas Conference. With the closing of this school and the founding of Bethel College this relationship was modified. C.K.

Die Entstehung der Kansaskonferenz der Mennoniten-Gemeinden 1877-1892 (official Kansas Conference minutes and reports), in Bethel College Library.

Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite (MC) Conference (1879-1920). As early as 1871 a few Mennonites had settled in central Kansas. In 1872 several families settled in Marion and (eastern) McPherson counties; they were served by Bishop Henry Yother (q.v.) of Blue Springs, Neb. Within the next few years Mennonite settlements were also started in Adams Co., Neb., and Osborne, Ness, Harvey, and McPherson counties, Kan. As early as April 1876 a church was built on the land of Bishop Daniel Brundage (q.v.), known as the Spring Valley Mennonite Church, located near Canton, Kan.

The first conference met on the forenoon of April 14, 1876, in this church. Besides the bishops Yother and Brundage, two ministers, one deacon, and a delegated layman attended the conference. Singing and Scripture reading were in both English and German. Six resolutions were discussed and approved as follows: (1) Members should not seek protection in lightning rods; (2) Members should take no part in worldly insurance; (3) It was considered inconsistent with nonresistant doctrine to go to the polls to vote; (4) It was not considered advisable for brethren to hold the office of Road Overseer; (5) Attendance at worldly amusements is not in accordance with the Word of God; (6) Brethren moving in from abroad should bring a church letter.

It was decided that conference should meet again on the fourth Friday of April 1877 at the same place. Brundage was for 15 or more years very active in encouraging and organizing the Mennonite settlers who came to Kansas. R. J. Heatwole (q.v.) served as secretary of the first conference and as moderator of a number of sessions. From 1879 to 1890 the conference met for both a spring and fall session; from 1892 on there was only an annual session of conference which was usually held in October. Brethren from Nebraska attended the conference for the first time in 1879; that is perhaps the reason why 1879 is given as the beginning year of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference.

The conference of 1907 took action requesting the Mennonite Board of Education to take steps to establish a school "in which Bible work is made a Religious Life. Out of the Kansas Conference came the Western District Conference (q.v.) of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Of the 66 congregations of the Western District, 53 are located in Kansas, which is by far the largest number of General Conference congregations in any of the states or provinces. The membership was 11,118 in 1955 and the total population including children, 15,552. The Mennonite Brethren have 10 congregations in Kansas (2,000 members, 1951); the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren 3 (449 members, 1955); the Church of God in Christ Mennonite, 14 (1,917 members, 1954); the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren 2 (297 members, 1955); Mennonite Church (MC) 13 (1,575 members, 1954); the Brethren in Christ 5 (240 members, 1955); the Evangelical Mennonite Church 1 (143 members, 1955); the Old Order Amish have 6 districts (386 members, 1954); the Conservative Mennonites 1 (113 members, 1954). Regarding the more conservative groups it can be said that through the contact with other Mennonite groups in Civilian Public Service and in relief projects, their spiritual life and their forms of worship have been revitalized and as a rule they have developed an active program of missionary and evangelistic outreach. Interest in education is growing continually. Kansas, with its three Mennonite colleges and many secondary schools, is not only the center for the Mennonites of the prairie states as far as education is concerned, but also a center for Conference organizations and publications. The General Conference headquarters are located in Newton, where the various boards of the Conference do their business. The Conference maintains a bookstore in Newton, and together with Bethel College, a Mennonite Press in North Newton. In North Newton there is also a clothing center of the MCC for the prairie states. At Newton is the Prairie View Hospital, a mental hospital operated by the MCC.

Hillsboro, located some 28 miles north of Newton in Marion County, has become the national headquarters for the Mennonite Brethren. It is the location of the largest Mennonite Brethren congregation east of California, the Mission Board of the Mennonite Brethren, the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House and bookstore, and Tabor College. Hesston and Hesston College, six miles northwest of Newton, has become a center for the Mennonite Church (MC) in Kansas. All three college campuses are being used extensively by their constituencies for conferences, and religious and cultural programs sponsored by the respective colleges. Bethel Deaconess Home and Hospital (q.v.) at Newton, Bethesda Hospital at Goessel (q.v.), and Salem Hospital at Hillsboro (q.v.), as well as the Mercy Hospital (q.v.) at Moundridge, and a number of homes for the aged are Mennonite-sponsored institutions. The Hertzler Clinic of Halstead was originally also sponsored and supported by the Mennonites. Midland Mutual Fire Insurance (q.v.), the oldest fire insurance of Kansas, was originally a Mennonite organization, founded by David Goerz.

The total Mennonite church membership of Kansas is 18,294 (1955). This should make a total Mennonite population (including children) of about 30,000. Many Kansas Mennonites have migrated to Oklahoma and the Pacific Coast to establish settlements of various Mennonite branches in these areas. C.K.

C. C. Janzen, "A Social Study of the Mennonite Settlement in the Counties of Marion, McPherson, Harvey, Reno, and Butler, Kansas" (Ph.D. thesis, Chicago, 1926); Helen B. Shipley, "The Migration of the Mennonites from Russia, 1873-1883, and Their Settlement in Kansas" (M.A. thesis, Minnesota, 1954); Ed. G. Kaufman, "Social Problems and Opportunities of the Western District Conference Communities of the General Conference of Mennonites of North America" (M.A. thesis, Witmarsum Seminary, 1917); Gideon G. Yoder, "The Oldest Living American Mennonite Congregations of Central Kansas" (M.A. thesis, Phillips University, 1948); C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); Gustav E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar: Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956); Cornelius J. Dyck, "Kansas Promotional Activities with Particular Reference to Mennonites" (M.A. thesis, Municipal University of Wichita, 1955); G. D. Bradley, The Story of the Santa Fe (Boston, 1920); Ernst Correll, "The Congressional Debate on the Mennonite Immigration from Russia, 1873-74," MQR XX (February 1946) 174-88; G. Raymond Gaeddert, The Birth of Kansas (Lawrence, 1940); Herald of Truth, Elkhart, 1873 ff.; Herold der Wahrheit, Elkhart, 1871 ff.; Cornelius Krahn, "Some Letters of Bernhard Warkentin Pertaining to the Migration of 1873-1875," MQR XXIV (July 1950) 248-63; Georg Leibbrandt, "The Emigration of the German Mennonites from Russia to the United States and Canada in 1873-1880," I, MQR VI (October 1932) 205-26, and II, MQR VII (January 1933) 5-41; Abraham Albrecht, "Mennonite Settlements in Kansas" (M.A. thesis, Kansas, 1924); James C. Malin, Winter Wheat in the Golden Belt of Kansas (Lawrence, 1944); Arthur E. Hertzler, "What Kansas Mennonites Have Produced," Kansas Magazine, 1939, 87; Alberta Pantle, "Settlement of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren at Gnadenau, Marion County," Kansas Historical Quarterly XIII (February 1945) 259-85; L. L. Waters, Steel Trails to Santa Fe (Lawrence, 1950); P. P. Wedel, Kurze Geschichte der aus Wolhynien, Russland, nach Kansas ausgewanderten Schweizer-Mennoniten (n.p., 1929); Zur Heimath, Halstead, 1876-81; Cornelius Krahn (ed.), From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949); see also articles on Kansas in Mennonite Life; ML II, 458 f.

Kansas City, a city of over 585,000 population, located at the junction of the Kansas and Missouri rivers, approximately three fourths of which is situated in Missouri and one fourth in Kansas. Mennonites (MC) opened the Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.) at 200 South 7th St. (Kansas City, Kan.) in May 1905. Later extension work was carried on in Argentine, a section of southern Kansas City, Kan. A building at 3105 Strong Avenue was purchased and used for a mission hall. As a result of mission activity in this area the Kansas City Argentine Mennonite Church (q.v.) was built in 1924 at the corner of 37th and Metropolitan Avenue and dedicated in 1925. Previous to this the 7th Street building was sold. In 1946 the Argentine Mennonite Church was organized out of the original Mennonite Gospel Mission congregation. This congregation now has a membership of 102. An outgrowth of Mennonite mission activity in this area was the Mennonite Children's Home (q.v.) in 1917. It is located at 1620 South 37th Street. In 1946 the Mennonite Gospel Center (q.v.) was established. It is located at 1238 Washington Street and has a membership of 25. All of these institutions were established by the Mennonite Church (MC). A Voluntary Service program (MC) known as the Kansas City Hospital Unit is located at 2512 Holmes St., Kansas City, Mo. This is also the I-W center for men doing their alternative service in Kansas City. In 1956 the Western District (GCM) purchased a church at 40th and Rainbow Streets, Kansas City, Kan.; it is used by the Mennonite fellowship, which has been meeting in Kansas City. M.G.

Kansas Conference of Mennonites (Kansaskonferenz) was the forerunner of the Western District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church, founded through the initiative of David Goerz in 1877, who proposed in Zur Heimat (Aug. 15, 1877) to have a meeting with teachers pertaining to their profession. The meeting took place in the home of Heinrich Richert (q.v.), Alexanderwohl, at which teachers, ministers, and elders were present. W. Ewert was chosen chairman and David Goerz secretary. A committee was elected to work out a plan by which the conference could successfully conduct an educational program.

The first official Kansas Conference meeting took place Dec. 14-15, 1877. In the invitation it was suggested that all congregations were entitled to send one delegate for every 30 members. Ten congregations (including the Mennonite Brethren of Marion County) sent delegates totaling about 70 persons. On the agenda were chiefly educational matters, such as the establishment of a secondary school (Zentralschule) and also questions pertaining to songbooks, home missions, foreign missions, and relief. It was recommended that Mennonites aim to establish their own school districts and if there were sufficient Mennonites in a community, to establish a Mennonite parochial school. Questions pertaining to curricula and textbooks were discussed in detail. The minutes of this and the following meetings were regularly published in Zur Heimat.

At the second meeting (Nov. 6-7, 1878) the school committee presented a report. David Goerz was sent as a delegate to the Middle District Conference (at the time Western District Conference) meeting in Berne, Ind., and to the General Conference meeting at Wadsworth, Ohio. At the third session (Oct. 27-29, 1879) such questions were discussed as to whether it is sufficient for a congregation to maintain its numerical strength by having the children join the church or whether a congregation should demonstrate its spiritual life by reaching out into communities where the Gospel is not preached. This session was also attended as guests by Jakob Wiebe and Johann Harder of the Gnadenau Krimmer Mennonite Brethren and Abraham Schellenberg of the Mennonite Brethren. The fourth conference (1880) was also attended by delegates from the Salem Mennonite Church, South Dakota. At the sixth conference the school committee presented the constitution of the proposed secondary school (Fortbildungsschule).

The regular reports of the conference deal with questions pertaining to education, home missions, and publication efforts, for all of which committees had been created. Numerous problems of a general nature and those pertaining to congregations and individuals were discussed in brotherly and orderly manner. The meetings were held in various congregations. At the sixteenth session, held Oct. 26-27, 1892, the Kansas Conference was dissolved and its work and business transferred to the newly organized Western District Conference (q.v.). This name had been in use by the present Middle District Conference until 1888. The chief concern of the Kansas Conference had been matters pertaining to education on the elementary and secondary level. Bethel College (q.v.), organized at this time, was one of the results of these efforts. The interests in education were now in the hands of the German Teachers' Association (q.v.) and a special education committee of the Western District Conference. Until then the Fortbildungsschulen, first at Emmatal (q.v.) and later at Halstead (q.v.), were supported and owned by the Kansas Conference. With the closing of this school and the founding of Bethel College this relationship was modified. C.K.

Die Entstehung der Kansaskonferenz der Mennoniten-Gemeinden 1877-1892 (official Kansas Conference minutes and reports), in Bethel College Library.

Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite (MC) Conference (1879-1920). As early as 1871 a few Mennonites had settled in central Kansas. In 1872 several families settled in Marion and (eastern) McPherson counties; they were served by Bishop Henry Yother (q.v.) of Blue Springs, Neb. Within the next few years Mennonite settlements were also started in Adams Co., Neb., and Osborne, Ness, Harvey, and McPherson counties, Kan. As early as April 1876 a church was built on the land of Bishop Daniel Brundage (q.v.), known as the Spring Valley Mennonite Church, located near Canton, Kan.

The first conference met on the forenoon of April 14, 1876, in this church. Besides the bishops Yother and Brundage, two ministers, one deacon, and a delegated layman attended the conference. Singing and Scripture reading were in both English and German. Six resolutions were discussed and approved as follows: (1) Members should not seek protection in lightning rods; (2) Members should take no part in worldly insurance; (3) It was considered inconsistent with nonresistant doctrine to go to the polls to vote; (4) It was not considered advisable for brethren to hold the office of Road Overseer; (5) Attendance at worldly amusements is not in accordance with the Word of God; (6) Brethren moving in from abroad should bring a church letter.

It was decided that conference should meet again on the fourth Friday of April 1877 at the same place. Brundage was for 15 or more years very active in encouraging and organizing the Mennonite settlers who came to Kansas. R. J. Heatwole (q.v.) served as secretary of the first conference and as moderator of a number of sessions. From 1879 to 1890 the conference met for both a spring and fall session; from 1892 on there was only an annual session of conference which was usually held in October. Brethren from Nebraska attended the conference for the first time in 1879; that is perhaps the reason why 1879 is given as the beginning year of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference.

The conference of 1907 took action requesting the Mennonite Board of Education to take steps to establish a school "in which Bible work is made a specialty somewhere in the west." As a result of this action Hesston College and Bible School was established in 1908-9. The conference of 1912 appointed D. S. Weaver and L. O. King to meet with persons from other interested conferences to consider establishing a home for the homeless. Out of this interest the Kansas City Children's Home was established in 1917.

Beginning apparently with only a few churches in central Kansas in 1876 and adding the church in Adams Co., Neb., the conference continued to grow by adding churches in other states. By 1895 mention is made of the churches in Oklahoma. In 1900 churches in Idaho and Oregon were added. In 1904 Colorado was added, in 1908 the congregation at Plainview, Tex., and in 1911 the congregation at Las Vegas, N.M. The conference of 1905, held in Oregon, decided to divide the conference, making the Rocky Mountains the dividing line. The western congregations, three in number, were organized into the Pacific Coast Conference on Nov. 1, 1906. From the small beginning of five ordained men in 1876, by 1908 there were 7 bishops, 21 ministers, and 8 deacons. By 1909 the reported membership had increased to 949, and in 1920 to 1,204 with 6 bishops, 30 ministers, and 16 deacons.

The redistricting in 1920 of all Mennonite and Amish Mennonite conferences west of Indiana resulted in the reorganization of the Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite, Missouri-Iowa Mennonite, and Western Amish Mennonite conferences into the Missouri-Kansas (q.v.) Mennonite, and Iowa-Nebraska (q.v.) Mennonite conferences, with the Illinois A.M. congregations assigned to the Illinois (q.v.) Mennonite Conference, and those in Oregon assigned to the Pacific Coast (q.v.) Conference. In 1920 (last session of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference, Aug. 2-4, 1920) the following 18 congregations (with membership) constituted the conference: Kansas—12 congregations with 797 members (Spring Valley at Canton, 72; Pennsylvania at Newton, 102; West Liberty at Windom, 125; Catlin at Peabody, 35; Protection, 62; Hesston, 111; Yoder, 70; Pleasant Valley at Harper, 155; Larned, ; Mennonite Gospel missions at Kansas City, 48 and Argentine, 17); Colorado—3 congregations with 228 members (La Junta, 109; East Holbrook at La Junta, 111; Limon, 8); Texas—1 congregation at Plainview, 42 members; Oklahoma—1 congregation, Milan Valley at Jet, 37; Nebraska—1 congregation at Roseland, 100.

The conference also had a district mission board, organized in October 1905, composed of the representative elected by each congregation in the conference. When the conferences were reorganized in 1920, the mission board was also reorganized to conform to the new boundaries of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference. H.A.D.

Conference Record Containing the Proceedings of the Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite Conference 1876—1914.

Kanselboek, the liturgical manual of the Dutch Mennonites, drawn up by a committee appointed by the A.D.S., of which S. H. N. Gorter (q.v.) was president. It was published in 1948: Kanselboek ten dienste van de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Nederland, and offered to the congregations in order to secure more unity in the order of church services. It contains liturgies (orders) of ordinary services as well as of special services (baptism, communion, induction of new preachers, funerals, etc). Many of the Dutch congregations did not appreciate the Kanselboek, considering it a contradiction of the Mennonite concept of congregational autonomy. Notwithstanding this aversion, the Kanselboek proved to be very helpful, especially to young ministers. vdZ.

Kaplanbek was an estate some 14 miles northwest of the city of Tashkent (q.v.) in Turkestan (q.v.), Central Asia, where the first and second groups of the chiliastic Mennonites from Samara, inspired by Claas Epp (q.v.), found a temporary shelter after their arrival on Oct. 15 and Nov. 25, 1880, respectively. When the successor of Governor Konstantin von Kaufmann, with whom they had made arrangements for settlement, did not honor the promise, the group proceeded to Bokhara (q.v.) and from there to Khiva (q.v.). (See Asiatic Russia, Ak-Metchet, Aulie-Ata.) C.K.

Kaplaneihof, a small settlement of six farms, two miles southeast of Bergzabern, Palatinate, Germany, one-half mile east of Deutschhof (q.v.), has been occupied by Mennonites since 1787. In that year Elector Karl Theodor sold to the Mennonite Joseph Schowalter of Klein-Bundenbach near Zweibrücken (originally from Geisberg) the entire estate, which was then divided into six separate small farms of about 25 acres each. Additional families which came included Christian Lehmann of Niederrödern (q.v.) a son-in-law of Schowalter, and two other Schowalter families, originally from Geisberg and Schafbusch. In 1957 the six families on the Kaplaneihof included two Hege and four Schowalter families. Otto Schowalter, pastor of the Hamburg Mennonite Church, and Paul Schowalter, pastor of Weierhof, stem from Kaplaneihof. The Kaplaneihof families are members of the Deutschhof congregation and attend the services there. L.W.

Karaganda: see Soviet Central Asia.

Karaguy, a village in the Orenburg (q.v.) Mennonite settlement of Russia, was founded in 1908. In 1910 it became the seat of a subsidiary congregation of the Kamenka M.B. Church. The Karaguy center included Chernoozernoye, Kamyshevo, Zelenoye, Karaguy, Pretoria, and Zuvorovka. The earlier meetinghouse, which had been built in Kamyshevo in 1899, was sold and torn down when the larger church in Karaguy was built in 1914. Ministers of the Karaguy M.B. Church were Wilhelm Giesbrecht (leader 1898-1905), Jakob Bergen (leader 1905-9), David Janz, Gerhard Neufeld, Daniel Friesen, Kornelius Janzen, Franz Heier, and Abram Janzen. After 1914 David Janz of Zagradovka in the Ukraine was ordained as elder of the Karaguy congregation.

The Mennonites of Karaguy belonged to the Orenburg (q.v.) Mennonite Church, with a center at Deyevka (q.v.). (ML II, 459.) W.Q.

Karassan Mennonite Church, Simferopol District, Crimea, Russia, was founded in 1862 by Mennonites from the Molotschna settlement, who established villages in the area at this time. Jacob Wiebe (q.v.) was the first elder (1862-80). He was succeeded by Heinrich Unruh (1880-83), Abr. Friesen (1884-), G. A. Rempel, and Jakob Lötkemann, who was exiled under the Soviets. The elders were assisted by many ministers, some of whom joined the Mennonite Brethren Church of the Crimea. Originally the Ettingerbrun, later Busau, Mennonite Church was a part of the Karassan church. In 1905 the Karassan church with its branches Spat, Pasha-Tchakmak, and Dyurmen had a membership of 846 and a total population of 1,928. The main place of worship was Karassan. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 709; Statistik der Mennonitengemeinde in Russland Ende 1905, p. 63.

Karel van Gent (Carel van Ghendt), the reputed author of Het Beginsel en voortganck der geschillen, scheuringen, en verdeeltheden onder de gene die Doopsgesinden Genoemt worden (q.v.), written in 1615 but first published in 1658 at Amsterdam. W. J. Kühler considers him to be the author and calls him "the best historian among the old Doopsgesinden" (Geschiedenis I, 365). De Hoop Scheffer held him to be the author, Karel Vos flatly denies the authorship, while N. van der Zijpp and Cornelius Krahn are uncertain. A certain Carel van Ghendt was one of the two secretaries who wrote the Protocol of the Emden disputation of 1578 (printed in 1579), but no trace of a Carel van Gent has been found among the Doopsgezinden of the first century. For the details of the life of the author of Het Beginsel, who might be Carel van Gent, see the article Het Beginsel. The most thorough discussion of the identification problem is that by Samuel Cramer in BRN VII, 491-500. H.S.B.

Karel Halling, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Steenwerck, Flanders, who was burned at the stake in 1567 at Armentiéres in Flanders. (Mart. Mir., D 345, E 704; ML II, 237.) vdZ.

Karel (Chaerle) Hannebeel, an Anabaptist martyr, called simply Karel by van Braght (Mart. Mir.), was burned at the stake on Nov. 8, 1567, at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, together with Joos Casteels, Willem Aertsz, and Jaques Mesdag. Karel, who was a native of Nederwaestene, and was arrested in Zwevegem, had been a member of the church since 1563. He frankly confessed his faith and died steadfast. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 358, E 715; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 36, No. 16.

Karel (Kaerle) de Raed(t), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Tillegem near Brugge, Belgium, on May 18, 1570 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously 1568, without exact date). With him Hansken in 't Schaeck and Willem de Snijder suffered martyrdom, while Karel's wife Grietgen was executed some days after. Karel, who was born at Whyngene in Flanders, and was a shepherd, had been a member of the congregation of Brugge since 1564. On Ascension Day (May 4), 1570, he was arrested with a number of other members of the congregation at a meeting held in the woods of Tillegem. (Mart. Mir. D 654, E 725; Verheyden, Brugge, 60, No. 64; ML III, 425.) vdZ.

Karel (Kaerle) Tankreet (Tancreet, Tanghereet), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 5, 1559, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, with three other martyrs, while a number of others, including Proentgen, the wife of Karel Tankreet, were executed on Aug. 7. All these martyrs, who had been arrested on Friday after Pentecost of 1559, have been celebrated in a hymn, "Ick moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), which is found as No. 14 in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563. Karel Tankreet originally was from Nijpkerke (Nieukerke) in Flanders; by trade he was a cobbler. vdZ.

Offer, 348, 556 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 61.

Karel (Charles) van Tiegem (Thieghem), an Anabaptist martyr, steadfastly suffered martyrdom at the stake on Dec. 20, 1560 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously has 1559 without exact date), at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium. Karel was a native and citizen of Kortrijk. At first he was a shoemaker, then a weaver. His few possessions were confiscated. (Supersedes Carel van Tiegem, ME I, 517.) vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 242, E 617; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 35, No. 11.

Karel van de(n) Velde, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Hondschote (q.v.) in Flanders, Belgium, on April 20, 1562. Six other martyrs with him suffered martyrdom, all dying faithful. He was a native of Gent. (Mart. Mir. D 298, E 663.)

Karg, Georg (1512-76), a German Lutheran theologian. He studied theology at the University of Wittenberg, in 1547 he became pastor in Schwabach, and in 1553 general superintendent at Ansbach. In the following years his position with the Wittenberg theologians was very influential. He was often, second to Melanchthon, spokesman for the group in making declarations. In 1557 he participated at the theologians' disputation at Worms (Sept. 11-Oct. 7). Here he signed with Johann Brenz, Johann Marbach, Michael Diller, Johann Pistorius, Jakob Andreae, and Jakob Rungius an opinion drawn up by Melanchthon at the request of the elector Palatine Ottheinrich (Corpus Reformatorum IX 1842, col. 521, No. 6501) for the suppression of the Anabaptists (see Diller, Michael). It was printed at Worms in 1557 under the title, Prozess, wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern, by Paulus and Philip Köpflein. It gives the German authorities suggestions for dealing with the Anabaptists, in order to lead them back into the church. Any of the Anabaptist leaders who did not comply with this demand were to be killed with the sword as insurrectionists and blasphemers. Hege.

G. Bossert, TA I: Württemberg, 161-68; R. Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift der hutterischen Täufergemeinschaften in Mähren," Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. XXVIII (1931) 104 and 111 (see also 1920, 118); Menn. Bl., 1893, 108; K. Schornbaum, "Markgraf Georg Friedrich von Brandenburg und die Einigungsbestrebungen der Protestantischen Stände 1556-1559," Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. XVII (1920) 105 ff.; ML II, 459.

Karl Theodor (Charles Theodore) (1724-99), Elector of the Palatinate, Germany, head of the Sulzbach line, who inherited the Palatinate in 1742 upon the death of Charles Philip (q.v.), the last of the Neuburg line. In 1777 he also inherited the territories of the Bavarian line. He was a Catholic, educated by the Jesuits, and made it very hard for the Mennonites of his domain throughout his reign.

On Feb. 18, 1743, the Mennonites presented a petition to Charles Theodore for confirmation of the concession (Privilegium) of 1664 and a reduction of the annual per capita protection fee from 12 to 6 florins. They repeated the petition on Dec. 10, 1743, and on March 30, 1744, offered to make a free contribution of the 10,000 florins which they had loaned the ruler in 1741, in return for the proposed reduction of the annual fee. Charles Theodore granted the petition on condition that the limit of 240 families in the country be gradually reduced to 200. Mennonite sons would have to receive a special governmental permit to remain in the country after marriage, and new Mennonite immigrants would need the same.

An official inquiry of Oct. 22, 1752, revealed that the number of families had risen to 250, the increase being chiefly in the districts of Alzey, Heidelberg, and Neustadt, since many families had harbored relatives arriving since 1744 who had no official permits, and others also had likewise come into the country illegally. A legal opinion requested by the prince objected to expulsion of the surplus Mennonites, giving as the reason that "no more industrious and capable subjects could be found, who, apart from error in religion and customs and intense zeal, should serve as models for other religious groups." The prince refused, however, to follow this advice and decreed that the previous rulings should be strictly enforced, including the reduction to 200 families. A corresponding decree was issued to all district officials on Dec. 23, 1763. The Mennonites of the Zellertal, who were under the jurisdiction of the University of Heidelberg, did not succeed in getting their annual protection fee reduced until 1769 after a long struggle.

In 1784 the entire Mennonite population addressed a petition to the prince for a cancellation of the special "retract" law, which permitted sellers of land to Mennonites to repurchase it within three years at the original sale figure without regard to any increase in value or improvements. The princely chancellor Raubisson supported the petition, stating that he had always considered the law a harsh one. However, the prince rejected the petition in his decision of Sept. 27, 1787. After Charles Theodore's death the renewed petition of the Mennonites for cancellation of the "retract" law was granted by Elector Max Josef IV on March 28, 1801, for the right bank of the Rhine, after the French authorities had canceled it for the left bank as early as 1793. The Mennonites of the Palatinate were then gradually treated as full citizens and freed from the payment of the annual protection fee. (ML II, 463 f.) G.H.

Karlin, an Anabaptist of Zürich, probably identical with Karl Brennwald (q.v.).

Karolswalde, during 1801-74 the seat of a congregation of West Prussian Mennonites, located near Ostrog, Volhynia, Russia. Coming from Graudenz, Culm, and Thorn along the Vistula River (some authorities say 1780-85) a small group of West Prussian Mennonites settled at Michalin near Machnovka in the province of Kiev. Due to a disagreement with the government the majority of the Michalin group migrated to Karolswalde in 1801. The group spread to surrounding villages as Antonovka, Karolsberg, Jadvinin, Dossidorf, and Fürstendorf. Benjamin Dircks was ordained elder of the group in 1817, Tobias Unruh in 1853. Names of common occurrence were Becker, Buller, Decker, Dirks, Goertz, Koehn, Schartner, Siebert, Thomas, and Unruh.

In 1874 the entire group emigrated to America as part of the larger Mennonite emigration from Russia of that year. Tobias Unruh had taken an active part in the negotiations prior to the emigration of the Russian Mennonites, and was one of the 12 delegates sent to America on the exploratory trip of 1873. The Karolswalde emigrants left Volhynia in several groups: July 28, 1874, 25 families; Oct. 24, 1874, 40 families; and Nov. 3, 1874, 27 families. The leaders Tobias Unruh and Ben Buller left on Nov. 11, 1874.

Because of poor economic conditions in Volhynia the group had made little economic progress there and consequently required considerable financial aid to make the journey to America. Arriving in Kansas in the middle of January 1875, without resources, the group was given considerable aid by American Mennonites. The majority of the group settled near Canton, Kan. The present Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Moundridge as well as most of the members of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, congregations in the Canton area are from this group. The Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Pawnee Rock, Kan., is also from this group. The settlements at Montezuma, Kan., and Meno, Okla., are largely of Karolswalde background. Tobias Unruh and a few others settled in South Dakota, establishing the Friedensberg (q.v.) congregation near Avon. E.C.

H. G. Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1888, 79; Menn. Bl., 1888, 128; Ernst Crous, "Mennoniten in Wolhynien und den benachbarten Gouvernements Kiew and Tschernigow," in Gesch.-Bl. XIII (1956); Cornelius Krahn, ed., From the Steppes to the Prairies (1874-1949) (Newton, 1949); Das Namensverzeichnis der Aeltesten, Lehrer und Diakonen oder Vorsteher der Taufgesinnten Mennonitischen Gemeinden (Elbing, 1843, Danzig, 1857); Abe J. Unruh and Verney Unruh, The Tobias A. Unruh Biography, Diary and Family Record 1819-1950 (Pulaski, 1950); Walter Kuhn, "Deutsche Täufersiedlungen im westukrainischen Raume," Ztscht für Ostforschung IV (1955) No. 4; ML II, 468.

Karpfis, Jörg, an Anabaptist martyr drowned at Zürich, Switzerland, in 1532 with Hans Herzog of Stadel. As far as the records go, he was the fifth Anabaptist victim of the persecution in Zürich.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Ref.-Zeit (Zürich, 1878) 91; TA Zürich, 280, 283, 285, 287; ML 468.

Karsdorp, a former Dutch Mennonite family name, especially found at Leiden, where Jan Karsdorp was a deacon of the Flemish congregation 1695-97, and of the (in 1700) united Mennonite congregation 1714-17; Nicolaas Karsdorp was five times a deacon of this congregation during the period 1725-62 and Anthony Karsdorp four times in 1747-77. The Karsdorps were rather well-to-do merchants. Gerrit Karsdorp (q.v.) and Gerrit Karsdorp, Jr. (q.v.), both preachers at Hamburg, Germany, were members of this family. Another member of this family, Abraham Karsdorp, a carpenter at Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, was custodian of the meetinghouse and the last member of the Dordrecht congregation when it died out about the middle of the 19th century. After his death his nephew J. Karsdorp considered himself private owner of the properties of the congregation, as did after his death in 1865 his heirs, who sold the meetinghouse and appropriated the funds of the congregation. Harmen Karsdorp, Jr., from Hamburg, apparently belonging to the same family, emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1700, with his wife Adriana de Vos and their children, and became a preacher of the Germantown congregation. Isaac Karsdorp (d. before 1708), who also went to Germantown in 1700, probably also emigrated from Hamburg. The Prussian Mennonite name Kasdorf, found in Prussia, Russia, and America, is probably of the same origin as Karsdorp. vdZ.

DB 1862, 109-12; 1867, 156 f.; 1868, 145-56; 1869, 3, 126; MQR VII, 1933, 46 f., 230 f., 236.

Karsdorp, Gerrit, a minister belonging to an old Mennonite family of Leiden, several branches of which lived in North Germany. He was a minister at Friedrichstadt a. d. Eider and then at Hamburg, serving the church there 1718-50. He was the first salaried minister of the Hamburg Mennonite Church, receiving 1200 marks annually. He was zealous in promoting the instruction of the children, and had 60 Dutch question-and-answer books sent from Holland for this purpose. He died on Sept. 19, 1750. His colleague Gerrit Beets delivered his funeral sermon, De vrolyke gesettheyd eenes Christen tegens de verschrikkingen des doods . . . (Hamburg, n.d.). R.Do.

R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein (Hamburg and Lübeck, 1930); Pieter Beets, Gedächtnisrede auf Gerrit Karsdorp; ML II, 468.

Karsdorp, Gerrit, Jr., son of the above, minister of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church, b. May 23, 1729, d. Oct. 11, 1811. He studied history and church history (Mosheim) independently. To learn merchandising he was apprenticed to Isaac Stokman, a Mennonite, whose daughter Sara he married in 1758. In 1750, at the age of 21 years, he became a ministerial candidate; in 1753 he became a preacher of the congregation, and in 1764 he was ordained to the ministry. He served the church nearly 61 years. He refused a salary because being in business he did not need it. During his long service he ordained many preachers.

He was well-read, and owned a library of over 9,000 volumes. Theologically he showed no particular stamp, except that he is an illustration of how the practical Mennonite traditions and beliefs were easily adapted to the religious language of the time. He was a member of the Hamburg Society for the Promotion of the Arts and Useful Crafts, in which his love for humanity and his tolerance could find expression outside the church, so that he could be called an "enlightened spirit" in this regard.

A portrait of Karsdorp adapted from an etching by L. Wolf is contained in Gesammelte Denkmäler der Liebe und Achtung (Altona, 1812). His published works are Jubelpredikatie ter gelegenheid der 50 jarige Amtsbediening 27. Juli 1800 (Altona); Redevoering over het noodzaakelyk verband tuschen de prediking van het goddelyk woord en tuschen een geregeld christelyk gezang . . . (Altona, 1802); funeral sermons for Frederick V of Denmark, Gerrit Beets, Pieter Beets, Berend Roosen, Reinh. Rahusen, Jan de Jager, and Abr. Wynands. O.S.

Nemnich, Verzeichnis der Bibliothek Karsdorps (Hamburg, 1812); Gesammelte Denkmäler der Liebe und Achtung (Altona, 1812); B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn.-Gem. zu Hamburg und Altona II (Hamburg 1887); ML II, 468.

Kartels, Joseph (1872-1931), a German Catholic historian, for a time city archivist at Fulda. In 1906-15 he taught at the Realgymnasium at Ahrweiler; in 1920 he entered a Capuchin monastery, and in 1921 he became a priest in Mainz. He inaugurated the Fuldaer Geschichtsblätter in 1902 with an address, "Die Wiedertäuferbewegung im ehemaligen Hochstift Fulda" (pp. 3-20), which he delivered to the historical society of Fulda on the Anabaptist movement (1529-87) in Grossenbach near Hünfeld, based on records in the Marburg state archives. (ML II, 468.) E.C.

Kasai, a district in the Belgian Congo, which is the location of the Mennonite Brethren Kasai district mission field. The area covered by the mission has approximately 35 villages with an estimated 12,000 population. The mission is generally referred to as the Bololo (q.v.) field. See map of Belgian Congo. A.E.J.

Kaspar, the name of an Anabaptist of Graz, Austria, a painter by profession, who, the court records say, not only joined the Anabaptists, but also instructed and baptized others therein. He was seized and instructed by the clergy, but "would not desist from his error." He finally pretended to do so, but later withdrew his recantation, and left the city in 1529. Where he went is not stated.

In accord with the decree of Ferdinand I his house was now torn down, and the building site sold to a citizen by the name of Stephan Kirchbacher; the money was used to repair the "burned" castle at Graz. Kaspar's children, Caecilie and Franz, presented a petition to the authorities that the building site be given them. The manager of the princely estates denied the request, on the ground that it would give the impression that the painter had been mistreated, though he had in reality deserved a far more severe punishment; if the prince wished to show the children mercy, he could order the mayor to pay out the value of the land. The site was a good one, near the church, fronting on two streets. The painter's relatives twice protested (document of July 11, 1535), but Kirchbacher retained possession. It is not known whether the children received any compensation.

The original of the above record is in the Vienna state archives, division Oesterreichische Akten Steiermark. For details see Graz, which this article supplements. (ML II, 469.) LOSERTH.

Kaspar of Schöneck, an Anabaptist martyr: see Caspar.

Kassel, a Mennonite family: see Cassel.

Kat, a Dutch Mennonite family name, especially found on the island of Ameland, where some of them were deacons of the church; Jan Jacobs Kat (d. 1803) was a preacher 1762-77. They were usually members of the Foppe Ones congregation; Pieter Jacobs Kat (d. 1864) was a preacher from 1829 and an elder from 1843 to 1851 of the Jan-Jacobsz congregation. (DB 1889, 18 f.) Many of them were captains of boats. Hidde Dirks Kat, of Hollum, Ameland, was the author of an interesting book: Daghboek eener reize ther Walvisch- en Robbenvangst gedaan in de jaren 1777 en 1778 door den Kommandeur H. D. Kat (Haarlem, 1818). (De Zondagsbode III, 1, Nov. 3, 1889.) Some of the members of this family lived in Workum, Hindeloopen, and Amsterdam. Hidde Abesse, of Hindeloopen, was in 1697 the skipper of the Barbara, a boat owned by the Mennonite van Eeghen (q.v.) family. Probably the preacher Jacob Kat (q.v.) also belonged to this family. Jan Lammertsz Kat (or Kadt), who was a preacher of Wormer and Jisp in 1697 (DB 1898, 79 ff.), was apparently not a member of this family. VDZ.

Wanda Oesau, Hamburgs Grönlandsfahrt (Glückstadt-Hamburg, 1955) 194 ff.

Kat, Jacob Jansz (d. 1748), a Dutch Mennonite preacher at Amsterdam (Old Frisians) 1704-48, published Kort begrip van de Leere der Waarheyt . . . , of which are extant a 2nd edition of 1736, a 3rd edition of 1747, and a 4th (erroneously indicated 3rd) edition of 1762, all published at Amsterdam. This catechism was used in the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation until 1801. (DB 1868, 109; 1869, 103; 1898, 16 f.; Biogr. Wb. IV, 670.) VDZ.

Kate, ten, a Dutch Mennonite family name. Many members of the ten Cate (q.v.) family spelled their name "ten Kate" after the close of the 17th century; e.g., Jan ten Kate, d. 1679 at Amsterdam. He was a preacher of the United Flemish-Frisian-High German-Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam from 1677, publisher of some sermons and two volumes of religious poems. In the 19th century two unmarried brothers, Rijkle (1770-1855) and Keimpe ten Kate (1775-1856), sons of Lammert ten Kate, bequeathed their considerable properties (DB 1917, 66-73) to the Mennonite congregation of IJlst (q.v.), where they had lived. VDZ.

Kate, Lambert Hermansz ten, b. Jan. 23, 1674, at Amsterdam, d. there Dec. 14, 1731, the son of Herman ten Kate and Sara Blaupot. He was baptized in the Lamist (q.v.) church on April 18, 1706. Like his father he was a grain dealer in Amsterdam. He was one of the educated and generally gifted men, of whom the Amsterdam Mennonite Church had a great many at the time. He was a linguist, a forerunner of Jakob Grimm, who understood the value of his work (Kalff, 436). In his main work, Aenleiding tot de kennisse van het verheven deel der Nederduytse sprake (Amsterdam, 1723), his basis was not the written language and grammar, but the living speech; he gives a number of conversations in various dialects, which he sees in a remote connection, and for which he drew up a table of sounds. This work proves him to have been a man with a sense of reality, and makes him the originator of the science of comparative languages in the Low Countries.

He also published two devotional books: Drie gewichtige Bedenkingen des Gemoeds; benevens den Weg tot Heil (Amsterdam, 1728) and Het Leven van onzen Heiland Jezus Christus (Amsterdam, 1732). VDZ.

J. te Winkel, Ontwikkelingsgang der Nederlandsche Letterkunde III, 392-96; G. Kalff, Gesch. der Nederl. Letterkunde VI (Groningen, 1910) 554; Biogr. Wb. V, 670 f.; N.N.B.Wb. V, 295 f.; ML II, 469.

Kathelijne (Calle) van Lokerhoute (Loorehoute), an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded in the Gravensteen Castle at Gent, Belgium, on March 24, 1563, together with two other victims. She was the wife of Loys Allaerts and 40 years of age. (Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 84.) VDZ.

Katherijn of Lier: see Catharina.

Kating, a village in Germany in the south of the Eiderstedt (q.v.) region below Tönning a.d. Eider, Schleswig-Holstein, where several Mennonite families lived in the last half of the 17th century and the first half of the 18th; e.g., David Lourensen, a smith who belonged to the Frisian congregation at Friedrichstadt. Mennonites from the Rhenish Palatinate also settled here, among them the Strichler family. Through mixed marriages and emigration Mennonitism here soon became extinct. (ML II, 474 f.) R.Do.

Katlijk, Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens in 1563-65 baptized 20 persons. Since there was never a congregation in this town it is assumed that the newly baptized members joined a congregation in the neighborhood of Katlijk, viz., Mildam, Knijpe, or Heerenveen. VDZ.

Katrijn Huyghendochter, widow of Jacob Pieterszn, of Rotterdam, was drowned on Feb. 6, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, because she had been rebaptized. VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam (1907) 6.

Katrijn Witten, from Lierichuysen (?), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on Jan. 17 or 23, 1539, with three other women at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, because of rebaptism. Probably she was a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749.) VDZ.

Katwijk aan Zee, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 27 persons in 1563-65. From that time it was seat of a small Mennonite congregation which later belonged to the Flemish branch. In 1649 the congregation had no preacher. It must have died out soon after, because no mention is made of this congregation at the Flemish conference at Leiden, June 1660. (Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 330.) vdZ.

Kauenhowen (Kauenhoven, Kaunhowen, Kauenhofen; Dutch Couwenhoven), the name of a Mennonite family originally of Danzig, first appearing in the records there in 1656 and living there until 1945. There are two Kauenhowen lines, the relationship of which is probable, but could not yet be established by records.

The origin of the family is in the Netherlands where the place name Kouwenhoven (Couwenhoven) is to be found in a number of regions, e.g., near Amersfoort, Bunnik, and Leiden. From which of these places the Danzig Kauenhovens came, cannot be stated definitely. They must have emigrated from the Netherlands to the mouth of the Vistula about the first part of the 17th century, settling at Danzig and its suburbs, especially Altschottland, Schidlitz, and Stolzenberg. From there the Kauenhoven family spread over a large area during the following centuries. Since 1732 the family name is mentioned in the records of Königsberg in Prussia, where members of the family resided until 1908. In 1732-53 four members of the Danzig Kauenhoven family went back to the Netherlands, where descendants are living today at Heemstede, Amsterdam, and Utrecht. Between 1784 and 1855 several members of the Danzig and Königsberg Kauenhoven families emigrated to Russia. One of them, Bernhard Kauenhoven (1786-1841), settled shortly after 1809 at Rosenthal near Chortitz, Ukraine. He later on moved to Bergthal from where his descendants emigrated to the East and West Reserve of Manitoba in 1875. In 1922 some of the Canadian Kauenhovens went to Mexico, settling near Cuauhtemoc, Chih., and in 1927 others settled in the Menno Colony in the Paraguayan Chaco. In 1840 Heinrich Peter Kauenhoven (Henry P. Cowenhoven, 1814-96) left West Prussia for the United States and became one of the Colorado pioneers at Aspen, Col. In 1880 Theodor Kauenhoven (1853-1918) went from Königsberg to London, England, where some of his descendants adopted the family name Carton. It has not yet been ascertained whether there is any connection between the Mennonite Kauenhoven family of Crefeld (1755-1802) and the members of the van Kouwenhoven-Conover family of New York whose forefathers came there from Amersfoort in 1626.

With very few exceptions up to 1815 all members of the two Danzig Kauenhoven lines belonged to the Danzig Flemish Mennonite congregation or to the Königsberg Mennonite Church. After that date the Kauenhovens living at Danzig and Königsberg in Prussia more often than not left the Mennonite church and became members of the Reformed, Lutheran, or Baptist churches by marrying outside the Mennonite church. In the 20th century, however, some of them returned to the Mennonite church. On the other hand, the Kauenhovens who emigrated to Russia and consequently to America have always remained members of the Mennonite church, most of them belonging to the Sommerfeld church of the "Old Colony." The name Kauenhoven is now comparatively rare among Mennonites. There are about 9 Kauenhoven families in Europe now, and about 6 each living in the Mennonite settlements of Manitoba (Canada), Cuauhtemoc (Chih., Mexico), and Menno (Paraguay). Among the members of the two Kauenhoven lines several have rendered outstanding service to their congregations and in public life. In the period from 1678 to 1830 eleven members of the Danzig Kauenhovens were deacons of the Danzig Flemish Mennonite Church, three of whom were also ministers besides. Two of the Kauenhoven women were elected deaconesses in 1758 and 1804. Of the Königsberg Kauenhovens two were deacons, one of them later on a minister of the Königsberg Mennonite Church.

Special mention should be made of the following persons of the older branch: Arend Kauenhoven (1712-92), a brandy distiller, vinegar brewer, and spice seller at Altschottland near Danzig, willed to the Danzig Flemish Mennonite Church 11,000 guilders; Abraham Kauenhoven (1674-1731), in 1720 "Vorsteher" of the Danzig Flemish Mennonite Church. Of the members of the younger Danzig Kauenhoven family should be mentioned Cornelius Kauenhoven (1683-1756), a lacemaker in the city of Danzig (?) chosen "Vorsteher" in 1718 and preacher in 1720 of the Danzig Flemish Mennonite Church; Berend Kauenhoven (1707-63), a brewer at Schönfeld near Danzig, in 1743 chosen "Vorsteher," 1749 preacher in the Danzig Flemish Mennonite congregation; Isaak Kauenhoven (1714-94), a dyer of silk, citizen of Königsberg, West Prussia, "Vorsteher," preacher, and benefactor of the Königsberg Mennonite congregation; Johann Kauenhofen (1892-1935), a preacher, orphan supervisor, and Schulze (q.v.) of the Neuenlage Mennonite settlement at Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico. K.K.

Kurt and Walter Kauenhowen, ed., Die Kauenhowen (No. 1, Verden/Aller, 1926); Kurt Kauenhowen, ed., Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes der Danziger Mennoniten-Familien Epp-Kauenhowen-Zimmermann (Göttingen, 1935-40), continued as Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes Danziger Mennoniten-Familien (Göttingen, 1941-43), again continued as Nachrichtenblatt des Sippenverbandes Danziger Mennoniten-Familien (Göttingen, 1943-44); Kurt Kauenhowen, "Stammfolge Bernhard Kauenhowen zur Ausbreitung einer russlanddeutschen Siedlerfamilie 1600-1938," in Der Wanderweg der Russlanddeutschen (Stuttgart, 1939) 137-40.

Kaufbeuren, a city (pop. 19,738) in Swabia, southwest Bavaria, Germany, once an imperial city, which passed to Bavaria in 1803. It opened very slowly to the Reformation. Anabaptists soon came here from Augsburg; among them Hans Kraft and Gallus Fischer were influential. At first the Protestant pastors tried with partial success as in other imperial cities to win them by friendly persuasion. Then the Swabian League (q.v.) in 1528 hunted down the Anabaptists with a squadron of 400 horsemen. In Kaufbeuren 40 persons were seized, of whom five were beheaded (May 13, 1528) and seven had their cheeks burned through. These events intimidated the council, and Catholicism won control for the next 15 years.

But Anabaptist ideas continued to influence the populace, and after 1535 Schwenckfelders (q.v.) and Zwinglians obtained a firm footing. The progress of the various branches can no longer be traced. In any case, by 1543 the council was apparently completely under Schwenckfeld influence. It is worth noting that Catholic services were at this time in no way encroached upon. Religious developments in Kaufbeuren were discussed by the Protestant estates at the Diet of Worms in 1545. Delegates from various cities were sent there, who with great difficulty succeeded in pushing out these quiet "confessors of the glory of Christ." But in secret their influence continued. During the Schwenckfeld period the council passed many measures against the Anabaptists, causing many to emigrate. A letter written by Ferdinand I to the council of Kaufbeuren, dated Sept. 5, 1545, contains the court records of the trials of the Kaufbeuren Anabaptists, Hans Staudach (executed at Vienna in 1546), a baker of Kaufbeuren, his wife Ursula, and his cousin Blasius Staudach (baker), Hans Hofmayr (weaver), Hans Feuerbach (apparently a preacher), Anna Zacharias, the widow of a butcher, Katharina Losch, and Anna Stangel (Alt, 9-24). Alt (37) prints the sincere letter of comfort and admonition written by a Kaufbeuren Anabaptist woman named Katharina.

In the 17th century there were still some Anabaptists in Kaufbeuren; the court records repeatedly note that citizens go to the Anabaptists in Moravia, stay a while, and return, or that they have given lodging to Anabaptists. H.Q.

F. Stieve, Die Reichsstadt Kaufbeuren (1870); Th. Keim, Schwäbische Reformationsgeschichte bis zum Augsburger Reichstag (Tübingen, 1855); K. Alt, Wiedertäufer in und aus Kaufbeuren (Kempten, 1930); ML II, 475.

Kauffman (Kaufman, Kaufmann, Kauffmann, Coffman, Cauffman), a prolific Mennonite and Amish family, originating apparently in Steffisberg, canton of Bern, Switzerland. One of the early Mennonite settlers in Lancaster Co., Pa., was Andrew Kauffman, who came in 1717 from Friesenheim, Palatinate, to which place he had earlier come from Steffisberg. The Palatinate Mennonite census lists of the late 17th and early 18th century contain a number of Kauffman families, and as late as 1936 there were as many as 44 Kaufmanns in nine congregations in South Germany. Another line of Swiss Kauffmanns emigrated to Alsace and Montbéliard about the same time, of which there were still in 1954, 20 Kauffmann families in seven congregations in France, including a preacher at Belfort. Around 1800 several of these Kauffmann families (Amish) joined the migration to Galicia and Volhynia (1803) (Michelsdorf, Eduardsdorf, Horodisch) and finally came from there to Kansas (Moundridge) and South Dakota (Freeman). P. R. Kaufman's Unser Volk und seine Geschichte (1931) tells the story of this group. From this group stem Ed. G. Kaufman (1891-), president of Bethel College (1932-52), R. C. Kauffman (1910-), dean of the same college (1949-56), and Charles Kauffman, curator of the Kauffman Museum (all GCM).

The direct immigration of Kauffmans from the Palatinate to America began with Isaac and Andrew Kauffman, who settled in Lancaster Co., Pa., in 1717. From this line came such leading figures in the Mennonite Church (MC) as David D. Kauffman (1827-96), first Mennonite bishop in Missouri (Versailles), and his son Daniel Kauffman (1865-1944), a long-time bishop and editor of the Gospel Herald, living most of his active life at Scottdale, Pa. A branch of this Lancaster County line located early in western Virginia (Page Co.) where Michael Kauffman was the first Mennonite minister. Here the name was changed to Coffman. Bishop Samuel Coffman (1822-94), his son J. S. Coffman (q.v., 1848-99), the noted evangelist of Elkhart, Ind., and the latter's son Bishop S. F. Coffman (q.v., 1872-1954) of Vineland, Ont., were noted bearers of this name.

The progenitor of the Amish Kauffmans, Jacob Kauffman, came to Berks Co., Pa., in 1754 from the Palatinate. Many Kauffmans are still found among the Old Order Amish (10 preachers by that name in 1955), chiefly in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois. Those families who have joined the Mennonite group have produced a number of outstanding leaders in the Mennonite Church (MC), among them Milo Kauffman (1895-), president of Hesston College (1933-50) and leading bishop in Kansas; Nelson Kauffman (1904-), bishop at Hannibal, Mo., and president of the Mennonite Board of Education (1948-); J. N. Kaufman (1880-), long-time missionary in India and bishop near Peoria, Ill. There were in 1955 in the Mennonite (MC) Church 25 ordained men bearing the name Kauffman. Sister Frieda Kaufman (q.v., 1883-1944) was a prominent leader in deaconess work in the General Conference Mennonite Church. Her parents came from Switzerland. H.S.B.

C. F. Kauffman, A Genealogy and History of the Kauffman-Coffman Families of North America 1584-1937 (York, Pa., 1940) 775 pp.; J. C. Beachey, Family Record of Moses and Katie Kauffman and Their Descendants (Arthur, Ill., 1941) 65 pp.; M. A. Kauffman, Abraham Kauffman Family History (Fresno, Ohio, ca. 1950) 100 pp.; Mrs. Abe Gingerich, Family Record of Jacob Kauffman and His Descendants (Arthur, Ill., 1952) 16 pp.

Kauffman, Daniel, son of Bishop David D. and Elizabeth (Winey) Kauffman, b. June 20, 1865, in Juniata, Pa., d. Jan. 6, 1944, near Parnell, Ia. The family moved to Elkhart, Ind., in 1866, and to Morgan Co., Mo., in 1869. He secured the degree of Principal of Pedagogics at the Missouri State University, taught school in Missouri 1883-97, and served as county commissioner (superintendent) 1887-90. For a time he conducted a private business college at Garden City, Mo. He was married in 1887 to Ota J. Bowlin, who died in 1890. There were two children, James A., and an infant daughter who did not live. In 1902 he married Mary C. Shank. There were six children, three of whom are living: Homer M., Alice (Mrs. Fred Gingerich), and Fannie (Mrs. Michael Sarco). He lived in Missouri, most of the time at Versailles, until 1909, when he moved to Scottdale, Pa. One year, 1922-23, he lived at Goshen, Ind. His closing months were spent in the Iowa home of his daughter Alice.

Under the preaching of J. S. Coffman he was converted in 1890, and joined the Mennonite Church (MC). He was ordained minister in 1892 and bishop in 1896. His natural gifts as speaker, teacher, writer, and leader soon made him the outstanding leader of the Mennonite Church and for over 40 years he made an impact on the church not even approached by any other person. A born organizer, he led in the setting up of the organizational patterns which still are in effect. He was at one time a member of 22 committees and boards. He was a prime mover in the organization of Mennonite General Conference, and its first moderator at the age of 33. He is the only man to have been moderator four times. Three times he preached the conference sermon, seven times was chairman of the Resolutions Committee, and at some time served as chairman of most of the other important committees. He also served as moderator of the Missouri-Iowa and the Southwestern Pennsylvania conferences. Able to transcend all bounds of sectionalism and factionalism, he was a church statesman, serving often as mediator and conciliator.

Kauffman urged the establishment of Hesston College, taught in the Bible School at Alexandria, Va., which proved to be the beginning of Eastern Mennonite College, and served one year (1922-23) as president of Goshen College. He taught winter Bible terms at all the Mennonite (MC) colleges, and was widely used as an instructor when the Bible Conference movement was at its height.

Kauffman was a prolific writer at a time when the church was poor in writers. He was the author of the following books and booklets: Manual of Bible Doctrine (1898), One Hundred Lessons in Bible Study (1899), A Talk with Church Members (1900), Life Insurance (1903), A Talk with Our Boys and Girls (1906), Bible Doctrines Briefly Stated (1908), One Thousand Questions and Answers (1908), The Conservative Viewpoint (1918), The Message and the Message-Bearer (1919), The Christian Worker (1922), The Gospel Mirror (1922), The Mennonite Church and Current Issues (1923), The Way of Salvation (1923), The Two Standards (1923), Mennonite History (1927), My Vision of the Future (1938), Fifty Years in the Mennonite Church (1941), The Devotional Side of Life (1942). He served as editor of Bible Doctrine (1914) and as editor and chief writer of Doctrines of the Bible (1928) and Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (1937). He was coauthor with J. S. Hartzler of Mennonite Church History (1905) and with J. L. Stauffer of Helps for Ministers (1930).

His greatest work was as editor of the Gospel Witness (1905-8) and of the Gospel Herald (1908-43). Through wise editorial policies and capable editorial writing he used his position through 39 years to mold the life and thought of the church. Both as preacher and writer he came to be recognized as the spokesman of the church. His emphasis on doctrine made him the interpreter of the Mennonite Church to itself.

He helped to launch Beams of Light, was joint editor of the Sunday-School Teachers' Quarterly (1907-14), and editor for many years of tracts and the Family Almanac. His biography, Life and Times of Daniel Kauffman (Scottdale, 1954), was written by his daughter Alice. He was buried in the Alverton cemetery north of Scottdale.† P.E.

Kauffman, John D. (1847-1913), was born in Logan Co., Ohio, lived most of his life in Elkhart Co., Ind., but moved to Shelbyville, Ill., in 1907, where he died. He was an unordained self-appointed "preacher" until 1911, when he was ordained bishop by Bishop Peter Zimmerman of the Linn Township A.M. Church (q.v.). The group which followed Kauffman from Indiana in 1907 was organized into a congregation (Mt. Hermon) and built a meetinghouse near Shelbyville in 1912, where they continued with a maximum membership of 85 (1930), which in 1954 was down to 45, with Joseph Reber as bishop, who was ordained in 1914 as Kauffman's successor. Preacher S. E. Yoder of Delafield, and Peter Zimmerman of Roanoke sided with the group.

The Kauffman group, with the two congregations at Mt. Hermon and Linn Township, became known as the Sleeping Preacher (q.v.) group because of Kauffman's strange custom of going into trances for several hours at a time, during which he conducted a religious service and preached a full sermon. H.S.B.

Pius Hostetler, Life, Preaching, and Labors of John D. Kauffman (Shelbyville, Ill., 1916).

Kauffmann, Mathys, of Kriegstetten, Solothurn, Switzerland, was one of the Anabaptist preachers held in chains in the newly built penitentiary and orphanage in Bern, who were considered "the most important preachers and ringleaders" (see Bern). From March 3, 1659, to Sept. 10, 1660, Kauffmann was there. Efforts of the council and the clergy to convert him were in vain. On Jan. 20, 1660, the appointed persons "betook themselves to the Anabaptist business" in the penitentiary to give the Anabaptists an examination. On 16 points the prisoners had to give an account, covering doctrine, communion, baptism, and attitude to government. All remained true to their convictions. Kauffmann had been seized at Koppingen in the canton of Bern, at his daughter's home. Now he besought the council to release him because he wanted to go to Solothurn. According to a decision of the council of June 15, 1660, the prisoners were to be banished. On Aug. 27 they were again cross-examined, but they still "persisted in their opinion, no matter what one tried with them." Kauffmann was then taken to the border via Brügg with the others on Sept. 10, 1660, and banished. S.G.

A. Fluri, Beiträge zur Gesch. der bernischen Täufer II: Das Waisenhaus als Täufergefängnis (Bern, 1912); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 398 ff.; ML II, 475.

Kauffman Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, is located on the Kauffman farm on the Manheim Pike in Lancaster Co., Pa. The congregation had formerly (prior to 1860) met at Sun Hill, several miles from the present location, but when it moved it adopted the name of its benefactor, Abraham Kauffman, who gave his farm of 97 acres to the church. The first meetinghouse here was built in 1860, enlarged in 1891, and recently remodeled. It was earlier a part of the Hernley-Erb circuit, but today has its separate ministers. Homer D. Bomberger is the bishop, William Heisey is minister, and Ernest Bauman, deacon. The membership in 1954 was 72. I.D.L.

Kauffman's was formerly a Mennonite (MC) congregation of the Lancaster Conference about two miles north of Annville in Lebanon Co., Pa. The community was settled by the Myers, Shirks, Ellenbergers, Lights, and Brightbills. In 1773 Frederick Kauffman was the Lebanon County bishop. The meetinghouse, which was built on the lands of Benjamin Bowman before 1768, was used until 1851, when the United Brethren claimed the building. The Mennonites then, under their bishop Jacob Dohner, moved east to the present site of Dohner's (q.v.) meetinghouse, the congregation now bearing that name being the lineal descendant of Kauffman's. I.D.L.

Kaufman, David S., was born near Davidsville, Pa., Sept. 7, 1834, son of Samuel Kaufman, d. July 17, 1918. He married Lydia Kaufman and moved to Lagrange Co., Ind., some years later, where he was ordained to the ministry. In the spring of 1877 he was ordained bishop in the North Barrens district of the Old Order Amish Mennonite Church. Bishop Kaufman was very successful in leading his flock. Although he also had his troubles and sometimes a few adversaries, still he always succeeded in preserving peace in the church. His services and advice were much sought in other states. He was called and let himself be used in church work in more different places than any other bishop of his time. He was always very successful in working for peace and harmony wherever he was called. His field of service covered the entire country from Pennsylvania to Oregon and from North Dakota to Mississippi. Although he was lenient toward other leaders who could not quite agree with his views, he was firm in his convictions and adhered strictly to what he thought was right where he himself had to take the lead. E.J.B.

Kaufman, Isaac (1807-86), an Amish Mennonite philanthropist of northern Somerset County near Johnstown, Pa., who owned considerable stock in the Pennsylvania Railroad and was one of the directors of an early bank in Johnstown. He was widely sought for his sound financial advice and the large number of private loans he made to Amish settlers in this area. The Kaufman Amish Mennonite Church near Davidsville, Pa., was named in his honor. He died Oct. 17, 1886, aged 79. (Register of Wills, Somerset County courthouse.) J.A.H.

Kaufman, Sister Frieda Marie, b. Oct. 23, 1883, at Haagen in Wiesental, Baden, Germany, the daughter of Johannes and Marie Egle Kaufmann, citizens of Switzerland. In July 1892 the parents and three daughters, Anna, Elizabeth, and Frieda, came to Halstead, Kan. From early childhood until she entered the public school of her native village, she had attended kindergarten conducted by Lutheran deaconesses. For a year the family lived in a Catholic community, and the seven-year-old girl spent much of her time in the home of a group of nuns who lived just across the street from the Kaufmanns. They were very kind to the little neighbor and gave her many coveted privileges of helping with the tiny tots in the kindergarten section of the parochial school. Under these influences she decided to become a sister, a desire she never lost.

She was educated in the Bethel College Academy 1900-2; the Deaconess Hospital Training School, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1902-4; graduate nurse Aug. 8, 1904; ordained deaconess June 11, 1908; registered nurse July 16, 1913; Doctor of Humane Letters, Bethel College, 1942.

Sister Frieda served as deaconess nurse in private homes, 1904-8; sister in charge of Bethel Deaconess Home and Hospital, Newton, Kan., 1908-38; Deaconess Mother, Bethel Deaconess Home and Hospital, Newton, 1908-43. She shared in the organization and building of Bethel Hospital, Mountain Lake, Minn., and Bethel Home for the Aged, Newton. She was editor of In the Service of the King 1941-44. In 1934 Sister Frieda made a trip to Europe, which she recorded in her book Auf Wanderwegen (Newton, 1935). She was a member of the First Mennonite Church (GCM) of Newton. She died on Aug. 7, 1944, at Newton and is buried there. L.M.S.

Kaufman Amish Mennonite Church, now extinct. Among the first settlers of Conemaugh Twp., Somerset Co., Pa., were some Amish Mennonites who began to come about 1790. Christian (Schmidt) Miller (d. 1845) was one of the first and became the first Amish bishop in the township. Others kept moving in until there were possibly several hundred members around Johnstown. The advent of the steel mills into Johnstown caused many of them to move westward. They adhered strictly to the German language, which caused a general decline in membership. In 1880 they built two meetinghouses, one near Davidsville, Somerset County, known as the Kaufman Church, because it was built and financed by Isaac Kaufman and because more than half the members have the name Kaufman, and another near Geistown, Cambria County. After the death of Bishop Moses B. Miller in 1902, services at the Geistown church (sometimes known as the Miller church) were discontinued, while the Davidsville church continued with ministerial help supplied by the Mifflin County churches until 1916, after which all Amish worship was discontinued and the church dismantled. The few surviving members united with the Mennonite Church (MC). A.KA.

Kaufman Mennonite Church (MC), located two miles east of Holsopple, Pa., is the youngest of the congregations of what was once a united Johnstown bishop district. The other congregations in the district were, with date of first meetinghouse, Blough (1836), Weaver (1855), Thomas (1874), Stahl (1882), and Elton (1899). These congregations constituted in effect a single congregation, called in the conference minutes the Johnstown congregation, with one bishop, which in 1900 was listed as having about 500 baptized members. Bishops were Jacob Blough (d. 1849), Samuel Blough, Sr. (d. 1877), Samuel Blough, Jr., Jonas Blough (d. 1906), James Saylor (ord. bishop 1903). About 1940 the district was divided and the individual congregations given different bishops. The Kaufman congregation apparently was organized as a separate body about 1912, when the first meetinghouse was built and 94 members were listed. It had no minister of its own until 1917, when A. J. Blough was chosen. In 1955 the membership was 162, with Harry Y. Shetler and Irvin M. Holsopple serving as ministers. The remnant of the old Kaufman Amish (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, which had been located in the same area, joined the new Kaufman Mennonite congregation (History of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference). H.S.B.

Kaunitz, Ulrich von, a ruler in Moravia, in whose territory Austerlitz (q.v.) was located, was kindly disposed to the Reformation, though he was a Catholic. Thus in 1528 he allowed the nonresistant Hutterite Anabaptists, called Stäbler (q.v.), who had separated from the Schwertler (q.v., Anabaptists who did not share the principle of nonresistance), to move from Nikólsburg to Austerlitz. vdZ.

Kautz, Jakob (1500-?), for two years a Lutheran preacher at Worms, Germany, joined the Anabaptists in 1526. In his later public work he expressed some ideas similar to Hans Denk's (q.v.). In the spring of 1527 Denk and Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) finished translating the Prophets from Hebrew to German at Worms, a task which had not yet been done because of linguistic difficulties. Thus Kautz had a considerable period of contact with Denk beginning in January 1527. Denk did not appear in public in Worms, but after his expulsion from Strasbourg used this retirement to devote himself to his scholarly work.

In the free imperial city a lively religious movement was in progress, the consequence of the struggles of the citizenry with the bishop. The courage and eloquence of the gifted young preacher Kautz had soon won a considerable following. He urged a spiritual Christian life, and union with God, placing no value on cult forms. He felt himself akin to Wolfgang Capito (q.v.), who also laid the chief stress on the spirit, and who, of all the reformers, was most like the Anabaptists in position. Thus it is easy to understand Denk's influence on him.

Kautz at first worked quietly for the movement. In January 1527, his colleague Hilarius joined the Anabaptists. For a while they continued to practice infant baptism, so that the government would have no cause for action against the parents. But on Jan. 27, 1527, the Elector Palatine, Louis V, to protect the rights of his brother, the bishop of Worms, demanded that the council take steps against these two preachers. The council hesitated, urging the bishop instead to have the pure Gospel preached in the churches; then peace and quiet could be kept among the citizens.

The elector, however, insisted, and on March 31, 1527, Kautz and Hilarius had to answer before the council. Kautz refused to preach contrary to his convictions, and continued to preach them. His following increased from day to day. Karl Hagen says one hundred peasants, followers of Kautz, were executed because they would not recant. On Thursday, June 13, he challenged his opponents to a public disputation. He outlined his views in seven theses (ML I, 158), and attached them to the door of the Predigerkirche in Worms. In them he stresses the inner life, which forms the core of religious striving. The "external," which for him includes the written and spoken word, communion, and infant baptism, has no power to comfort the inner man or assure him of salvation. Even the physical suffering of Christ would not be a true reconciliation with God without inner obedience. The Christian must be a disciple and follow the Father's commands like the Son.

Fr. Zorn, the chronicler of Worms, says Haetzer, Denk, and Melchior Rink were invited to participate in the disputation, but their names are not given in any publications (zur Linden, 174); the replies to the seven theses also name only Kautz as their author. Nor do the Kautz views as a whole coincide with Denk's. Denk's statements on these points, where they are found in his writings, are clearer and more mature. It is therefore most unlikely that Denk co-operated in drawing up the theses, or even that he gave his consent to their publication (Hege, 38-42).

Kautz's theses brought an immediate response. The two Lutheran preachers in Worms, Ulrich Preu and Johann Freiherr, wrote seven counter theses, which they posted on the church doors and put into print at once. At the advice of Johann Cochlaeus, who was also replying to some theses published in both Latin and German, the council decided on July 1, 1527, to banish the two preachers from the city. On July 2 the Strasbourg reformers issued a publication titled, Getrewe Warnung der Prediger des Evangely zu Strassburg vber die Artickel, so Jakob Kautz, Prediger zu Wormbs, kürtzlich hat lassen aussgehen, concerning which Röhrich says the preachers here defend "several of the debated doctrinal statements with arguments that careful exegesis would hardly consider valid; and other reasons are presented so strikingly and convincingly that they would not be without effect on the less prejudiced" (Röhrich, Reformation I, 339). Zwingli also attacked the Kautz theses.

After his expulsion from Worms Kautz sought refuge in South Germany. He seems to have gone first to Rothenburg on the Tauber, where he worked with Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.). Then he went to Augsburg, where on June 22 a new edition of the translation of the prophets had just come off the Ottmar press. He took part in the martyrs' synod on Aug. 20, 1527 (Keller, Reformation, 427). In June 1528 he went to Strasbourg (Cornelius, II, 274). Here the reformers tried again to convert him. He left the city, but returned in August, and was seized on Oct. 22, 1528, at a meeting, with Wilhelm Reublin and other attendants. In prison he had frequent talks with the reformers, but his request for a public debate was denied when the council learned that Worms had expelled him (Röhrich, "Strassburgische Wiedertäufer," 43). Kautz and Reublin now drew up a statement of their faith: they knew only adult baptism; infant baptism was not in accord with Christ's command; they compared the Strasbourg theologians to unskilled carpenters, who tear down more than they can build up (Röhrich, 44). In prison Kautz and Reublin again complained that they were not permitted to present their teaching openly or to the magistrate. The magistrate still refused public debate; they must limit themselves to written expression (Röhrich, 47). Not much is known of the content of their written statements, for they are lost (see Bucer; Schiess, I, 169).

The authorities asked the advice of various preachers and councilors as to how to proceed with the prisoners. One opinion has been preserved; it recommends the death penalty for Kautz and exile for the others (Hulshof, 84).

In prison Kautz became ill and declared himself willing to renounce Anabaptism. He was expelled, and then attached himself to Peter Schöffer, the printer who had published several editions of the translation of the Prophets by Denk and Haetzer in 1527 and 1528 (Hege, 22-31). In the same year, 1529, Kautz published the first complete German Bible based on the original text, five years before Luther's Bible. The Worms Bible was built on Luther's, as far as it had appeared. The rest is based on the Zürich Bible. The apocryphal books are attributed to Kautz, who made use of Leo Jud's translation of 1529 (Metzger, 75).

Kautz tried to earn a living as a tutor. Seriously ill, he sought (Oct. 14, 1532) medical aid in Strasbourg; but the magistrate refused him entry on the ground that it was not clear that he had renounced Anabaptism, and asked the opinion of the Strasbourg reformers (Cornelius, 279). In a second petition for toleration Kautz, broken in body and spirit, wrote that he had renounced it in prison, and now "knew nothing but Jesus the Crucified, that He is Lord; but no lover of God can abstain from proclaiming the virtue of Him who has called us to His wonderful light" (Röhrich, "Strassburgische Wiedertäufer," 63). His petition for toleration in the city was denied on the counsel of the reformers on Oct. 16 (Röhrich, 60; Cornelius, 277).

Little is known of Kautz's further fate. He died soon afterward, and his wife seems to have followed him in death a little later. His father's brother Peter took care of their children in Worms.

According to Calvary, Mitteilungen aus dem Antiquariate I (1870, supplement 5, 6, p. 52), the following works by Kautz have appeared: Von der evangelischen Mess. Mit schönen christlichen Gebetten vor und nach der entphahung der Sacramente (Hagenau, 1524), and Wie man die Krankken und sterbenden Menschen ermanen . . . sol (n.p., 1574).

HEGE.

J. Böshenz, "Jacob Kautz, ein Grossbockenheimer Volksprediger der Reformationszeit," in Neue Leininger Blätter I (October 1926); A. Brecher, "Jakob Kautz," in ADB XV, 510-11; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885); A. Hegler, "Jakob Kautz," in HRE X, 192-94; A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgez. te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905); J. J. Metzler, Gesch. der deutschen Bibelübersetzungen in der schweizerisch-reformierten Kirche (Basel, 1876); T. W. Röhrich, Gesch. der Ref. in Elsass I (Strasbourg, 1830); idem, "Zur Gesch. der Strassburgischen Wiedertäufer," in Ztscht f. d. Hist. Theol., 1860; L. Keller, Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien (Leipzig, 1885); Georg Baring, "Die Wormser Propheten" (reprint from Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXXI, 1934, 23-41); idem, another article with the same title in Deutsches Bibelarchiv, Dritter Bericht (Potsdam, 1933); ML II, 476-78.

Kazakhstan: see Soviet Central Asia.

Kedung-Pendjalin, a former mission station of the Dutch Mennonite missionary association in Java (q.v.), established in 1869 by members of the church founded in and about Japara by Pieter Jansz, the first missionary sent by the association. These members were living in several villages south of Japara, but since land was too scarce to assure them a living they settled north of Japara on land covered by virgin forests given them free of charge by the Dutch government, and built the village Kedung-Pendjalin.

Almost at the same time Pasrah, an assistant of Pieter Jansz, founded a small Christian congregation. It was served in turn by Jansz, Schuurmans, and Pieter Anton Jansz. In 1893 Johann Hübert came to the field and located at Kedung-Pendjalin in 1895. A church seating 400 was built in that year. In 1896 two evangelists, Tresno and Martakarija, were appointed, and gave devoted service for many years. In 1906 a 40-bed hospital was erected, which was later enlarged. In 1908 Hübert built a school, which in 1933 employed five teachers for a student body of 199.

In 1931 Hermann Schmitt took over the schools of this station, so that Hübert could devote all his time to the church. In 1933 it had a membership of 1,317, including the 649 unbaptized school children, five assistants and evangelists, two Sunday schools, and seven schools. In 1954 the baptized membership was 451, with 459 children.

The following subsidiary churches belong to Kedung-Pendjalin: Bondo, established in 1897, church dedicated in 1899, school built in 1895; Balongkodak, founded in 1904, church built in 1908, and a school in 1911; Puladjati, founded 1896, dissolved 1908; Japara, founded 1852, and reopened for the third time in 1924; Margokerto, founded 1900, church dedicated 1928; Tembelang, founded 1907, school 1910; Poring, founded 1921; Pakis, founded 1925. Missionary Johann Hübert was in charge of this congregation until 1936; he was followed by Otto Stauffer (q.v.), who served until 1940. On Nov. 24, 1940, this congregation became independent, with S. Jogopranoto as its pastor. In 1949 the congregation numbered 373 baptized members and 511 children; in 1955 the figures were about 450 and 500. (Reports of the Dutch Mission Association; ML II, 478.)

J.H., VDZ.

Keersgieter, Jacob de: see Jacob de Rore.

Keescooper, Hans: see Jannijn Buefkijn.

Keessen, a Dutch Mennonite family of Aalsmeer (q.v.). Since the 18th century usually occupied in fruit and tree raising, the family now owns one of the famous flower, nursery, and export businesses of this town. Many of its members were deacons. Gerrit Cornelis Keessen served 1798-*ca.*1830 as a preacher of the Nieuwe Vermaning congregation, as did also Dirk Aldert Keessen 1826-56, Willem Keessen 1832-*ca.*60, and Willem Dirks Keessen, Jr., 1861-66. D. W. Keessen Azn published De vermaningen te Aalsmeer in den ouden tijd (Aalsmeer, 1932) and De Doopsgezinde Gemeenten te Aalsmeer 1642-1942 (n.p., n.d.—Aalsmeer, 1942). vdZ.

W. Tsj. Vleer, De Aloude Aalsmeerse Familiën (De Kaag, n.d.-1953).

Keest, Jacob, a deacon of the Flemish Mennonite congregation at Franeker (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, who in 1586 opposed Elder Thomas Byntgens and soon became the principal leader of the Contra-Huiskopers (q.v.), Byntgens being the leader of the Huiskopers. Jacob Keest is thought to be identical with Jacques Outerman (q.v.), who about 1600 was a well-known preacher at Haarlem.

Perhaps earlier traces of Jacob Keest can be found if we assume that he is the same person as the Jacob Keest mentioned by Verheyden (Courtrai-Bruxelles, 20) who in 1553 was a cloth merchant living at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, near the (Cloth) Hall, and who was suspected as to his religion. (BRN VII, 553; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 430 f.) vdZ.

Keg, a Dutch Mennonite family, since the early 17th century found at Zaandam, North Holland, where this family was engaged in shipbuilding during the 17th and early 18th centuries. After a period of economic decline the family became prominent again about 1830 in oil milling, the cheese trade, and cheese export, particularly to England. Many members of the Keg family have served as deacons in the West Zaandam Mennonite congregation and in a few other congregations. Pieter Keg, of Zaandam, was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite general conference) in 1873-81. vdZ.

Keim, Anthoni (called Kleyn by van Braght, Dutch Martyrs' Mirror, and Klein in the German edition of 1780), a Hutterite martyr, a tailor of Gunzenhausen (Middle Franconia), Bavaria, Germany, was seized with Hans Staudach (q.v.) and two companions when they were about to go to Moravia, and taken to Vienna (Aug. 2, 1546), and after a long, severe imprisonment and several cross-examinations, in which they victoriously attested their faith, they were beheaded on Nov. 22, 1546. To commemorate their death Wolf Sailer (q.v.) and Hans Gurtzham (q.v.) each wrote a song; both are found in Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder. Neff.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 205 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 165-67; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 260, 265 f.; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 133, 136; Mart. Mir. D 74, E 475, where the name is Antony Keyn; ML II, 478, 507.

Keim, Karl Theodor (1825-78), a German research scholar in church history, professor of theology at the University of Giessen. He contributed to the study of Anabaptist history in his works, Reformation der Reichsstadt Ulm (Stuttgart, 1851); Schwäbische Reformationsgeschichte bis zum Augsburger Reichstag (Tübingen, 1855); Reformationsblätter der Reichsstadt Esslingen (Esslingen, 1860); and his article "Ludwig Hetzer. Ein Beitrag zur Charakteristik der Sektenbewegungen in der Reformationszeit," in Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie (1856, pp. 215 ff.). (ML II, 478.) Neff.

Keim Meetinghouse (MC) was built in 1859 in St. Paul, several miles from Salisbury, Somerset Co., Pa. The building was of simple frame construction, 30 x 35 feet in size, and cost $535. It was also known as the Mennonite Union, because although it was largely in the hands of the Mennonites, the Lutheran and Reformed congregations also shared in its use, the latter having contributed $200 to the building project. It was sold to the Lutherans in 1893.

The Mennonite congregation which was served by the Keim Meetinghouse was established in 1780 near Meyersdale, Pa., and was the first Mennonite body to be organized in the Casselman Valley District. The first minister was Jacob Seiler or Saylor (1715-93), a former Amish minister from Germany who was ordained by a Lancaster County bishop in eastern Pennsylvania for the purpose of serving in the Meyersdale area. At the time of the building of the Keim Meetinghouse, H. H. Blauch was the minister (served 1853-1904). His activity and vision as pastor and leader of the group so encouraged an increase in numbers that by 1859 it was no longer feasible to meet in schoolhouses and the First Baptist Meetinghouse of West Salisbury, as had been the custom of the group for some years. It was at this point that the Keim Meetinghouse was constructed. In 1878 the Mennonites erected their own meetinghouse at Springs (q.v.) some five miles southeast, called the Folk Meetinghouse. The group worshiping in the Keim Meetinghouse was in effect the later Springs congregation. It was probably called Keim's because of David Keim (1832-1915), preacher 1870 and bishop 1875-1915. A.E.S.

Keiser: see Keyser.

Kelet, a hospital in Java located on the highway leading from Taju to Japara on the north side of Mt. Muria in the former province of Central Java. Kelet was established by the former Dutch Mennonite mission on Java, built under Dr. H. Bervoets and opened in 1915. It has beds for 142 patients, has a children's ward, a fully equipped surgery, laboratory, and electrotherapy. Dr. Bervoets was replaced in 1921 by Dr. K. P. C. A. Gramberg, who was assisted after 1930 by Dr. F. C. van der Horst; in addition there was always a government physician in service there. The first nurse was Helene Goossen of Russia, who served 1920-22; she then married Dr. Gramberg. Other nurses (deaconesses) were Panman 1922-25, Spannenburg 1927-29, and Maria Klaassen 1931-51.

The indigenous personnel, 40-50 nurses, some of whom had midwife certification, were with few exceptions trained at Kelet. The leper colony at Donorodjo (q.v.) (eight miles north of Kelet) was also established by Dr. Bervoets and belongs to Kelet. The head physician of Kelet officiates at Donorodjo. Kelet also maintains two subsidiary hospitals, Taju with 22 beds and Bangsri with 10 beds, besides the dispensaries at Pati, Juvana, and Vedarijeska. Soon after the opening of the hospital a mission school was built at Kelet. The teachers were trained in the mission school in Margoredjo.

The extent of the hospital services is indicated by the following 1932 statistics: a total of 2,105 patients was admitted, with 117,142 days of nursing care; in Kelet alone, 1,481 patients with 48,481 days of care. The clinics gave 54,485 treatments to 9,769 patients. The total expenses were 112,820 guilders, of which the government contributed 78,586 guilders.

The development of the hospital also gave rise to a thriving congregation living in and around Kelet. The staff became the center of a live youth group. Pastoral care from 1915 was in the hands of a native assistant, Pariman Martosentono (elder since 1950), directed by Hermann Schmitt in Kudus. At the end of 1932 the church had 92 members and 125 children. Average attendance at church was 128 adults. In 1930 a church was built; meetings had previously been held in a room of the hospital. Among the lepers in Donorodjo there was also a Christian group, with a leper preacher. The head of the colony, P. Bouwer, assisted with the preaching, and missionary N. Thiessen of Margoredjo had the spiritual oversight over the colony. In 1954 the Kelet congregation had 167 baptized members and 262 children. It had become fully independent on Nov. 24, 1940.

Maria Klaassen, missionary nurse, was able to continue at Kelet throughout the vicissitudes of World War II, the Japanese occupation, and the guerrilla warfare afterwards. She operated the hospital successfully singlehandedly until she left the field in 1951. The MCC relief program in this area, which had been begun in 1949 at Pati, moved its headquarters to Kelet in 1953. (Reports of the Dutch Mission Association; ML II, 479.) K.P.G., vdZ.

Keller, Gottfried (1819-90), a Swiss literary figure, one of the most important writers in German literature. His best-known work is probably the novel, Der grüne Heinrich; but his Züricher Novellen are also widely read. One of these, titled Ursula (q.v.), takes the reader into the Reformation in Zürich. Zwingli is engaged in a struggle with the Catholics and Anabaptists. A soldier just returned from the Italian wars attaches himself faithfully to Zwingli. He finds that his sweetheart has become a follower of the fanatical Anabaptists. What the author presents is a caricature. Excesses, some of which occurred in St. Gall, are here ascribed to the Zürich Anabaptists in unpleasant exaggeration. Finally Ursula finds her lover seriously wounded on the battlefield of Kappel, saves him from death, is cured of her madness in the distress of war, and as his wife follows him to his house. NEFF.

Elizabeth Bender, "Portrayal of the Swiss Anabaptists in Gottfried Keller's Ursula," MQR XVII (July 1943) 136-50; ML II, 479.

Keller, Ludwig, b. March 28, 1849, at Fritzlar, Germany, d. March 9, 1915, in Berlin, attended school at Rinteln, studied classical philology at the universities of Leipzig and Marburg, and then specialized in archives. In 1874 he began his work in archives for Prussia. Until 1895 he was state archivist in Münster. Intensive study of the archives here led to the publication in 1885-87 of Die Gegenreformation in Westfalen und dem Niederrhein (see also his articles, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer nach dem Untergang des Münsterischen Königreichs," Westdeutsche Ztscht I, 1882, 429-68; and "Zur Kirchengeschichte Nordwestdeutschlands im 16. Jahrhundert," in Ztscht des bergischen Geschichtsvereins XV, 1879, 106-42) and to his realization that the religious brotherhoods outside the church organizations had been given a completely false evaluation in traditional presentations of church history.

In succession Keller published his epoch-making writings, vindicating Anabaptism, and giving the initial impetus to an entirely new judgment and to most zealous inquiries into this religious movement. In 1880 his Geschichte der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reiches zu Münster appeared; in 1882, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer (Hans Denk); in 1885, Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien; in 1886, Die Waldenser und die deutschen Bibelübersetzungen; in 1887, Zur Geschichte der altevangelischen Gemeinden (a lecture given in Berlin on April 20, 1887); in 1888, Johann von Staupitz und die Anfänge der Reformation. In addition to these he wrote a series of articles for the Mennonitische Blätter, 1883, 1885-90; for the Gemeindeblatt, 1885-89; and in the Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie.

He was an ardent exponent of the idea that there was a direct connection between the Waldenses and the Anabaptists (Gbl., 1886, 70), and that their principles, doctrines, and institutions continued to live in the Christian church from its beginnings through the centuries in brotherhoods which he named "altevangelische Brüdergemeinden" (q.v.; see also Menn. Bl., 1890, 113; Gbl., 1890, 85).

Keller was violently attacked. Nevertheless he continued undismayed on his way, which led him to a far-reaching syncretism. He had a vision of an ideal Christian brotherhood of humanity above the dogmatic ecclesiastical or materialistic, naturalistic view of the world. To bring about this brotherhood he won friends for it among the Baptists and Mennonites and other extra-church groups, including the Free Masons. On Oct. 10, 1892, he instigated the organization of the Comenius-Gesellschaft (q.v.), which published the Monatshefte der Comenius-Gesellschaft; in 1895 a pedagogical supplement was added, called Comeniusblätter für Volkserziehung. The former included a series of valuable informative articles and treatises from the past and present of Anabaptism (e.g., Monatshefte, 1897, 131-76, "Grundfragen der Reformationsgeschichte"; 1912, 115, "Zwei Jubiläen. Ein Beitrag zur religiösen Zeitgeschichte").

In 1897 Keller became a Mason. But his hope of finding in this organization fighting allies for his ideas was not fulfilled. Nevertheless he remained faithful to it. His prize-winning book, Die geistigen Grundlagen der Freimaurerei und das öffentliche

Leben (1911), and Die Freimaurerei (1914) in the Teubner Collection, Aus Natur und Geisteswelt, were unusually successful.

Ludwig Keller rendered the Mennonites a meritorious service by his historical research, which obligates them to lasting gratitude. Among the historians much influenced by him were not only the Mennonites John Horsch, Christian Neff, and Christian Hege, but also Karl Rembert (q.v.) and Friedrich Thudichum (q.v.). J. H. Kurtz pays the following tribute to Keller in his widely used Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (14th ed., 1906, Vol. II, 55): "It is Keller's achievement to have brought out into the forefront of scholarly consideration the great significance of Anabaptism in the history of the Christian spirit in the 16th century, and to have called emphatic attention to the rich religious literature and remarkable organizational activity of the Anabaptists as well as the primitive Christian elements in their movement." NEFF.

"Geisteskultur," Monatshefte der Comeniusgesellschaft, 1913, 78-86; Amalie Keller, "Ludwig Keller—Scholar with a Mission," Menn. Life VIII (October 1953) 159 f., 192; DB 1903, 151-63; 1911, 98-100; ML II, 480.

Keller, Ludwig, and the Mennonites. Ludwig Keller had significant relations with the German Mennonites and certain Mennonite scholars, and exerted a tangible influence upon them. Around 1880 the Mennonites in Germany were not very historically minded, and took the attitude more of the "Stillen im Lande" than feeling a mission to the society around them. In this situation Keller's book, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer, appeared in 1882, centering attention upon Hans Denk (q.v.). It was a real eye opener for Mennonites, and many were willing to accept Hans Denk (the "spiritual reformer") as the finest and most original expression of the "Anabaptist" genius. (Today scholarship has learned to make a distinction between the spiritualists such as Denk, and the regular Anabaptists.) Between 1882 and 1892 (when Keller founded the Comenius Gesellschaft) Keller sought closer contacts with Mennonites and tried to promote his idea of the "old evangelical brotherhood" among them. He began to publish articles of this nature in the Mennonitische Blätter beginning in 1883, and in the Gemeindeblatt in 1885. He also had personal contacts with German and Dutch Mennonite preachers whom he wanted to win over to his vision. In 1885-93 a lively correspondence developed between Keller and John Horsch (q.v.)—after 1887 in America—and in 1885-91 between Keller and Christian Neff (q.v.), as well as with other men of influence in the Mennonite church.

Keller's letters reveal much about his intentions. He claimed that "the best and purest tradition of Anabaptism" goes back to the period of 1517-34. Since there was no Anabaptist in the strict sense before 1525, this contention needs explanation. Keller equated the teachings of mystics and spiritual reformers with those of Anabaptists proper. Thus he included in his list of "early Anabaptists" men like Johann von Staupitz (Luther's superior in the monastery at Erfurt), Sigmund Salminger, Jacob Dachser, Christian Entfelder, and above all Hans Denk. They all taught a free semimystical and individualistic interpretation of the Scriptures (over against Luther's solid Biblicism and ecclesiasticism), but they had little to do with the essential idea of Anabaptism. Keller urged his Mennonite friends to study Denk, the Theologia Deutsch, also Tauler and other mystics. It is known that in those years the father of John Horsch published the Deutsche Theologie together with comments by Denk (1886), and John Horsch published Denk's Von der Wahren Liebe at Elkhart, 1888. The Mennonitische Blätter and the Gemeindeblatt published long excerpts from these authors, and so did the Herold der Wahrheit (1888-91) and the Kirche unterm Kreuz (1885-89) in America. W. Molenaar, a leader of the Berlin Mennonites, wrote to Keller in 1886, "We are definitely espousing your program but believe that the moment has not yet come for general action," which meant for the promotion of the idea that the Mennonite congregations should reconstitute themselves as an aggressive "old evangelical brotherhood."

Keller's letters to John Horsch are particularly revealing. Horsch was a young man full of enthusiasm and willing to risk money and more for the propagation of such ideas. At first the Gottesfreunde (among them the Theologia Deutsch had originated in the 15th century) attracted both Keller and Horsch more than the Anabaptists, but soon also the latter moved into the focus. In 1883 Joseph Beck (q.v.) had published his Geschichts-Bücher der Wiedertäufer in Österreich und Ungarn, which provided rich material for the student of Anabaptism. Keller also called attention indiscriminately to Sebastian Franck and Caspar Schwenckfeld. In spreading the ideas of all these men he saw the "German mission" of the Mennonites. Its goal should be the overcoming of prejudices among the Lutherans against Anabaptism, a goal eventually reached, to a large extent thanks to Keller's efforts.

When in 1887 young Horsch moved to Elkhart, Ind., the correspondence became even more intense. Keller hoped that Horsch could perhaps help in reshaping also the Mennonite church in America according to his ideas, but he warned Horsch to proceed slowly, with circumspection and greatest care. The Herold der Wahrheit of these years (1887-91) abounds in reprints of the above-named authors, together with reprints from Johannes Arndt, Matthias Claudius, Michael Hahn, and—at long last—also some genuine Anabaptists, taken from newly discovered Hutterite sources. Strangely enough, Menno Simons is somewhat neglected and his authority even opposed. (Keller: "By cleaving to Menno Simons the goal of the brotherhood has been narrowed down too much.") In 1891 John Horsch published his Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten, quite in line with Keller's ideas; Hans Denk appears here as the most important early spiritual leader of Anabaptism.

But then, all of a sudden this trend came to an end. Keller lost interest in making the Mennonite church the mouthpiece for his ideas, and turned to other pursuits (Christian humanism and Freemasonry). And so the correspondence stopped. The same was true in Germany: the Keller period was definitely over by 1893.

Looking back we may say that it is easier to understand the issues today than it was in the 1880's. Keller had been thinking of the Mennonites as an open society of inspired Christians, while the Mennonites understood themselves as a closed brotherhood with strict discipline. Keller, who was always a staunch individualist with some inclination toward mysticism, had very little appreciation for this type of church life, and his association with the Mennonites inevitably had to come to an end. And yet his idea of "old evangelical brotherhoods" was widely accepted even long after the 1880's. The Langnau-Emmental Swiss congregation accepted this name for their church and on the title page of P. M. Friesen's book on the Mennonites in Russia (1911) we meet this term again. It is still used now and then in Mennonite writings, and has, no doubt, also a grain of historic truth in it. (See Altevangelische Wehrlose Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden for a discussion of Keller's influence on the use of this term by Mennonites.) The Keller letters to John Horsch are preserved in the Goshen College Library. His letters to Christian Neff are preserved at the Weierhof. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "John Horsch and Ludwig Keller," MQR XXI (July 1947) 160 ff.; Elizabeth H. Bender, "The Letters of Ludwig Keller to John Horsch, 1885-1893," ibid., 175-204; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 257; ML II, 480.

Kell(n)er, Wenisch (Köhler), a Hutterite, was ordained in Moravia as a preacher in 1578, and as elder in 1580; in 1584 he and six other Brethren were sent out as missionaries; and on May 6, 1593, he died at Lewar (Levary) in Hungary. He is the author of the song, "Wach auf, ihr Kinder Gottes all" (Wolkan, Lieder, 233). In Gottmading near Schaffhausen he wrote letters to Matthias Binder (q.v.), Michael Veldthaler (q.v.), and Claus Braidl (q.v.), on Aug. 12 and 14, 1584, reporting on his work and success in the neighborhood of Zürich. NEFF.

Loserth, Communismus, 176 ff.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 319; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 388 et passim; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); Zieglschmid, Chronik, 501, 520, 567; ML II, 480.

Kelowna (B.C.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Canadian Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, was organized with 36 members on June 8, 1947, under the leadership of J. J. Unger as minister. The first meeting place was a private house, then a rented hall until 1948, when the new church 60 x 40 ft. was built. The 1953 membership was 72, with J. J. Unger still serving as pastor. Kelowna is an isolated congregation, located 200 miles east of the Fraser Valley churches, in the Okanagon Valley about 80 miles north of the Washington state border in a city of 10,000 population. The small congregation at Oliver, 70 miles south of Kelowna, in charge of J. J. Klassen, is a subsidiary of Kelowna. J.J.U.

Kemp, Franciscus Adriaan van der, was born May 4, 1752, of Dutch Reformed parents, at Kampen, Netherlands, and prepared for a military career. At the University of Groningen (1770-73) he heard lectures on the most varied subjects. In 1773 he entered the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam, and the next year became a member of the Mennonite church. He became a ministerial candidate in 1775 and served the congregations of Huizen 1775-77 and Leiden 1777-87. His effervescence and his radical ideas were the cause of many difficulties. Yet a severe illness made it apparent that a large proportion of his congregation was attached to him. But this affection grew cool as van der Kemp became more and more involved in politics, and threw all the force of his character into the cause of democracy on the side of the Patriot movement. In 1775 the Patriots sympathized with the Colonies in the American struggle for independence against England, and van der Kemp openly espoused their cause. He became a close friend of John Adams, the American commissioner in Holland 1780 ff. He published a number of sermons: Het gedrag van Israel en Rehabeam, ten spiegel van Volk en Vorst, followed by Staatkundige Aanmerkingen (Leiden, 1782), Elftal kerkelijke Redevoeringen (Leiden, 1782), Viertal Leerredenen, op Bedestonden gehouden (Leiden, 1783).

In 1785 he was granted a leave of absence to travel. In Wijk-bij-Duurstede he joined the secret military society Pro pace et bello and soon resigned his pastorate to become captain of a militia company. In June 1787 he was arrested in Amersfoort, and released in November on the condition that he leave the country.

On May 4, 1788, van der Kemp landed in New York. His reception by eminent Americans included an invitation by George Washington to Mount Vernon. He became a farmer, and acquired American citizenship. He lived for six years near Kingston, N.Y., and then established a home at Oneida Lake, and finally at Barneveld. He found old and new friends, and inner quiet. His love for preaching revived, his political fervor subsided. In 1803 he assisted in forming a union for church services in his home town, Olden Barneveld; Sunday school was held in his home.

He continued to write devotional and learned articles, using the English language from now on. Harvard awarded him the LL.D. degree. In 1817 he wrote an account of his romantic life for his only son. He died on Sept. 7, 1829. vdZ.

Helen Fairchild, Franciscus Adrian van der Kemp 1752-1829: An Autobiography (New York and London, 1903); Dictionary of American Biography XIX (N.Y., 1936); DB 1907, 99-151; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 953-58; Biogr. Wb. IV, 706-18; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de Kennis van het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden . . . te Leiden (Leiden, 1905); ML II, 481.

Kempe, Adriaan, b. about 1710 at Norden, d. 1779 at Medemblik, was baptized at Norden, Germany, on Feb. 13, 1729; in 1731-79 he was preacher of the United Frisian and Waterlander congregation at Medemblik, Dutch province of North Holland. In 1739 he was married to Cornelia Metschaart (Meschaert) of Hoorn. He published Jesus Christus de Paerl en Pronk van 't Geslachte der Menschen and seven other sermons (Medemblik, 1740). (Biogr. Wb. IV, 724; Ned. Patriciaat XVI, 218.) vdZ.

Kempen, a town (pop. 10,000) in the former Prussian Rhine Province, six miles west of Crefeld. Here the Anabaptists found adherents in the middle of the 16th century. Under Archbishop (of Cologne) Hermann, who had Protestant leanings, the authorities apparently did not concern themselves greatly about them, for, as the preacher Hardenberg reported to Theodor von Buchell, the privy councilor of the archbishop, they were quiet and orderly, and he hoped by indoctrination to win them; if they resisted he would use "other means," and that the Anabaptists threatened no danger. About 1550 many prominent families of this town were Anabaptists. Even some burgomasters of Kempen in 1560 and following years belonged to the Anabaptists. But from 1569 Bishop Salentin of Cologne gradually succeeded in suppressing Anabaptist influences in Kempen, though Mennonites were found in the town until after 1648.

Kempen and the adjacent Aldekerk (q.v.) were the source of the first Mennonite migration to Crefeld (1609). There had been even earlier connection with Crefeld. The pastors of Kempen, Anrat and Hüls, reported that an old preacher from Crefeld by the name of Wolter had appeared in their district; he had previously been the pastor at Odenkirchen, and had there adopted Anabaptist ideas. HEGE, VDZ.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, passim; Ernst Crous, "Von Täufern zu Mennoniten am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit IX (July 1956) 107; ML II, 481.

Kempen, Gerhard (Gerrit) von, an Anabaptist martyr who died at the stake at Wiesen (?) in 1550 "for the testimony of Jesus Christ." (Mart. Mir. D 99, E 497; ML II, 481.)

Kemper, Freule Christine de Bosch, b. at Amsterdam, Holland in 1840, and died May 12, 1924, at Amersfoort, daughter of Professor Jeronimo de Bosch Kemper and Maria Hulshoff, was baptized in 1861 by J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, then Mennonite pastor at Amsterdam. Soon after, in 1867, she broke with her idle, luxurious life to devote herself to the education of young women. In 1880 she moved from Amsterdam to Amersfoort, where she opened her house to all kinds of young women. Being very well-to-do she asked nothing for herself but was charitable to others. Like her sister Jeltje she was also a champion of women's rights, but she did not proclaim her ideas beyond her home circle. She bequeathed her stately residence to an old people's home and her other property to the "Christine-Stichting" (q.v.), a foundation, administered by Mennonite directors, for the improvement of the material condition of women. (DJ 1926, 21-33, with portrait.) VDZ.

Kempsville Amish Mennonite Church (Beachy Amish) is located a half mile northeast of Kempsville, Va., in the southeastern part of the state. An Old Order Amish community had been established here near the beginning of the present century by settlers, many of whom came from Somerset Co., Pa. In 1940 some of the later arrivals in the community led a movement to allow ownership of automobiles by members of the congregation. This produced a schism and the formation of the Kempsville church. After this event, most of the Old Order who did not join the progressive group moved out of the community. In 1955 the congregation had 150 members, with Jacob J. Hershberger and Ezra N. Troyer serving as ministers and Paul Brenneman as bishop. The congregation operates a parochial school, fully organized in 1946. A Conservative Mennonite church was organized here in 1952, with Simon Coblentz as bishop. Some 15 families left the community in 1953 to found a new congregation at Montezuma, Ga. M.G.

A. J. Beachy, "The Rise and Development of the Beachy Amish Mennonite Churches," MQR XXIX (April 1955) 118 ff.

Kempten, a Swabian town (pop. 40,000) in Bavaria, Germany, on the Iller River. In the Middle Ages it consisted of two towns, the old and the new. The former adopted the Reformation in 1527; the latter was the center of the Kempten district and of a Benedictine abbey, whose abbots had been princes of the empire since 1360.

In the middle of the 16th century Anabaptists were found here, for three decrees were passed against them dated Sept. 8, 1544, Sept. 8, 1551, and Sept. 7, 1562. The first points out that the "blind, offensive, and damned sect" of the Anabaptists is making inroads and growing, and commands the people to abstain from it and conduct themselves in accord with the old, true faith. Whoever was not willing to do so should sell his goods and leave Kempten, or be punished with life imprisonment or other penalty of property or body. The second adds that the imperial "recess" of Augsburg of Feb. 14, 1551, applies to them. The third mentions the imperial law of April 23, 1529, and stipulates that no special burial ground can be given the Anabaptists, who bury their dead in secret, that anyone dying outside the Catholic faith without confession or the sacrament should be buried only under the nearest gallows.

From these decrees it may be inferred that the Anabaptist movement in and around Kempten was strong and maintained itself for a long time. NEFF.

W. Koehler, "Zur Gesch. der Täufer im Stift Kempten," in Festschrift zum 70. Geburtstag von Dr. Christian Neff (Weierhof, 1933); ML II, 481.

Kengel, Benjamin (Beniam), a Hutterite, a tailor in Sobotiste, Hungary, left the brotherhood in June 1645, because he thought outward usages were not necessary to a Christian. He won a following, but after his death most of his adherents returned to the brotherhood. Against him Ehrenpreis (q.v.) wrote Antwort und Widerlegung der irrigen, verführerischen und falschen Meinung des Benjamin Kengels und seines Anhangs etlicher Articul. NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 630 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 841 ff.; ML II, 481 f.

Kennel, a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin. In 1759 a von Kennel from Reichenbach is named among the Anabaptists of Montbéliard, France. In 1940 the name was still found among the South German Mennonites, in the Frankfurt congregation. In 1955 there were still numerous Kennel families among the French Mennonites, including a preacher in Montbéliard and seven out of eight preachers in the Haute Marne congregation.

The Kennel family was represented in the Hessian Mennonite congregation in Butler Co., Ohio. Peter Kennel served as a minister in the Apostolic Mennonite Church (GCM), Butler County, 1847-96. He came to America with his parents in 1830. John Kennel settled in Woodford Co., Ill., in 1833. John J. Kennel, who was ordained a minister in the Central Conference Mennonite Church in Tazewell Co., Ill., in 1912, was a nephew of Peter Kennel of Butler Co., Ohio. The Linn Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Roanoke, Ill., is sometimes known as the Kennel church because Joseph J. Kennel served as its minister for a number of years and John Kennel as its bishop.

Among the early settlers in the Wellesley Amish Mennonite congregation of Ontario was Christian Kennel. Peter Kennel migrated from France to Ontario in 1881, and later moved to Milford, Neb. In 1905 he was ordained as minister of Salem (MC) at Shickley, Neb. In 1913 he was ordained bishop and served in that office until his death in 1923. His son Peter Kennel, Jr., is now bishop of this church, and a grandson, Leroy Kennel, is pastor of the Lombard Mennonite Church in a western suburb of Chicago. The Kennel family has also been prominent in the Amish Mennonite community of eastern Pennsylvania. John A. Kennel is a bishop in the Millwood congregation at Gap, Pa. At the present time, five ministers with the Kennel family name are serving Mennonite (MC) churches in eastern Pennsylvania. M.G.

Kent County, Del., Old Order Amish Mennonite settlement consists of four districts having about 250 members, located west of Dover. Amish families from various states moved to Kent County. The first to come were the families of Bishop David Y. Miller and Jacob K. Miller in 1915. Others came from Geauga Co., Ohio, Oscoda Co., Mich., Lancaster Co., Pa., Somerset Co., Pa., and Ford Co., Kan. The original settlement was divided into two districts in 1928, and the west district of the original settlement was divided in 1933. In 1946 several Byler families with others consisting of about 18 families moved to Catlett, Faquier Co., Va. In 1947 a more progressive congregation was organized under the leadership of Bishop Seth Byler of Stark Co., Ohio. The present (1956) bishops are John D. Hochstetler, D. Leroy Nissley, Eli S. Miller, and Simon W. Byler. J.A.H.

Kent County, located in southern Michigan and including the city of Grand Rapids, has been the seat of two Mennonite (MC) churches, Caledonia (q.v.) and Bowne (q.v.). The Caledonia settlement was located some 12 miles west of the Bowne settlement. The first settlers in the Caledonia area came in 1864. Those locating at Caledonia came partly from Ontario, and partly from such states as Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. The first meetinghouse was erected in 1865 and replaced by another in 1881; the latter burned down in 1923. Only the cemetery now remains to mark the location of the building. The congregation seemed to prosper at first, there being 40 members at Caledonia by 1867. But internal differences over religious practice led to the weakening of the congregation and its ultimate death by 1910. The Bowne settlers located in Kent County in 1865, coming from Somerset Co., Pa., and from Ontario. The first meetinghouse was a log structure and was erected jointly by the Church of the Brethren and the Mennonites (MC) about 1870, being used for seven years on alternate Sundays by the two groups, after which the Brethren built their own separate house of worship. The present building of the Bowne congregation (also called Elmdale) was erected in 1901. The present membership (1956) of the congregation is 104. J.C.W.

Kent, Johanna of, an Anabaptist martyr: see Boucher, Jane.

Kentucky is one of the southern states, bounding Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio on their southern borders. Until recently (1943) Mennonites have by-passed the state, very likely because the chief routes of Mennonite westward migration lay north of the Ohio River. There are now eleven Mennonite missions and churches in the state with a total membership of 143. Seven of these are churches and missions of the Mennonite Church (MC) with a membership of 90, and three of the Conservative Mennonite Church, with a membership of 53. These churches are located in two areas of the state. Morgantown, with a membership of seven, is located in the west central part of the state, and is sponsored by the Berea Mennonite Church (MC) of Montgomery, Ind. The other nine stations are located in the eastern part of the state. Teges and Wildcat, with 25 and 37 members respectively, situated south of Booneville, are sponsored by the Pike Mennonite Church (MC), Elida, Ohio. Approximately 15 miles northeast are the three Conservative Mennonite stations named Turners Creek, Bowlings Creek, and Gays Creek, with memberships of 25, 8, and 11. Northeast of these stations, and near Highway 15, southeast of Jackson are the two mission stations Caney Creek and Talcum, the latter with four members. The first is sponsored by the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite District Mission Board (MC) and the latter by the Clinton Frame Mennonite Church (MC), Goshen, Ind. Approximately 30 miles northeast of Jackson are two Mennonite missions sponsored by the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC). These are Crockett and Relief, with seven and eleven members. The first of the ten missions was Relief, established in 1943. It was followed by Turners Creek in 1946, Bowlings Creek in 1947, and Wildcat and Crockett in 1949. The later stations were begun in 1950-52. Big Branch, near Talcum, was added in 1956. M.G.

Keppel (Kepfel, a parish in the duchy of Berg, Germany), Wilhelm von, an early Anabaptist, a former Catholic priest. He may have been a preacher (ML II, 482), but there is no proof for this assertion, nor is there information as to the time of his uniting with the Anabaptist congregation. While he was a member he worked at his trade of buckle-making (Krampenmacher) in the duchy of Berg, now in the Rhine-Wupper district. In 1561 he was arrested ("a priest, Wilhelm Keppel by name") with a large number of the Anabaptist congregation of Cologne (q.v.). Only those were punished who refused to recant. Wilhelm von Keppel was arrested the second time in 1562, and must therefore have been released after the first arrest, which indicates that he had recanted. After his second arrest he was imprisoned in one of the towers of Cologne, where he was subjected to torture before he was transferred to the dungeon in September 1562, which was the prison of the Supreme Court of Cologne. He was placed into a cell already occupied by the Anabaptist Georg Friesen (q.v.). Both were tortured here in an attempt to convince them of the correctness of infant baptism. In his cross-examination Wilhelm declared that "he did not regard the ceremonies of the church as anything, considered the Catholic worship useless, the devil was the teacher of the Catholics, only God's Word, and by no means the doctrines of men should be obeyed." But neither the rack, threats, nor any other attempts at conversion induced him or Georg Friesen to recant, and they were consequently sentenced to death by drowning. After the waters of the Rhine had closed over Georg Friesen, Wilhelm declared himself willing to recant. Thereupon he was banished from the city and region (Turmbuch No. 2, p. 98; Ennen, 815, note 2): "Wilhelm Krampenmacher of Monheim banished and condemned by the Grefen and bailiffs of the city and the archbishopric of Cologne; because he would be submerged in a boat with Georg, and feared death, he said that he would desist from his error."

Their imprisonment and the martyrdom of Friesen Keppel later described in a song which is found in the Ausbund (No. 22, p. 131 ff.), but which is true to fact only in so far as it refers to Georg Friesen, since he denies the recantation he made. Another account of these men is found in the Martyrs' Mirror, which in some respects contradicts the account given in the poem. The reason for the errors in the reports is not yet clear.

In the song Wilhelm von Keppel closes with admonitions to his brethren and sisters, poses as their defender, who "has fought with lions wild and with wolves" (stanza 34), and in stanza 35 he cries out to them—ambiguously—"Therefore, dear brethren and sisters mine, prepare yourselves with diligence, that you may also be qualified to fight with such a foe." Was he alluding to the qualifications of Georg Friesen or his own? Why did he not rather maintain a humble silence? A.R.

Turmbücher (found in the Historical Archives of the City of Cologne) No. 2, pp. 59 and 98; No. 5, p. 48; Leonhard Ennen, Geschichte der Stadt Köln IV (Cologne and Neuss, 1875) 814 f.; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied, 817 ff.; Wolkan, Lieder, 101; Mart. Mir. D 295, E 661; ML II, 482.

Kerber (Körber, Kerwer, Körffer), a Mennonite family of West Prussia, Germany, recorded as early as 1586. Especially in the Montau-Gruppe (q.v.) and Kazun (q.v.) congregations they were found from the early 17th century. Steffen Kerber was (1737) a preacher of the Montau Frisian (sometimes also called Waterlander) congregation. Another Steffen Kerber (1734-1800) served this congregation as preacher from 1767 and as elder from 1781; Peter Kerber (1782-1821) served as preacher from 1801 and as elder from 1814; another Peter Kerber as preacher from 1801. Others served as deacons. They were apparently all farmers. In 1940 there were 42 bearers of the name in East Germany. The name has not spread into other countries. C.K.

L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe, ein Gedenkblatt (Montau, 1918) 83-89; Reimer, Familiennamen, 111.

Kerbert, a Mennonite family, formery found at Koog aan de Zaan, Dutch province of North Holland. Jan Kerbert, b. 1820 at Koog, d. April 11, 1890, at Arnhem, studied at the Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam and thereupon served as Mennonite pastor at Rottevalle 1845-46, Hoorn 1846-67, and Zwolle 1867-84, retiring in 1884. Coenraad Kerbert (Koog, 1816-57), a physician in his home town, was a noted botanist. vdZ.

Kerckhove, van de (Kerhoven), a Mennonite family from Flanders which emigrated to the Netherlands. One branch moved to Haarlem as early as about 1590 and became related by marriage to other Mennonite families such as Meevels, Teyler, and Snep. Another branch settled about 1630 near Aardenburg in Dutch Zealand Flanders. Here Tanneken van den Kerckhove was married about 1632 to Christoffel Hebberecht (q.v.). Both branches have died out. vdZ.

Kerkgezangen, Christelijke, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, published at Haarlem, Holland, in 1851 and used by the Haarlem congregation and a few others. It contains 176 hymns with notes, mostly borrowed from other Mennonite hymnals. This hymnbook, commonly called Oude Haarlemsche Bundel, was in use at Haarlem until 1895, when it was replaced by the Doopsgezinde Liederen (q.v.). (DB 1861, 159 f.; 1865, 76 ff., 91 ff.) vdZ.

Kern, Ruepel: see Gellner, Rupp.

Kerssenbroick, Hermann von (b. ca. 1520), attended the cathedral school in Münster in 1533, and remained there until the Anabaptist kingdom was set up there; and after the city had been taken he returned to the same school. He lived a while in Cologne and Hamm; for 25 years (1550-75) he was rector of the cathedral school at Münster, and died July 5, 1585, as rector of the cathedral school at Paderborn. His two books, Belli Monasteriensis contra anabaptistica monstra gesti descriptio, auctor Hermanno a Kerssenbroick (Cologne, 1545), and Anabaptistici furoris Monasterium inclitam Westphaliae metropolim evertentis historica narratio, autore Hermanno a Kerssenbroick, are source materials for Anabaptist history in Münster.

The former is a lengthy poem in hexameters, of no value in content, which he himself rejected as immature in his later years; the latter of greater importance, though not faultless critically, since it was written from the Catholic point of view and is prejudiced. In 1573 it was given for publication to the Cologne printery of Gervinus Calenius, but the Münster city council prohibited its publication. The council could, however, not carry out its intention to suppress it, for manuscript copies were already in the hands of several persons. In 1730 and 1750 an inadequate edition was printed. A German translation published in 1771 (2nd ed. 1881) is full of errors (Löffler). In 1900 H. Detmer (q.v.) published a thorough edition of the work in two volumes at Münster (Cornelius, p. xxiv and p. xxix). In 1929 the Aschendorf publishers at Münster printed another edition in German translation based on a different manuscript copy, with an introduction by S. P. Widmann. NEFF.

C. A. Cornelius, Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster II (Münster, 1853); C. Löffler, Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster . . . (Jena, 1923); H. Detmer, Hermann von Kerssenbroch's Leben und Schriften (Münster, 1900); ML II, 483 f.

Kesselflicker (Kesselbusser, Ketelbueter), Johannes, a deacon and active leader of the Anabaptist congregation (Christliche Brüder) at Maastricht, Netherlands, baptized in 1541 by Leonhard Fälber (q.v.), was haled several times (1559, 1566) before the court in Jülich. He testified that he did not attend the state church services because idolatry was practiced there, that he held only baptism on confession of faith to be true baptism, the communion only a symbol. (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 433, 450.)
H.S.B.

Kesselsdorf (also Gesselsdorf, Czech, Kostolna), a village in Slovakia (formerly Hungary) between Tyrnau (Trnava) and Trencin (Trentschin). Here the Hutterian Brethren began a Bruderhof in 1622, after they had been expelled from Moravia, on the estate of the manorial lord Hans Palffy (Wolkan, 572). Most of the Brethren there came from the Bruderhof Gostal (q.v.), Moravia. During the Thirty Years' War, the Brethren had much to suffer also in Slovakia; in 1626 the Kesselsdorf Bruderhof was plundered and partially destroyed (Wolkan, 604; Beck, 431). Later Turkish Wars again brought misery to this Bruderhof: on Sept. 6, 1665, Turkish troops plundered and destroyed it to a large extent. Forty-six persons were either killed or dragged away. One sister, Susanna, returned after 15 years of imprisonment in Turkey, after the Brethren had paid a ransom of 150 guilders (Beck, 532). The survivors were lodged for over a year in a near-by castle, during which time 26 brethren died. On Aug. 8, 1665, Count Nicolas Palffy gave them his ruined house at Schatmansdorf near Bratislava (Beck, 520).

During the era of the Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) Kesselsdorf reached a certain fame. It was here that a great number of written sermons and sermon-collections were drawn up (see Sermons, Hutterite). It was almost as if Kesselsdorf had been made a sort of official center of preaching. Here the preachers H. F. Küntsche (q.v., d. 1659), Andreas Binder (d. 1662), Michel Mildner (d. 1660), and Tobias Bersch (q.v., d. 1701) were active. There may have been several other preachers, whose names are not given. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch contains on pp. 204-14 and 218-21 excerpts from 26 such sermons, usually introduced as "by a pious and inspired teacher at Gesselsdorf." No names are given, partly on purpose to stress the collective nature of this material, and partly because the authors were actually not known. (Hutterite literature in general is to a large extent anonymous.) But the frequent reference to Kesselsdorf is at least significant. Apparently these men were supported by the bishop Ehrenpreis who wanted to create henceforth an official tradition as to the how and what to preach. It so happened that a number of very good preachers were in residence at Kesselsdorf, and thus this new type of devotional literature came into being. It is still used today; in fact it represents more than anything else present-day Hutterite piety. HEGE, R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; ML II, 484.

Kessler, Johannes (1502-74), reformer and chronicler of St. Gall, Switzerland. On his way to the University of Wittenberg at the inn "To the Black Bear" in Jena he met Martin Luther, who was returning from the Wartburg disguised as a knight. Upon his return to St. Gall, Kessler conducted Bible study classes, which were attended by the Anabaptists. A difference arose between them on the question of infant baptism, which finally led to a division. Kessler is the author of the Sabbata, a cultural and church history, in which he treats the Anabaptists with gratifying objectivity, though not with full understanding. It was published in 1866-68, edited by Ernst Götzinger, and in 1902 by Emil Egli and Rudolph Schoch. A new edition appeared in 1945 (Zollikofer, St. Gall). (ML II, 484.)
NEFF.

Kessler, Moritz, an Anabaptist martyr, is no doubt identical with "a tinker from the Emmental" in Switzerland. Moritz was a native of Sumiswald, and is frequently mentioned in the court records of the Emmental. On Oct. 12, 1532, he promised to desist from Anabaptism, but did not keep his promise, and was expelled with his family in February 1533 for perjury. Two years later he returned to Bern and was put to death in the first half of 1535. The record of the wages paid the sexton uses the words, "to bury Kessler, who was executed." Kessler's wife returned to the state church and had her child baptized on April 1, 1535. But later she again joined the Anabaptists and was banished with her children. HEGE.

Th. de Quervain, Kirchliche und soziale Zustände in Bern unmittelbar nach der Einführung der Reformation (Bern, 1906); Mart. Mir. E 1129; P. Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 45, 117, No. 177; ML II, 484.

Kestenholz: see Chatenois.

Ketelaer, Jan Geers, an Anbaptist martyr: see Jan Geertsz.

Ketelbueter, a family in Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, many members of which were active in early Anabaptism. The most prominent of them was Lenart (Leonard, Lentgen) Ketelbueter, who was baptized in September 1534 by Henric Rol (q.v.) and was a deacon of the Maastricht congregation. His son Simon was also an Anabaptist. In early 1535, when persecution arose in Maastricht, Lenart fled from Maastricht to Antwerp with a number of members of the congregation, among whom were a daughter and his son Jan, who was baptized at Antwerp. Here too Lenart was active, but soon all trace of him is lost. Lenart's wife

Anna was in prison at Maastricht in 1537; she was released, apparently because she had recanted. Another member of this family was Jan Ketelbueter, Lenart's brother, in whose home at Maastricht the Anabaptists sometimes met in 1534. Ruth Ketelbueter was also a deacon at Maastricht. On Jan. 28, 1535, he was arrested with other members of the congregation; he denied his faith and was beheaded on Feb. 13, 1535. His wife, also an Anabaptist, was put to death in 1539 at Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland. Lysken Ketelbueter, a sister of Lenart and Jan, also a member of the congregation, had been Henric Rol's housekeeper; in the records it is suggested that she was Rol's wife.

Thoenis Ketelbueter and his wife of Maastricht still adhered to Anabaptism in 1545, when the congregation had been wiped out. Also a Jacob Ketelbueter is named as an Anabaptist. Probably Johann Kesselflicker (Ketelbueter), who was baptized in 1541 by Leonard Fälber (q.v.), also belonged to this family. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) passim, see Index; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index; DB 1917, 120, Nos. 110-11.

Kettler, Johann Dietrich, a magistrate at Norden, East Friesland, Germany, who successfully defended the Mennonites in a debate before the imperial court at Vienna in 1705. Five years later the East Frisian government asked him for a "detailed report" on another dispute. Thereupon he drew up a detailed account covering 48 folio pages, which is of historical value. (Menn. Bl., 1906, 21; ML II, 484.) NEFF.

Kettner, Friedrich Gottlieb (1670-1739), a Lutheran theologian. During his last years he was the second pastor at St. John's in Magdeburg, Prussia, Germany. As praeses, with Karl Gottlob Zeidler as respondens, according to contemporary academic custom, he treated the life, doctrine, and writings of Menno Simons, as well as the confessions and teachings, diffusion, and customs of his followers, after a brief reference to Müntzer and Münster (in the series Lipsiae, literis Christiani Scholvinii), titled Historiam Mennonis ejusque asseclarum (1696). (ML II, 485.) E.C.

Ketzer-Historie and Ketzer-Lexikon. The 16th century produced a special literary type, the "Catalog of heretics," created out of the utmost hostility against all non-orthodox, primarily non-Catholic Christian groups (including the Lutherans and Reformed). These often voluminous and most uncritical enumerations of heretics were intended to fight all those stigmatized as heretics and if possible to eradicate them. The public should be warned, and to dramatize the danger, the encyclopedic technique of listing all the hundreds of "false" teachers and "damnable" groups of heretics was used. One should remember that liberty of conscience (q.v.) and toleration were yet generally unknown ideas, abhorred and considered as being against all common sense.

Only a few exceptions to this attitude are known: a few humanists (like Sebastiano Castellio), then the Anabaptists whose idea of a believers' church presupposed voluntarism and a free decision of each individual, and finally the lonely figure of Sebastian Franck, the "spiritual reformer," whose Chronica, Zeytbuch und Geschichtsbibel (q.v., 1531) for the first time dared to justify, if not actually to glorify, the otherwise greatly slandered "heretics" as persons who genuinely sought and found their own answer in matters of theology and doctrine. The intolerance of the century, however, prevailed and the heretics were persecuted all the same.

This spirit or attitude changed altogether toward the end of the 17th century, in the period commonly called the "age of reason" or from the point of view of church history the "age of Pietism" (q.v.). Christianity now became a matter of subjective experience (Innerlichkeit) while all questions of doctrine were submitted to a rational scrutiny and considered of secondary significance. Thus the picture changes almost to the opposite of the earlier century. Rationalists and pietists alike devaluate orthodoxy (and with it the "traditionalist" viewpoint of the church, e.g., the position of a Luther or Calvin), and discover so to speak the particular attraction of all sectarians, medieval and modern, and vindicate the "heretics" as the true orthodox (i.e., right believers), and vice versa.

The man who more than anyone else achieved this change of historical viewpoint is Gottfried Arnold (q.v.), mainly through his justly renowned Unpartheyische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie (Frankfurt, 1699). Erich Seeberg devoted a 600-page study to this book (see Bibliography) in which he traces the major roots of this historical viewpoint or historical evaluation. They are in the main threefold: (a) humanistic-rationalistic (example, Castellio), (b) legalistic: natural-law school (example, Grotius), and (c) mysticism and mystical theology (example, Jacob Böhme). Arnold himself stands halfway between mystical theology and Pietism, the religion of subjectivity. All these trends have one trait in common: the idea that the Church has fallen ever since Emperor Constantine became the very patron of the church in A.D. 312 or 313. Seeberg contraposes the "idea of tradition" (both in Catholicism and Protestant orthodoxy) to that of the "Fall" (Verfallsidee) of all sectarians, spiritual reformers, and the three afore-mentioned groups. According to the latter interpretation of church history, the "heretics" are the true representatives of the church of the spirit, who continue the genius of both Jesus Christ Himself and the apostles, but they are persecuted by the representatives of the "Anti-Christ," be they officials of the Roman or of the new Protestant state churches. Here the idea of vindication of what in recent times has often been called "the Left Wing of the Reformation" is the great theme of rewriting the history of the church. Like Jacob Böhme, Arnold considers as the "true heretics" not the poor sectarians but all those whom he calls "the non-regenerated nominal Christians" (Seeberg, 391). Arnold characterizes his own historiography by the new term unpartheyisch, that is non-partisan, by which he means the direct outlook at the Master Jesus Christ Himself, not through the eyes of any theological faction but straight through the eyes of the "pure spirit" as it is experienced in the rebirth of the soul. That Arnold actually was anything but "non-partisan" in his writing needs hardly to be mentioned. His sympathies lie clearly with the "Left-Wing" people, the Anabaptists and related groups.

There is of course no dependency of Arnold upon Franck, but we might agree with Seeberg's remark that one cannot help feeling "as if Arnold stretches out his hand to his lonely brother in the spirit across a period of one century and a half" (Seeberg, 517). Arnold's technique in writing his Ketzer-Historie "unpartheyisch" is to quote profusely from the writing of all "heretics," including the Anabaptists, thus letting them plead for themselves, and paying little attention to the usually cited opinions and reports of the official churchmen who naturally were biased against all these nonconformists. The fact that the book by Johann Heinrich Otte (q.v.) or Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672), had been published not long before might point to the renewed interest in Anabaptist source publications and their general evaluation. Arnold got his material, however, from many different sources, and one is amazed how much factual knowledge was available for the searching scholar already at the end of the 17th century; it needed but to be read with a friendly understanding.

Only as a footnote to this discussion on Arnold it should also be remarked here that Arnold's famous contemporary, Christian Thomasius, jurist and philosopher, in many regards depended on Arnold. Otherwise a lover of the "natural-law" idea, he published in 1697 a tract with the characteristic title, Ob Ketzerey ein strafbares Verbrechen sey, quite in line with Arnold's position, namely, that heresy is no crime at all but the personal right of each individual, upon which no government should infringe.

After Arnold this literary type of Ketzer-Historie flourished for almost a century, but the spirit of the 18th century changed the emphasis again, this time in favor of greater "objectivity" (not yet present in Arnold) and historical relativism. The good church historian, thus the opinion now runs, should not judge at all but collect and in a matter-of-fact fashion present the sources and facts just as they are. Needless to say that in this "age of enlightenment" the appreciation for the sectarians, above all for the "primitive-Christian" Anabaptists, was rather poor and inadequate. But the same was also true for the understanding by orthodoxy. In any case, at long last the term Ketzer lost its sting and received more the character of a technical term (somewhat like today's term "Left Wing of the Reformation"). But it should also be stressed that all the authors presently to be quoted were equally opposed to both the defenders and the accusers of the "heretics." In no case can they be called their friends or sympathizers as Arnold and some of his friends had been.

Here is the list of books related to this type of church-historiography:

(1) Anonymous: Gottfried Arnold, Fortsetzung und Erläuterung der Unpartheyischen Kirchen- und Ketzer Historie, Frankfurt, 1715, i.e., vol. II, part 3, and vol. III (also new editions 1729 and 1740). (Arnold had died in 1714.)

(2) Johann Georg Walch, Historische und Theologische Einleitung in die Religions-Streitigkeiten, welche sonderlich ausser der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche entstanden. 5 vv., 1724-36 (some of the volumes saw a 3rd edition).

(3) Johann Lorentz von Mosheim, (a) Versuch einer unpartheyischen und gründlichen Ketzergeschichte (Helmstädt, 1746, 2nd ed. 1748), treating only the history of the Ophites and the Apostel-Brüder, and

(b) Anderweitiger Versuch einer vollständigen und unpartheyischen Ketzergeschichte (Helmstädt, 1748), treating exclusively the history of Servetus in great detail.

(4) Johann Conrad Füsslin, (a) Neue und unpartheyische Kirchen und Ketzer Historie der Mittleren Zeit. 3 vv. (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1770-74) and

(b) Beyträge zur . . . Kirchen . . . Geschichte des Schweitzerlandes. 5 vv. (Zürich, 1741-53). Its subtitle states: Enthaltende authentische bishero zum theil ungedruckte, zum theil gantz rare Urkunden . . . darinnen die Zwistigkeiten der Römisch-Catholischen, der Lutheraner, und der Reformirten, wie auch der Wiedertäuffer und anderer Sectierer . . . an den Tag gelegt werden—a truly nonpartisan program.

To this list of objective Ketzer-Historien belong also several more encyclopedic works of that kind and period, namely,

(1) John M. Mehlig, Historisches Kirchen- und Ketzerlexicon, 2 vv. (Chemnitz, 1758)

(2) J. G. H., Compendieuses Kirchen- und Ketzer-Lexicon (Schneeberg, 1733, 1734, 1744, and 1756). A fifth edition came out in 1789 at Stendal under the title, Kurtzgefasstes Kirchen- und Ketzer-Lexicon. The initials J. G. H. stand for Johann Gottfried Hering (M. Holtzmann, Deutsches Anonymen Lexikon VI, 1911, No. 6159). Either out of modesty or for the fun of anonymity, J. G. H. disclaims any credit for the compilation of this seemingly popular encyclopedia; he claims only to be the editor concerned with the publication as such. (ML II, 496, erroneously gives 1731 as the date of the first edition, and takes Schneeberg, the place of publication, for the name of the editor.)

(3) Ketzer-Lexicon, oder: geschichtliche Darstellung der Irrlehren, Spaltungen und sonderbaren Meinungen im Christenthume . . ., translated from the French of V. de Perrodil and edited by Peter Fritz (3 vols., Würzburg, 1828-29), had the French title, Memoires pour servir à l'histoire des égarements de l'esprit humain par raport à la religion chrétienne: on Dictionnaire des Hérésies, des Erreurs et des schismes . . . (Paris, 1764). The first part of this encyclopedia deals with the "heresies" from the beginning of the church to the 16th century. The second part treats all "heresies" in an alphabetical order. Among them are found the Anabaptists (Vol. II, pp. 67-90), Mennonites, Carlstadt, Müntzer, etc. The presentation is biased and from a Catholic point of view.

(4) Ketzer-Lexicon . . . (Würzburg, 1828) is an alphabetical treatment in three volumes of all groups which had separated from the main body of the Catholic Church throughout the centuries. It first appeared in the French language and was translated into German by Peter Fritz. The treatment is from a Catholic point of view and includes the Anabaptist and Mennonite groups.

Again as in the case of church historiography also these volumes represent the complete reversal of the spirit of the "Ketzer-Catalogs" of former centuries. Now a sort of curiosity prevails; one just wants to get information about these strange outsiders and their peculiarities. That the general theme of the "Fall of Christianity" since Constantine found sympathetic ears in this century may be easily understood.

This spirit, however, did not continue for too long. With the coming of the period commonly called "Romanticism," the pendulum swings again in the opposite direction. Traditionalism and orthodoxy become dominant again, and with them that kind of church historiography which condemns (and even slanders) sectarianism, and in particular Anabaptism. When one hundred years later (20th century) a more sober viewpoint eventually succeeded, the old term Ketzer was dropped altogether. The book by Walter Nigg, Das Buch der Ketzer (Zürich, 1949), is too broadly conceived to be of value for the present discussion. R.F.

Walther Köhler, "Kirchengeschichtsschreibung" and "Philosophie der Kirchengeschichte" in RGG III (1929) with ample bibliography; Erich Seeberg, Gottfried Arnold, die Wissenschaft und Mystik seiner Zeit, Studien zur Histographie und zur Mystik (Meerane i. Sa., 1923) a work of outstanding value; E. Troeltsch, Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1930, in particular p. 788), a volume which emphasizes the idea of natural law in relation to the judgment concerning the heretics; likewise also the several writings by Wilhelm Dilthey (not available in English); R. Friedmann, "Conception of the Anabaptists," Church History IX (1940), in particular 349; also Roland H. Bainton, "The Left Wing of the Reformation," Journal of Religion XXI (1941) 124-34; Horst Quiring, article "Mennonisten-Lexikon," ML III, 95; for the 16th-century heretic-catalogues see also Henry DeWind, "A Sixteenth Century Report on the Religious Conditions in Moravia," in MQR XXVIII (1955).

Keulen, Pieter van: see Peter van Coelen.

Keurlis, Pieter, one of the first German immigrants to America (13 families from Crefeld), who landed in Pennsylvania on Oct. 6, 1683, and founded Germantown. He acquired 200 acres of land from J. Telner (q.v.), and was the first German bartender in America. He was a Crefeld Quaker, formerly a Mennonite.

Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940); W. J. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore, 1935) 231; ML II, 486.

Keuter, Albert, b. Jan. 7, 1892, at Blokzijl, Dutch province of Overijssel, d. March 10, 1945, at the concentration camp of Bergen-Belsen, Germany. He studied theology at the University and the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam and served as pastor in the Mennonite congregations of Oost- and West-Graftdijk 1917-20, Twisk and Medemblik 1920-25, Akkrum 1925-28, and The Hague 1928 until Jan. 4, 1944, on which date he was arrested by the German Nazi officials, the Netherlands then being occupied by the Germans. It was his Christian conviction that he should fight the pseudo-religious ideas of National Socialism and support the victims of Hitlerism in the Netherlands. After his arrest he was at first imprisoned at Scheveningen near The Hague, then at Vught, Dutch province of North Brabant, where he found his oldest son, who had been arrested at Amsterdam; in September 1944 he was transported to the camp of Heinkel in Germany, where he for some time shared his bunk with A. du Croix, Mennonite pastor of Winschoten and also imprisoned by the Germans; later on he was transported to a camp near Sachsenhausen and finally to Bergen-Belsen, where he died five days after his son. Like a true Christian he was a blessing even in prison; when it was possible he preached or comforted his fellow prisoners. The strong faith and the cordial friendliness of this "modern martyr" remain in grateful memory of many members of The Hague congregation. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Een dader des Woords (Amsterdam, n.d.-1946); idem, "Laat Uw werk aan Uwe knechten gezien worden," memorial service, held in the Mennonite church of The Hague, July 1, 1945 (The Hague, 1945)

Keyn, Antony: see Keim, Anthoni.

Keyser, a Mennonite family name in the Netherlands. According to a Dutch family tradition the relatives of Leonhard Kaiser (q.v.), a Lutheran martyr (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously lists him among the Anabaptists), burned at the stake in 1527 at Schärding, Austria, moved from Austria to the Netherlands, where they spelled their family name "Keyser." In Holland they joined the Anabaptists. The tradition of the Austrian ancestry of the Dutch Keyser family, however, is not very likely true. Keyser is a rather common Dutch family name, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite.

At Amsterdam the Keysers were manufacturers and businessmen. Mattheus Keyser, a member of the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam, had some disagreement with Jan Theunisz (q.v.) in 1612, and in 1613 he and some others left the Waterlander group of the Bevredigden (q.v.) to join the Afgedeelden (q.v.). Another Keyser of Amsterdam, Dirk Gerritsz Keyser was married to a daughter of Tobias Govertsz van de Wyngaert (q.v.), preacher of the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam, one of the Amsterdam representatives to sign the Dordrecht Confession of 1632. Dirck Keyser, b. 1635, d. Nov. 30, 1714, the oldest son of Dirk Gerritsz, emigrated from Amsterdam, where he was a silk merchant, to Pennsylvania in 1688 and was an active member of the Germantown Mennonite congregation. His son, Peter Keyser, who came with his father to America, left the Mennonite Church in 1719 to join the Dunkards (q.v.).

As early as 1534 Obbe Philips (q.v.) administered baptism in the house of a broker, called de Keyser(e) at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, and in 1539 Arent Jacobssen Keyser (q.v.), of De Rijp, was drowned at Monnikendam in the Dutch province of North Holland. Since the 16th century the family name of Keyser (Keyzer) is very common on the Dutch island of Texel, all being Mennonites; Albert Dirksz Keyser was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation of Burg on the island of Texel 1713-55, succeeding his father, Dirk Pietersz Keyser, while many members of this family served here as deacons. Albert Pieters Keyzer (Keyser) (d. 1731) was preacher of the Frisian congregation of Wieringen, province of North Holland 1690-1700; Dirk Cornelisz Keyser was preacher of the Frisian congregation of Langedijk and Koedijk in the province of North Holland 1723-ca. 68, and his brother Willem Cornelisz Keyser was preacher in the same congregation 1727-d. 60, and Dirk Keyser in the early 18th century was a preacher of the Frisian congregation of Wormerveer. S. L. Keyser of Amsterdam, a descendant of this family, is now (1955) treasurer of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association. Hege, vdZ.

DB 1884, 74; 1891, 43, 57; Mellink, Wederdopers, 211; Naamlijst 1731 ff.; Chr. S. Keyser, The Keyser Family (Philadelphia, 1889); H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown, 1683-1708," MQR VII (October 1933) 227-30, especially 230-33; ML II, 451.

KfK: see Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten.

Kharkov, a province and city in the Ukraine, South Russia, area 12,000 square miles, population (1946) 2,500,000. According to the evaluation of 1909 there were in the province of Kharkov, especially in the district of Izyum, 1,386 settlers of Mennonite origin, divided in two groups of colonies, Naumenko and Zamoilovka. The valuation amounted to over 10 million rubles.

The Naumenko settlement (established in 1889) was grouped around the station of Barvenkovo of the Lozovaya-Rostov Railway. It included the villages of Grigoryevka, Petrovka, Elenovka, Vassilyevka, and the factory and mill owners in Barvenkovo. Their founders emigrated from the Mennonite Brethren group at Einlage (Kitchkas), and their villages formed a subsidiary of that church. An exception was Grigoryevka, which was composed of settlers from New York, the Chortitza daughter colony. The individual settlements had good school buildings, and Barvenkovo had a school of commerce supported principally by Mennonites. There were M.B. church buildings in Barvenkovo and Petrovka. Inadequate connections with the mother colony, together with economic deterioration caused some loss of religious and intellectual life. Sharp opposition to the local authorities and to the Mennonites at first had an unfavorable effect. The group had about 16,200 acres of land, besides important industrial establishments, and numbered over 600 souls.

The second group, Zamoilovka, near Bachmetyevka was founded by emigrants from the Molotschna and consisted of several villages founded in 1888 and after. They were Zamoilovka, Shostakovo, Novo-Stepeno, Ryskovo, etc. The villages were laid out on land which they had bought.

Besides these villages there were several settlements of German Lutherans (Elizavetovka near Barvenkovo, Ivanovka, etc.) and Baptists.

After the Russian Revolution there were Mennonite students attending the schools of higher learning in the city of Kharkov. After 1922 the Verband Bürger holländischer Herkunft (q.v.) had its headquarters in Kharkov. (ML I, 339.) C.B.

Kharkov, capital (pop. 833,000) of the Ukraine, Russia, a railroad and industrial center, founded in 1654, played a significant role for the Mennonites of the Ukraine. A number of small settlements were established in the province of Kharkov (q.v.). Some Mennonites found their way to the city before World War I. N. H. Hildebrandt was instructor of German in the high school of Kharkov (1898-1918). All of his children received a very good education. Käte was a physician. His son-in-law, J. L. Festa, was a tutor of many Mennonite teachers. The firm Braun and Epp, Mennonites originally from Tiegenhof, Danzig, had the agency of the Mercedes cars, etc., there. J. S. Ediger was a successful practicing homeopathic physician until 1917. Kharkov usually had a number of Mennonite students. Among them were Eliesabet Isaak and J. Dick, both of whom studied medicine.

After World War I, B. B. Janz and A. Dick resided for a time (1922- ?) in Kharkov. Both represented the Mennonites and were active in the Verband Bürger holländischer Herkunft (q.v.). In addition, Kharkov was always a stopping place for Mennonites traveling through. Evidently, however, the Mennonites did not organize a congregation here. Some attended the Lutheran Church and others worshiped with the Baptists. (A. H. Dueck, "Memorien," ms.) C.K.

Khartch, a village of the Mennonite settlement in the district of Khassav-Yurt (q.v.), Russia, in the Terek region, founded in 1901 on the left bank of the Sulak River, which flows into the Caspian Sea, and is crossed by the Talma Canal. It comprised 30 farms of 108 acres each. The inhabitants, who were immigrants from the Mennonite Molotschna settlement in Taurida, were engaged in agriculture and sheep-raising; a small mercantile business also developed. Khartch had a church in which the Mennonites of the western part of the colony met for services. The village supported an elementary school, which was attended exclusively by Mennonite children. (ML I, 339.) Hege.

Khassav-Yurt: see Terek Mennonite Settlement.

Kherson, a city (1939 pop. 97,186) in the Ukraine, Russia, on the right bank of the Dnieper, 15 miles before its opening into the Black Sea. The province of Kherson (1946) numbers 700,000 inhabitants and with its 10,000 square miles it was formerly one of the largest in the country, bounded by the Dnieper and Dniester rivers and the Black Sea. Its soil is fertile and adapted to wheat raising. The population was mixed, made up of immigrants, including a large number of Germans, who in 1804, 1808, 1817, and later established more than 150 villages, with 810,000 acres of land.

In 1871 the Molotschna Mennonite volosts, Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld, purchased over 54,000 acres situated north of the opening of the Vizan into the Ingulets, where they established the Mennonite daughter settlement of Zagradovka with 16 villages, which for the most part had the names of Molotschna villages (Ohrloff, Tiege, etc.). In 1918 the settlement owned over 86,400 acres not including the very important private farms. There were also several daughter villages of this settlement in the province of Kherson, partly on their own land, and partly on rented land. The Mennonite population numbered 5-6,000 souls, of whom one fifth belonged to the Mennonite Brethren, with a meetinghouse in Tiege, and the others to the Mennonite Church, with a church in Nikolaifeld, where a central school was also built for the district in 1895. Near this colony was located one of the forestry services on which the Mennonites satisfied requirements for military duty. In addition the settlement founded a daughter colony in 1894 near Tempelhof in the province of Stavropol and in 1909 the larger one near Barnaul (q.v.). (ML I, 340.) C.B.

Khiva, a former khanate in Central Asia, conquered by the Russians in 1873. All possessions of Khiva on the northern side of the Amu Darya became Russian and the rest was also subject to Russia although ruled by the khan. Under the Soviets Khiva became a part of the Turkmen SSR.

A group of Mennonites from the province of Samara under the leadership of Claas Epp (q.v.) in 1880 sought refuge in Central Asia to escape military conscription and to prepare to meet Christ at His Second Coming. After unsuccessful attempts to settle near Tashkent, they proceeded in the direction of Khiva where they settled in 1882 on the Amu Darya River. Since they were constantly attacked by the surrounding native population, some 20 families returned to Samara in 1884 in order to set out for America.

The remainder under the leadership of Claas Epp settled on the oasis of Ak-Metchet (q.v.) in the vicinity of the city of Khiva. During the pioneer days numerous families left the settlement to go to America. After the economic hardships had been overcome, and after the death of Claas Epp in 1913 their chiliastic views gradually disappeared and the settlement attained the status of a normal religious and economic life. During the Soviet regime it was dissolved and the group exiled. C.B., C.K.

Claas Epp, Die Entsiegelung des Propheten Daniel (Alt-Tschau, 1878); Franz Bartsch, Unser Auszug nach Mittel-Asien (Halbstadt, 1907); J. Janzen, "Mennonite Colony in Turkestan," MQR IV (October 1930) 282-89; ML I, 347.

Kicin, a village near Vola-Vodzinska (q.v.), not far from Warsaw, Poland, was established by German Mennonite and Lutheran settlers on the estate of Count Kicinski around 1842. Evidently the Mennonite settlers came from the Deutsch-Kazun Mennonite settlement near Warsaw. Peter Ewert (q.v.) of this community took a large number of the Mennonites with him into the Baptist Church, which was started here in 1855. Mennonites of this community were probably members of the Vola-Vodzinska Mennonite Church (q.v.), which in turn was a subsidiary of Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) C.K.

Eduard Kupsch, Geschichte der Baptisten in Polen (Lodz, 1932) 59 ff.

Kidron Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, was located three miles southeast of Taloga, Okla. It was represented for the first time in the General Conference session of 1911, although three years earlier it had had a membership of 25. The minister in 1911 was Heinrich Reimer, and in 1945, the last time the church was listed in the official minutes of the General Conference, H. U. Schmidt was the pastor. M.G.

Kidron Mennonite Church (MC), located in Kidron, Wayne Co., Ohio, a member of the Ohio-Eastern Conference, was organized Oct. 18, 1936, with 332 members, under the leadership of bishops Aaron Mast of Belleville, Pa., and A. J. Steiner of North Lima, Ohio, who had been appointed by the Ohio-E.A.M. Conference to organize the group which was withdrawing from the Sonnenberg (q.v.) independent (Swiss) congregation, founded in the community in 1817 by immigrants from the Swiss Jura congregations. The membership in 1954 was 491, most of whom were rural people with a Swiss background. The meetinghouse, a brick structure with a seating capacity of 800, was erected in 1937. On Nov. 15, 1937, Allen Bixler was ordained minister, and Reuben Hofstetter deacon. On May 24, 1938, Isaac Zuercher was ordained minister. On Dec. 21, 1941, Hofstetter was ordained as bishop and has the oversight of the congregation. All three men were still serving in 1956. A mission outpost was started at Dillonvale, Ohio, in 1942, and with several workers stationed there had a membership of 23 in 1956. A.Bix.

Kief Mennonite Brethren Church of Kief, McHenry Co., N.D., a member of the Central District Conference, was organized in 1911 by Ludwig Seibel with 25 members of Russian racial background. This congregation affiliated itself with M.B. congregations of Russian-speaking people in Canada. The present church building was erected in 1911. Ministers who have served this congregation are E. Lushenko, who served until 1923, and Daniel Rerekrestenko until 1943. These have been assisted by Ed Simbalenko 1923-44 and after that by Levi Simbalenko for three years. The membership in 1953 was about 35. A.A.D.

Kieferndorf, Philipp, a preacher of the Mennonite church at Monsheim, Hesse, Germany, 1889-94, a native of Leistadt (Palatinate), was the first minister whose theological education was sponsored by the Vereinigung of Mennonite churches in Germany. He studied at the universities of Basel, Jena, Heidelberg, and Berlin. In 1892 he wrote a treatise on the oath, Der Eid (Worms, 1892), the first systematic treatment of the question. Later Kieferndorf migrated to Jerusalem, and died there. (ML II, 486.) Hege.

Kiel, in Schleswig Holstein, Germany, population (1950) 253,857, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation, founded in 1948 by refugees from the Danzig area who settled in this region. In 1956 it had 332 baptized members, with Hans Rempel as pastor, who was at the same time serving as pastor of a Lutheran congregation in the city. Most of the members live outside the city in surrounding towns and villages.

In December 1946 the MCC relief program in this area was begun with headquarters in Kiel, continuing until the summer of 1950. Until the summer of 1948 Kiel was also the MCC headquarters for the entire British Zone, with C. J. Dyck as director.

H.S.B.

Kielstra, Tjepke, b. April 27, 1852, at Bolsward, d. Feb. 4, 1936, at Zeist, was one of the most active and prominent Mennonite ministers in the Netherlands in the late 19th century. He was trained at the University of Groningen and the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam. Appointed ministerial candidate in 1876, he first served the small congregation of Zwartsluis, at the same time being in charge of the Mennonites living in the neighboring town of Meppel (q.v.). Through his work in Meppel a congregation was founded in 1879, and a church was built there, dedicated by Kielstra on Jan. 11, 1880. In 1885 he was called as minister of the congregation at Middelburg (q.v.). During his Middelburg period (1885-1901) Kielstra's great gifts, both of heart and intellect, came to full development. In this time he served not only the Middelburg congregation, but until 1899 also Vlissingen and Goes. All these congregations experienced a period of spiritual prosperity; in all three towns Kielstra dedicated new churches. His book Het godsdienstig leven, eene schets der Christelijke geloofs- en zedeleer, published at Amsterdam in 1883 (reprinted in 1890, 1901, and 1914), is evidence of his thorough catechetical instruction. (This book was translated by Kielstra into German; this translation appeared shortly after his death: Das religiöse Leben, Skizze einer christlichen Glaubens- und Sittenlehre, Bern-Leipzig, 1936.)

During his Middelburg period Kielstra, who had already given the impulse to the publication of the Dutch Mennonite weekly De Zondagsbode (q.v.), in 1894 (after failing in 1890) successfully insisted on the formation of a committee to care for those Mennonites who were living in towns where there was no Mennonite congregation (Commissie tot de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing, q.v.). He himself took an active part in the work of the committee and even after he had resigned continued to visit the Mennonites in the diaspora.

In 1901 (farewell sermon on Feb. 17) he left the congregation of Middelburg, and at the same time the ministry, to be a district public school inspector (until 1927). In the meantime he was also a teacher of Hebrew, having already taught Hebrew in the Gymnasium of Middelburg, and continued to teach in Amersfoort until 1930. He did not return to the ministry. In 1910 he seriously considered accepting a call to the congregation of Hallum, Friesland, but finally rejected it. Nevertheless his love for the church was unfailing; he was a beloved guest-preacher in many congregations. In Zeist, where he lived after 1916, there was no Mennonite congregation, but Kielstra, with the help of some others, succeeded in founding one in 1921, and the new church of Zeist was dedicated in 1933 by Kielstra, who was then 81 years old.

Besides his Het godsdienstig leven of 1883, Kielstra also published some booklets on Mennonite history; e.g., Hans Denck (No. 3 of the set of booklets for the Mennonites in the diaspora), Het oproer te Munster and Over oud Evangelische gemeenten. He also published some sermons, among them De vreugde van den godsdienstigen mensch (Zwartsluis, 1880), a dedication sermon of the Meppel church, and a larger number of articles in the Zondagsbode. A commemorative sermon preached in 1926 to celebrate his fiftieth year in the ministry was published under the title Na Vijftig Jaar, 1876-1926.

Kielstra, being a highly gifted teacher, perhaps more than preacher, had a keen interest in the social problems of his time. With his warm heart he did much for the welfare of the common people, not only during his pastorate, but also in later years; he also wrote a number of papers to insist on better living conditions and pensioning of the working classes. But Kielstra in the first place was a pious man; he was a moderate liberal, but he was not a rationalist like many of his contemporaries, considering the assurance of a heart enlightened by the Holy Spirit of greater value than the acquisition of intellectual knowledge. His whole life was a plea for ethical holiness. In 1890, when a meeting was held to discuss the question whether Mennonites should go into the army if compulsory military service should be introduced (this indeed happened in the Netherlands in 1898), Kielstra declared that the New Testament is a strong testimony against force and that he was not willing to act contrary to the clear statements of the New Testament, for "conscience must not yield to any claim of society."

Kielstra was married twice: in 1876 to H.C.W.A. Eger (1853-92), who bore eight children, and in 1894 to Maria P. Fak Brouwer (1877-1934).

His oldest son was Johannes Coenraad Kielstra (1878-1951), who studied law, then became a government official in the Dutch East Indies, and successively rose to high military ranks. He was later a professor at the universities of Utrecht and Wageningen in the Netherlands, teaching agrarian law. In 1933-42 he was governor of the Dutch territory of Surinam and afterwards ambassador of the Netherlands to Mexico. Like his father he was a loyal member of the church. On the matter of military service, however, he largely differed with his father. In a booklet, Geweld en Rechtshandhaving (Assen, n.d.), he controverted the views of unilateral disarmament and refusal of military service.

One of the daughters of Tjepke Kielstra, Henriëtte Charlotte Kielstra, b. 1882 at Zwartsluis, performed no mean achievements in behalf of the schooling of the deaf. She also inherited her father's love for the Mennonite Church, being for more than 25 years, until 1954, a deaconess and a member of the church board of the congregation of Rotterdam.

vdZ.

DJ 1937, 25-33, with portrait; De Zondagsbode, Feb. 9, 1936; DB 1882, 3, 5; 1883, 43-66; 1891, 101; 1894, 75; 1895, 144; 1901, 214; 1905, 193; 1910, 231; ML II, 486.

Kien, Johannes, preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, and author of Den Honigraet der Godgeleerdheid (Middelburg, 1704) and other theological treatises, in 1710 left the Mennonite Church and joined the Reformed. His reason for this step was "that the Reformed Church knows only one way to salvation, i.e., faith in Jesus Christ, and the Mennonites three ways; i.e., nature, the law of Moses, and the Gospel of Jesus Christ." After his transfer to the Reformed Church Kien tried to be appointed pastor of the Reformed church at Essequebo in the Dutch West Indies, but he seems not to have obtained this office since in 1725 he was still living in the province of Zeeland. For his leaving the Mennonites and his theological views Kien was attacked by his former Mennonite colleague Gerardus de Wind in Johannes Kiens redenen des geloofs onderzocht (Vlissingen, 1711). Johannes Kien was born at Middelburg ca. 1670. (DB 1891, 63 f.; 1895, 121; Biogr. Wb. IV, 747 f.) vdZ.

Kiernica, a Ruthenian village in Galicia (q.v.). In 1848 Peter and Magdalene Kintzi (q.v.) of Einsiedel bought the 3,000-acre estate Kiernica, and laid it out in farms for their eight married children. Settling them on individual farms rather than in a village was an innovation among the Galician Mennonites. From this beginning a congregation developed which owned a church building by 1862, and employed Johannes van der Smissen of Altona as their minister. He served until 1868. After the merger of all Mennonite settlements in Galicia into one organization, Kiernica was for a long time the seat of the leading minister, Johann Klein (q.v.). In the constitution (1909) of the Galician Mennonite Church it had the name Kiernica-Lemberg, but the official center was transferred to Lemberg.

The founders had intended that Kiernica remain a Mennonite settlement, and specified in their will that it should not be sold to others; but this clause was declared illegal, and many Mennonites sold their land and moved away. In 1934 there were six families resident there, with the names of Kintzi, Ewy, Müller, and Schmidt. The meetinghouse was sold after World War I. J.Ru.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (Lemberg, 1934) 220-27; Artur Miller, "Mennonitengemeinde Kiernica-Lemberg," Unser Blatt (Gronau i.W.) III (1949) No. 54 (Nov. 1), No. 55 (Nov. 15), No. 56/57 (December), IV (1950) No. 58 (Jan. 1), and No. 59 (Feb. 1); ML II, 486.

Kiesling, Johann Rudolf (1706-78), a Lutheran theologian and Orientalist. In addition to many other works, some in Latin and some in German, he published (Reval and Leipzig) in 1776 Das Lehrgebäude der Wiedertäufer, nach den Grundsätzen des Martin Czechowitz, eines der ältesten Bestreiter der Kindertauf und seiner Nachfolger, zur Vertheidigung der Kindertaufe. After his death and without his name another title was published in 1779: Historische Untersuchung der anabaptistischen Streitigkeiten, nebst einer exegetisch-dogmatischen Prüfung der alten und neuen Einwürfe wider die Kindertaufe.

The book by Martin Czechowic (d. 1613), a Polish Socinian, which Kiesling attacked, had the title, De paedobaptistarum errorum origine et de ea opinione, qua infantes baptizandos esse in primo nativitatis eorum exortu creditur (Lublin, 1575, copies were in the state and university libraries at Königsberg). Czechowic attacked 14 errors of the advocates of infant baptism, and, in an appendix, also the Socinian idea that baptism is unnecessary for those who believe and have grown up in Christianity.

Kiesling, in 31 paragraphs, answers the most important assertions of the old book, following its order. But he forgets to say that paragraph 16 concerns the ninth error, paragraphs 21-23 the twelfth error, paragraphs 26 and 27 the fourteenth error, and paragraphs 28-30 concern the appendix; and the approximately 40 excerpts from Czechowic are by no means verbatim; indeed, one might think Kiesling had a different version, or that he was making up his own Latin extracts. (For bibliography, see ML II, 486 f.) E.C.

Kiessling, Hans, one of the leading personalities of the Augsburg Anabaptists, holding the office of deacon. His activity ended with the martyrs' synod, which met in Augsburg the last week of August 1527 (see Augsburg), and in which he participated. He was seized before the week had passed. On the rack information on other members of the congregation was expressed from him. Other arrests followed. On Oct. 18, 1527, he was banished from the city as an Anabaptist ringleader with Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.), Endres Widholz, Gall Fischer, and Peter Scheppach. The exiles met in surrounding villages for mutual comfort and strength. Langenmantel was repeatedly visited in Göppingen by Kiessling, Widholz, and Fischer; he was living in the house of Laux Lang, a brother of the archbishop of Salzburg and Cardinal Matthias Lang (q.v.). In 1529 Kiessling was permitted to return to Augsburg. Nothing is known about his further activity. Hege.

Keller, Reformation; Chr. Meyer, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben (1874); Fr. Roth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," loc. cit., XXVII and XXVIII (1900, 1901); idem, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte (Munich, 1901); ML II, 487.

Kill Creek Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in Osborne Co., Kans., took its name from a near-by creek and the township in which it was located in Osborne Co., Kan., took its name from a vania, arrived about 1875, and the congregation was organized soon afterwards by Bishop Abraham Newschwanger. A church was built in Kill Creek Township about 15 miles southwest of Osborne, the county seat. The membership of the congregation was never large. It was composed of such names as Newschwanger, Winey, Bickel, Graybill, and Shellenberger. Because of crop failures and also because of dissension the congregation died out about 1910. The church building was sold to the Presbyterians. G.G.Y.

Killig, Andreas, concerning whom nothing is known except that he was a Hutterite and the author of the song, "Mein Geist lässt mich nicht ruhen." It bears the heading, "A new, sad song of the persecution that took place in Gross-Schitzen in the year 1725." The story is told in 80 stanzas.

NEFF.

Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 879 ff.; ML II, 487.

Kimedoncius (Kimdonck), Jacobus, b. ca. 1550 at Kempen near Cologne, d. 1596 at Heidelberg, Germany, was for some time a Reformed pastor at Gent, Belgium, and at Middelburg in the Netherlands. He attacked Dirk Philipsz (q.v.) in his book Van der Doope onses Heeren Jesu Christi, bekentenisse door Dierick Philips, metgaders een beandtwoordinghe derselver bekentenisse (Middelburg, 1589). (Biogr. Wb. IV, 835 f.; DB 1908, 26 f.)
vdZ.

Kimswerd, Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens in 1551-82 baptized 125 or 132 persons; in 1563-65 he baptized here no less than 65. This large number suggests the existence of a congregation, of which, however, nothing is known. The newly baptized members may have joined the congregation of near-by Arum. vdZ.

Kinderbote, a periodical (GCM) published at Rosthern, Sask., was founded in 1887. Carl van der Smissen (q.v.) was editor of the Kinderbote for many years. Since he was opposed to fairy tales and fiction the Kinderbote had a rather sober viewpoint. After World War I, since the German language was banned from the lower schools and the children began to speak English, the Kinderbote contained an English section, which grew larger and larger.

When the great immigration to Canada started in 1923, the General Conference at Saskatoon in 1938 agreed that there should be an English paper for the United States. Accordingly the Junior Messenger appeared, in addition to the Kinderbote. J. G. Rempel of Rosthern was the editor of the Kinderbote 1940-56. He was followed by Cornelia Lehn.

In 1953 the Kinderbote had 2,400 subscribers, about 750 of them in South America, chiefly in Paraguay. The Kinderbote appears on the first and 15th of the month, i.e., 24 issues per year, 4 pages, 9½ x 12½ in. J.G.R.

Kinderliedekens, ofte Jeugdsboecxken was a Dutch booklet of an anonymous compiler containing religious songs for children. It was published at Hoorn in 1630 and was much in use among Mennonites. The compiler or author was probably a Mennonite. vdZ.

DJ 1837, 65; M. Schagen, Naamlijst van Doopsgezinde schrijveren (1745) 59.

Kindert, Pieter van der: see Verkindert, Pieter.

King (Koenig, Kinig, Konigh, König), a Swiss Mennonite family name found in the Palatinate Mennonite census lists as early as 1717 when Hans König was registered in the district of Alzey. In 1770 another Hans König was the preacher of a Mennonite congregation in the territory of Waldeck. In 1940 there was one Mennonite named König living in Northwest Germany and seven in South Germany.

On Dec. 22, 1744, Jacob, Christian, and Samuel König arrived in Philadelphia from Rotterdam. These are the ancestors of many Mennonites with this name scattered through Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Kansas. Between 1732 and 1806, 38 persons bearing the name König arrived in Philadelphia, although it is not known how many of these were Mennonites.

Nicolas King (Koenig) (1814-76) was born in Switzerland and came to America in 1832, moved to Wayne Co., Ohio, and later to Fulton County. He was ordained minister in 1844 and bishop in 1871. John P. King (1827-87) was born in Mifflin Co., Pa., moved to Champaign Co., Ohio, in 1849, and later to Logan Co., Ohio. He was ordained deacon in 1859 and in 1872 was ordained bishop. In 1886 he moved to Coffee Co., Kan. He traveled extensively and exerted a commanding influence in the Mennonite Church (MC). Three brothers, L. O. King, Hutchinson, Kan.; B. B. King, now Scottdale, Pa.; and John Y. King of West Liberty, Ohio, were ministers in the Mennonite Church. Henry J. King, Arthur, Ill., is a Mennonite bishop and evangelist. S. M. King was a missionary to India. Christian B., Christian L., Joel, and John King, all of Ronks, Pa., and Joshua and John King of Uniontown, Ohio, are ministers in the Old Order Amish Church. J. H. King (b. 1861) was a leading bishop in the Central Conference Church. H.H.HAR.

Isabelle King Yoder, Centennial Memoir of Abraham and Mattie King (Harrisonburg, Va., 1949).

King, Joseph H., was born May 2, 1861, son of Daniel and Mary Hotler King, who came to Central Illinois from Butler Co., Ohio. He lived his entire life in the vicinity of Carlock, Ill. He married Salina A. Lantz, also of Carlock, Oct. 16, 1883. There were three children. He died March 5, 1935. He was ordained to the ministry in the North Danvers Mennonite Church (GCM) by Bishop Joseph Stuckey, April 17, 1892. Later he shepherded a group of the members living in Carlock, from which grew the Carlock Mennonite Church, of which he was the first pastor, 1916-22. He served for extended periods as a member of the Central Conference Mission Board, field secretary of the conference, and secretary of the (Bloomington) Mennonite Hospital Board. R.L.H.

King Ranch Hutterite Bruderhof near Lewistown, Mont., founded in 1935 by Preacher Joseph Stahl and several families from the Huron commune. Their population in 1947 was 65, with 25 baptized members. D.D.

Kingman County, Kan., is known for its fertile red soil and rolling hills. Its principal crop is wheat and there is also a considerable amount of grazing land. The total population of the county is over 12,000.

There are two General Conference Mennonite churches in Kingman County—Bethany Mennonite Church (q.v.), southeast of Kingman, organized in 1907, and the Zion Mennonite Church in Kingman (q.v.), which was organized in 1929. In addition, the camp of the Western District young people, Camp Mennoscah (q.v.), is located there, on the Ninnescah River west of Murdock. H.J.S.

Kings View Homes, the second of Mennonite Central Committee mental hospitals, located 2½ miles southwest of Reedley, Calif., resulted from the 1947 MCC assignment to erect three such hospitals. The Kings River, which forms the northwest border of the 43-acre ranch, has given its name to the hospital. The ranch provides fruit and vegetables to the hospital and also an avenue of therapeutic work.

The plant consists of the main building with 8,500 sq. ft. and an activity building with 1,800 sq. ft. Personnel are housed in Reedley. Kings View Homes was opened on Feb. 11, 1951. It now (1955) has three psychiatrists, a psychiatric social worker, psychologist, and four nurses on the total staff of 30. Arthur Jost was appointed administrator in 1950 and he continues to direct the business and public relations program. Kings View Homes has utilized many volunteers from the community in its recreational, devotional, and educational program for patients and staff alike. A number of patients have been placed in foster homes in the community.

The present services include full psychiatric care, medical workup in conjunction with local general medical facilities, outpatient care, and foster home care. All types of mental patients are admitted. The ultimate program is to include facilities for 100 patients. At this writing, a study committee is being appointed to study the steps for its further development. (ME II, †.) A.Jo.

Kingwood Bible Church of the Mennonite Brethren Conference of North America, located at 1125 Elm St., Salem, Ore., was organized as the Mennonite Brethren Church of West Salem on Oct. 13, 1940, by 27 members of the M.B. Church of Dallas, Ore., who felt the need of a place of worship in Salem. In 1944 the church was enlarged to provide room for the newly organized Salem Bible School and Academy. In order to reach more people the present name was adopted. Pastors who have served the church are Abe A. Loewen, Albert Fadenrecht, Alex Sauerwein, and Frank Wiens. The membership in 1957 was 185. P.Pa.

Kingwood Reformed Mennonite Church is located in Wellesley Village, Stratford, Waterloo Co., Ont. Established in 1850, it had a membership of 27 in 1948. J.L.K.

Kinsinger (Kenzinger, Kentzinger, Kinnzinger, Kinzinger, Kitzinger), a Swiss Mennonite family name occurring in the Palatinate Mennonite census lists under various spellings in 1717, 1724, 1743, and 1759. A Christian Kentzinger, whose name appears in 1724, was the ancestor of those carrying this family name in South Germany. In the 1940 census of Mennonite families in South Germany, 14 Kensingers were members of the Sembach Mennonite Church. Peter Kinzing, the noted mechanic and clockmaker at Neuwied, Germany, whose collection was admired by Goethe, Lavater, and Basedow in 1774 (MQR XXV, 1951, 252), no doubt belonged to this Kinzinger family.

In 1729 an Abraham Kensinger arrived in Philadelphia. Joseph Kensinger, a native of the Palatinate, came to America and settled in Butler Co., Ohio, in 1826. He was ordained as minister in the Amish congregation in 1844 and served until his death in 1857. Peter Kinsinger, a distant relative of the above Joseph, born in the Palatinate in 1827, was ordained to the ministry of the Butler Co., Ohio, Amish congregation in 1867 and served there until his death in 1888. Joseph Kinsinger from the Palatinate, a brother of the above Peter, settled in Butler Co., Ohio, in 1850. He was ordained there in 1861 and served the Amish congregation until he moved to Wayne Co., Ind., in 1868.

Bertha Kinsinger Petter observed the sixtieth anniversary of her work among the Cheyenne Indians of Oklahoma and Wyoming in 1956. She was one of the first Mennonite women to graduate from a college (Wooster).

Members of the Butler County Kinsinger families moved to central Illinois as early as 1837. Here Michael Kinsinger was ordained to the ministry in 1862 and died in 1895. John Kinsinger from Butler County was ordained in 1881. Michael Kinsinger, an immigrant from Germany, was ordained in 1889 and died in 1912. Joseph Kinsinger was ordained in 1891 and died in 1925. These served in the Central Conference of Mennonites.

At least as early as 1842 Kinsinger families from Butler Co., Ohio, were living in the Lee Co., Iowa, Amish settlement. Later, members of these families moved to the Amish Mennonite settlement of Davis Co., Iowa.

Jacob Kinsinger migrated to America from Hesse-Kassel, Germany, in 1832, and finally settled near Springs, Pa. A son, Peter Kinsinger, served as a bishop (1884-1923) in the Old Order Amish church of Johnson Co., Iowa. His relatives and descendants are still found in this community. Other members of the family remain in the Grantsville, Md., Amish Mennonite community. M.G.

Kint (Kind, Kindt), Joos (Josse): see Jooskint.

Kinthis, Jobst, of Freinsheim, Palatinate, Germany, the otherwise unknown author of the Gesprächbüchlein (q.v.), which has a certain significance for the history of the Mennonites in the Palatinate. (ML II, 494.)

Kintzi, Peter, b. Oct. 18, 1802, at Einsiedel in Galicia, d. Feb. 15, 1874, at Kiernica (q.v.), was a wagoner by trade, became a farmer, and worked himself up from a very modest beginning to the possession of the large Kiernica estate. He was the founder of the Mennonite church at Kiernica by creating a fund to which he contributed 3,000 florins. For all the efforts of the Mennonite brotherhood he had a warm interest and an open hand. He liked to help wherever there was need. He supported such institutions as the school at Weierhof and the Dutch Mennonite missionary association with sizable gifts. Of his 16 children, nine were living when he died. NEFF.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (Lemberg, 1934); Menn. Bl., 1874, 29; Gbl., 1874, 3 and 45; ML II, 494.

Kinzer Mennonite Church (MC), located in the small thriving town of Kinzers on the Lincoln Highway, Lancaster Co., Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Conference. In 1897 a meetinghouse was built here for the benefit of retiring farmers. Until 1916 the quarterly mission meetings were held alternately at Kinzer and at Paradise. The 1955 membership was 143. G. Parke Book was bishop, the Paradise-Kinzer ministers served, and Clarence V. Groff was deacon. I.D.L.

Kiowa County, Kan. (pop. 4,730), is located in the south central part of the state. The Mennonites in the community are largely farmers living in the south half of the county. There are three branches of Mennonites in the area. The Church of God in Christ Mennonites were the first group of Mennonites to come to the county, coming from Marion and McPherson counties in 1906. They have a country church of approximately 80 members.

The Mennonite Church (MC) in Greensburg was organized in 1932 by various Mennonite families who came to this community around 1908 and after. Its membership of 75 comes from seven different denominational backgrounds. The Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) of Elkhart, Ind., operates a 24-bed general hospital in Greensburg, which is the only Mennonite institution in the county. The Faith Mennonite Church (GCM) was organized in 1948 and has a membership of 31 (1955). S.J.

Kipfer (Küpfer), a family name found among the Mennonites in Switzerland since the rise of Anabaptism. Elizabeth Kipfer (q.v.) died as martyr in 1538. Johannes Kipfer of Langnau, where the family has been resident since 1680, was long the editor of the Zionspilger, the weekly periodical of the Mennonites in Switzerland. To this family also belonged Ulrich Kipfer (q.v.) and another Ulrich Kipfer, of Frittenbach, preacher of the Emmental (q.v.) congregation from 1825, who in 1852 left the Emmental with a number of other Mennonites to settle in Adams County, Ind., where he was a minister until he died in 1866. The name is also found among Swiss Mennonites in Ontario. In Perth County, near Newton, Ont., an Amish congregation of 125 members is known as the Kipfer group. vdZ.

Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 135, 153 f.; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954); Mart. Mir. E. 1129; Th. de Quervain, Kirchliche und soziale Zustände in Bern 1528-36 (Bern, 1906); ML II, 494.

Kipfer (Küpfer), Elisabeth, a Swiss Brethren martyr of Sumiswald in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, was executed at Bern for her faith in 1538. (Mart. Mir. E 1129; ML II, 494.)

Kipfer, Johann, an elder of the Mennonite congregation of Langnau in the Emmental, Switzerland, was born Oct. 15, 1858, at Oberfrittenbach in the Raingut not far from Langnau. As a youth he was converted by the preaching of the German revivalist Elias Schrenck. As a means of spreading the Gospel, Kipfer and some others founded the Zionspilger (q.v.) in 1882, which has been published in Langnau continuously since that time. Kipfer was also an instigator in building the meetinghouse and parsonage (Vereinshaus) at Kehr near Langnau in 1888. Kipfer became the editor of the Zionspilger following the death of Samuel Bähler, the first editor in 1890, holding this position until 1943, with the exception of 1898-1900, when Matthias Pohl served as editor.

In 1884 he was ordained as preacher of the Langnau Mennonite congregation. His deepest interest was, however, the promotion of the Evangelical Alliance, more than the development of the Mennonite congregations on the principles of their fathers. He therefore stressed Luther's doctrine of justification rather than that of discipleship as stressed by the fathers. This explains the dropping of articles on Mennonite history from the Zionspilger during Kipfer's editorship, contrary to Bähler's editorial policy.

In the 1890's Kipfer was ordained as elder of the Emmental congregation. In this office he sought especially to implant the message of salvation into the hearts of his catechumens. On the one hand his good judgment against extremist movements was greatly appreciated. On the other hand, he was sometimes intolerant toward other brethren in the conference. Mennonite tradition was for Kipfer a thing of the past; he sought so much the more after fellowship with believers of other circles, especially in the Free Churches, but also in the state church. The content of his theological thought can be summarized as "faith and grace." This was the keynote of the Zionspilger, which contained mostly articles written by non-Mennonites, e.g., Wilhelm Meili and Heinrich Kurz. For 60 years Kipfer worked along these lines, impressing this stamp on the Emmental congregation. Mennonite principles were given only partial consideration. This was true of the Confession of Faith of the Emmental congregation which Kipfer wrote in 1937. He presented this document for adoption by the other Swiss Mennonite congregations, but it was rejected on the ground that it went too far in involvement with the state church and in the recognition of infant baptism as being "in the spirit of the Scriptures." In 1943 Kipfer retired as editor, moved with his family from Kehr to Langnau, and died on March 15, 1944. S.G.

Kipfer, Ulrich, deacon of the Mennonite congregation in the Emmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland, was born near Langnau in 1772. He passed through the changes of the 1830's in the Emmental churches, and wrote an exact, detailed account of the division of 1835 (see Bern, Samuel Fröhlich, and Neutäufer). For a long time he corresponded with the Mennonites living in the Palatinate. In March 1810 Ulrich Kipfer, Nikolaus Gerber, Christian Gerber, and Christian Brand made a futile appeal to the cantonal government of Bern requesting the observance of the rights granted the Mennonites in 1799 by the "Act of Toleration." In 1850 Kipfer helped to draw up the petition to the government at Bern for military exemption for the Mennonites, and was one of the signatories. S.G.

S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 467, 474; Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 100; ML II, 494.

Kirche unterm Kreuz, Die (The Church under the Cross), a religious periodical published in the German language by John G. Stauffer (q.v.) of Quakertown, Pa., from April 1885 to September 1891. The subtitle reads as follows: Botschafter des Heils in Christo (Den Wehrlosen Christen in Amerika gewidmet). The masthead carried the motto, "Christum vermag niemand recht zu erkennen es sei denn dass er ihm nachfolge im Leben, Hans Denk," apparently as so-to-speak the editor's program or intention with this paper. In December 1885, the term Kirche in the title was changed to Gemeinde (congregation, brotherhood) which seemed to Stauffer nearer to his ideal than the former term. In 1885 the paper came out monthly; from January 1886 on it was published only bimonthly, until November 1888 (altogether 27 issues, 432 pages). Then in January 1889, Stauffer "dropped the denominational" and again changed the title, now the former subtitle as the main title as follows: Botschafter des Heils, adding as something new: Und Zeichen der Zeit, indicating the search for the signs of the second coming of Christ. In this new dress 17 issues of the magazine appeared (272 pages), after which it was discontinued quite abruptly.

The journal was in many regards similar in tone to the contemporary European German and Swiss Mennonite papers (Mennonitische Blätter, Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten, and Zionspilger) but never had any official connection with the Mennonite church. In fact, Stauffer was rather conscious of his independence from any organized church life. "Wherever I meet men who love the Lord Jesus Christ I keep brotherhood with them" (letter to John Horsch). In many regards this journal was also similar to the Herold der Wahrheit after John Horsch had taken over its editing in 1888, with the difference that the latter paper was strictly "denominational" in its intention, serving the Mennonite church (MC) as a real church paper. But otherwise both Stauffer and Horsch (as well as Ulrich Hege in Germany) had at that time one great idea in mind: to revive the church (or brotherhood) in the spirit of the forefathers of the 16th century, or should we better say in the spirit of the "old evangelical brotherhoods," as Ludwig Keller (q.v.) saw and propagated them in his many books ever since the publication of his Hans Denk in 1882. Keller's influence in the 1880's was very strong. Everywhere among Mennonites Stauffer wanted to assist in the "great awakening" on his own initiative by publishing a magazine in which all these publications and sources should be made known to a wide public, first of Mennonite background and later of a general Christian interest. Stauffer never had any official backing, although he addressed himself many times to his Mennonite readership (both of the old church and the new General Conference congregations). His paper had a good circulation, and was also welcomed outside his church.

Stauffer's first program was to reprint the entire book by Anna Brons of 1884 (Ursprung . . . der Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten), which he actually concluded in the fall of 1888. Besides this he reprinted material from the recently published Geschichts-Bücher der Wiedertäufer, by J. Beck (q.v.), 1883, which was certainly a service for the American readers who then did not know anything about the Hutterites; next he planned to reprint from Keller's books, from W. Mannhardt's Die Wehrfreiheit der . . . Mennoniten, 1863, and from M. Klaasen, Geschichte der wehrlosen Taufgesinnten Gemeinden, 1873. He also published a radical Christian essay by Heinrich Balzer (q.v.), the well-known minister of the Kleine Gemeinde (Verstand und Vernunft, 1833), and a fine article by Leonhard Sudermann, Von der Wehrlosigkeit und dem Leiden. Stauffer's own editorials were usually of a high standard and well able to awaken sensitive souls. He was also interested in a strong revival of the Deknatel (q.v.) sermons, as e.g., a comparison between the Mennonite church and the church at Laodicea (IV, 129 f.). But then—almost suddenly—he discontinued this kind of work. He reports his disappointment in his endeavor, which was so incongruous to the prevailing American mind. In any case, from 1889 on, he shifted the tenor to the "Signs of the time," i.e., to eschatological ideas concerning Christ's second coming. Once more, in September 1891, he published a fine tract (or sermon) of his own, "Philadelphia and Laodicea," in which he admonished his readers: turn away from Laodicea and enter Philadelphia, the city of the open door. It was his last message. We do not know what went on behind the scenes, but it was (as far as it is known) the last issue. Stauffer, who had lost his inner ties with the Mennonite church (of any branch), had become a solitary man, and both his name and his work have been almost forgotten. R.F.

R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 258-60; Bender, Two Centuries, 99 f.; and a short autobiography by Stauffer himself in J. H. Battle, History of Bucks County, Pa. (Philadelphia, 1887) 1067-69.

Kirchen-Gemeinden, Kirchliche Mennoniten, Kirchliche are terms used occasionally among Mennonites from Russia. The origin of the term Kirchen-Gemeinden can be traced back to the early history of the Mennonites in Russia when there were two Gemeinden (communities) in existence in each settlement. The civil and the ecclesiastical communities were integral parts of solid Mennonite settlements. In order to distinguish between the civil community or Gemeinde and the ecclesiastical body or Gemeinde, the distinction between Gemeinde as a civil organization and the Kirchen-Gemeinde came into usage. One can find this distinction in early records and writings pertaining to the Mennonites of Russia.

A different meaning and connotation was given to this term by members of the Mennonite Brethren Church after 1860, when they began to refer to the members of the Mennonite Church of Russia as Kirchliche and their congregations as Kirchen-Gemeinden. The above-mentioned term was taken over and given new meaning. Among those using the term it implied that those to whom this name was given were meeting for worship in a "church building" (Kirche), while the Mennonite Brethren met originally in private homes and later in a Versammlungshaus (meetinghouse), which was not spoken of as a church. Among those using the term, it may have—it still does—implied many other things in which the new Mennonite Brethren movement differed from the traditional Mennonite Church. This distinction can be compared with the terms in use among Pennsylvania-German Mennonites when they speak of "old" Mennonites and "new" Mennonites.

Although the term Kirchen-Gemeinden or Kirchliche has become obsolete among the Mennonites of the United States who use the English language, it is still being used among the Mennonite Brethren in Canada and South America and occasionally also by other Mennonite groups. Not only is there no justification for the use of this name in the Americas, but there was also none in Russia, with the possible exception of the time when a confusion between the ecclesiastical body and the civil organization in Mennonite communities could take place. Kirchliche Mennoniten are simply "Mennonites" and the Kirchen-Gemeinden are just Mennonite churches or congregations and should be referred to in these terms. No confusion is possible with other Mennonite groups of Russian background since they all added a distinguishing name to their traditional name "Mennonite" (Mennonite Brethren, Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, etc.). (ML II, 500.) C.K.

Kirchenkonvent, one of the various names used by the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia to designate the body of deacons, ministers, or elders of a congregation or settlement. Very common were "Lehrdienst," "geistlicher Vorstand," "Konferenz," and "Kirchenkonvent." The latter gradually became accepted among the Chortitza Mennonites (see Chortitzaer Mennonitischer Kirchenkonvent) and also among the Molotschna Mennonites (see Molotschnaer Mennoniten-Kirchenkonvent). The Kirchenkonvent was not a board with executive authority and it had no power to pass regulations for various congregations. Resolutions passed were subject to the approval of the various congregations represented in the Kirchenkonvent. During the second half of the past century, the Kirchenkonvent grew into a conference organization which included all congregations and settlements and later on even congregations of other Mennonite branches. Lay delegates became common. (See Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland.) C.K.

Kirchenkonvent (Church Convention) was the name given the church authorities in Bern, Switzerland, in earlier centuries. It was a sort of consistorial or synodal council. The designation was derived from Catholicism, were "convent" means a congregating of monks or nuns. It is a purely local board, and not to be confused with the Kirchenrat (church council), in which the large and small councils (of the government) were also represented. The members of the Kirchenkonvent presented to the government several official opinions on the solution of the Anabaptist problem, demanding violent measures which led to cruel persecution. Characteristic of their ideas are the opinions of the clergy of 1585 and the divided opinion of the Konvent in 1670. Under the date of Feb. 13, 1693, a government order was sent to the Konvent to suggest in writing "the cause of this leaven," and to recommend measures to counteract the rapid spread of Anabaptism. S.G.

Berner Ratsmanual; Prediger Ordnung (Bern, 1824); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 207-9, 404, 414; ML II, 496 f.

Kirchenordnungen (Church Regulations), the name of the government regulations issued by the civil authorities of the several German states, areas, or towns and cities, or at times by the church administrative office, to regulate church affairs, beginning with the time of the Reformation. Each Kirchenordnung usually began with a doctrinal section, then followed with directions for the conduct of worship including a detailed liturgy, the church offices, organization of the general church administration of the land, salaries of church officials, administration of church property, alms administration, church discipline, marriage, school affairs, etc. Frequently it contained directions regarding the combating of heresy (other confessions). The oldest Kirchenordnung was that adopted by the synod of Homberg in Hesse in 1526, which is noteworthy in that it calls for a church of "believers only," but which never was put into effect by any civil authority. The first effective Lutheran Kirchenordnung was that of Braunschweig of 1528.

Most of the Kirchenordnungen had paragraphs prescribing how the Wiedertäufer (Anabaptists) were to be dealt with, usually calling for turning them over to the authorities as enemies of church and state. Others were milder in their requirements, such as that of Philip of Hesse in 1537, which required "each superintendent to deliver a good sermon, especially in those areas where the Anabaptist ferment has become noticeable, so that the people shall be held by clear preaching to stand by pure doctrine, the fear of God, and obedience." Since the specifications of the Kirchenordnungen had much weight and influence, their bearing on Anabaptist history is not negligible. (For further details see article in ML II, 499 f.) The full text of the German Kirchenordnungen has been published by Emil Sehling in the six large volumes of his Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des XVI. Jahrhunderts (Leipzig and Tübingen, 1907-55). (ML II, 499 f.) NEFF.

Kirchheimerhof in the duchy of Zweibrücken, Germany, is mentioned in Dutch Naamlijst of 1769 and following issues, as a Mennonite center, being one congregation together with Freudenberg and Hombach. Johannes Schönny (Schöny), elder after 1745, lived at Kirchheimerhof. Other elders were Joseph Schnebele, preacher 1762, elder 1767 until after 1802, Christian Wels(?), preacher 1774, elder 1781-84; preachers were Johannes Lehmann 1745-ca. 80, Rudolf Schmidt 1755-ca. 83, Peter Boër 1755-ca. 80, Georg Finger 1783 until after 1800, and Ulrich Lehmann 1783 until after 1802. (See also Zweibrücken.) vdZ.

Kirchliche Mennoniten: see Kirchen-Gemeinden.

Kirianov Mennonite Brethren Church was a congregation in the province of Tobolsk, Siberia, under the leadership of Hermann Peters (q.v.), commonly known as the Apostolische Brüdergemeinde (q.v.).

Kirrweiler, a village (pop. 1,500) in the Rhenish Palatinate, Germany, mostly Catholic, near Neustadt a.d.W., where according to Hutterian tradition two Hutterian Brethren, Hans Arbeiter (q.v.) and Heinrich Schuster (q.v.), lay in prison 29 weeks in 1568. "Thus at Kirweiler Arbeiter was put into a dark dungeon, where one is deprived of the light of day, and Heinrich into the common prison" (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 327). This prison was evidently the Hambach castle (formerly known as the Kästenburg, now the Maxburg). The fortress, which belonged to the see of Speyer until 1789, was destroyed in the Peasants' War and rebuilt by feudal service in 1525, was seriously damaged by Albrecht Alcibiades of Brandenburg, and in the Thirty Years' War demolished. (ML II, 500 f.) NEFF.

Kirschgartshäuserhof, a hamlet near Mannheim, Germany, on the road to Lampertheim, was occupied in the 18th century by ten Mennonite families, which formed a congregation and held services every Sunday. A register of April 10, 1742, lists the following names: Abraham Strickler, Stephan Brennemann, Johann Jakob Hackmann, Christian Danner, Christian Krafft, Jakob Schaub, Johannes Landes, Jr., Rudolph Schneider, Adam Danner, Diether Kieferndorf, and Jakob Landes.

It is not known when they settled here. In 1740 they were charged the protection fee, "not only the sum due for the past years, but also the increased sum for the future"—a sum they could not possibly raise. Vainly the owner of the land, Anna Sophie, widowed Countess of Sayn and Wittgenstein, appealed to the court in their behalf. They had to move out—nobody knows where they went (records in the Generallandesarchiv in Karlsruhe). (ML II, 501.) NEFF.

Kiss. In conformity with the New Testament command that Christians greet each other with the holy kiss (Rom. 16:16; I Cor. 16:20; II Cor. 13:12; I Thess. 5:26) or the kiss of love (I Pet. 5:14) considerable use has been made of the kiss as a symbol of love and fellowship in the history of the Christian Church. This spontaneous and pure expression of the love for the brethren within the fellowship was originally a part of every corporate act of worship. It was not the same as the common kiss among friends in the Roman world, nor the common Jewish salutation among friends, for it was a "holy" kiss and observed only among members of the church. In his description of the worship services of the Christians of the second century, Justin Martyr reported that the kiss was regularly used. The Apostolic Constitutions state: "Then let the men apart, and the women apart, salute each other with a kiss in the Lord." Origen connected the kiss of the Christians with the apostolic injunction of Rom. 16:16. Cyprian reported that the one baptizing a convert, as well as the entire church, greeted the newly baptized with the holy kiss. The evidence is clear that the kiss was uniformly used at both baptism and communion in the early church, and it is found in all the ancient liturgies. Gradually it disappeared from common use, from the fourth century on, and became restricted to liturgical and ritual ceremonies. It continued to be practiced in the early medieval church in baptism, ordination, consecration of bishops, absolution of penitents, marriage ceremony, and the Lord's Supper. In the liturgical churches, particularly Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox, it has continued to the present day with little modification in the ceremonies of ordination and consecration of bishops. In the medieval period such a conception of the kiss developed as involved the kissing of inanimate objects associated with the sacraments and services of the church as well as the vestments and rings of the higher clergy. These have also continued to the present day. It was renewed again somewhat in its original sense in monasticism and in some of the medieval sects such as the Albigenses and Waldenses. The Anabaptist movement of the 16th century, apparently of all countries, Switzerland, Germany, and Holland, revived and maintained the observance of the holy kiss in the common fellowship of the brotherhood on a widespread if not universal basis.

In a fellowship such as the Anabaptists with an emphasis on a literal following of the commands of Christ and His apostles, with a stress on the infallibility, unity, and authority of the Bible, with a conscious attempt to re-establish the church on its apostolic foundations, it is not surprising to find the same spirit of love within the fellowship which characterized the early church, nor to find love's most intimate and Biblical expression, the holy kiss. Their heartfelt love for their fellow believers caused them to adopt the terminology of the family in speaking of one another, referring to one another as brothers and sisters, just as the earliest Christians (and later the Waldenses) had referred to one another. The letters of persecuted Dutch Anabaptists or Mennonites abound in examples of this familial denotation; e.g., "We would inform our most beloved brethren and sisters in the Lord, and all who seek to fear the Lord with the whole heart, that we are all (the Lord be praised forever) of very good cheer, and hope to adhere to the word of the Lord." "Herein rejoice now with us, O you holy brethren and sisters in the Holy Spirit of truth." "In the same year, on the first Friday after St. Martin's Day, brother John Korbmacher, a minister of the Word of God and of His church (who was frequently sent out into the work of the Lord), was apprehended for the faith and the Word of God" (Mart. Mir. D 181, 488, 276, E 566, 830, 645).

In this environment of love and affection the injunctions of Paul to "greet the brethren with a kiss of love," and that of Peter to "salute one another with a kiss of love" were readily accepted by the Anabaptists as directly applying to themselves as a sign and seal of the love and brotherhood which existed among brethren and sisters.

Menno Simons mentions the kiss at least twice in his writings. With his strict emphasis on a disciplined and pure church it is not surprising to find his emphasis on the relation of the kiss to the disciplined brotherhood. "If some deceiver should come to us who has left the doctrine of Christ . . . we should not receive such an one into our houses, lest he deceive us; and . . . we should not greet him as a brother lest we have communion with him. . . . But the greeting or kiss of peace signifies the communion." "We certainly know that there is but one excommunication in the Scriptures, which does not only extend to the spiritual communion, such as the Lord's Supper, and the hand and kiss of peace; but it also extends to the bodily communion, such as eating, drinking, daily actions and conduct . . ." (Writings, 480, 971).

Thus we find that as early in the Anabaptist movement as Menno Simons the kiss was accepted as a normal Christian practice. Moreover we are sure from this that it was one of the instruments of discipline and of defining the brotherhood in that it was practiced only among the brethren and sisters and that it was denied those brethren and sisters who because of sin were in a state of excommunication.

The kiss had an early emphasis among the early Dutch Anabaptists as evidenced by the writing of Menno Simons; did it also have early acceptance by the Swiss-South German Anabaptists? As will be shown there are a few references in the Martyrs' Mirror to the use of the kiss by Anabaptists in Austria as early as 1528, and again in 1546, and by Alsatian Anabaptists in 1558. The kiss is not mentioned in the Schleitheim Confession, the earliest of the Anabaptist statements of faith, which was formulated in 1527 near the border of Switzerland and Germany. However, in 1568, after a series of conferences held to come to an agreement on faith and practice, a discipline of 23 articles was adopted by a group of South German and Swiss Anabaptists at Strasbourg. The eleventh article of this discipline states the use of the kiss and its restriction to the brotherhood. The fact that the kiss is limited as to sex in this discipline is also significant. "11. The brethren and sisters, each to each, shall greet each other with a holy kiss; those who have not been received into fellowship shall not be greeted with a kiss, but with the words, 'the Lord help you'" (MQR I, 1927, 65).

Another early confession is one appearing in the Martyrs' Mirror under the title "Confession of Faith According to the Holy Word of God" and reputed to have been written about the year 1600. In this confession the kiss is twice alluded to, once in connection with footwashing and once in relation to excommunication. Article XXIII: Of the footwashing of believers. When their fellow believers, out of love, visit them, they shall with heartfelt humility, receive them with the kiss of love and peace into their houses, and as a ministration of their neighbors, according to the humility of Christ, wash their feet. . . . Article XXIX: Of the withdrawing from and avoiding of apostate and separated members is confessed: As separation is commanded by God for the reformation of sinners, and the maintenance of the purity of the church; so God has also commanded and willed, that in order to shame him to reformation, the separated individual is to be shunned and avoided. . . . This withdrawing extends to all spiritual communion, as the Supper, evangelical salutation, the kiss of peace, and all that pertains to it. This withdrawing extends likewise to all temporal and bodily things . . . (Mart. Mir. D I, 439, 445; E 399, 405).

After having been stated so strongly in the earlier statements of faith it is rather startling that the kiss is not mentioned in the important Dordrecht (1632) and Cornelis Ris (1747) confessions, which have become the official statement of faith of the majority of contemporary North American Mennonite churches; the Mennonite Church (MC) and the Amish churches holding to the Dordrecht Confession, and the General Conference Mennonite Church holding to the Ris Confession. Nor is the kiss mentioned in the catechisms of the early Mennonites (Shorter Catechism, 1690, Waldeck Catechism, 1778, Roosen's Catechism, 1702).

There is no extended discussion of the holy kiss by the early Anabaptists. As has been pointed out, it signified communion to them and was observed as a symbol of fervent Christian love. However, how often the Anabaptists practiced this greeting or on what occasions we do not know. Nonetheless, we do have some clues. As has been pointed out, the "Confession of Faith According to the Holy Word of God" associated the kiss with the washing of the saints' feet, which shows antiquity in that use of the kiss by many Mennonite groups today. The kiss also obtained a place as the ordinary salutation among brethren and sisters as will be shown later. Thus is preserved, or rather revived, the apostolic twofold use of the holy kiss—ritualistic and salutatory.

The letters and incidents recorded in the Martyrs' Mirror are the important primary sources for our knowledge of the uses of the holy kiss as the salutation of love between Christians. Since the book deals exclusively with the persecutions of the brethren and sisters, the accounts of the kiss are in some relation to the events of their persecution. This does not mean that the salutation was observed only by those undergoing persecution, but rather it implies that it was a common observance by all the brethren and that it quite naturally carried over to their periods of trial and suffering, becoming a source of comfort and an expression of their unquenchable love.

There is one account of the kiss being given in prison. The early date of this account, 1546, makes it especially significant. This incident occurred in Styria, a province of Austria, and Vienna, showing that the kiss was practiced by the South German-Swiss group of Anabaptists as well as the Dutch followers of Menno. "They were then led in iron chains through Styria, and delivered into the bailey, at Vienna, to the jailer who said, 'Come, I will bring you into a vault where others of your brethren are'" (Mart. Mir. D 73, E 474). In the prison were Hans Stautdach and three fellow prisoners.

When they met, they embraced and kissed each other and praised God, who had brought them together for the glory of His name.

One account records the kiss being given by two brethren at their trial: "When John Claess and Lucas Lamberts, an old man of eighty-seven years, called grandfather, came to court they greeted one another with a kiss" (Mart. Mir. D 69, E 471).

A number of accounts of the kiss being given at the time of execution also appear in the Martyrs' Mirror. The first is another account of Austrian Anabaptists, this time having occurred at Bruck on the Mur, in Styria. The date of this account is even earlier, 1528, just three years after the Zürich Brethren broke with Zwingli, and just one year later than the Schleitheim Confession. "A circle having been formed, they all knelt down (Acts 7:60; 20:36) and earnestly prayed to God that they might finish this their evening sacrifice. They then arose and submitted to the sword. The executioner was sad; for he did not like to do it. The youngest of them all entreated his brethren, that since he felt of good cheer and bold, they should let him suffer the first pain; he then kissed them, and said, 'God bless you, my beloved brethren; today we shall all be together in Paradise' " (Mart. Mir. D 19, E 429).

The next account is also of early date, 1544, but occurred in the province of Overijssel, Netherlands: "When the time of suffering drew nigh, Maria said: 'Dear sister, heaven is opened for us; for what we now suffer for a little while we shall forever be happy with our bridegroom.' Then they gave each other the kiss of peace. Thereupon they prayed together to God . . ." (Mart. Mir. D 66, E 467). Note the interesting tendency to refer to the kiss as the "kiss of peace," which is not Biblical, but a denotation which arose in the early church. This use of the term "kiss of peace" by the early Anabaptists must be either a carry-over from the Roman Church or a result of reading the early Church Fathers. There is an account of the kiss being given by Gotthard of Nonnenberg and Peter Kramer, of the duchy of Berg on the Lower Rhine, at their execution in 1558. "When the time had come for them to die, they rose to their feet, called upon God in heaven, and as brethren in Christ, and as a token of brotherly love and unity, kissed each other with the sweet kiss of peace, as those that were united with God, and thus were beheaded standing" (Mart. Mir. D 208, E 591).

The next account concerns two men apprehended in Cologne and executed in 1562: "And thus George was compelled to be the first one to be made ready for an offering. When he was ready for death, he took brotherly leave from William and they kissed each other with a holy kiss of love. Then George was thrown overboard" (Mart. Mir. D 296, E 662).

The fervent love and unmistakable Christian witness of the Christian martyrs motivated their persecutors to attempt to prevent their witness of love at Deventer in the Netherlands in 1571. "Thus Claes was brought upon the scaffold first and he fell upon his knees to prayer, but the executioner lifted him up, for the Spaniards would not tolerate it, and cried, 'Villains, villains!' But the six preceding ones, who had been offered up first, had performed their prayers, and had not been prevented from it; for they had been allowed to come together and also to kiss one another; but since the people said so much about it, how they had prayed, and so lovingly kissed one another, they had resolved to bring only one at a time on the scaffold. Now when Claes stood at the stake, they also brought Ydse upon the scaffold and he forced his way to Claes and kissed him. Hence the Spaniards clamored again and were enraged" (Mart. Mir. D 554, E 887).

In reading the accounts of the holy kiss among the early Anabaptists there arises the problem of whether it was practiced promiscuously between the sexes. In some accounts one cannot be sure from the text whether the kiss is exchanged between men and women, in a few promiscuity is certain, and in others the kiss is definitely limited to members of the same sex as it is today in Mennonite groups (Mart. Mir. D 106, 548, E 503, 882).

Besides being referred to in the narration of the martyrdoms of the Anabaptist Christians, the kiss is often alluded to in the letters of the martyrs to their relatives and fellow Christians. Sometimes the kiss is referred to directly; at other times, while the word "kiss" itself does not occur, its meaning is readily inferred. The holy kiss is described in eleven narrations in the Martyrs' Mirror, in 16 letters the word "kiss" appears, while in at least 95 letters the kiss is alluded to by some term other than "kiss." Two letters from Hans Bret dated 1576 and written at Antwerp illustrate the use of the kiss as the Christian salutation in correspondence: "Thus dear brother, I would write you more, but I have no more paper now. Farewell, the Lord be with you and I greet you now, dear brother, with a holy kiss, for I think that you will see my face no more" (Mart. Mir. D 734, E 1043). In this letter Hans's use of the "holy" kiss would seem to be somewhat out of line with its general connotation given by Menno and the Strasbourg Discipline of 1568 as signifying the communion of the brotherhood, since as the title of this letter indicates, his brother "had not yet come to the knowledge of the truth." The other letter is addressed to his mother: "My dear mother, I greet you with a holy kiss of love (I Pet. 5:14), for I think that you will see me no more in this flesh nor I you, my mother."

The following two illustrations of the kiss used in correspondence are more orthodox in their brotherhood dimension, being limited to the household of faith. The first is from a letter entitled "A Letter from Jerome Segers to the Brethren and Sisters" (Antwerp, 1551): "Greet one another with a holy kiss of peace. Jude 21, 24, 25; I Cor. 16:20." The second is from a letter written from Cologne in 1558 by Thomas von Imbroich: "Greet all the saints with the kiss of love, and all who love the Lord Jesus, and tell them to be kind; for God is the Hero and Captain, who so faithfully succors in time of need" (Mart. Mir. D 115, 200, E 511, 581).

A characteristic of the strong emphasis on the definition of the brotherhood and the fervent love within it is that members of the same family saw their heavenly relationship just as important or more important than their earthly relationship.

Thus when Joris Wippe salutes his wife with the kiss he refers to her both as wife and as "sister in the Lord" (The Hague, 1558): "Everlasting joy, grace, and peace from God our heavenly Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, and the joy of the Holy Spirit, in your heart and conscience, be with you, my beloved wife and sister in the Lord; I wish it to you as an affectionate salutation in the Lord and to all our dear children whom God has given to us; to Him be praise forever and ever. Amen" (Mart. Mir. D 205, E 586).

The form of the greeting in these letters very often follows very closely the Biblical texts from which its use is drawn. Sometimes the Biblical references are even given by the authors: "I greet all believers with a holy kiss. Greet one another with a kiss of love." "Receive one another with a holy kiss of love." "Greet one another with a kiss of charity: Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus. Amen. I Pet. 5:14" (Mart. Mir. D 338, 341, 366, E 697, 700, 711).

It is then evident that among the early Biblical Anabaptists or Mennonites the holy kiss was frequently practiced both as the common salutation among Christians and as a part of certain rituals, among which footwashing was one. It is further evident that this kiss of peace was the sign or symbol of the communion or brotherhood, that, in essence, its use defined brotherhood.

The history of the kiss from the time of the early Anabaptists until the last century is difficult to trace because of the scruples of many groups against keeping written records. However, it was brought with the early Mennonite immigrants to America and has been preserved, so that today it is still practiced to a greater or less degree by a large portion of the North American Mennonites.

The main body of American Mennonites, the Mennonite Church (MC), composed largely of South German and Swiss immigrants, seemingly has always held to the practice of the kiss. In fact, toward the end of the 19th century, Mennonite ministers were speaking of seven ordinances having been enjoined by the Bible, of which the holy kiss was one. In 1921 the General Conference of the Mennonite Church (MC) declared the kiss an ordinance to be observed by all believers, in a statement of faith entitled "Christian Fundamentals."

One early reference to the kiss by American Mennonites occurs in a letter from three ministers of Eastern Pennsylvania, Andreas Ziegler, Isaac Kolb, and Christian Funk, to several ministers of Crefeld, Germany, and Utrecht, Netherlands, dated 1773. The kiss is here mentioned as one of the privileges denied those who are disciplined for marrying outside the church: "Concerning marriages, it is not approved nor permitted that any one should marry outside the community, and in the case it occurs, the person, whether brother or sister, is notified to withdraw from the fellowship, the brotherly council, the kiss of peace, and the Lord's Supper, until they have made expiation to the community" (MQR III, 1929, 230).

A further proof that the withholding of the brotherly kiss from transgressors was a part of church discipline in the Mennonite Church (MC) is found in an interesting decision of the committee of bishops called in to deal with the problem of Jacob Wisler in the Yellow Creek Church, Elkhart Co., Ind., dated Oct. 17, 1871, as follows: "John M. Christophel is asked to acknowledge that he erred in greeting with the kiss one who had been set back from full fellowship by the counsel of the brotherhood."

In the Mennonite Church (MC) today the kiss is observed in a number of situations. It accompanies the footwashing service, the reception of members into the church by baptism or reclamation, and the ordination of ministers, and is the salutation among believers in general. In all cases it is practiced only by members of the same sex. In the footwashing service the men and women are separated, and after each brother (sister) has washed his neighbor's feet the kiss is exchanged. Restriction of sex in the kiss is maintained in the reception of sisters into the church by a sister, often the bishop's wife, taking the newly baptized or restored sister by the hand and giving her the kiss. The salutatory kiss which originally was the ordinary salutation among all the brethren has declined somewhat in its use until in some congregations its practice is limited to the ministers and deacons, who observe it at every church service.

The Mennonite Church (MC) through its periodicals (Herald of Truth, 1864-1905; Gospel Witness, 1905-8; Gospel Herald, 1908 until the present) has constantly and consistently held the ordinance of the kiss before its members and defined its meaning for them and their duty to the brotherhood and to Christ to practice it. Most of the volumes of the Gospel Herald contain at least one article on the kiss. Undoubtedly this fact coupled with constant preaching on the subject from the pulpit and in Sunday schools has been a determining factor in the continuance of the use of the kiss in the Mennonite Church today. The kiss is emphasized (1) as a command of the apostles, and (2) as the sign and symbol of brotherhood. The first emphasis stresses obedience to Scripture and discipleship, the legal aspect of the Gospel. The emphasis on the kiss as the sign and symbol of brotherhood stresses the freedom and spontaneity of the fellowship of the Gospel.

There has been a tendency especially in the more liberal conferences of the Mennonite Church (MC) for the salutatory holy kiss to be limited to the ministers, for the lay members to observe it less often among themselves, and for ministers to observe it less often when meeting lay members than when meeting other ministers. Because of this the kiss is accused of having become "ceremonial" and having lost its original spontaneity. The secular greeting has taken the place of the holy kiss where the latter has been dropped, aiding the breakdown of the concept of the brotherhood which led to the dropping of the use of the kiss as the common salutation. "In this age when the love of many shall wax cold, it is becoming more and more common to omit the kiss . . . and how cold and formal the words of the greeting, the shallow 'hello' of the world being substituted for the hearty 'God bless you,' or 'Peace be with us!' And, oh how much encouragement we miss" (Gospel Herald XXI, 1928, 498).

In contrast to the Mennonite (MC), the "conservative" conferences such as Old Order Amish Mennonites, Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites, Church of God in Christ Mennonites (Holdeman), Reformed Mennonites, and Conservative (Amish) Mennonites have maintained either an absolute or a greater relative separation from all other groups and influences. In general they have placed a greater emphasis on the Mennonite heritage and tradition, opposing almost all advances and thus manifesting a tendency toward maintaining a distinctive and separate culture. In this separate and controlled environment it has been much easier for the brotherhood to maintain such practices as the kiss. In these groups the kiss is practiced universally in its ritualistic sense at baptism and footwashing. As the Christian salutation it is practiced almost universally among all members, lay as well as ministers, except in the Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Conference where it is only practiced between brethren and ministers at the invitation of the ministers. There is a tendency arising even in such a conservative group as the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, toward weakening in the practice of the kiss. In general this group of churches has not been active in publication, nor has it attempted to maintain its heritage in this manner; they have relied, as has been stated, on a strict separation and discipline to maintain their heritage and tradition. One striking exception to this statement is the well-written summary of doctrine published by the Reformed Mennonites entitled Christianity Defined. This book contains a well-written three-page discussion of the holy kiss, as well as discussion of a number of other areas of faith and practice.

In the General Conference Mennonite Church the practice of the kiss is very rare. No mention is made of the holy kiss in either the Handbuch für Prediger (1893) or the new Minister's Manual (1950). The Eastern District which broke away from the Franconia Mennonite (MC) Conference in 1847 has but two congregations which practice the kiss, both of which left the Mennonite (MC) communion rather recently: The Richfield, Pa., congregation which joined the Eastern District of the General Conference in 1941, and the Stirling Avenue, Kitchener, Ont., congregation which joined in 1947. Both these churches observe the holy kiss at footwashing.

When the kiss was dropped in the Eastern District is uncertain, but it is significant that the kiss is not mentioned in the Ordnung der Mennonitischen Gemeinschaft, which was drawn up at the time of the break with the Franconia Conference (MC) in 1847.

The practice of the salutatory brotherly kiss among the Mennonites of Dutch-Prussian-Russian background has not been investigated. There are indications that this practice was observed quite generally during the first centuries, but was gradually confined to the ministers and such occasions as baptismal services. The final stage is that the use of the brotherly kiss is given up. This stage was reached by all Mennonites of Holland and the urban churches of Germany. Among the rural churches of Prussia, Poland, and Russia the second stage, that is, the use of the kiss among the ministers, was generally still in use. This is to some extent still the case among the Mennonites who have come from Russia and have settled in South America and Canada. Occasionally an old practice along these lines can be noticed among the Mennonites of the United States. A few years ago when the deacons of the Friedenstal Mennonite Church at Durham, Kan., which originated in Poland, extended a call to a minister, they bade him farewell following their visit by giving him the brotherly kiss. This was no doubt an old tradition among this group, going back to the early centuries. In the Bethel Mennonite Church, Inman, Kan., male members were kissed by the minister when they were received into the church by baptism or church letter until some ten years ago, when this practice was dropped.

In Russia the common use of the brotherly kiss was reintroduced, retained, and re-emphasized among the Mennonite Brethren, who originated in 1860. Among the Mennonite Brethren in America as well as the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, and Church of God in Christ Mennonites, the practice of the salutatory brotherly kiss is still in use although not as generally as formerly.

The Central District Conference of the General Conference is the result of a split in the Amish Mennonite Church in Illinois, begun in 1871 and completed in 1899. With its conservative Amish background the Central District has maintained footwashing and the kiss in connection with it. The holy kiss as the Christian salutation has also been maintained until recently. However, due to lack of teaching on the subject, its use is declining among many people, especially the young people.

The Evangelical Mennonite Conference is another Mennonite body which arose through a split in the Amish Mennonite Church, in 1864. In this conference the kiss is practiced at footwashing by those who participate, but the salutatory use of the kiss has been lost.

In the Mennonite Brethren Church in the United States the kiss is not the general Christian salutation, but it is observed in footwashing services. However, in Canada, where footwashing has been dropped, it is observed in the communion service.

Among the European Mennonites the observance of the kiss has completely died out in Holland and Germany, but persists in France and Switzerland, though only as a salutatory kiss (not universal however), footwashing having almost completely died out where it was practiced (Amish background congregations in France) and never having been practiced in Switzerland and South Germany (except scattered congregations of Amish background). In Holland the kiss was observed by conservative groups like the Groningen Old Flemish into the 18th century. J.Re.

Mart. Mir., passim; Menno Simons, Writings, passim; Christianity Defined (third edition, Lancaster, 1940); A. E. Crawley, "Kissing," Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics VII (N.Y., 1920); E. Venables, "Kiss," Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, edited by W. Smith, II (London, 1888); J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament (N.Y., 1930).

Kist, Jacob Jansen: see Jacob Jansz Sche(e)demaker.

Kistenmaeker, Wilhelm: see Willem de Kistenmaker.

Kitchener-Waterloo, Ont., twin cities with a population of 35,657 and 9,025 respectively, is the center of the largest community of Mennonites in Ontario. The first Mennonites came to Waterloo County from eastern Pennsylvania in 1800 and soon occupied a large part of the virgin land of the county, particularly in Waterloo and Woolwich townships. In 1824 an Amish community was established in the western part of the county, Wilmot Township. In 1872-75 a schism occurred in the Mennonite community which resulted in the establishment of the Ontario Conference of the United Missionary Church, a large congregation (Bethany) being established in the city of Kitchener, and several smaller ones in county towns. In 1889-90 a conservative schism occurred in which much of the Woolwich district withdrew to form the Old Order Mennonite group. In 1925 the large Stirling Avenue group withdrew from the First Mennonite (MC) congregation, and later joined the General Conference Mennonite Church. The immigration from Russia in 1922-25 (supplements of 1930-31 and 1947-50) led to the formation of strong General Conference and Mennonite Brethren congregations. Thus the Kitchener-Waterloo community in 1955 represents a variegated pattern of Mennonitism.

In the city of Kitchener proper are located the following congregations. First Mennonite (MC) 1807, 579 members; Stirling Avenue (GCM) 1925, 445; Mennonite Brethren 1925, 375; Bethany (UMC) 1877, 323; Evangel United Mennonite Church (UMC) 1949, 45. In Waterloo are located Waterloo Mennonite (MC) 1854, 281; Waterloo-Kitchener (GCM) 1925, 390. Thus the total membership of the seven churches in the twin cities is 2,439. In addition there are 15 other MC churches in the county with 1,894 members, a large Old Order Mennonite community with 1,730 members in 14 meeting places, and three other U.M.C. churches with 297 members; at least one of the Amish Mennonite churches with 521 members can be reckoned in the Kitchener-Waterloo area. The total of 6,881 baptized members, of whom probably 2,300 live in the twin cities, constitutes one of the largest compact urban-rural Mennonite communities in North America.

In Kitchener are located two Bible schools: the Ontario Mennonite Bible School and Bible Institute (MC) and Emmanuel Bible College (UMC), the Golden Rule Book Store (MC), a branch of the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, and Rockway Mennonite (MC) School, a church high school.

The Mennonite population has made a major contribution to the Kitchener-Waterloo community over the 150 years of its settlement there. Not many industries have been established by Mennonites, the largest possibly being the Hallman Organ Co. (MC) manufacturing electric organs. Earlier Jacob Y. Shantz (MBC; 1828-1909) had been a leading industrialist and city builder. The excellent agricultural production of the county has been largely due to the Mennonites, who continue to be a major element in the rural area. (ML II, 501 f.) H.S.B.

Kitchener First Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Ontario Conference, located at 800 King Street East, Kitchener, Ont., had its origin in the log church built by Benjamin Eby in 1813 in the southeast corner of the large cemetery adjoining the present building. This was the first building erected solely for religious worship in Waterloo County. Known simply as "Ben Eby's," it stood until 1854, when the "Christian Eby" frame church replaced it. In 1902 this structure in turn was replaced by a brick building which still forms the main part of the present edifice, known until 1917 as the Berlin Mennonite Church. In 1928 and 1949 this church was enlarged, and can now seat 1,000 persons.

This congregation was the second to be organized in Waterloo County and has remained the central and strongest congregation in the Ontario Conference. The peak population in the Ontario Conference in the early period was 2,500 souls in 1840. How many of these the "Ben Eby" church could claim is uncertain, but the log church with its frame annex might have held 250. The low point in membership was reached just before the J. S. Coffman revivals of the early 1890's. In 1898 the membership of the congregation was 195. In 1924, following the division which resulted in the founding of the Stirling Avenue Mennonite Church (GCM), the membership was 123, but by 1956 had risen to 587. (The Stirling Church, which also had 123 in 1924, had 457 in 1954.) The causes of this division were differences of opinion on polity, church government, and the regulation of attire, the new Stirling group desiring congregational church government rather than conference authority. Both churches have prospered and relations between them are cordial.

A serious division had occurred two generations earlier (1872-75) which resulted in the formation in 1877 of the Bethany United Missionary Church, which had a membership of 323 in 1953, and which has always been the central and largest congregation of the Ontario U.M.C. conference. Thus in 1953-54 there were three Kitchener congregations with a total membership of 1,347, all of which sprang from the original Benjamin Eby congregation.

The leading ministers of First Church and dates of ordination are as follows: Benjamin Eby, Nov. 27, 1809; Abraham C. Weber, 1850; Christian Eby, 1854; Daniel Wismer, 1860; Samuel S. Bowman, 1878; Eli S. Hallman, 1897; Urias K. Weber, 1907. In 1924 C. F. Derstine, already a minister and bishop, became pastor, a position he still holds (1954). John H. Hess served as associate pastor 1949-56, and Edgar Metzler 1957- . Outstanding deacons have been Benjamin Shoemaker 1890-1911, George A. Weber 1911-41, John Kehl 1942- . Isidore B. Snyder was chorister 1882-1922, and Titus L. Kolb 1914-49. M. C. Cressman (q.v.) was a Sunday-school teacher for 57 years and an active lay leader.

Before 1890 all services had been in German.

Up to 1870 German was no handicap to the growth of the church, but in 1870-90 it undoubtedly had much bearing on the decline in membership. The decline in the use of German began with the Coffman revivals of 1890-91, which were all in English. With the ordination of E. S. Hallman in 1897 all evening services were in English, though morning services were chiefly in German. After 1907 the decline in German was most pronounced and German was then preached only in alternate Sunday morning services until the termination of German preaching in 1924.

Revivals have long been and still are a feature of the work of this church. The Coffman revivals furnished most of the leaders for this congregation for the ensuing 30 years. In 1907 Bishop S. F. Coffman began a winter Bible school in this church which has grown into the large and flourishing Ontario Mennonite Bible School (q.v.). In 1928 a vacation Bible school was begun in this church. It was the first summer school both in this city and among Canadian Mennonites. It has greatly flourished, drawing pupils from all denominations. The membership is 70 per cent urban and 30 per cent rural. The racial background is chiefly Pennsylvania German. J.B.C.

J. B. Cressman, "History of the First Mennonite Church of Kitchener, Ontario," MQR XIII (July and October 1939); Ezra Eby, History of Waterloo Township (Kitchener, 1895).

Kitchener Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Kitchener, Waterloo Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian Conference of Mennonite Brethren churches, was organized on May 25, 1925, under the name "Molotschna Mennoniten-Brüder-Gemeinde," with Jacob P. Friesen as leader. On Nov. 20, 1932, the church was reorganized under its present name with H. H. Janzen as pastor. The membership in 1954 was 375; most of the members live in the city. For a number of years the congregation used a rented hall for its meetings, but later bought a church which is still being used. The following ministers have served the church: J. P. Friesen, J. W. Reimer, J. P. Wiens, P. Klassen, H. Konrad, H. H. Janzen, D. Klassen, I. Ewert, J. Sudermann, H. Thielmann, Frank C. Peters, and J. J. Toews, the present pastor. (ME I, †.) H.H.J.

Kitzbühel, a town (pop. 2,000) in Tirol, Austria. Few places in Tirol had as many Anabaptists as Kitzbühel, in the archbishopric of Salzburg. To be sure, the Tirolean government had on Nov. 28, 1527, demanded that the archbishop assist in eliminating the sect, and had issued orders to the subordinate authorities to that effect; but these public servants lacked either the interest or the power to halt the movement. Instead, refugee Anabaptists from Salzburg and other parts of Tirol met here.

A number of them were seized in March 1528; by April 200 had been arrested. Many were dismissed when they recanted; but 110 refused to do so. An order of April 2 promised pardon to all but the preachers and those who had talked about Christian liberty, community of goods, or against the sacraments; the houses where they met and observed communion should be burned and torn down, unless it involved innocent persons.

At the same time strict orders were sent out to catch "the priest" Paul, who was preaching in the community, and his disciple, Hans Rott, who was preaching in the mountains of Reutte and in the castle of Helene von Freiberg at Münichau. Proceedings were started against this lady, and on May 5, 1528, 106 persons "spotted with Anabaptism" were ordered to appear in the cemetery of Kitzbühel to make a solemn recantation and receive the penance they must pay. Thirty-six were doubtful, and were treated "kindly and painfully"; 13 were easily persuaded, the others only after long torture.

On May 9 the iron-miner Hans Schwaighofer and Hans Platzer of Aschlberg were tried, and on Aug. 12 executed. While they were on the road to the site of the execution "Thomas Herrmann (q.v.) of Böhmisch-Waidhofen spoke some sharp words," and was himself called before the court and condemned to death. At this trial the jurors said it was hard for them to try such a case, "for they did not know whether the verdict would be accepted by the people." The consequence of this was that the judge was instructed to get jurors from a distance for such cases. This may have been the occasion for the mandate of Feb. 5, 1529, stipulating that the verdict should not be pronounced according to personal opinion, but according to regulations.

Since the burning of Anabaptist houses caused damage to others, a notice was sent to Kitzbühel on April 30, 1529, that henceforth only houses in the country should be burned.

The care of the children of fugitive Anabaptists became a problem. In Kitzbühel alone there were 40 to 50. They were kept in a special home until they were able to take care of themselves.

One such fugitive, who forsook wife, child, and goods, was George Grünwald (q.v.) of Kitzbühel, the author of the song, "Kommt her zu mir, spricht Gottes Sohn," which can be found in many Anabaptist manuscripts (Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 128). In September 1529 Grünwald was at Lackstatt in Bavaria, Germany, and was seized there and executed in 1530.

Some of the Anabaptists who had recanted at the cemetery had again joined the group; they were seized with some others who had assembled for worship on the wooded mountain slopes, and dealt with in accordance with the mandates. Many of them had been won by a former chaplain, Jakob Partzner; he himself escaped to Augsburg. Seized there, he was returned to Kitzbühel, and confessed that he had worked as an Anabaptist in Kitzbühel, Rattenberg, and Kufstein, and was now sincerely sorry. He recanted on Aug. 29, 1530, thereby saving his life.

Helene von Freyberg (q.v.) was also involved with Anabaptists; she was considered "at the bottom of the matter, that so many persons had been baptized and put to death." After long hesitation she recanted in 1534. Christina Häring (q.v.), on the contrary, remained steadfast and was executed in 1533.

In order to instruct those Anabaptists who had been found in and around Kitzbühel in May 1530, the Franciscan monk Tonauer of Schwaz preached missionary sermons for four weeks. Then on July 30 the orders of the government for the discovery and eradication of the Anabaptists throughout the country were announced. These were the days in which Hutter began his extensive work in Tirol and Moravia. One of the questions the government asked local authorities was: why were suspected preachers allowed to preach so long at some places like Kitzbühel?

On June 19, 1533, the authorities reported to the ruler that the Anabaptists in the Kitzbühel region had been wiped out; but they erred. In autumn of 1533 it was reported that a priest, Paul Kessler, in Kitzbühel was taking a wanton attitude on infant baptism. Of course, the Anabaptists were no longer numerous in Tirol; but persecution in Moravia drove many Tirolean Anabaptists back to Austria, and even Hutter's death in 1536 did not end the movement.

On Feb. 22, 1544, the government reported to Brixlegg that the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia were planning to lead the Anabaptists to Moravia the following spring, and that a large number had reported for emigration in Kitzbühel. But the next few years were relatively quiet. In May 1557 a native of Kitzbühel, Hans Kräl (q.v.), was seized in Taufers and brought to judgment. For two years he lay in a dungeon, until he won his freedom. In 1561 he was again in Kitzbühel, and reported to the brotherhood in Moravia the death of Mändl, Rack, and Kotter. The fear inspired by these executions did not last long.

Soon other Anabaptists from Kitzbühel were taken to court. They reported that Kräl was their leader. He writes, "There is not an hour that we are safe from their bloodthirsty hands. They search and spy day and night, where they might seize us." Hence in the next year it is Hans Kräl and Leonhard Dax (q.v.) on whose capture the authorities were bent. Well-to-do persons from Kitzbühel migrated to Moravia in 1564.

Thus in spite of all the measures passed, the Anabaptist movement in Kitzbühel did not die out. The more freely they were allowed to move in Moravia, the stronger the train of immigrants became. Hans Kräl, having won a reputation for bravery on his bold missionary journeys in the highlands, was chosen leader of the thriving church in Moravia. In 1592 the Anabaptist Georg Pintlechner from the territory of Kitzbühel was reported "unwilling to be corrected of his error. If he remains obstinate, proceed according to the mandates."

In the 1590's the movement continued to grow weaker, nor is there any mention of Anabaptist propaganda in Kitzbühel. The number of those who testified to their faith with their blood in Kitzbühel, according to a manuscript of 1581 found in the metropolitan library in Gran, was 68, certainly a stately number for so small a town. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 55, 107; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 41 f., 64, 183; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 57, 89, 154, 234; Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML II, 502-4.

Klaar Vertoog dienende tot wederlegginge van de ongefondeerde beschuldigingen van Franciscus Elgersma . . . (n.p., 1689). This anonymous book refutes the objections of F. Elgersma (q.v.), a Dutch Reformed minister, who had attacked the Mennonites and especially Foecke Floris, accusing them of Socinianism (q.v.). As to the author, C. B. Hylkema and W. J. Kühler took Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) to be the author, but H. W. Meihuizen thinks that Claes Stapel (q.v.) is the author. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 162.

Klaas Tigler-Leen, a foundation for the financial support to be given to young people, descendants of Klaas Tigler, who might wish to study at a Dutch university. All branches of study can be chosen, except training for the Roman Catholic priesthood and military science. The founder was Klaas Tigler (q.v.) (1724-1811) of Leeuwarden, a preacher of the Mennonite congregation in his home town. In 1832-1920 the Leeuwarden Mennonite church board administered the foundation. Among about 50 beneficiaries there have been eight Mennonite theological students, whose educational expenses have been paid by the fund. vdZ.

Gedenkboek Honderdjarig bestaan Klaas Tigler Leen te Leeuwarden, 1832-1932.

Klaasen, Gerrit, an elder of the Old Flemish Mennonite congregation of Danzig, West Prussia, Germany, whose years of serving are unknown, stayed 1627-29 in the Netherlands, especially at Amsterdam and Rotterdam, to arbitrate in disputes within the congregations. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 423 f.) vdZ.

Klaassen (Klassen, Klaeszen, Klasen), a Mennonite family: see Claassen.

Klaassen, Eije: see Clasen, Eje.

Klaassen, Jakob Abramovitch, a Mennonite teacher, b. Aug. 3, 1847, in the Bergtal settlement, Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, the son of Abram Klaassen, the volost secretary, d. Dec. 16, 1919, in Rosental near Chortitza. In 1875 he married Agnes Sudermann, to whom were born six children. In the history of Mennonite education in the Ukraine he occupies a prominent place. He taught for 46 years. At the age of 17, upon completion of the course in the Chortitza Zentralschule, he began his career as a teacher in the elementary school, and 16 years later transferred to the Chortitza Zentralschule (q.v.), where he taught in 1881-95.

Klaassen was a man of unusual capacity for work and self-discipline, continuing his own education until he was at the head of the teaching profession among the Russian Mennonites. He was an earnest Christian, rooted deeply in Mennonitism in thought, feeling, and deed. He was an ardent advocate of girls' schools, and helped to establish them among the Russian Mennonites. The rapid growth of the Chortitza Mädchenschule (q.v.), where he taught the last 18 years of his life, was principally his achievement. His teaching subjects were religion, German, Russian, history, and drawing. (ML II, 504.) H.E.

Klaassen, Johann, b. March 17, 1872, in Ladekopp, district of Halbstadt, Taurida, Russia, d. June 25, 1950, at Djakarta (Jakarta, formerly Batavia), Indonesia, a Mennonite missionary. Initially he was trained as a businessman, but in 1893 he began his missionary studies, first at St. Chrischona near Basel, Switzerland, then at Rotterdam in the Netherlands. In the meanwhile he had been ordained as a preacher in Russia (June 9, 1896). After he had finished his studies, being appointed missionary by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, he sailed for Java, now Indonesia, then Dutch East Indies, where he arrived on the field in March 1899. He was active in Margaredjo until June 1905 when he returned to Europe because of illness. In his first Indonesian period he had been married July 6, 1903, to Magdalena Horsch from Gelchsheim, Germany, sister of Michael and John Horsch. He remained in Europe until August 1908. The European period was devoted to medical studies and trips in Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and Russia to arouse interest in missions. Back at Java he was in charge of a large field, serving Margaredjo, Kedung-Pendjalin, Kaju-Apu, and Pati. After 1910, when missionary Johann Hübert had come back from Europe, he served only at Kaju-Apu and Pati. Here he worked with much blessing as an evangelist, as a teacher, and also doing some medical work. From 1913 to 1923 he lived in Europe, at first at Lautenbach, then mostly in Heilbronn, Germany. But though far from the mission field, he did not forget his "brown brethren" and traveled widely to preach and to collect money for the mission work. Because of the war and political changes in Russia after 1914 he was unable to enter his native country and lost touch with its congregations. He became a German citizen in 1915.

From April 1923 to Jan. 8, 1925, Klaassen again was on the Java mission field, now serving Margaredjo and the leper colony of Donorodjo. In the spring of 1925, after having visited the Dutch Mennonite mission of Pakanten on the island of Sumatra, he returned to Germany. The following years were devoted to mission promotion until he returned to the mission field for the fourth time in 1939. On the mission field he found his children: Helene, a nurse, married in 1926 to the missionary Hermann Schmitt (q.v.), Maria, also a nurse, and Martha, married to the missionary Otto Stauffer (q.v.). He re-entered Java as a widower, his wife having died in 1929. He now lived mostly in the home of Hermann Schmitt in Kudus. After a year of happiness and blessings among his relatives, bitter years followed. At the outbreak of the war between Germany and the Netherlands both Schmitt and Stauffer, being German subjects, were interned in a camp and in 1942 both perished when their ship, transporting them from Java to India, was torpedoed. Other calamities followed: hostilities of the Mohammedans, the Japanese invasion in 1942, and 1945 the troubles which accompanied the political movement of independence of the republic of Indonesia loosed from the Dutch motherland, the communistic disturbances, the attacks of fanatical Mohammedan bands against missionaries and native Christians, and the guerrilla wars of 1948-49. In all these troubles and disasters Klaassen remained loyal to his faith and continued to serve his Lord as much as he could. On Jan. 6, 1950, he took leave of his beloved mission field, delivering a short address in the church of Kelet. It was his intention to go to his daughter's home in California, but while in Djakarta he had a stroke and died there on June 25, 1950.

Klaassen was a man of steadfast simple piety, whose preaching and life was able to strike many hearts and to win over for the church of Christ a large number of Javanese natives. vdZ.

"Johann Klaassen," Gem.-Kal. 1952, 19-39, Part I autobiographical, Part II by Maria Klaassen, Part III by Gerhard Hein; reports of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association.

Klaassen, Martin, a teacher in the village of Köppenthal near Saratov, South Russia, wrote the book, Geschichte der wehrlosen taufgesinnten Gemeinden von den Zeiten der Apostel bis auf die Gegenwart (Danzig, 1873), when exemption from military service was at issue in Russia. His purpose was to follow nonresistance as a Christian principle through the history of the church, and by giving a connected historical account of nonresistant brotherhoods who remained true to the Gospel of Jesus, to encourage the Mennonites of his day to hold fast to the principle. He divides the history of these brotherhoods into three periods: The first period begins early in the third century, when the first "Anabaptists" opposed the secularized church, and extends to Peter Waldus; the second period extends to Menno Simons, and the third to 1873. He did not believe, however, that these various groups belonged together. Their stamp of connectedness derives from their adherence to the Word of God. This book was written with warm devotion and was not without its effect. (ML II, 504.) H.Q.

Klaassen, Michael (1860-1934), a Mennonite (GCM) minister, the son of Martin Klaassen (q.v.), was born Aug. 26, 1860, in Köppenthal, Trakt settlement, Russia. He received his secondary education under Jacob Penner, was baptized by David Hamm in 1877, and followed his parents to Central Asia in 1880. Here he married Margaretha Janzen. In 1885 they came to America, spending the first years in Beatrice, Neb. In 1894 they moved to Bessie, Okla., where he was elected minister of the Sichar Mennonite (GCM) Church in 1896. In 1901 he was elected elder of the Herold Mennonite Church, which had been organized in 1899. For 17 years he taught German and Bible in the elementary school there. He was active as an itinerant minister in Oklahoma. Because of the hardships during World War I he went to Morden, Man., with a number of his church members in 1918, and there organized another Herold Mennonite Church. He died at Morden on Oct. 18, 1934. C.K.

J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen, 1902-1952 I (1954) 128.

Klaasz (Klaese, Klaase), Jacob (d. February 1658), was elder of the Frisian congregation of West-Zaandam 1609-58 and also served the Frisian congregation of Westzaan; in 1640 he had some difficulties at the conference of Frisian churches in North Holland because contrary to the conservative views of most Frisian congregations, he was willing to promote a union with the Flemish Mennonites, whom he esteemed as good Christians just as well as the Frisians. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 865; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 83 f., 99, 102, 191.

Klaasz, Jan, also called Jan Klaasz (Klaaszen, Claessen) van Grouw, because he lived at Grouw, or Jan Claesen Backer, apparently because he was a baker, was a Mennonite preacher of the congregation at Grouw (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, where he served 1680 until at least 1702. He was a man of fragile health but of a strong spirit, and notwithstanding his poor education he was versed in theological problems. Jan Klaasz was a champion of rather liberal ideas and is not without reason called a Socinian (q.v.). He enthusiastically participated in the meeting of the Collegiants (q.v.) in his home town, where he met Mennonites, Reformed, and non-church men, all of a liberal trend. In his home church his ideas caused a schism; a group of more conservative members in 1696 separated from the main body and founded a congregation, called the Flemish congregation. The other and larger group was at first called the Jan Claesen congregation, later mostly the Waterlander congregation. Jan Klaasz's ideas are best known from his book De Leere der Doopsgezinden verdedigd (Amsterdam, 1702). The gist of his theological ideas is the view that the Holy Scriptures are secondary to the immediate action of the Spirit of God in the heart of the believers. Only when enlightened by the Spirit of God can one truly read the Scripture. Though Jan Klaasz does not deny the deity of Christ, he is more interested in His example than in His death. The doctrine of salvation by the satisfactory death of Christ is not a substantial part of his doctrines. With an astonishing knowledge of the old Mennonite literature he shows that among the early Anabaptists personal faith as a trust in God was more emphasized than the creed of the congregation; the well-known confessions are not to prescribe the faith, as is the opinion of some Mennonites, but they are merely directives for the members of the church. In these ideas of Jan Klaasz one will easily recognize the spiritualistic teachings of Galenus Abrahamsz, and indeed Galenus greatly influenced the preacher of Grouw, but the latter goes further and admits that some of his ideas agree with those of Socinus, which Galenus never did.

Not only in his home congregation but also elsewhere Jan Klaasz's opinions were opposed. Sometimes this happened in a peaceful way as in the correspondence which Jan Klaasz conducted with E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.) after 1695.

Klaasz's book, De Leere der Doopsgezinden, was directed against the "strange and false notions" (vreemde misduidingen) of Douwe Feddriks (q.v.), Mennonite preacher of Harlingen, who had called him an irascible troublemaker, breaker of peace, Socinian, Arian, and Spinozist, but who, according to Jan Klaasz, had more likeness to a Reformed (Calvinistic) than to a Mennonite preacher.

Some of his members at Grouw in 1695 lodged a complaint of Socinianism against him with the Reformed Classis at Leeuwarden, but apparently it did not result in a trial. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2946; Biogr. Wb. II, 56 f.; F. H. Pasma, De Doopsgezinden te Grouw (1930) 8-11 with a facsimile of a letter of Jan Klaasz; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 193, 226, 235 ff.; idem, Groningen I, 189; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1896) 216 ff.; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 183 f., 186.

Klaasz, Klaas, of Blokzijl: see Claesz, Claes.

Klaerken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Claerken Boucket.

Klaes: see also Claes.

Klaesken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Claesken.

Klampferer, Bernhard and Marx, brothers, who were sent by the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia to Vienna "to purchase the tools for their trade." When they were about to return they were imprisoned by the baron of Roggendorf on April 1, 1573, after a long argument with him on infant baptism; they proved from the Scriptures that children should not be baptized. When he saw that his preaching did not change their mind, he summoned the preacher from Krems (q.v.), Master Gangolf Wanger (Beck, 263); Wanger's efforts were equally futile. After an imprisonment of eleven weeks they were released and permitted to return to Moravia. Their dispute on baptism is recorded in a manuscript in the archives at Brno, "Verantwortung Brueder Marx vnd bernharts Klampffrern, zu wien in irer gefenckhnus vmb der warhait willen 1573." NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 261 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 362-65; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 471; ML II, 504.

Klampferer (Klampherer), Julius: see Gherlandi, Giulio.

Klassen, a Mennonite family: see Claassen.

Klassen, Cornelius Franz, b. Aug. 3, 1894, as the oldest of 13 children of Franz F. and Justine Wiebe Klassen in the New Samara, Russia, Mennonite settlement, d. at Gronau, Germany, May 8, 1954, an active lay worker in the Mennonite Brethren Church of Canada after 1928, an outstanding leader and administrator in Mennonite relief and colonization work in Russia, Canada, and Europe, and from 1945 to his death director of the refugee and resettlement service of the Mennonite Central Committee in Europe in behalf of the Russian and Danzig refugees. His early schooling was in the village school at Donskaya, Neu-Samara, where the family lived from 1900 on (his father operated a store there until 1918), and in the Zentralschule at Karassan, Crimea, 1907-10. After his baptism into the M.B. Church at Lugovsk in the summer of 1911, he entered (1912) the office of the Otto Deutz Co. of Moscow. His plan to study medicine was blocked by induction into the Mennonite forestry (CO) service 1915-17. Meanwhile he studied (1913-14) in Education under A. Tcheriyayev in St. Petersburg and then served a year as private tutor.

Klassen's first representative service for the Mennonite brotherhood was in 1917 as delegate to the All-Mennonite Congress at Ohrloff, and also to the Bundeskonferenz at Halbstadt, representing the Mennonite forestry service men. With Peter Froese he was delegated by the Congress to negotiate the release of Mennonites held in prison in Moscow by the Kerensky government, where his outstanding gifts of diplomacy and determination were demonstrated. With Froese he was chosen again at Ufa in 1920 to represent the Mennonites of East Russia and Siberia at Moscow, after having served as elected representative of the settlement of New Samara and Orenburg both at Moscow and to the Bashkir Republic at Sterlitamak (1918-19). He worked in Moscow in 1920-21 in the United Council of Religious Bodies and the Russian Relief Committee, and aided A. J. Miller in the negotiations with the Kremlin which laid the foundation for the American Mennonite Relief (AMR) of the MCC in Russia. He was active in the AMR program 1921-23, then shared in the organization (1923) and administration (vice-president) of the all-Mennonite organization, A.M.L.V. (Allrussischer Mennonitischer landwirtschaftlicher Verein, Peter Froese, president), which rendered great service both in the great emigration of 1922-25 to Canada, and in taking over the representation of the Mennonites of Russia after the church conference organization was suppressed by Moscow. In 1928 he left Russia, arriving at Winnipeg in December of that year.

In Canada Klassen entered the service of the Canadian Pacific Railway (1930-) and became the effective leader of the great work of paying off the entire transportation debt of those emigrants of 1922-25 whose trip from Russia to Canada had been financed by the loans from the C.P.R., over $1,000,000. He was also an active and intimate collaborator with David Toews (q.v.), of Rosthern, in the work of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization. He helped to organize the Mennonite Central Relief Committee of Western Canada (1940), and served as its first secretary-treasurer. He served on the board of trustees of the Gretna (Man.) Mennonite Collegiate Institute and the Mennonite Brethren Bible College in Winnipeg. He was a member of the Committee for General Welfare and Public Relations of the M.B. General Conference 1936- , and secretary of the Military Problems Committee of the Mennonite Churches of Western Canada 1941- . With David Toews he served as Canadian delegate to the Mennonite world conferences at Danzig (1930) and Amsterdam (1936), also as delegate and speaker at the succeeding world conferences at Goshen-Newton (1948) and Basel (1952). From 1944 he was a member of the Mennonite Central Committee, and a member of its Executive Committee from 1946.

Klassen's greatest work was as European Commissioner for Refugee Aid and Resettlement under the MCC in Europe from December 1945 until his death, during the last year serving also as general director of MCC work in Europe. He was the MCC representative on the important Liaison Committee with the German Mennonites, also on the Board of Trustees of the European Mennonite Bible School at Basel. He carried through with outstanding success the arduous and difficult assignment of negotiating with various governmental and international agencies (UNO, IRO, etc.) for the exit permits, transportation, and migration for over 10,000 Russian (plus several thousand Galicians and Danzigers) Mennonite refugees to Canada, Paraguay, and Uruguay. He was the father of the resettlement housing program for Danzig Mennonite refugees in Germany (Niederbiber, Espelkamp, Backnang, Enkenbach, and Wedel), which he administered to his death, and a prime figure in the establishment of the service of old people's homes at Leutesdorf (where he is buried), Enkenbach, and Pinneberg. During the difficult postwar period in Europe, particularly in Germany, he rendered a great service as a counselor and helper in the revival of Mennonite church life, in the establishment of such institutions as the Foyer Mennonite at Valdoie-Belfort, France, the Basel Glaubenskonferenz, and Der Mennonit, of which he served as editor during the last year before his death. Throughout his service he remained a devout, simple Christian of deep faith and dedicated life, an inspirer to thousands, both young and old, in both Europe and America. Through his tireless labors and extensive speaking tours on behalf of relief, he became not only the symbol of Mennonite relief and refugee service to Mennonites in general but a strong influence for better mutual understanding and co-operation among Mennonites across denominational lines. This found expression also in his participation in the work of the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA, of which he served as an associate editor from the beginning to his death.

He was survived by his wife Mary (nee Brieger) and four children, Harold, Walfried, Herbert, and Irmgard. His residence in Canada was in Winnipeg until 1948 when the family moved to Abbotsford, B.C.† H.S.B.

Der Mennonit VII (1954) 83-87; Mennonitische Rundschau LXXVII (May 19, 1954) No. 20, pp. 1-5.

Klassen, Jakob Jakovlevitch, b. April 7, 1856, d. Oct. 8, 1919, executive secretary (Kanzleiführer) of the Chortitza (Russia) Mennonite administration (Gebietsamt) after 1888. The volost administration was a sort of cabinet in miniature, headed by the volost elder, who was elected for a term of three years, assisted by an aide and an executive secretary. They had executive power to carry out orders and directions from the legislative body, the volost meeting, and from the Russian government. This executive organ had to look after nearly all the social aspects of life in the Mennonite villages, like the purchase of land for the landless, management of the "communal land," and provide for the orphans' care, fire insurance, tax for forestry service, and in a sense the higher schools of the settlement. Thus an executive secretary of the Gebietsamt who conducted the work for 34 years, with frequent changes of volost elders, was a very influential leader. Rich in experience, familiar with psychology of his people, progressive and democratic in temperament, Jakob Jakovlevitch Klassen gave direction and worked constructively for the Chortitza Mennonite community.

As a zealous promoter of education, Klassen took a leading part in all the educational efforts of his time. With his co-operation the Chortitza Mädchenschule (q.v.) was founded. With his support the Zentralschule was enlarged, and the normal school built. Thanks to his initiative, the daughter settlements joined Chortitza in the support of the normal school. He was one of the founders of the public library of Chortitza.

Klassen's death was a tragic one. During the period of terror from the Machno bands in 1919, he was sent by the community to Ekaterinoslav to seek aid to meet the violence of the bandits. Unsuccessful he returned to Chortitza, was seized by the bandits and shot near Alexandrovsk. (ML II, 504 f.)

Klassen, Johann J. (1872-1942), was active as teacher and minister of the Chortitza settlement, both in the city of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, and later as minister and elder in Canada. Born in the village of Kronsgarten in the vicinity of Ekaterinoslav, he completed the Zentralschule with its pedagogical course at Chortitza. For a year he taught in the elementary school at Chortitza, only to leave as the first student from Chortitza to study at the Theological Seminary at Basel, Switzerland. This was made possible through the scholarship founded by a Mennonite industrialist. After his return he taught for several years in the village of Schönhorst near Chortitza. In Schönhorst he was elected to the ministry in 1902. In 1905 he was called to teach in the Chortitza Zentralschule. After a few years he went to Ekaterinoslav (q.v.), where he replaced the well-known minister and editor of the Botschafter, David H. Epp (q.v.), who had moved with his paper to Berdyansk, as teacher and minister (1912-18). Again he returned to Chortitza, and as a minister in the congregation and teacher in the Zentralschule, he shared with his contemporaries the first severe postwars year with their anarchy, robberies, typhus, and hunger.

In 1923, when the doors were opened for emigration, Klassen with many others went to Canada. A large number of these immigrants established their homes on newly acquired farms, first in Saskatchewan, then also in the other provinces. J. J. Klassen soon began to gather these scattered groups in Saskatchewan into a congregation. The Nordheim congregation with its main station at Dundurn, about 30 miles from Saskatoon, was the first organized church of the immigrants, and J. J. Klassen was the first elder of these Mennonites to be ordained in Canada. The ordination was performed by David Toews (q.v.). Due to the sickness of his wife, J. J. Klassen spent the last years of his life in British Columbia. In an auto accident on Jan. 29, 1942, he here came to a tragic death.

Because of his deeply spiritual disposition, his unwavering faith on the one hand, and his calm unbiased judgment on the other hand, as well as his enormous Bible knowledge, he already in the old country and even more in the new country left a permanent influence on the Mennonite congregations. J.G.R.

Klassen, Johann Peter (1868-1947), a leading elder and writer of the Russian and Canadian Mennonites (GCM), was born May 27, 1868, at Schönwiese near Alexandrovsk (Saporozhe), Ukraine, Russia, the son of Peter and Aganetha Klassen. He was married twice: first to Katharina Wieler (7 children), and in 1911 to Katharina Dyck (2 children). After completing the Chortitza Zentralschule he served as village schoolteacher for five years. He served the Kronsweide (q.v.) Mennonite congregation as preacher from 1904 and as elder from 1907 until his emigration to Canada in 1923, with residence however in Schönwiese. In 1928 he founded the Schönwiese (First Mennonite) church in Winnipeg, serving as its elder until his retirement in 1939. He died at Vancouver on May 25, 1947, and is buried at Winnipeg.

Klassen was a rather prolific writer, chiefly of poems. J. H. Janzen calls him "the most productive and most natural of [the Russo-Canadian Mennonite] poets." He adds, "he writes mostly for existing melodies, so his poems at the moment they appear are already songs . . . . An inexhaustible and unconquerable joy speaks out of all his poems . . . , even though he has suffered much from an infirmity." His published booklets of poems include Aehrenlese (Winnipeg, n.d., 73 p.), Brocken (Winnipeg, 1932, 32 p.), Dunkle Tage (Scottdale, 1924? 32 p.), Krümlein (Scottdale, 1924? 43 p.), Meine Garbe (Vancouver, n.d., 102 p.), Nohoaksel (Yarrow, 1946, 87 p.), Roggenbrot (Vancouver, 1946, 134 p.), Wegeblumen (Scottdale, 1924? 52 p.), Der Zwillingsbruder von "Meine Garbe" (Vancouver, n.d., 100 p.). In addition he also published Reiseskizzen über die Auswanderung im Jahre 1923 (Scottdale, 1924? 37 p.). H.S.B.

J. H. Janzen, "The Literature of the Russo-Canadian Mennonites," Menn. Life I (January 1946) 23 f.; Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen 1902-1952 I, 183 f.

Klassen, Peter Abraham, elder of the Kronsweide Mennonite Church near Chortitza, son of Abraham Klassen and Justina Hildebrand, was born in 1825 on the island Chortitza, South Russia. His first wife was Anna Janzen, and his second wife Aganeta Schulz, each of whom had four children. One son, Johann Peter Klassen, later also became the elder of the Kronsweide Mennonite Church, emigrated to Canada, and became one of the leaders there. He served his church as a minister 1851-1902, and from 1867 also as elder. He died 1905 and was buried at Neu-Schönwiese. J.H.En.

Klassen, Peter J. (1889-1953), a minister (GCM) and outstanding Mennonite poet and literary artist, was born June 7, 1889, at Ohrloff, Molotschna, Russia. He attended the secondary school at Spat, Crimea, and taught school. On Jan. 3, 1910, he married Liese Löwen and entered business. During 1916-24 he was again a teacher. He made numerous trips to Moscow to represent the Mennonite constituency. He was active as a youth leader and choir director. On July 3, 1923, he was elected minister of the Ebenfeld Mennonite Church and ordained by P. Wiens. After teaching a year at Arkadak he emigrated to Canada in 1925. For a while he lived in Rosthern and Saskatoon, Sask. In 1928 he purchased a farm at Superb, Sask., and lived there until 1948, when he went to Yarrow, B.C., where he spent the last years of his life. He died at Abbotsford on July 19, 1953.

Peter J. Klassen, although struggling with sickness and want nearly all his life, was an outstanding writer. J. H. Janzen said of him, "He is the one who is most widely known in German literature and is the only [Mennonite] poet who has received high honors and an income for his literary work." In 1951 the Canadian Mennonite Conference published 5,000 copies of his Verlorene Söhne because of its significance in promoting the Mennonite peace principles. Many of his stories appeared in installments in Der Bote. He was also a constant contributor to Der Kinderbote for the column "Onkel Peters Ecke."

Among Klassen's writings are the following: Der Peet. Geschichten vom Peet und seinen Kameraden (Superb, 1943-49, 4 vv.); Die Heimfahrt (Superb, 1943); Heimat einmal—Eine Erzählung aus Russlands jüngster Vergangenheit, 2 vv. (n.p., n.d.); Die Geschichte des Ohm Klassen (Regina, n.d.); Fünfunddreissig Fabeln (Superb, 1944); Grossmutters Schatz und andere Geschichten, Gedichte und Fabeln (Superb, 1939); Als die Heimat zur Fremde geworden, wurde die Fremde zur Heimat (Winnipeg, n.d.). C.K.

J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen, 1902-1952 II, 344 f.; J. H. Janzen, "The Literature of Russo-Canadian Mennonites," Menn. Life II (January 1946) 24; Der Bote, Aug. 19, 1953, 6.

Klatt, Johann Karl, one of the outstanding schoolmen among the Mennonites of South Russia. As a young man he was a teacher on the country estate of Johann Cornies II, son of the well-known Johann Cornies (q.v.), and later became the son-in-law of the former. He studied systematically, Cornies' rich library offering a good opportunity for such study. Frequent contact with the Russian nobility and high government officials, and his service on the board of the Melitopol Realschule, as well as various other non-Mennonite institutions, gave him vision and social security, which served him well in representing the cause of Mennonite schools to the authorities.

In 1883 Klatt was elected to the school council by the conference (Kirchenkonvent), the head of the district (Gebietsvorsteher) of Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld, and the functioning member of the school council. In 1884 he was elected president of the school council, served in this capacity until 1887, when he resigned to serve as a regular member of the council. P. Heese (q.v.) succeeded him as president.

Klatt and Heese did many things together, such as school visitation, conferences, and examinations. Both also promoted schools financially. Under their influence the school system in the Molotschna took a long forward stride. On Sept. 4, 1884, Klatt received the silver medal "For zeal" in his services to the cause of education. Klatt also served on the board of the Ohrloff Zentralschule in 1880-90. He was a member of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church, and as a youth had been a pupil of Heinrich Franz. A.B.

P. Braun, "Der Molotschnaer Mennoniten-Schulrat" (ms.); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 595, 650; ML II, 505.

Klaus, Alexander, a Russian of German extraction, in 1889 published a book in Russian with the title Nashi Kolonii (Our Colonies), which will always be important for the history of foreign colonies in Russia. To the Hutterites and Mennonites he devotes 128 pages. In 1887 the Odessaer Zeitung published a German translation of the book, done by its editor, Jakob Töws, under the title Unsere Kolonien. (ML II, 505.) D.H.E.

Klausen (Italian, Chiusa), an ancient village of Tirol, Austria, which became Italian after World War I. It lies narrowly confined by the Säben Mountain and the Eisack River. Until the 10th century it was an episcopal see, which was transferred to Brixen. Towering over the town is the Säben abbey (Roman camp Sabiona) and the castle of Branzoll.

In Anabaptist history Klausen is important. It was the scene of the last labor of several Anabaptist leaders. Here Georg Blaurock (q.v.), one of the founders of the movement in Zürich in 1525, was burned to death. Several years later Jakob Hutter (q.v.) was put into the dungeon of Branzoll, and then burned at the stake at Innsbruck. Seven Anabaptists were executed for their faith in Klausen (Beck, 278).

For a long time the Anabaptists were the only evangelicals in this area. To be sure, Andreas Carlstadt (q.v.) was here for a time in 1525 at the invitation of the mine owners of Villander (one mile southwest of Klausen), but he soon returned to Saxony (Loserth, 448; Pitra, 89). This invitation, however, indicates that the Klausen area was ready for evangelical teaching. The first Anabaptist preacher in the Eisack Valley was Jörg Zaunring, who later accompanied Hutter on some of his journeys. He baptized Michael Kürschner (Klesinger) in June 1528 in Vells; Kürschner (q.v.) later became the leader of the Anabaptist group around Klausen. In Klausen and Gufidaun (one mile east of Klausen) Kürschner was apparently especially active, since in February 1529 the government charged the officials with laxity in their suppression of the Anabaptists. On April 25 he was seized with seven others at a meeting in Kitzbühel and taken to Innsbruck, where he was condemned to death and burned at the stake across the bridge on June 2. He himself confessed to having baptized over 100 persons (Loserth, 470 f.).

When Georg Blaurock, who had just been banished from Switzerland, heard of the desire for the Gospel in Tirol, he was at once willing to take charge of Kürschner's orphaned congregation. In May 1529 he came to Klausen with Hans Langegger. His succcess did not remain concealed from the government. To avoid capture he went to other places to work, but in August he returned to Klausen and Gufidaun, and was betrayed to the authorities. On Aug. 14 he and Hans Langegger fell into the hands of Hans Preu, the magistrate, and were burned Sept. 6, 1529, at Klausen.

The effect of Blaurock's preaching was so deep that many of the members of the group followed his example and were faithful unto death. On the Breitenberg ob Leifers near Bozen several persons were surprised at a meeting and seized, among them Simon Kob of Breitenberg and his wife. The monk Gardian of Bozen tried for three weeks to persuade them to return to the church; but most of them remained steadfast and were put to death. During the night of Nov. 16, 1529, four men and four women of Blaurock's group were seized at Vill near Neumarkt. They were also given instruction by a priest on government orders, and the steadfast were executed (Loserth, 487 and 500).

In Klausen Ulrich Müllner was beheaded on Oct. 2, 1531, because he belonged to the Anabaptist group (Beck, 105).

Jakob Hutter was also working around Klausen during these years. A part of Blaurock's group was sent to Moravia by Hutter, after he had established connections with the Anabaptists there. After his return he worked principally in Klausen. A reward of 40 guilders was offered by an order of July 8, 1529, for reporting an Anabaptist leader. In a cave near Gufidaun he held a meeting attended by 150 persons, most of them from Teys and Villnöss (northeast of Klausen), and held a communion service. In Albeins (two miles north of Klausen) and at Prugg 50 to 60 persons met at night (Loserth, 502).

The government was seriously intent on seizing Hutter, as well as Christoph Gschöll and Hans Amon (Loserth, 507). On Dec. 13, 1532, orders were sent to judge Flamm to try to find where the three leaders, Jakob Hutter, Hans Amon, and Offerus Griesinger, could be caught, "since now in winter they cannot live in the woods and forests." Hutter and Amon were given shelter by Peter Binder in Klausen. In January 1533 Hutter had held a meeting in Villnöss, attended by about 70 persons from the Puster Valley. The meeting was not noticed, for the episcopal councilors in Brixen rebuked the authorities of Klausen for not catching Hutter, "who was trying to mislead the community," and who was so often seen in Klausen (Loserth, 508 f.). In August 1533 Hutter went to Moravia again, where as the chroniclers relate, "he put the true brotherhood in pretty good order by the help and grace of God" (Beck, 114), and in 1534 returned to Klausen. In the meantime he had married. On Nov. 25, 1535, he and his wife and three other women were seized in the house of the former sexton Hans Steiner on the other side of the Eisack bridge, and taken to Burg Branzoll. Katharina Hutter was cross-examined on Nov. 3 in Klausen by the city judge Lienhard Mair at Creuz, and imprisoned in Gufidaun castle, from which she made her escape (Loserth, 556 f.). Jakob Hutter died at the stake on Feb. 25, 1536, at Innsbruck.

The Anabaptist movement in Klausen was now destroyed. Ferdinand's wish was fulfilled; he had written to the authorities at Innsbruck on Dec. 24, 1535, "We are confident that the capture of Hutter will do much to wipe out the Anabaptist sect" (Loserth, 562). Raw force had won. LOSERTH.

Loserth, Anabaptismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 41, 55, 64, 118, 182; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 76, 89, 157, 233; F. Pitra, Klausen und Umgebung (Brixen, 1910); ML II, 505-7.

Kleef (Cleve), Pieter van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter Aelbrechts.

Kleefeld, a common Mennonite village name transplanted from Russia to America. The name appeared in the following Mennonite settlements: Molotschna and Barnaul, Russia; West Reserve, Man.; Cuauhtemoc, Mexico; Menno and Fernheim, Chaco, Paraguay. C.K.

Kleefeld, a village in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in the Ukraine, Russia, situated on the left bank of the Yushanlee River, was founded in 1854 by 40 families, and was the second youngest village of the Halbstadt volost. The village comprised 8,300 acres of land.

In 1929 the name Kleefeld was also given a village in the Fernheim settlement in Paraguay. In 1950 it had 104 inhabitants. HEGE.

Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender XLIII (Odessa, 1911) 108; J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953) 31; ML II, 507.

Kleefeld (formerly Gruenfeld) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located at Kleefeld, 30 miles southeast of the city of Winnipeg, Man., was organized in 1881. Most of the members are descendants of the first settlers of 1874-75, immigrant Mennonites from Russia, and until 1881 were a part of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) group. One of the first ministers, Abraham Isaac, was actively in charge from 1881 until his death in 1938. In 1902-11 most of the congregation moved west to Swalwell, Alberta. Among them was Peter Toews, the first leader. John I. Penner, present leading minister, and Deacon Jacob I. Bartel were ordained in 1924. Later Joseph Isaac was ordained as minister and Peter I. Bartel as deacon. A meetinghouse was erected in the early eighties. The present church was built in 1907 in Hochstadt and moved to its present site in 1917. Its seating capacity is 250. Low German is spoken in the homes. The majority of members are farmers. The church activities in both the German and English language include weekly Sunday morning worship services, Sunday school, midweek Bible classes, and singing practice, with Christian Endeavor every third Sunday evening. The sewing circle aids in MCC relief, hospitals, and home mission work. The membership in 1956 was 181. J.I.P.

Kleefeld (Man.) Evangelical Mennonite (Kleine Gemeinde) Church is located eight miles west of Steinbach. Its first meetinghouse was built in 1940. The Kleefeld church had a baptized membership of 140 in 1955. The church has a weekly Sunday school and a monthly Jugendverein. This is the smallest district in membership in Manitoba of the Kleine Gemeinde. The ministers are John R. Friesen and Peter K. Bartel, Gerhard S. Fast is deacon. Between 1874 and 1940 services were held in the village schools and later in a near-by church. Arnold Fast was ordained as minister of the Kleefeld church in 1955. D.P.R.

Kleermaker, G., whom van Braght in his Martyrs' Mirror (D 644-46, E 965-67) lists as an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1573 (exact date and method of execution not given). A letter written by G. Kleermaker in prison to "J.H.," a sister of the congregation, is found in the Martyrs' Mirror. But this information is incomplete and probably incorrect. No martyr by this name was found among the victims in Antwerp. G. Kleermaker may be identical either with Coenraad Cleermaker or with Gillis Glercq, Nos. 1044 and 1052 of Génard's list in Antw. Arch.-Blad XIV, who were both banished from the city and not put to death.

vdZ.

Klei-Oldambt: see Oldambt.

Klein Eicholzheim: see Adelsheim.

Klein Hoopjen (Little Heap, Group); by this name the Groningen Old Flemish congregation of Zaandam in the Netherlands is indicated in 1723. Formerly the name was also usual in other towns in the Netherlands for small conservative groups.
vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 20.

Klein, Johann (1836-1910), a prominent elder in the Galician Mennonite Church, near Lemberg, then Austria-Hungary, and the last lay-preacher in the church, to whom (according to Bachmann, Kleinpolen, 324-5) is to be attributed the survival of the entire Galician group as a Mennonite brotherhood since the other elder, Jacob Müller (1834-1914, ordained elder in 1883), had withdrawn from active service.

Klein was born in 1836 at Einsiedel, the son of Johann (1814-75) and Maria Ewy Klein, grandson of Friedrich Klein (1776-1831), who came to Galicia from the Palatinate in 1785. Johann married Christine Müller in 1857; they had 10 children. He started farming in 1864, in 1870 acquired possession of the estate Dobrovlany (q.v.) near Stry, but lived at Kiernica from 1883 on. He was ordained preacher in 1860, and elder in 1877. He died Aug. 9, 1910, at Kiernica. H.S.B.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934); ML II, 507.

Klein Lubin, a village in West Prussia on the Vistula in the territory of Schwetz, then Polish, was settled by Dutch colonists as early as 1525. In 1595 they obtained some privileges, including free transportation of goods along the Vistula and later also freedom from military levies. A land lease of 1632 shows that at this time the farmers of Klein Lubin were all Mennonites. They were probably members of the Montau (q.v.) congregation. Some of the Mennonite families living here in the 17th and 18th centuries were Schultz, Janzon (Jantzen), Görtz, Vogt, Baltzer, Schroeder, and Rosenfeldt. vdZ.

Felicia Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen (Enkhuizen, 1913) 133; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 22 f., 79.

Klein Nembschitz (Czech, Nemcic), a village near Upper Bayanovic, east of Auspitz (Hustopece) in Moravia, where the Hutterian Brethren had a Bruderhof which they had to abandon in 1559. They moved to Pellertitz (Polehraditz), and again set up a Bruderhof, from which they were driven in 1563 (Beck, 210 and 214).

In 1562 the Hutterian Brethren also founded a Bruderhof in Klein Nembschitz near Pralitz on the right bank of the Jihlava and acquired a mill from Sigmund von Zastrizel, Baron of Kaunitz. In 1565 the brotherhood chose Leonhard Dax (q.v.) as preacher, who served temporarily as a missionary to the Palatinate. When they were driven out of their households in the Thirty Years' War, they settled in Farkeshin, a village on the Dudwaag, southeast of Tyrnau (Trnava). (Beck, 214 and 410.)
Hege.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 210 et passim; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 302, 314-16, 404, 427, 494 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 397, 408, 412, 521, 551, 646, 647; ML II, 508.

Kleine Afrika-Bote, Der, was a monthly periodical published by the Afrika-Missions-Verein from June 1936 through January 1944. In all, 80 issues were published. Its editor was F. C. Thiessen, a Mennonite Brethren minister, and its place of publication was the Rundschau Publishing House of Winnipeg.

The Afrika-Missions-Verein was an independent mission society organized to sponsor the mission at Bololo in the Belgian Congo where Mr. and Mrs. Heinrich Bartsch had established a mission field. The major support of this mission society came from Mennonite Brethren churches and individuals. Since the mission field was incorporated in the missionary program of the Mennonite Brethren Church in 1943 Der Kleine Afrika-Bote discontinued its publication.
J.F.S.

Kleine geistliche Harfe, Die, the first Mennonite hymnbook produced in America, prepared by a committee of the Franconia Mennonite (MC) Conference (q.v.) in Eastern Pennsylvania, and used in that conference district as the official hymnbook for over a century. It was printed at Germantown in 1803, with further editions as follows: Germantown 1811, 1820; Northampton 1834; Doylestown 1838; Lancaster 1870; Elkhart 1904. The full title of the first edition is as follows: Die kleine geistliche Harfe der Kinder Zions, oder auserlesene geistreiche Gesänge, allen wahren heilsbegierigen Säuglingen der Weisheit, insonderheit aber allen Christlichen Gemeinden des Herrn zum Dienst und Gebrauch mit Fleiss zusammen getragen, und in gegenwärtiger Form und Ordnung gestellt; nebst einem dreyfachen Register. Erste Auflage. Auf Verordnung der Mennonisten Gemeinden. Germantaun: Gedruckt by Michael Billmeyer, im Jahre 1803. This title covers only the first 40 pages, which contain only psalms, 40 in number. The second title, covering the main part of the book (412 pages with new pagination), reads as follows: Sammlung alter und neuer Geistreicher Gesänge, zur öffentlichen und besondern Erbauung und Uebung in der Gottseligkeit, insonderheit aber den Gemeinden des Herrn, auf Begehren guter Freunde, zum Dienst und Gebrauch mit Fleiss zusammengetragen in gegenwärtiger Form und Ordnung. Nebst einem dreyfachen und darzu nützlichen Register. Erste Auflage, Germantaun: Gedruckt bey Michael Billmeyer, 1803. This section includes an appendix (373-412), and contains a total of 475 hymns. It is followed by three unpaginated indexes 18 pages in length. All editions are identical in content (40, 412, 18 pages) except that a Zugabe einiger auserlesener Lieder of 20 pages containing twenty hymns was added in the second edition, which grew as follows: 1820, 21 hymns; 1834, 23; 1840, 24; 1870, 34. The 1870 and 1904 editions have a short title, Zions Harfe, pasted as a label on the spine.

The preface to the first edition explains the reason for its publication. "Since the Psalms of David were in use in most of the meetings, and still were not available everywhere, and since in many meetings two or three hymnals were in use, it was thought useful to print a hymnal so that there could be more uniformity in the praise and worship of God our Saviour, Jesus Christ. Therefore a selection of spiritual songs was taken out of various spiritual songbooks, most of which can be sung to the melodies of familiar hymns. In the selection we were primarily concerned to choose such hymns as are needful and useful, in the light of the present dubious state of the Christian Church, for the encouragement and warning of souls desirous of salvation. For this reason the book is sincerely recommended to all evangelical churches in this land for their kind acceptance and profitable use."

Since the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference (q.v.) was also preparing a hymnal at the same time, an attempt was made to have the two groups unite in the publication of a joint hymnal. A meeting was held in Lancaster for this purpose, but the laudable intention failed. (See letter of Martin Möllinger of Lancaster, Feb. 20, 1821, in MQR V, 1931, 55-57.) The Franconia delegation at the session reported having already brought together enough hymns for a complete hymnbook and having 3,000 subscriptions in advance, for "they have a large and strong church as well as a large district and are well-trained in singing." The Franconia delegates also reported that "their hymns had been handed in by so many brethren and dared not be omitted"; so they thought it best for the two groups to proceed with separate hymnbooks, the Lancaster group also having received many selections submitted by individual members. These comments give light on the method of selection of the hymns, a very democratic procedure.

The sources of the selections can no longer be determined. Most probably a considerable number of contemporary European and American German language hymnals were used. The 40 psalms were clearly taken from Lobwasser's (q.v.) popular collection. Only two of the Harfe hymns are also found in the Ausbund and these are standard parting hymns: "Lebt friedsam, sprach Christus unser Herr," and "Muss es nun sein gescheiden." The remarkable similarity (three-fourths identity) of the title-page text with that of Das kleine Davidische Psalterspiel (2nd ed., Baltimore, 1797) might suggest a borrowing of many hymns from that hymnal, but this is not the case. The same is true of the short hymnal of 56 pages, Die kleine Harfe (Chestnuthill, 1792) bound with the Psalterspiel. Clearly the editors of the new hymnal used the wording of the two title pages, and probably the very title itself was half-borrowed, but there is no evidence of dependence upon the hymnal itself for much hymn selection. The Franconia Mennonites were eclectic in compiling their hymnal, using standard German hymns and ignoring the only hymnal of their own heritage, the Ausbund. The Lancaster Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch used 64 hymns of the Ausbund. The Franconia and Lancaster hymnals had about half of their hymns in common.

Seidensticker's listing (The First Century of German Printing in America, Philadelphia, 1893, p. 40) of an edition of the Kleine geistliche Harfe in 1753, which he calls "Hymnbook for Mennonites," is a manifest error. (ME II, †.) H.S.B.

Kleine Gemeinde, since 1952 called Evangelical Mennonite Church (Canada), originated in 1814 in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in Russia (founded in 1804), when Klaas Reimer (q.v.) assumed the role of leader of a small group of dissatisfied members of the Mennonite Church. Before coming to Russia, Klaas Reimer had been elected minister at the Neunhuben Mennonite Church near Danzig on Sept. 1, 1801, to become co-minister with his father-in-law, Elder Peter Epp. Klaas Reimer's autobiography reveals that he began to study the Bible, the Martyrs' Mirror, and other books diligently after he had been elected to the ministry. Encouraged in the thought by his dying father-in-law, he too came to the conclusion that there was no future for the Mennonites in the Danzig area; thus he left with some 30 members of his congregation and arrived in the Old Colony (Chortitza) settlement in 1804, where he became acquainted with a like-minded minister by the name of Cornelius Janzen, who was elected to the ministry at Chortitza in 1805 during Reimer's stay there.

From the Old Colony Klaas Reimer and his group proceeded to the Molotschna settlement where they settled permanently in 1805. Here Reimer soon found that the Mennonites were, in his judgment, too lax in church discipline and rather low in moral standards. He was opposed to contributions made to the Russian government during the Napoleonic War and he objected to coercion in punishing evildoers of the Mennonite community, and to other "worldly" practices. Reimer's unpleasant relationship with the Elder Jacob Enns was another significant factor in a separation of some families from the main church. Reimer's group began to hold special meetings in private homes in 1812. Cornelius Janzen, who had followed Klaas Reimer and his group, co-operated along these lines. The group elected Klaas Reimer as elder in 1814 in the presence of Elder Heinrich Janzen of the Schönwiese church of the Old Colony who, however, hesitated to ordain him formally. Thus Klaas Reimer assumed the functions of an elder without ordination. Cornelius Janzen, his co-minister, preached an installation sermon, and the group of some 18-20 members considered itself organized as a church. Janzen left the Kleine Gemeinde in 1822 and returned to the old church, but three other preachers left the old church to join the Kleine Gemeinde; namely, Heinrich Wiebe 1830, Heinrich Balzer 1834, and Peter Penner 1835.

One of the basic characteristics of this small group was its radical attempt to save a small remnant of children of God from the disastrous influence of the world. It had very strong ideas on nonconformity, humility, and church discipline. On the positive side diligent reading of the Bible, the writings of Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, and Peter Peters, as well as the Martyrs' Mirror, foot-washing, strict discipline, honesty, etc., were zealously practiced. The Molotschna Oberschulze (1842-48), A. Töws, declared that in 14 years none of the members of the Kleine Gemeinde had been punished for any civil offense. Their preaching was an "admonishing" to live in repentance and in the fear of God. Catastrophes were interpreted as means of preparation for the Judgment Day and were narrated in primitive ballads. Among the practices especially condemned were card-playing, smoking, drinking, higher education, musical instruments, mission work, and marrying one's sister-in-law. Any worldly act, or even an expressed worldly sentiment, was punished with excommunication followed by shunning. The group vigorously objected to all possible forms of resistance. It was not permissible to help the police in apprehending violators. Children were taught to take life seriously and, therefore, laughing and joking was frowned on. Swearing or the use of vain words was not tolerated. Some of these things were carried to such an extreme that their whole conception of a religious life became narrow and cramped. For this reason the movement remained very small for almost a century. It was not an attractive church to join and was called in derision "De Kleen-gemeenta" (Low German for "Little Church"), in German, "Kleine Gemeinde." In contrast the rest of the Mennonites in the Molotschna were called "die grosse Gemeinde," the big church. Outside persecution by the "big church" probably strengthened these people in their principles, but inside dissensions among leading characters weakened them considerably from time to time. Jealousies and unhealthy rivalries developed, due in part to too strict discipline.

Klaas Reimer died on Dec. 25, 1837. When Abraham Friesen was elected as his successor on April 3, 1838, the number of male members entitled to vote was 61. An elder of the Mennonite Church in the Molotschna, Bernhard Fast, was asked to ordain Abraham Friesen as an elder. He met with his co-elders, Peter Wedel, Wilhelm Lange, and Benjamin Ratzlaff, inviting representatives of the Kleine Gemeinde to meet with them. Since the latter were not willing to agree to the conditions under which Abraham Friesen could be ordained as elder, Friesen simply assumed the functions of an elder without ordination. Through the intervention of Johann Cornies the elders of the Mennonite Church were compelled by the civil authorities to recognize the Kleine Gemeinde and the functions of its unordained elder as valid. This was done through a decree issued Jan. 28, 1843, by the Russian Government Board of Guardians at Odessa (Fürsorgekomitee). On June 10, 1847, Johann Friesen was elected elder, succeeding Abraham Friesen who died on July 1, 1849. The number of voting male members at this time was 91. At an election on Nov. 21, 1864, it had increased to 122. The entire group emigrated to North America in 1874, Cornelius Töws and David Klassen having been the Kleine Gemeinde delegates in the study group of 12 sent ahead "to spy out the land."

In 1834 Heinrich Balzer, a well-educated Mennonite minister of Tiege, joined the Kleine Gemeinde, expressing his reasons for this action in a lengthy treatise on "Faith and Reason" (Verstand und Vernunft). He died on Jan. 1, 1846.

An interesting episode in the history of the Kleine Gemeinde in Russia was its connection with the origin of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) group, founded in 1869 by Jacob A. Wiebe (q.v., 1839-1921). A group of Mennonite families from the Molotschna (Wiebe himself was from Ohrloff) about 1860 bought a Mohammedan village in the Crimea, which they named Annafeld. Through a spontaneous religious revival most of the families in the villages began to seek a more earnest Christian life and experienced conversion, Wiebe among them. Since Wiebe had become acquainted with a leader of the Kleine Gemeinde during a period of work as a hired hand in the Molotschna, he invited the Kleine Gemeinde elder, Johann Friesen, to visit the Annafeld group and organize them as a Kleine Gemeinde congregation, which the latter did in 1867. Wiebe and a P. Berg were ordained as preachers, and Wiebe soon thereafter as elder. Friesen had refused to accede to the request by the Annafeld group for rebaptism, but the group remained dissatisfied on this point and finally proceeded to have one of their members (Kornelius Enns was chosen) rebaptize Elder Wiebe, who in turn on Sept. 21, 1869, rebaptized 18 others. This is considered by the K.M.B. group as their founding date. Immersion was adopted as the mode. The group chose the name "Brüdergeminde" but was soon called "Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde" to distinguish it from the Mennonite Brüdergemeinde founded in the Molotschna in 1860, with which it had nothing to do. The act of rebaptism constituted in effect a withdrawal of the Wiebe group from the Kleine Gemeinde with which it had had fellowship for only a few years, although it was not a true schism of a fraction from the historic Kleine Gemeinde group. However, much of the ultraconservative spirit of the Kleine Gemeinde was combined with an emphasis on conversion, assurance, and experience in the K.M.B. group. There was little further connection between the K.M.B. and the Kleine Gemeinde, but in the United States a Kleine Gemeinde preacher, Abraham Klaassen, joined the K.M.B. group in Kansas about 1879.

In 1866 internal dissension in the Kleine Gemeinde in the Molotschna became so serious that signs of disintegration appeared, and the group divided into two parts. Elder Johann Friesen excommunicated two preachers, Abraham Friesen and Peter Friesen, and two deacons, Jacob Friesen and Klaas Friesen. There was a reconciliation on May 6, 1869, through the help of Elder Jakob Wiebe. The group adhering to the excommunicated men (26 male members) then organized themselves into a congregation and on May 4, 1869, elected Abraham Friesen as elder. He was ordained to the office by Elder Johann Harder of the Blumstein Mennonite Church. In the Johann Friesen group Peter Toews had been ordained preacher in 1868, and was ordained elder in 1870.

Elder Jakob Wiebe was sent to the Molotschna at the time of these troubles to attempt reconciliation. He also visited the Kleine Gemeinde group at Berezenko. His diary reports having achieved reconciliation in a meeting at Fischau, no date being given. Franz Isaac (Molotschnaer Mennoniten, 93) reports that the entire Molotschna Kleine Gemeinde group moved to the district of Ekaterinoslav "in the sixties," but fails to state exactly when or where the migration took place. Presumably the place of settlement was Berezenko.

[The handwritten church record of Klaas Reimer and successors, now in possession of Elder D. P. Reimer of Giroux, Man., states: "The congregation divided into two parts in January 1866, held an election, and Heinrich Enns was chosen elder of the one part by majority vote, and as deacon Abr. Löwen, and as preachers Peter Töws and Gerhard Goossen. . . . On Jan. 6, 1868, Cornelius Töws was chosen deacon, then preacher, and following him Joh. Goossen as deacon. But Töws did not preach because he had earlier been under the ban. There was disunity about this matter, and Elder Heinrich Enns was removed from his office in 1868. In the spring of 1869 Preacher Jakob Wiebe was chosen elder in the Crimea on May 6. With the help of the latter with God's help, the congregation which had earlier belonged to Enns was reunited with a part of the congregation belonging to Joh. Friesen, with the preachers Abraham Friesen, Isaak Friesen, and Gerhard Schellenberg, and deacon Peter Wiebe." Additional notes written at the same place in the record by Peter Töws give the information that Gerhard Schellenberg was chosen preacher Nov. 23, 1866, and removed from that office Aug. 29, 1871. Another writer states that Preacher Isaak Friesen was removed from office in April 1870 for improper conduct and that Peter Töws had been ordained elder on Oct. 10, 1870. It is impossible to clear up satisfactorily what actually happened.]

Nebraska. The Kleine Gemeinde emigrants to North America in 1874 settled in three groups, the two larger ones in Manitoba, the smaller one of 36 families at Jansen, Jefferson Co., Neb., led by Elder Abraham Friesen. Here seven distinct villages were organized: Rosenort, Rosenhof, Rosenfeld, Rosental, Heuboden, Neuanlage, and Blumenort. In the same year this group was organized into a congregation and built a meetinghouse two miles west and three miles north of the present site of Jansen. By 1879 Isaac Peters, elder of the E.M.B. church at Henderson, had come into the community and organized an E.M.B. congregation (officially fully organized in 1890) out of dissatisfied Kleine Gemeinde families. John Holdeman's attempt to organize a Church of God in Christ congregation here in the next few years failed (he won only a few families), in contrast to his success in Manitoba.

A few families also joined the Reformed Mennonites (Herrites), although no congregation was ever organized here. The K.M.B. congregation organized here in 1880 was composed of K.M.B. families coming from Russia. This group, as well as the M.B. congregation organized in the 1890's, won a few Kleine Gemeinde families. In spite of these losses the Kleine Gemeinde congregation grew, but in 1906-8 the entire settlement migrated to Meade, Kan., to secure cheaper land and more isolation.

Kansas. The U.S. Census report for 1916 shows three Kleine Gemeinde congregations in Kansas at that date, all near Meade, with 171 baptized members, and three Sunday schools with 66 pupils. Apparently the settlement made in 1906-8 by that time had three meeting groups. By 1926 the census reports four congregations with 214 members, and three Sunday schools with 150 pupils. In 1936 the census shows two congregations, with 275 members, and two Sunday schools with 92 pupils. There were two meetinghouses in 1937 at the time of the important Kleine Gemeinde conference held here, but actually only one congregation. In 1944 the congregation dissolved, part joining the local E.M.B. congregation, while 124 charter members formed (on April 30, 1944) the independent Emmanuel Mennonite (q.v.) congregation which took one of the two meetinghouses. Elder Jacob F. Isaac continued with an unorganized small group, which in 1954 had 25 members.

Manitoba. The larger part (60 families) of the Kleine Gemeinde migration of 1874 to North America located in Manitoba in two parts. The smaller one located in the West Reserve in two villages (Rosenort and Rosenhof) near Morris, and a much larger group in five villages (Blumenhof, Blumenort, Grünfeld—Kleefeld, Steinbach, Rosenfeld) in the Steinbach area. The two groups (congregations) were under one elder, a moderately progressive and able man, Peter Toews, who had been ordained preacher in the Molotschna in 1866, and elder in 1870. In the first years in Manitoba the group enjoyed a healthy normal development. Then Peter Toews, becoming concerned about the spiritual condition of the church, sought contact with John Holdeman, who had broken away from the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1859 in Ohio and led a small group of followers called the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. He had a small congregation in Lone Tree Twp., McPherson Co., Kan., organized in 1878 among the Russian Mennonites in this community. Toews corresponded with Holdeman who then visited the Manitoba Kleine Gemeinde group in 1879. In June 1881, Toews himself visited the Lone Tree Church of God congregation in Kansas, and becoming convinced that he should join the group, invited Holdeman to come to Manitoba. This he did in the fall of 1881, accompanied by a fellow minister, Mark Seiler. As a result of their work Elder Peter Toews, three of the other six ministers, and 165 members (about half; some say one third) of the Kleine Gemeinde in Manitoba were rebaptized and joined the Holdeman group. The reordination of the ministers took place in January 1882. By 1954 this ex-Kleine Gemeinde group had 1,367 baptized members in Manitoba and Alberta.

The Holdeman schism was a major disaster for the Kleine Gemeinde. It was probably the more progressive element that left, so that the more conservative and leaderless remnant, discouraged by what had happened, withdrew into a stricter conservatism and isolation from all other religious groups. In the next 30 years the group remained small and static, with a constant loss of more progressive-minded families to other groups. A number joined the E.M.B. congregation which had been organized in Steinbach in 1897, and which has been built up largely out of Kleine Gemeinde transfers.

With World War I and after, change began to come. In 1920 the first automobiles were permitted. In 1926 the first Sunday school was organized in the Steinbach Kleine Gemeinde congregation, followed by choir singing and young people's meetings. The country Kleine Gemeinde churches soon followed the example of the Steinbach town church to some extent. By the middle thirties they also had Sunday schools, young people's meetings, and later choir singing. In 1935 a church paper, Der Familienfreund (q.v.), was established. The Steinbach Bible Academy (q.v.), a private inter-Mennonite school, was established in Steinbach in 1936 largely by the Steinbach Kleine Gemeinde congregation. The mission interest also developed about this time. In 1954 the Kleine Gemeinde had about 25 missionaries serving in the Belgian Congo, French West Africa, Bolivia, Panama, Mexico, and Northern Canada. Relief work was undertaken in co-operation with other Mennonite groups in Manitoba through the Canadian Mennonite Relief Committee and the MCC, during and following World War II. The Kleine Gemeinde has been an active member of the Canadian Mennonite Relief Committee of Manitoba. In 1946 an invalid home was taken over from a private group in Steinbach.

During the years of progress following World War I, the growth of the group was remarkable, with an approximate tripling of membership. In 1954 the Manitoba membership was 1,805 in seven congregations. In 1896 their ancient organizational pattern (one elder over all) was broken by the establishment of two elder districts, each of the two congregations (Blumenort near Giroux, Rosenort at Morris) being given its own elder. In 1947 the final move was made to give each of the other three (Kleefeld, Prairie Rose, Steinbach) the right to elect one of its ministers as leader or pastor. All the congregations continued together as a "conference." Blumenort, Steinbach, and Kleefeld had been from the beginning sub-districts of the one Blumenort congregation, each with its own meetinghouse.

Mexico. The experiences of World War I and the new Manitoba school law of 1919-20 created much dissatisfaction among the Manitoba Kleine Gemeinde, as it did among the Old Colony and Sommerfeld Mennonites. Delegates were sent to Mexico to prospect for colonization possibilities, and others were sent to northern Quebec. Since both reports were negative, plans were dropped. After World War II, however, the idea of emigration was renewed. In 1948 a colony (called "Quellenkolonie") was founded at Las Jagueyes, Chihuahua, Mexico, where 35,000 acres were bought at $7 per acre, this being two thirds of a ranch, of which the other third was bought by Old Colony Mennonites from Saskatchewan. By the fall of 1949 about 15 per cent (ca. 100 families with ca. 700 souls) of the Manitoba Kleine Gemeinde group had moved on to the tract, most of them from the Blumenort and Morris congregations. Of the 23 Kleine Gemeinde preachers in Manitoba, four joined the colony, plus four deacons. The elder who went along was P. P. Reimer, who died in 1949. C. R. Reimer was ordained in his place. In Mexico the following villages were established: Springstein, Talheim, Eichenbach, Grünland, Wiesenheim. In 1954 the baptized membership in Mexico was 323.

The Kleine Gemeinde has remained until recently one of the more conservative and traditional of the Russian Mennonite groups which settled in North America. They have maintained strict nonresistance and nonconformity, the practices of footwashing and the wearing of the prayer shawl (cap) by women, the unsalaried and untrained ministry, and in the main the use of German in worship.

P. M. Friesen (Brüderschaft, 111), basing his report in part on Abraham Friesen's Einfache Erklärung (1845), states that the Kleine Gemeinde members liked to read the old Dutch Mennonite writers such as Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, P. J. Twisck, and T. J. van Braght, as well as the Danzig confessions of Hans van Steen and Georg Hansen, and that they translated many old Anabaptist works into German and promoted them (Weg nach Friedenstadt, Die wandelnde Seele). It is possible, though not proved, that the Wandelnde Seele edition published at Stuttgart in 1860, and the edition of Peter Peters' Ausgewählte Schriften published at Stuttgart in 1865 were both sponsored by the Kleine Gemeinde. However, Friesen errs in ascribing the translation of the Wandelnde Seele to the Kleine Gemeinde, since the translation was done earlier by B. B. B. (Benedict Brackbill), as the preface indicates. The 1901 (Elkhart) reprint of the 1865 Peter Peters' works may have been sponsored by the Manitoba Kleine Gemeinde; the preface is signed by A. L. F. Gerhard Cornelsen of the Molotschna settlement was the translator of the third part of Peter Peters' works and the sponsor of the 1865 edition. A Gerhard Cornelson was head of a family living in Gnadenau, the K. M. B. village in Marion Co., Kan., in 1875.

The present (1955) Kleine Gemeinde congregations, all in Manitoba, with membership, are as follows: Rosenort at Morris (1874) 479, Blumenort (1874) 446, Steinbach (1874) 400, Prairie Rose (1918) 260, Kleefeld (1874) 142, Riverton, 90 miles north of Winnipeg (1950) 46, and McGregor, 90 miles west of Winnipeg (1952) 32. The total baptized membership is thus 1,805, plus 2,293 unbaptized children. Including Mexico and Kansas the total membership is 2,153. Riverton was founded by K. G. members from other districts. McGregor was the result of union of members of the Sommerfelder, Bergthaler, and Rudnerweider churches, which then joined the K.G. H.S.B.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 106-13 (includes a reproduction of Klaas Reimer's manuscript account of the origin of the Kleine Gemeinde); C. Krahn, "From Russia to Meade," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 18 f.; D. P. Miller, "The Story of Jansen, Nebraska," Menn. Life IX (1954)

73-75; idem, "The Story of the Jansen Churches," Menn. Life X (1955) 38-40; D. J. Classen, "Meade, a Changing Community," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 14-17, 19; P. J. B. Reimer, "From Russia to Mexico, the Story of the Kleine Gemeinde," Menn. Life IV (October 1949) 28-32; J. W. Fretz, "The Mennonite Community at Meade," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 8-13; P. A. Wiebe, Kurze Biographie des Bruders Jakob A. Wiebe (Hillsboro, 1924); D. Paul Miller, "An Analysis of Community Adjustment. A Case Study of Jansen, Nebraska," unpublished Ph.D. thesis at the University of Nebraska, 1953; J. M. Penner, A Concise History of the Church of God (n.p., 1951); R. Friedmann, "Faith and Reason," MQR XXII (1948) 75-93; Abraham Friesen, Eine Einfache Erklärung über einige Glaubenssätze der sogenannten Kleinen Gemeine. Wohlmeinend aufgesetzt von einem treuen Diener am Wort des Herrn im Jahre 1845 (Danzig, n.d., 40 pp.); reprint at Quakertown, Pa., in the "Himmelsmanna" Druckerei, 1901; G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar (Newton, 1956). The diaries of Klaas Reimer and Abraham Friesen have been preserved, also the record book containing the report of the elections of all ordained men; ML II, 507.

Kleine Zon, name of a congregation at Amsterdam, Netherlands, which separated in 1670 from the Zon (q.v.) congregation, holding its meetings in the "Arke Noachs (Noë)" on the Prinsengracht until it merged again with the mother congregation in 1679. The little congregation of Het Sterretje (q.v.) split off from the Kleine Zon. In 1720-52 the Frisian congregation of Amsterdam held its meetings at the Kleine Zon meetinghouse, thus usually called Arke Noachs (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1393-1404; DB 1895, 5.) vdZ.

Kleines Hand-Büchlein, darinnen Morgen- und Abend Gebeter, wie auch zur Tauf und Communion, und mehr andere etc. enthalten sind. Nebst verschiedenen Märtyrer und andern Liedern, the last Swiss Mennonite prayer book (q.v.); a small size (2x3 in.) pocket companion apparently intended for everyday devotional reading although its contents are not quite in accordance with this idea. It seems to have been and still is a rather popular book, as six European and two American editions prove. The oldest edition of 1786 apparently comes from the Palatinate although the title page does not indicate any place of publication. Later European editions are: 1801 Basel (von Mechel publishing house, q.v.); 1816 Römhild (Thuringia); 1837 Basel (von Mechel), this and all following editions changed by omission of several prayers and a new 53-page appendix; 1867 Biel (Switzerland); 1930 Meiringen (Switzerland). The two American editions are: 1835 Osnaburg, Stark Co., Ohio (Heinrich Kurz); and 1872 Elkhart, Ind. (John F. Funk). When American Mennonites shifted to the English language this prayer book lost its former value. No German Mennonite prayer book has ever been translated into English.

The first three editions contain 16 prayers, and 10 hymns and brief rhymes; all later editions contain only 12 prayers in the first part, with the same hymns, and in the second part (called Anhang) 11 hymns and 3 prayers. The entire work is very sentimental and a typical product of Pietism (q.v.) with its strong emphasis upon melancholy (Schwermütigkeit), sickness, and dying. And yet, the book is rather a combination of old Dutch Mennonite prayers of a quasi-formal nature (see Clock, Leenaert) together with certain hymns known from the Ausbund, plus non-Mennonite material apparently borrowed from prayer books and hymnbooks of the territorial state churches (Lutheran) of the 18th century. Of the 16 prayers of the earlier editions 13 are lifted verbatim either from the 1664 manual of van Sittert (q.v.), called Christliches Glaubensbekenntnis der waffenlosen . . . Christen (see Confessions), or perhaps from the 1702 Güldene Äpfel (q.v.), which contains about the same collection (namely, morning and evening prayers, prayers for the ordinances such as baptism and Lord's Supper, also for weddings, prayers before and after sermons, and one "to be spoken before a sick person"). To this are added new, non-Mennonite prayers, such as "Prayers of a sad and sorrowful person in the throes of death" (this prayer was later added to all 19th-century editions of the Ernsthafte Christenpflicht, q.v.), a general prayer directed to Jesus ("Der Du, oh Herr Jesu, uns so teuer erkaufet und erlöset hast," highly characteristic of the pietistic mood), and one "In the agony of death," concluding with "Sighs in times of dying" ("Darum allein auf Dich, Herr Christ, verlass ich mich").

The new form of the book after 1837 omits the prayers "before and after the sermons," and adds three prayers, viz., "Of those present at the passing away of a person, also good for funerals," another funeral prayer, and one "for persons in melancholy and inner troubles" (Anfechtung), a rather strange assemblage for a pocket devotional reader.

Among the hymns are the "Haslibacher Lied" (q.v.), the song describing the visit of three Christians from Thessalonica to Moravia (published as a pamphlet for the first time in 1695), the hymn by Hans Reist, likewise of 1695, entitled "Es ist eine wunderschöne Gab," and several of non-Mennonite origin. The 1837 appendix has eleven hymns dealing with dying and the futility of life ("Bedenke Mensch, das Ende"; "Wohl dem der stets ans Ende denkt"; "Ach wie kurz ist unser Leben"; etc.), also a song of penitence (Buss-Lied), "Denket doch, ihr Menschenkinder," headed "Thomas à Kempis Nachfolge Christi, in der Melodey des 42. Psalmes." R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Mennonite Prayerbooks" in Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); Wolkan, Lieder, 161-64; ML II, 246.

Kleinhäufler. Concerning the origin of this word, to which others like Stäbler, Gemeinschafter, Schwertler, and Sabbater should be added, the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren relate: In 1528, because the group in Nikolsburg was growing and a large number adhered to Jakob Widemann and Philip Jäger, Spittelmaier commanded his people to have nothing to do with them. The difference was still that which had existed between Hubmaier and Hut (q.v.). Widemann and Jäger held their meetings in the homes, received pilgrims, guests, and strangers from other countries, and united into a brotherhood (Gemeinschaft). Spittelmaier, on the other hand, taught that war, the sword, and levies should be maintained, hence the name Schwertler. The other group was called "Kleinhäufler" and "Stäbler" by the Spittelmaier group. The Schwertler, the chronicles add, were also called Sabbater.

The names Kleinhäufler, Stäbler, and Gemeinschaftler thereafter referred to those Anabaptists who separated from the Nikolsburg group in 1528, and later also from the Rossitz Anabaptists, and who in 1530 were divided into two groups, the Hutterites and the Austerlitz group. The Stäbler taught "that a Christian should not take part in war, therefore do not carry a sword, but only a staff." (ML I, 507 f.) LOSERTH.

Kleinsasser, a common family name among the Hutterian Brethren. Its progenitor was Johannes Kleinsasser (q.v., d. 1779 at Vishenka, Russia) of Aemlach, Carinthia, Austria. He was a leader of the group of Lutherans expelled from Carinthia and taken to Transylvania by Maria Theresa when they refused to return to the Catholic Church. In 1755 the group went to Alwinc, where a number, including Kleinsasser, joined the Hutterian Brethren. He was baptized and appointed as leader on probation in 1762 (Vorsteher in der Versuchung) and ordained in 1763. The name is now found in South Dakota, Montana, Manitoba, and Alberta. See also Waldner, Johannes.) D.D.

Kleinsasser, Johannes, of Aemlach in Carinthia, Austria, was the leader of the Protestants who were persecuted in their homeland and were by compulsion settled in Transylvania in the 1750's. By this time the heterodox were not simply banished from the country, for the refugees might then strengthen a hostile power, but were sent to a crown land, which enjoyed certain freedoms. Kleinsasser took his family with him: his wife Barbara, and four children, Stephan, Mathis, Joseph, and Christina.

In Transylvania Kleinsasser united with the group of his compatriots who refused to give the oath of allegiance to Maria Theresa, believing the oath to be forbidden by the New Testament, and thus deprived himself of the right to a home and land (see Carinthia), and united with the Hutterites at Alwinc (q.v.), which entailed privation, hardship, and want. His son Stephan died the first year in Transylvania. The following year he and his family were transferred to Kreuz. A pious man, he held his brethren to continued prayer.

When the small group took steps to order its life in spiritual and temporal affairs, the vote for leader in 1761 fell on Kleinsasser, and after he had been baptized with Joseph Müller in 1762, and received instruction on the essential doctrines, such as baptism, communion, marriage, exclusion from the group and reception, he was installed as leader (Vorsteher in der Versuchung) on April 27, 1762, and confirmed in that position in January 1763. The Alwinc colony gave him the necessary books for study. Thus the congregation had a shepherd. His position was an extremely difficult one, not wanting in mistreatment and chains.

It was therefore decided to try to find a place where they could live more peacefully. They found such a place in Wallachia, and in 1775 established themselves there. But peace was shattered by the Russo-Turkish war with its terrible consequences. Kleinsasser's suffering at the hands of Turkish and Tatar robber bands was described by Johannes Waldner (q.v.), who later became the leader and chronicler of the brotherhood. "I prayed," he writes (he was an eyewitness), "to the Lord in this distress: O Lord, wilt Thou thus make an end of Thy church, and quench Thy truth and Thy light and let it perish? That is impossible!"

The offer of Count Rumyantsev to give the plundered brotherhood a peaceful home on his lands was very welcome. In Vishenka Kleinsasser used his talents to develop the colony. Weaving made a good start the first year; pottery was successful by 1773, a smithy and mills were built. A room was built for the meetings of the elders, and also a cold pantry. In 1778 they built the big and little schools, and in 1779 a chapel, which was later turned into a nursery.

Waldner reports that God granted blessed years with good crops; the brotherhood recovered from the extreme poverty of previous years. "Hänsel" Kleinsasser, elder and leader of the entire brotherhood, died at Vishenka on Oct. 16, 1779, in his fifty-third year, having served the brotherhood with the utmost devotion for 18 years. (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; ML II, 508 f.) LOSERTH.

Kleinsasser, Joseph, chosen preacher March 12, 1901, by the Milltown Hutterite Bruderhof in South Dakota, confirmed Dec. 2, 1902. He was a schoolteacher more than 17 years. On Feb. 11, 1934, he was chosen as elder of the "Schmiedeleut" (q.v.). He died April 16, 1947, at the Milltown Colony, Bernard, Man. D.D.

Kleinsee: see Jeziorka.

Kleinste Hoopjen, Het (the Smallest Heap), a name formerly sometimes given to the Ukowallist (q.v.) or Groningen Old Flemish congregations in the Netherlands. (DB 1876, 39, note 2.) vdZ.

Kleintal, a Mennonite church in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland, sometimes called Moron. The congregation embraces the Mennonites scattered over the county of Moutier with small overlappings into bordering districts. The region is sometimes called the Münstertal, and the French name Moutier refers to the same political and geographical district as Münster.

The name Kleintal is used to designate the following areas: the source and upper reaches of the Sorne (Bellelay, Châtelat, Monible, Sornetan) and the little valleys of the Fontaines (Souboz, les Ecorcheresses) and the Chaliere (Perrefitte). This general valley region is surrounded in the north by the mountain chain of Béroie-Droit Mont-Perceux-Montagne de Moutier, and in the south by the elevation of Monbautier-Moron. This is the Kleintal district with its numerous scattered Mennonite farm homes. But in the territory of the congregation are also included the "Grosstal" and the Münstertal. The Mennonites gave to the upper end of the Birstal the name "Grosstal" or Dachsfeldertal (Vallée des Tavannes), in which the most important towns are Tavannes, Reconvilier, Malleray, Bévilard, Sorvilier, and Court. In the side valley of the Trame are located Le Fuet, Saicourt, and Saules, with Champoz near the Moron elevation. The side valley of Chaluet near Court was earlier a great place of refuge for the Anabaptists and the seat of the extinct congregation of Tscheiwo.

The rocky mountain slopes of the region are covered with firs, and in the meadowlands on the summits are numerous separate farms. The soil is not fertile, and yields sparsely what industrious farmers can eke from it. The Moron chain reaches a height of 4,460 ft. On the plateau-like west foot of the chain stands the hamlet of Moron (el. 3,400 ft.) with its school and chapel. Whereas in former times Chaluet (Tscheiwo) and Montagne de Moutier (Münsterberg) were the focal points of the Swiss Brethren in this community, Moron has now become the center.

The Moutier region, belonging to the prince-bishopric of Basel, was allied with Bern in 1486. Under Bern's protection the French-speaking population accepted the Reformation, and Bern controlled it in matters of religion and marriage. Thus the Moutier Valley had a Catholic spiritual prince, and a Protestant ally.

The Bernese government and the prince-bishop persecuted the Swiss Brethren on similar principles. But political considerations led the bishops to a more tolerant and lenient treatment, in spite of Bern's protests. The Swiss Brethren gradually earned the favor of the bishops and their officials by their quiet industry and competence. Even though the populace demanded the expulsion of the Swiss Brethren on economic grounds, orders of conscription were laxly enforced.

The territory of the Kleintal church was probably the first region of the Jura to be settled by persecuted Swiss Brethren. In April 1535 the prince-bishop of Basel notified the council of Solothurn (which was allied to Bern) that Anabaptists were moving into the mountains. An agreement was reached which permitted each canton to pursue Anabaptists into the other's territory. In 1538 a meeting was held between Bern and the bishop of Basel "for the extermination of this unchristian, damned sect." In March 1538 a disputation was held in Bern, at which the local Anabaptists were represented by Hans Heinrich Schneider of Moutier. In 1540 Bern sent orders to the bishop and the Moutier authorities, "that the Anabaptists be punished and stopped." There must have been a large number here. In 1596 the prince-bishop demanded of the provost and chapter of Moutier, that they clean out "the filth of the sect of Anabaptism highly damned in the Holy Roman Empire, in the Seehof." In 1622 Solothurn urged the persecution of certain Anabaptists, naming them. In 1693 the prince-bishop issued an edict of proscription. Though in the canton of Bern "looking through the fingers" was severely punishable, the prince-bishops officials were very lax in carrying out the edict. In 1720 a report on church conditions stated that there were many Swiss Brethren in the region.

In 1729 the landowners raised objections to the numerous orders of expulsion, saying that the native renters did not know how to utilize milk, and that the Swiss Brethren work brought much more money into the country. In 1731 the towns of Roche, Perrefitte, and Montagne de Moutier presented a petition for the banishment of the Anabaptists from the Moutier Valley, because they were in possession of many of the estates, while the natives were unemployed and roofless. A letter from Solothurn supported the petition, saying that the Swiss Brethren met on the "Brächbiel, by the old hut, Monteau, Schiltsberg." In 1732 these towns renewed their petition. Thus it is very unlikely that the orders of 1730 were painstakingly carried out.

In 1732 the prince-bishop demanded of Georg Moschard, "Bannerherr" of Moutier, a report on the Swiss Brethren. The report says, "They bring money into the land, they work land which without them yields no income; they live extremely modestly, visit no inns, give no occasion for complaint, pay twice as much rent as the natives could, and the landowners cannot be deprived of the right to choose their own workers."

In 1733 Swiss Brethren affairs took a dubious turn. On Jan. 15 all the communities collectively demanded expulsion. Jan. 20 brought a presentation in their favor from Court. In the Chaluet Valley in the district of Court, the Anabaptists of the 17th century had "as faithful and submissive subjects of the bishop peacefully made the hitherto untilled land usable." (Geographisches Lexikon der Schweiz I, 440.) On Jan. 26 came the petition for expulsion from Moutier Grandval, and Jan. 27 one from the 19 communities in the Prévôté of Moutier Grandval. On the same day the prince-bishop issued an edict of banishment, giving owners three months and renters a year to leave. The commune of Court demanded a longer period of grace. The mayor of Moutier and the magistrate of Delémont were to give their opinion; these were very favorable to the Swiss Brethren. At this time Peter Ramseier (b. 1706) was chosen preacher of the Kleintal church in 1730, and elder in 1732. In 1734 the Court community declared its opposition to exile and praised the 20 Swiss Brethren families living there.

The economic struggle continued. New complaints against the Swiss Brethren brought the reply from the prince in 1767, that no objective charges could be raised against these people, and that the interests of sound politics required an increase in the population of the state.

Thus they remained in the canton, even through the period of French domination. The story is still told on the Mennonite (leased) farm of Béroie, that when the French troops marched through in December 1797, they took possession of the monastery of Courtine de Bellelay and the 30 monks had to flee. The famous monastery school, which had been honored in 1784 by a visit of Prince Henry of Prussia and the duchess of Bourbon, was dissolved, the monastery sold, most of the land to Frenchmen, and new lands put up for lease. Nearly all of these lands were occupied by Swiss Brethren. Besides the Emmental cheese of their homeland they also manufactured the specialty of the monastery farm, the Bellelay cheese called Tête de moine.

From that time on this region became more and more prominent in the life of the Mennonites of modern Moutier. By emigration to America, Tscheiwo and Münsterberg lost in strength and in importance. A register of Mennonite families in 1832 in the Moutier district lists 126 households. Among them there were fifteen families named Moser, nine Lehmann, nine Bichsel, seven Burkhalter, seven Nussbaum, six Amstutz, six Baumgartner, six Boegli, six Neuenschwander, six Liechti, four Gerber, four Sprunger, four Kläy, three Augsburger, three Geiger, three Studer, three Oberli, three Steiner, three Wälti, and three Widmer.

In 1815 the entire region fell to the canton of Bern. The Bernese government did not molest the Mennonites of Kleintal (nor in the Jura in general), for which they sent the government a letter of thanks signed by Ulrich Röthlisberger, Jakob Engel, and Michael Gerber. In the 19th century the military question caused some unrest among the Swiss Mennonites. Until then they had been exempt from military service. The new federal constitution, however, brought universal conscription. In 1850 several brethren presented a petition for exemption, signed for Moutier by Peter Studer (Malleray), David Nussbaumer (La Côte, Souboz), and Peter Sommer (Vion near Tavannes, belonging to Sonnenberg). The famine years, 1819 and 1833, and the military question in 1850 and 1874 caused many families to emigrate to America. Their names disappear from the church records. After these emigrations the congregation of Kleintal numbered only 112 baptized members and 97 children in 1887. (Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1888, 39.)

The Kleintal region was also the home of the nature doctor, Hans Moser (q.v.) in Champoz. "His house was constantly filled with patients seeking help, from dawn to dawn" (Abrégé). "At that time the Mennonites were easily recognized by their gray clothing with hooks and the beard" (Ellenberger, 53). In the second half of the 19th century the religious life of the community had a peaceful course. Faithful ministers tried to prevent religious lethargy or deadness. A census of 1874 counted 390 Mennonites, including children, in the Moutier Valley.

Toward the end of the 19th century, three men became prominent in the church: Christian Gerber (see Gerber), d. Oct. 3, 1928, in Emmenholz (see Zionspilger, 1928, No. 43; Schweizer Bauer, 1928, No. 120), Gottlieb Loosli (q.v.), a teacher in Moron, and Jakob Amstutz, b. April 25, 1866, in Montbautier, and ordained elder on Sept. 9, 1917.

In 1881 Christian Gerber leased a farm in Bellelay. With his vigorous and fiery temperament he at once set about securing a church building for the Kleintal congregation. With some financial aid from the German Mennonites the Kleintal church built a chapel in Moron in 1893. In 1899 Christian Gerber moved to Emmenholz and founded there a subsidiary of the Kleintal church. The church work was looked after by the quiet and retiring elder Peter Bögli, with Gottlieb Loosli and Jakob Amstutz as preachers. On July 28, 1908, the house of Amstutz in Les Cerniers was struck by lightning and burned to the ground, destroying all the manuscript church records.

This period was a very active one. A revival went through the church, bringing much blessing, awaking spirits. But perfectionism and fanaticism also sought entry, for a time completely destroying inner peace. From 1908 to 1913 members' meeting were not held. Through the conciliatory efforts of Gottlieb Loosli and the election of new elders and preachers on Sept. 6, 1917, the difficulties were cleared away, and the church has grown.

In 1934 the elders in service were Jakob Amstutz, Le Fuet; and Hans Geiser, Combe de Peux; the preachers were Samuel Geiser, Châtelat; Abraham Gerber, Emmenholz; and Eugen Burkhalter, La Côte (Souboz). In addition to the Moron chapel, which has a school in the ground floor, the church built a school-chapel at Perceux and at Montbautier. At the state (public) school in Moron Walter Loosli was the teacher; at the state school in Montbautier, Alfred Amstutz, and at the private school in Perceux, Katharina Sprunger. All three schools have nine grades. The enrollment at Moron was usually 30, at Montbautier and Perceux 25. The schools have a good reputation, and use the German language. Moron, Montbautier, and Perceux have Sunday schools and choruses. Two additional places have Sunday schools. Evangelistic meetings are held annually in Moron and Perceux, usually three or four days in January.

In 1934 the membership was 281 baptized members, and over 150 children, with about 65 families. In 1954 it had declined to about 250 baptized members. A section held its meetings at Reconvilier near Tavannes, another section held services in Biel. Both these groups were under the leadership of Elder Samuel Geiser, for many years elder at Moron and secretary of the Swiss Conference.

In 1954 the elders at the Moron center were Samuel Amstutz, Jacob Hirschi, Abr. Gerber, and Theo Loosli, with Eugen Burkhalter as preacher and Walter Loosli as deacon. Loosli was still teacher of the Moron school. A.-T., H.S.B.

Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1932); J. Ellenberger, Bilder aus dem Pilgerleben (3 vv. n.p., 1878-83); M. Fallet-Scheurer, "Berner Bauer im Jura," in Schweizer Bauer, 1929, Nos. 146, 149, 152, 153; Abrégé l'histoire de la statistique du ci-devant de Bâle par Charles Ferd. Morel (Strasbourg, 1813); ML II, 509-11.

Klein-Werder: see Marienburger Werder.

Klemperer (Klampherer), Julius: see Gherlandi.

Klercken (Clercquen, Clerckschen), a term used in the 18th century to denote a West Prussian Mennonite group. According to H. van der Smissen it refers to the Huiskopers (q.v.). It is not unlikely that the name is identical with the Clarichen (q.v.) named in the Confession of Faith by Georg Hansen (q.v.). In that case, it refers to the Flemish Mennonites, known as the "Danzigers." A fuller discussion of the problem is found in the article Clarichen. (Menn. Bl., 1910, 62; ML II, 511.)
NEFF.

Klesinger, Michael: see Kürschner.

Kleyn Hoorns Liet-boeck was formerly one of the most popular Dutch Mennonite hymnals. It derives its name from the town of Hoorn, where the first editions were printed and published. Its first editor was Jan Jansz Deutel (q.v.). Most of the hymns found in this book are borrowed from older Dutch hymnbooks. It contains 30 Psalms in the rhymed version by Dathenus (q.v.), 15 Lofsanghen, 106 Gheestelycke Liedekens. Then follow an Aenhangsel (supplement) of 21 hymns (former edition 11), 't Vermeerdert Aenhangsel of 33 Stichtelycke Gesangen (previous editions had 61). The 1736 and following editions add a Nieuw Aenhangsel of 5 Stichtelycke Gesangen. The earliest edition now extant is that of 1644-45, but there were some older editions. Schagen (Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren) mentions editions of 1630, 1638, and 1661, of which no copy seems to be extant. The Amsterdam Library has editions of 1644-45, 1649, 1657, and 1685, all printed at Hoorn, 1736 at Amsterdam, and 1814 at Sneek. Besides these Blaupot ten Cate (Holland II, 212) lists editions of 1656, 1661, and 1685, all printed at Amsterdam. The 1814 edition was printed for the congregation of Balk, Friesland, who used this hymnal until a large part of the congregation emigrated to the United States in 1853-54; in the Uiterweg Oude Vermaning (old church) of Aalsmeer the Kleyn Hoorns Liet-boeck was used until 1862. A copy of an edition of 1646, bound with Twee korte Vermaen Brieven van wijlen Dirck Gerritsz which contains some songs by Gerritsz and was published in 1648 is found in BeCL. (ME II, †.) (DB 1862, 147; 1887, 86-112; 1892, 56, 65; ME II, †.) vdZ.

Kliewer, a widespread Mennonite family, originally from Holland, where they are called Kluiver (Kluyver, Cluyver). Some members of this family migrated from the Netherlands to West Prussia. In 1629 Dutch farmer Peter Kliewer was among the Mennonite land-leasers of the village of Klein Wolz near Graudenz. In Danzig the Kliewer family is also found since the 17th century. The first representatives of the family in Danzig were five brothers, Jakob, Cornelius, Paul, Conrad, and Heinrich; but nothing is known of any except Jakob Kliewer (1669-1728). He was received into the congregation on Oct. 29, 1694, and chosen deacon in the Frisian church in 1714. His first wife was Lucia van Dühren, his second Sophia Arentz. There were eight children from his first marriage, among them Jakob (1704-75) and Heinrich (1709-62). The former was a preacher and elder in the Frisian Mennonite congregation in Neugarten-Danzig from 1742. In 1748 Heinrich moved to Tiegenhof.

Heinrich's oldest son, Jakob Kliewer (1743-1826), was chosen head of the Frisian Mennonite church at Neugarten in 1786, preacher in 1797, and elder in 1798, serving during the difficult period of the war. When this church merged with the Flemish in 1808 he remained an elder in the united Danzig Mennonite church, which had 900 members. During his co-operative work with Peter Thiessen, Jr., the Mennonites lost two meetinghouses in the sieges of 1807 and 1813; a spacious new one was built in 1819. These two elders died only a few days apart. They were the last ones chosen from the congregation (pictures in Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennoniten-Gemeinde). From this time on the church was served by trained ministers; Jakob van der Smissen had been called shortly before their death.

Jakob Kliewer was married twice. From his marriage with Deborah Jantzen (b. Dec. 1, 1742, d. March 17, 1796) he had ten children; from his second marriage with Sara van Dühren (b. Dec. 23, 1773, d. Dec. 19, 1820) four children. Two of the sons of his first marriage, Heinrich (b. Dec. 24, 1770, d. Jan. 10, 1847) and Abraham (b. Feb. 10, 1778, d. Sept. 6, 1859), were copperplate engravers; the descendants of the former continued the art in Berlin, the son of the latter in Danzig. The youngest son of the second marriage, Gustav Kliewer (b. July 18, 1803, d. Feb. 29, 1872), was Vorsteher of the Danzig Mennonite church 1836-62, and a city commissioner 1836-48; he also served on the boards of various charitable institutions. His oldest son, Paul Kliewer (b. Feb. 14, 1851), became head of the sales department of the sugar refinery in Riesenburg, and was a member of the board of directors until 1923; he was a city commissioner of Riesenburg (1904-15), and was named a city elder when he left. In 1915 he moved to Danzig.

Members of the family who lived in East Prussia, Poland, and Russia all stemmed from Danzig. Many families emigrated to America when universal military training was introduced in the 18th century and settled largely in Kansas. Several missionaries to the Indians belonged to this family, as Henry J. Kliewer and Peter A. Kliewer to the Cheyennes (q.v.) and John J. Kliewer to the Arapahoes (q.v.). The chairman of the Foreign Mission Board of the General Conference Mennonite Church was for 25 years John W. Kliewer, who was also president of Bethel College (q.v.) 1911-20 and 1925-32.

In Paraguay members of the Kliewer family are also found. In 1930 Kornelius Kliewer instigated the founding of the village Rosenfeld in the Gran Chaco; the inhabitants had previously been members of the church at Wymysle in Poland. The population of the village in 1934 included four Kliewer families with 31 persons. Dr. Fritz Kliewer (d. 1956) was for a time principal of the Zentralschule in Filadelfia, and in 1954 a teacher in the new Witmarsum Colony in Brazil. Besides these there are two Kliewer families in the Fernheim Colony who come from the Waldheim settlement in South Russia, which was settled by Mennonites from Poland. HEGE.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennoniten-Gemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Gem.-Kal. 1934, 101; MQR VIII (1934) 69; ML II, 512 f.

Kliewer, Johann, was one of the last elders of the Deutsch-Wymysle, Poland, Mennonite Church (q.v.). He was ordained elder in 1885 and joined the local newly established Mennonite Brethren congregation on July 17, 1893, where he continued his service as a minister. On Nov. 4, 1895, he was ordained co-elder of the congregation. The Deutsch-Wymysle Mennonite Church chose Johann Schmidt as his successor. He also joined the Mennonite Brethren. (H. G. Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 77; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 479; see also Deutsch-Wymysle.) C.K.

Kliewer, John Walter, was born June 8, 1869, in the German Mennonite community of Michalin (q.v.), Russian Poland, the son of John P. and Aganetha Foth Kliewer. In 1874 his parents migrated from Poland to Kansas with their entire family, locating about 10 miles east of Newton, Kan. He was married in 1902 to Emma Ruth of Halstead, Kan. Three children were born to this union. Kliewer attended high school in Newton, and after graduation from the Halstead Seminary in 1890 taught for a few years. Later he attended Bethel College and Garrett Biblical Institute, where he received the Bachelor of Sacred Theology degree in 1901. In 1925 Garrett Biblical Institute and Bluffton College both conferred the honorary Doctor of Divinity degree upon him.

As a young man Kliewer united with the Gnadenberg Mennonite Church (GCM). He served as pastor of the Mennonite Church in Wadsworth, Ohio, in 1901-3, and the Berne Mennonite Church in 1903-11.

In 1911 Kliewer was called to the presidency of Bethel College and resigned in 1920. In 1925 he again became president of Bethel College and directed the administration of the college until 1932. His greatest contribution was made as president of Bethel College. His administration came in a period of transition of the college and so was difficult and stormy, but the school made great progress under his leadership.

Kliewer was a great conference leader. For a number of years he served on the Board of Trustees of Bluffton College. He was elected to the Home Mission Committee of the Middle District Conference while serving the Wadsworth Church and later became president of the Middle District Conference. He served as secretary of the General Conference in 1905-8. In 1908-35 he served on the Foreign Mission Board, and was sent to the Orient to visit the Mennonite mission fields in China and India. On this tour he also visited Mennonite churches in Europe. Upon his return he spent one year in visiting and reporting to Conference congregations. He also served on the Peace Committee of the General Conference during World War I.

On Oct. 16, 1932, Kliewer suffered a stroke, but recovered sufficiently to keep up his preaching duties until after the death of his wife in 1935. His remaining years he spent in retirement in the Bethel Home for the Aged writing his Memoirs. On Feb. 9, 1938, he died at Newton, Kan.

Kliewer was the author of two books: Letters of a World Tour (Bethel College, 1936) and Memoirs of J. W. Kliewer (Bethel College, 1943). E.G.K.

A published obituary of J. W. Kliewer may be found in Memoirs of J. W. Kliewer. Published biographies are found in A. Warkentin's Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1937) and Eva Sprunger's The First Hundred Years (Berne, 1938); P. J. Wedel, The Story of Bethel College (Newton, 1954).

Klinkert, a Dutch family, found in the 17th and 18th centuries in a number of rural congregations in the province of North Holland, e.g., De Rijp and Graft, and also found at Amsterdam, in the Lamist and Zonist congregations, where some of them were deacons. Claas Klinkert, a sailor of Graft, was captured as a slave by the Turks; a collection for his liberation was taken in his home church in 1709. Theunis Klinkert was from 1738 a (lay) preacher of the Beverwijk congregation. Bastiaan Klinkert (1794-1854) of Amsterdam was sent to England by his father at the age of 14 to escape military service. This Bastiaan Klinkert, a wealthy ship broker like his father, in his spare time studied literature; his studies on William Shakespeare were epoch-making (N.N.B.Wb. III, 695). His uncle Hendrik Klinkert Bast.zn (d. 1824) was a regent of the Collegiant-Mennonite Orangeappel (q.v.) orphanage at Amsterdam in 1813-24. Another member of this family was Hildebrand Cornelis Klinkert, who follows. vdZ.

Klinkert, Hildebrand Cornelis, b. June 11, 1829, at Amsterdam, d. Nov. 20, 1913, at Leiden, was at first a surveyor; he was educated for the missions by D. Harting (q.v.), pastor at Enkhuizen, and the Mission School of Rotterdam; in 1857 he entered the service of the Dutch Mission Association. He worked at first with Pieter Jansz (q.v.) at Japara, but in 1861 transferred to Semarang, his principal task being to translate the New Testament into the Malay language. In 1862 he settled on the island of Chianjur (Tjiandjur) as a missionary. In 1863 he entered the service of the Dutch Bible Society and later became an instructor of the Malay language at the University of Leiden. Neff.

Annual reports of the Dutch Mission Association; Biogr. Wb. V, 20 f.; DB 1885, 60-63; 1886, 82 ff.; 1887, 32 ff., 37; 1890, 39 ff., 44 ff., 46, 48; 1891, 34; ML II, 513.

Klinkhamer, a Mennonite family of Amsterdam, found in the Lamist congregation from about 1650. Barent Klinkhamer, a well-to-do silk merchant, married to Cecelia Looten, was a deacon of the Lamist Church. He was known for his liberality toward the poor, both Mennonites and others. Govert Klinkhamer (Amsterdam, 1702-74), a son of the foregoing, was a (mediocre) poet; in 1725 he published at Amsterdam De Kruisgezant, of het Leeven van den Apostel Paulus (two volumes). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 25 f.; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 162; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 57.

Klinkhamer (Klinckhaemer), Laurens (1626-87), a physician of Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, where he was born and died. Though from a Mennonite family and married in 1667 to the Mennonite Deliana van Hoogmade, and a Mennonite himself, he did not have much contact with his home church, but devoted himself ardently to Collegiantism (q.v.), which taught that there is no true Christian church on earth. He wished "to raise badly torn Christianity to the level of the apostolic period." He was much distressed over all who thought that their own church was the only true Christian church. Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), a Mennonite minister at Amsterdam, at first a follower of the Collegiants, but later somewhat critical of their principles, was for this reason called by Klinkhamer "the pest of the Collegiants." By his books, especially Vryheydt van spreecken in de Gemeynte der geloovingen (Leiden, 1655), he had wide influence on the Dutch Mennonites. vdZ.

J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) passim, see Index; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs I, II (Haarlem, 1900, 1902) passim, see Index; Biogr. Wb. V, 21-25.

Klippenfeld, a village in the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine, Russia, founded in 1862 on the Tokmak, a small tributary of the Molochnaya River three miles from Stulayevo, the railway station. The village comprised 2,300 acres; in 1917 it had a population of 310. (ML II, 513.)

Klock, Leonhard: see Clock, Leenaerdt.

Klomp, Pieter, b. about 1760, d. Aug. 19, 1832, at Groningen, studied at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam and became one of the outstanding ministers among the Dutch Mennonites of his time. He first served at Staveren 1784-98; in 1798 he was called to the Groningen Old Flemish congregation in the city of Groningen. By his activity and his tolerant views he succeeded in achieving a union of his Old Flemish congregation with the Flemish-Waterlander congregation at Groningen in November 1809. It was Klomp, who on Dec. 10, 1809, preached the first sermon for the united congregation. He also promoted the merging of the independent congregation of Swiss Mennonites of Groningen with the united congregation, which happened in 1824. Klomp, who in 1807 had been appointed commissaris (elder and leader) of the Conference of Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, presided at the last meeting of this conference in 1815. In 1826 he became the moderator of the Groningen Sociëteit (Conference), founded in that year. Klomp served at Groningen until his death in 1832. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 136, 148, 152, 195; H. Dassel Sr., Menno's volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d.) 35, 43, 48; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2261.

Kloosterburen, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation which also included the neighboring hamlets of Leens and Vliedorp. (It was also called the Marne, q.v., congregation, after the district in which these hamlets are situated.) This congregation belonged to the Old Flemish branch. The congregation is mentioned in 1616 and still existed in 1683, but had died out before 1731, for it does not appear in the first Naamlijst of that year. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 562, 571; DB 1879, 4; 1906, 46.

Klopfenstein, an Amish Mennonite family originally from Switzerland. In the 18th century some members of this family were found in the Normanvillars (q.v.) congregation in Alsace, where Peter Klopfenstein was a preacher in the early 18th century. In the 1830's, when most Mennonites left Normanvillars for the United States, most of the Klopfenstein family remained. They gradually left the Mennonite church. J. Klopfenstein was the editor of an almanac for Mennonite farmers, l'Anabaptiste ou le Cultivateur par expérience, on the title page of which is found a curious picture of a Swiss Mennonite farmer in ancient costume with a plow, published at Belfort, France, 1812-21. vdZ.

Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 92-94, 135, note 83; Catalogus Amst., 23; J. H. Yoder, "Mennonites in a French Almanac," Menn. Life IX (1954) 154-56.

Klöpfer, Hans, of Feuerbach near Stuttgart, Württemberg, Germany, was baptized about 1540 by Martin Fesser at Esslingen (q.v.), and then went to Moravia. Here he was a preacher of the Swiss Brethren at Polaw on Magdeberg (Meyberg) until 1543; at a meeting at Tasswitz he solemnly left them, giving four defects as the reason: (1) community of goods was not practiced; (2) they paid taxes which were used for war and bloodshed; (3) the preachers were not convinced of their authorization; (4) they punished adultery, thievery, and the like among themselves instead of through the government, and thus kept impure spirits and unclean hearts in their midst. With four companions he joined the Hutterian Brethren in Schäckowitz and was sent to Württemberg in 1543 by Leonhard Sailer and Peter Riedemann, to warn Hans Gentner (q.v.) and Michael Kramer of false doctrine and summon them home. About 1550 he became a Hutterite preacher and died in 1562 at Nikolsburg, where he was greatly respected. G.Bo.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 153, 214; G. Bossert, TA I: Württemberg (1930) 199; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 189 ff., 192, 306, 314; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 242, f., 246, 409; ML II, 513.

Klopper, a Mennonite family at Amsterdam. Members of this family were found in the Zonist congregation, and some also in the Lamist congregation. Two members of this family served as pastors of Mennonite churches. Reinier Klopper from Amsterdam, who studied at the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) Mennonite Seminary in 1736-41, was preacher at den Ilp 1742-45 and Almelo 1745-54. He was called to Almelo in May 1745, but could not preach his first sermon before Nov. 20, 1746, because the Baron of Almelo refused to approve the appointment. Nicolaas Klopper (d. ca. 1812 at Amsterdam) attended the Zonist seminary at Amsterdam for a time, but was dismissed because he did not accept the strict Zonist (q.v.) doctrines. He then served as preacher of the Goes congregation until 1752. In 1754-58 he studied at the Lamist seminary, and then served the congregations of Bolsward (until 1764) and Harlingen 1764-86. He was an ardent Patriot (q.v.) against the oligarchy of the old Reformed governing families. His radicalism (DB 1905, 23 f.) caused so much discord with his congregation that he was forced to resign. After his resignation he lived at Amsterdam. vdZ.

Uit het Verleden der Doopsgez. in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 24-28; Inv. Arch. Amst. II No. 1738.

Klopreis (Kloprijs), Johann, one of the outstanding Wassenberg (q.v.) preachers, b. in Bottrop parish near Recklinghausen, Westphalia, Germany, studied theology at the University of Cologne 1518-21, became a vicar at Wesel, Bislich, and Büderich, where he became a friend of Clarenbach (q.v.), was summoned to court on account of his evangelical sermons and forced to recant. When he nonetheless continued his Protestant preaching, he was summoned to Cologne the second time. Clarenbach accompanied him. Both were imprisoned. Klopreis was sentenced to "eternal prison" and Clarenbach to death; he was executed on Sept. 28, 1529. Klopreis escaped on New Year's night with the aid of Dietrich Fabricius (q.v.) and found refuge in Wassenberg on the Roer with bailiff Werner von Pallant who employed him as chaplain. Later the gates of the city church were opened to him; here he served a large congregation in an evangelical manner, using bread and wine during the observance of the Lord's Supper. In the surrounding territory he found numerous like-minded preachers, one of whom was Heinric Rol (q.v.), who exerted a great influence on Klopreis. Through him he was led beyond the initial Lutheran influence to some Zwinglian and early Anabaptist views. For four years Klopreis labored here without disturbance. When Pallant lost his office through the Cleve government on account of his evangelical innovations, he sent Klopreis to Philip of Hesse about Christmas of 1532 to intercede for him.

Klopreis went first to Büderich and proceeded to meet his friend Rol, who had meanwhile gone to the city of Münster. In February 1532 Klopreis arrived in Münster at the moment when this city was going through a significant transformation. The evangelical movement had been victorious and had reached an agreement with the bishop and ruler regarding the Reformation in the city. Klopreis was urged to stay. He accepted the position as minister and had his wife and children join him. With the transformation of Münster from an evangelical city to an Anabaptist Jerusalem, Klopreis underwent some additional changes. He was baptized on Jan. 5, 1534, and became an Anabaptist evangelist. The book Bekentnisse van beyden Sacramenten Doepe und Nachtmaele, published Nov. 8, 1533, was signed by Rothmann, Rol, Klopreis, Vinne, Staprade, and Stralen. This fact puts Klopreis in the front line of the early Anabaptist movement in Münster. C. A. Cornelius says that Klopreis opposed some of the radical developments such as polygamy.

With Gottfried Stralen, Klopreis was sent as an "apostle" to Warendorf (q.v.) on Oct. 13, 1534, to preach and baptize. The council of the city accepted the Anabaptist message. On Oct. 21, 1534, the bishop besieged the city and the council had to turn the "apostles" over to him. The co-workers were put to death while Klopreis was sent to the archbishop of Cologne. On Jan. 29, 1535, he was subjected to an examination on the rack. His "confessions" were published by J. Niesert (102 pages). On Feb. 1, 1535, he was burned at the stake at Brühl.

Klopreis was no doubt one of the most significant of the "Wassenburg predikanten." His association with and a letter he wrote to Clarenbach during his imprisonment reveal that he was a deeply religious, evangelically minded, and well-educated man, and worthy of a better fate. The stages of his development demonstrate that he was willing to accept the full truth and that in Münster he was unable to stop the development of a movement which was taking a course which he did not approve. What his attitude would have been when the city of Münster was defended by the sorely oppressed radical wing of Anabaptism is hard to tell. He died as a peaceful witness to the truth he had received. He greeted the stake at which he was to die with a prayer of praise. Neff, C.K.

Ernstliche handlung zwischen den hochgelerten Doctorn inn der gotheyt . . . unnd eynem gefangnen genant, Adolph Clarenbach . . . (1528) (BeCL); J. Niesert, Münsterische Urkundensammlung I (Coesfeld, 1826); Mellink, Wederdopers (Groningen, 1954); ADB XVI, 209; Ztscht des Bergischen Geschichtsvereins IX (1873) 144 ff.; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 311 ff.; C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs (Leipzig, 1855); W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 46 ff.; ML II, 513.

Klubnikovo, a village in the Ural Mts. of Orenburg, Russia, was the seat of a subsidiary congregation of the M.B. Church of Kamenka. It included the villages of Aliessovo, Stepanovka, Klubnikovo, Kubanka, Kitchkas, Rodnichnoye, Dolinovka, and Dobrovka. In 1906 a large church was built in Klubnikovo, which was closed by the Soviets in 1931 and used for grain storage. The leading ministers of Klubnikovo were Jakob Friesen (Kitchkas) to 1911, Heinrich H. Kröger (Aliessovo) to 1921, and Peter P. Funk (Kubanka). Preachers were Johann J. Block (Dolinovka), d. 1912, Johann D. Rempel (Rodnichnoye), David H. Kröger (Kubanka), Jakob J. Martens (Rodnichnoye), Gerhard D. Rempel (Rodnichnoye), and Heinrich Brucks (Kubanka). W.Q.

Klundert, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Brabant where a number of Mennonites were found about 1570. With their brethren at Breda (q.v.) they held meetings on the "Buursteedse heide" near Princenhage or in the homes of the members in Breda or also on the "Niervaert," i.e., Nieuwervaart near Klundert in the homes of Elsken Deeken (or Deckers) and Jan Peetersz. A meeting in the house of the latter, on Aug. 5, 1571 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously 1572), attended by about 50 members, was surprised by the police and a number of them were arrested, most of whom were executed at Breda. After this disaster no Mennonites were found there. vdZ.

DB 1912, 29-48; Mart. Mir. D 603-6, E 929-31; Ned. Archief v. Kerkgesch., Nieuwe Serie XXXVIII (1951) 23.

Kluyver, Dutch Mennonite family, many members of which were living at Koog aan de Zaan, Dutch province of North Holland, in the 18th and 19th century, where they were merchants and oil-millers. From this family numerous descendants, who spell their name Kliewer (q.v.), are found in Prussia, Russia, and America. vdZ.

Knapp, Albert (1798-1864), a German Protestant theologian, educated at the theological seminary at Maulbronn and the University of Tübingen, in 1820 was made vicar in Feuerbach, where his contacts with Ludwig Hofacker produced a deep change in him. As pastor at Kirchheim unter Teck he published the Christoterpe, a yearbook, 1833-53. In 1836 he became a pastor in Stuttgart, where he died on June 18, 1864. He is known as a writer of church songs. His Evangelischer Liederschatz für Kirche und Haus (1837), which was found in many Mennonite homes, contains 3,590 hymns, 1,200 of which he wrote himself. Johannes Molenaar (q.v.) secured his aid as a collaborator on the Gesangbuch zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauch in Evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Worms, 1854). He wrote three songs especially for this book; it contains in addition 24 others of his hymns. Of these, 20 were kept in the 1910 revision, and a new one adopted. His Christliche Gedichte (Basel, 1829) and Herbstblüte (Stuttgart, 1859) were also familiar in the South German homes. Thus through his hymns he exerted a lasting influence on the Mennonites of South Germany. NEFF.

M. Knapp, Albert Knapp als Dichter und Schriftsteller (Tübingen, 1912); Gbl., 1911, 38 f., 42 f., 47 f.; ML II, 513 f.

Knel, Johan (Büchner), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake in London on May 2, 1550, with Anna Cantiana, because they believed "with Menno Simons . . . that the Son of God . . . did not receive His humanity from Mary." (Mart. Mir. D 99, E 498; ML II, 514.) vdZ.

Kneutzinger, Jörg: see Kreutzinger.

Knijpe, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, about five miles from Heerenveen. Mennonites living at Knijpe often belonged to the congregation which had its meetinghouses at Heerenveen (q.v). Mennonites were found at Knijpe by the 17th century. The history of Mennonites and their congregations in Knijpe is very complicated. In the 18th century there was a Frisian congregation at Knijpe, which had a meetinghouse at Bovenknijpe. This congregation merged with the Waterlander congregation of Heerenveen-Knijpe in 1741.

In 1780 this united church was divided into two independent congregations: (a) Heerenveen, (b) Bovenknijpe (q.v.), both still existing.

In Knijpe there was also a Groningen Old Flemish congregation, sometimes called Heerenveen-Knijpe, Knijpe-Mildam, Nieuw-Brongerga, or Mildam. In 1710 the membership stood at about 30, in 1733 at 68, in 1754 at 22. After merging with the Mildam (q.v.) congregation the baptized membership numbered 60 in 1767. The preachers were Jan Jochems, mentioned in 1681, Jeyp Annes in 1683, Age Jouckes (q.v.) until 1687, Sjoerd Annes mentioned in 1685, Reitse Cobes (Koops) serving 1720-68, Jacob Sikkes chosen 1731, banned 1749, Anne Johannes serving 1769-83(?), Jan Tjerks (Vermanje) 1784-1805. The congregation died out in 1805. (See also Heerenveen, Bovenknijpe, and Mildam.) vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, See Index; P. Veen, De Doopsgezinden in Schoterland (Leeuwarden, 1869); DJ 1840, 43; DB 1870, 108 ff.; 1879, 2, 90; 1890, 94; Naamlijst; ML II, 514.

Knipperdolling, Bernt (Bernhard) (*ca.*1500-36), a leader of the Anabaptists in Münster, Westphalia, Germany. He was a prosperous clothing merchant. His home was located near St. Lambert's Church. He is first mentioned in 1527 when he helped to free Tonies Kruse, who had been imprisoned by the bishop. When the evangelical movement spread in Münster he joined it, particularly in supporting B. Rothmann. When the bishop and the city council lost their influence through the democratic Anabaptist movement, he was elected mayor in February 1534. He became a staunch supporter of Jan Matthys (q.v.) and Jan van Leyden (q.v.) when they arrived. Both were guests in his home. Jan van Leyden married Knipperdolling's daughter. After the 12 elders appointed by Jan van Leyden took over the government, he lost his office as mayor but remained the special representative of Jan van Leyden. When Jan van Leyden proclaimed himself king, Knipperdolling was opposed but finally yielded. After the defeat of Münster he was found in a hiding place and shared the fate of Jan van Leyden and Bernhard Krechting, who were cruelly tortured to death on Jan. 23, 1536. The corpses were hung in the tower of St. Lambert's Church. Numerous portraits of Knipperdolling—paintings, woodcuts, etchings, etc. were produced by artists like H. Aldegrever and Ch. van Sichem (Geisberg). (See also Münster Anabaptists.) C.K.

C. A. Cornelius, Historische Arbeiten vornehmlich zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1899) 99-101; idem, Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster, 1853); L. Keller, Gesch. der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reichs zu Münster (Münster, 1880) passim; Kühler Geschiedenis I, see Index; ADB XVI, 293; M. Geisberg, Die Münsterischen Wiedertäufer und Aldegrever (Strasbourg, 1907); Mellink, Wederdopers (Groningen, 1954); ML II, 514.

Knipscheer, a Dutch Mennonite family. Jan Knipscheer (1836-1927), married to Wilhelmina Johanna Meihuizen, was at first a teacher at Weesperkarspel; he then founded a private school at Amsterdam, serving at the same time as catechist of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation. His son Jacob Frederik Knipscheer (May 22, 1865—Feb 20, 1954) studied at the University and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam 1881-87, and then served the congregations of Baard 1888-90 and Knollendam 1890-1930. For many years he was secretary of the Zaansche Emeritaat en Invaliditeitsfonds. His brother Frederik Samuel Knipscheer, born at Amsterdam in 1871, who studied at the Mennonite Seminary 1890-96, joined the Reformed Church in 1898 and was pastor at Akersloot 1898, Grosthuizen 1903, and Zaltbommel 1911. He died in 1955. He published, among other historical books and papers, "Geschiedenis van het stil en het stemmelijk gebed bij de Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden" in DB 1897 and 1898, "Abdias Widemarius twistgesprekken met de Mennisten" in DB 1907, and "De Nederlandsche gereformerde synoden tegenover de Doopsgezinden, 1563-1620" in DB 1910 and 1911. Leendert Dionys Geerten Knipscheer (b. 1903), son of J. F. Knipscheer, after having studied at the Amsterdam University and Mennonite Seminary, served at Oudebildtzijl 1926-31, Dantumawoude 1931-35, and since 1935 at Groningen. He has been the editor of the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje (q.v.) since 1949, and published (together with H. Bremer) Wie zijn wij? (Groningen, 1947) and Verhalen uit de Doopsgezinde Geschiedenis (Amsterdam, n.d.-1953). vdZ.

Knobloch (Knoblauch), Georg and Greta. Greta was an Anabaptist martyr, the first wife of Georg Knobloch, a resident of Emseloh in Thuringia, whom he had married as a widow. She was seized with him, and after a valiant confession of her faith was beheaded in April 1534 at Sangerhausen. On the scaffold Greta declared before the crowd of spectators that she was dying for the sake of the Word of God; she had never harmed anyone. Her courage was greatly admired by the crowd.

Georg, who had not yet been baptized, saved his life by recanting. But he must have repented of his recantation, for on Oct. 6, 1534, he was baptized with Greta's three grown children of her first marriage. He is probably identical with Georg Meurer. Greta's sons-in-law, Jobst and Heinrich Möller, soon followed her in martyrdom. (See Möller, Jobst, for extended account.) NEFF.

E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harzvereins für Gesch. . . . XXXII (1899) 433 ff.; Wappler, Thüringen, 108 ff.; idem, Inquisition und Ketzerprozess in Zwickau (Leipzig, 1908) 100; ML II, 515.

Knodsenburg, J. C. van, a Dutch Mennonite of Amsterdam, an opponent of the Lamist minister Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.). He published Eenige Extracten uyt verscheyden Mennoniste Autheuren, Martelaren en Belijdenissen (Amsterdam, 1663), defending the doctrine of salvation by the death of Christ and combatting Galenus' views of perfectionism. Concerning the author no further information was available. vdZ.

Knollendam, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland. When the government in 1535 in consequence of the Münster catastrophe passed sterner measures against the heretics, Knollendam was one of the places named, "where the Anabaptists stayed most." At the end of 1535 special police appeared from the court to seize them. But they had already fled. Four houses in which Anabaptists had lived were razed, and one was burned as an abhorrent example. On April 10, 1535, Claesz Matthijs of Knollendam confessed his faith in The Hague with death by fire.

In Knollendam and the adjoining villages, Marken-Binnen, Krommeniedijk, and Uitgeest, congregations were soon formed, which united to a greater or lesser degree with Knollendam. In 1672-78 and 1726-33 these churches revealed a spirit of sacrifice for the sake of exemption from military service and aid to brethren in other countries.

The congregation at Uitgeest died out about 1750. The Krommeniedijk congregation united with Knollendam in 1804. The few members of Marken-Binnen joined the Knollendam congregation in 1828. In the 18th century this congregation usually was called West-Knollendam. Originally meetings were held in the homes of the members. In the early 17th century a frame church was built, renovated in 1745 and 1753 and replaced by a brick church in 1842; an organ was added in 1897.

The membership always was small, numbering 70 in 1772, 36 in 1804, 77 in 1861, 130 in 1900, and 35 in 1956. During the last century the following ministers served here: D. Lodeesen 1855-56, H. de Boer 1857-59, R. Brouwer 1860-63, G. A. Hulshoff 1864-89, and J. F. Knipscheer 1890-1930. The pulpit has been vacant since 1930; in 1934-47 and again since 1955, the congregation has been served by the pastor of Wormerveer (q.v.). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 98; DJ 1850, 25; DB 1883, 72; 1907, 37 f., 41 f., 72-76; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim, see Index; ML II, 515.

Knonau, a magistracy in the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, in which there were many Anabaptists in the 16th century. Complaints about their numbers produced renewed sharp mandates to punish them. On April 3, 1589, the Anabaptists presented to the magistrate of Knonau a document drawn up by Andreas Gut of Affoltern with the request to send it to the council and theologians of the city of Zürich. In it they give the reasons for their attitude toward the government and their views on the institutions of the church. Soon afterward they presented a second, very detailed "Supplication to the burgomaster and the council of the city of Zürich by a few Anabaptists," which they call a "simple confession." In it they discuss five questions: the reasons for the great division, the evaluation of the Old Testament in comparison with the New, their position on government and on accepting worldly office, and baptism. This was evidently a very important document (Bergmann, 62-64).

On Aug. 17, 1636, a disputation was held in Knonau, which was attended by 36 of the 58 Swiss Brethren living under the jurisdiction of Knonau. It was futile. The Swiss Brethren were then to send in individual answers in a short time. This happened on Sept. 26, 1636. The document was drawn up by the Swiss Brethren preacher, Rudolf Egli, and carried 20 signatures. The signers were seized, but were released by the wife of the magistrate. Yet the pressure was not eased. Their property was confiscated, causing great consternation and resistance. The Swiss Brethren emigrated, many of them to the Palatinate. In a short time Anabaptism was completely suppressed in Knonau. NEFF.

C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1600 (Leipzig, 1916); ML II, 515.

Knox County, Ohio, Amish lived for less than 20 years (between 1830 and 1860) in a fairly compact group about one mile north of Martinsburg. Preacher (later bishop) Isaac Schmucker (q.v.) was ordained to the ministry here in 1838 but moved to Noble Co., Ind., in 1841. J.S.U.

Knuyt, Francois de, a Mennonite elder at Zierikzee in the Dutch province of Zeeland in the first third of the 17th century, was a lover of peace and possessed great gifts. Repeatedly he disputed with Reformed preachers; in 1617 he debated with Abraham Stamperius at Sommelsdijk on infant baptism. By trade he was a fuller. He traveled much; on one of his journeys he was arrested in April 1615 and imprisoned at Aardenburg, because he had contacted the Mennonites here, preaching against the express interdiction of the city government. De Knuyt seems to have been influenced by the Flemish elder Jacques Outerman, while he in turn to some degree influenced Galenus Abrahamsz, who was a native of Zierikzee, where de Knuyt lived.

De Knuyt was a convinced exponent of silent prayer (q.v.), which was then in the process of being replaced by audible prayer by the preacher. Hans de Ries was an influential and ardent advocate of audible prayer. De Knuyt opposed it publicly, and wrote against it in his book, Onder Verbeteringhe. Een corte bekenntnisse onses geloofs (1618 and reprinted in 1623, 1635, 1642, 1648, 1684, and 1709). In the later reprints the confession is supplemented by his devotional hymns.

Outside his own circle de Knuyt found an opponent, Godefridus Udemans, a Reformed preacher at Middelburg, who felt obliged to publish a 380-page book against him (Noodige Verbeteringhe . . . 1620). Later Aernout van Geluwe, a Catholic bookseller in Gent, opposed him with a book titled Een onverwinnelijcke schriftmathige roomsch catholijcke belijdenisse des geloofs . . . teghen de onschriftmathighe belijdenisse der nieuwgesinde Wederdooperen . . . (Antwerp, 1654). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 69-72; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 194 f., 216; DJ 1837, 65; DB 1876, 86; 1877, 25 f., 42, note; 1897, 106-9, 114 f., 117; 1898, 57, 73-76; 1908, 106; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 12-15, 18, 25; ML II, 516.

Kob (Gobl), Simon, an Anabaptist martyr, was a member of Georg Blaurock's (q.v.) congregation in the Eisack Valley of Tirol, Austria. He was seized at a meeting near Bozen in the autumn of 1529, with his wife and her sister Margarete as well as other participants. In Bozen the monk Guardian tried for three weeks to bring them back into the Catholic fold. Most of the prisoners did not yield and were put to death in Bozen, among them Kob and his wife. Their property was given to their children upon orders of King Ferdinand. (Loserth, Anabaptismus, 487, 500; ML II, 516.) Hege.

Kob(e)litz (Kobelic; Czech, Kobyli), a village between Auspitz (Hustopece) and Chaykovitz in southern Moravia, where the Anabaptists began to live on Lipa territory (see Kromau) in 1589. In the Bocskay war this Bruderhof as well as the one in near-by Paraditz was burned down by the invading enemy (July 1605). In 1616 a spark set fire to the rebuilt house and reduced to ashes the part used by the coopers, masons, and carpenters. Kobelitz suffered more than other Hutterite settlements in the rebellion. By mid-October it had been plundered six times. Dampierre's troops lodged here two days (Oct. 11 and 12), broke down all the doors, chests, and drawers, chopped up the filled wine barrels, stole the brewing pans and the kettles as well as all the tools, even the smiths' bellows, and dragged away all the bedding, linens, and cloth supplies in addition to the big clock and bells, a total of 70 wagonloads of booty. Finally they killed a brother and burned down the school. In March 1620 Polish troops again plundered the scarcely rebuilt house, and in December all the inhabitants had to flee to escape the inhuman cruelties of the passing troops. They had scarcely returned, when they were again robbed by the imperial troops; this was repeated so often in a short time that "nothing was left in the house." In October the imperial troops dug up all the money and other goods the Hutterites had buried. The expulsion of 1622 put an end to this martyrdom, as well as to the settlement itself. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 302 et passim; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 487, 517, et passim; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 636, 659; ML II, 516.

Koch, Elise, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Bamberg, Bavaria, Germany, on Jan. 30, 1528, with two men and two other women for their faith.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); ML II, 516.

Koch, Hans, a martyr, probably Waldensian, who was put to death with Leonhard Meister at Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, in 1524. He is the author of the oldest song in the Ausbund, "Ach Gott, Vater im höchsten Thron." His further identity has not yet been clarified. Samuel Cramer identifies Koch and Meister with Hans Kag (see Kager, Hans) and a Speiser or Pfoster, both of whom were beheaded as revolutionaries at Augsburg in 1524 (Uhlhorn). But such an identification is today considered dubious. None of these names is found in the Hutterite Chronicle. Neff.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte (Munich, 1901) 189 ff.; Wolkan, Lieder; Mart. Mir. D 1 f., E 413 f.; S. Cramer, "De geloofwaardigheid van van Braght," DB 1899, 65-164, especially 116 f.; G. Uhlhorn, Urbanus Rhegius (Elberfeld, 1861) 62; ML II, 516.

Koch, Konrad (Coenraet, Conrad), an Anabaptist martyr of Honnef on the Rhine, in the Löwenberg (q.v.) area of the duchy of Berg, Germany, was beheaded there on Nov. 26, 1565, after he had remained true and steadfast through a long imprisonment. From prison he wrote two short letters describing his life and asserting his determination to suffer death for his faith. He asks his friends' intercession, that the Lord might give him the strength to do so, to God's glory and his own salvation. The book Güldene Aepfel in silbernen Schalen (q.v.) prints his letters (pp. 132-36) and says that he came from Leuenburch (Löwenberg). With Heinrich Koenen of Breidtbach (of whom nothing else is known) he wrote the song, "Hört zu, ihr Christen alle." Neff.

W. Risler, "Täufer im bergischen Amt Löwenburg," Gesch.-Bl., 1955 and 1956; Wolkan, Lieder, 100; Mart. Mir. D 324-26, E 686-88; ML II, 516.

Koch, Margarete, a widow, known as "die alte Garköchin," was banished on account of her faith from her home in Hersfeld, Hesse, Germany, and later also from Vacha, and was arrested with Fritz Erbe (q.v.), who had taken her in, was released, and seized again. For years she languished in prison. She had to undergo many cross-examinations, through which she remained faithful. Her fate is not known. Neff.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); ML II, 516.

Kodarma, a town in the Hazaribagh District, Bihar Province, India, and the first mission station of the Bihar Mennonite (MC) Mission (q.v.). It is the most important center of the world's leading mica mines. It is located on a double track trunk line of the East Indian Railway running between Calcutta and Delhi, and connected by a black top road with the Grand Trunk Road, the most important Calcutta-Delhi highway. Kodarma is in the eastern end of the Mennonite mission field. It was transferred to the Mennonites by the Methodists, who formerly worked it, and was first occupied by the Mission when the S. J. Hostetler family arrived there Jan. 29, 1940, from Dhamtari, M.P. (q.v.). In January 1941 the M. C. Vogt family also came here from the Dhamtari area, and one or both of these families worked here until March 1947. The work done was direct evangelism, village school work, work with high-school boys, establishing and nurturing groups of believers, and medical aid. About 25 were baptized, mostly of the Turi caste, and several Mohammedans. Social ostracism and threats triggered by a remarkable case of healing scattered most of the Christians. When the Palamau field (q.v.) opened, the missionaries moved to Latehar, because it is a much more promising field. However, the Kodarma field is still visited at intervals to keep contact with the Christians there. Dhan Masih Lakra and Anand Masih Topono and their wives were also workers in Palamau field. S.J.Ho.

Koedijk, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, where there was formerly a Mennonite congregation of the Frisian branch, always served by the same preachers as the near-by congregation of Langendijk, now Broek op Langedijk (q.v.). The congregation of Koedijk, always small, declined during the 18th century; the last services in the little meetinghouse were held in December 1805. (Naamlijst 1806, 75; 1808, 87.) vdZ.

Koehn (Könn, Koen, Kuehn, Kien, Kane) is an old Prussian Mennonite name first recorded in 1681, which was found in the church records of Danzig, Tragheimerweide, Deutsch-Kazun (Poland), and other places of the Vistula Delta. The Alexanderwohl church record before the migration to Russia also lists the name as one of the early members of the congregation. From Prussia and Poland the name spread to Russia. Today it is, however, most frequently found in Kansas and Oklahoma among the Mennonites that have come from Karolswalde, Poland, many of whom have joined the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. This group has eleven preachers with the name Koehn. C.K.

Koekebakker, a Dutch Mennonite family, found at Wormerveer, province of North Holland, from at least the early 18th century. They are members of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation and at the same time in the 18th century ardent Collegiants (q.v.) as well as ardent Patriots (q.v.). Hendrik Koekebakker (1809-88), married to Guurtje Prins, ran an oil mill and was a stock dealer at Wormerveer. His son, also called Hendrik, b. Feb. 5, 1847, d. Oct. 8, 1890, at Zwartsluis, studied at the University of Utrecht and the Mennonite Theological Seminary of Amsterdam. He became a ministerial candidate and served the following congregations: Burg on Texel 1871-74, Ouddorp 1874-78, Berlikum 1878-81, Giethoorn 1881-86, and Zwartsluis-Meppel 1886-90. He was liberal in theology, being called "a sage," whose papers on ethics, such as "De ontwikkelingstheorie en de Zedeleer" in De Gids (1881) and Het godsdienstig zedelijk belijden (Amsterdam, 1878), are of importance. Pastor Hendrik Koekebakker also was the first editor of the Dutch Mennonite weekly, the Zondagsbode. He was married in 1873 to Sina Huizinga (d. 1901). (Biogr. Wb. V, 89 f.; N.N.B.Wb. X, 474 f.)

Two of Hendrik's sons also went into the ministry: Jacob Koekebakker (b. 1875), who served the congregations of Den Ilp-Landsmeer 1899-1903, Aardenburg 1903-19, and Middelburg-Goes 1919-40, was active in behalf of the Russian Mennonites in 1921, visiting Russia in that year. He also was the first president of the board of trustees of the Elspeet (q.v.) Broederschapshuis. He published De Droom (three sermons, Middelburg, n.d.-1924). Willem Koekebakker (1878-1954) was Mennonite pastor at Zwartsluis 1904-9 and Dordrecht-Breda 1909-45. He was editor of De Zondagsbode 1930-42, and published De Zelfstandigheid der Gemeente (n.p., 1926); Ons Belijden (Wolvega, 1928); Tot geloof bewegen en bewogen worden (Utrecht, 1948). DJ 1922, 83 ff.; 1955, 16 f.) vdZ.

Koenen, an important Mennonite family in Hamburg and Friedrichstadt a.d.Eider, Germany. The progenitor of the family was Jan Koenen of Haffkrug near Lübeck, who later operated a sugar refinery in Altona. Isaac Koenen (later a member of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church) and several other Mennonites had previously been living in the immediate dominion of Wickrath (Kreis Grevenbroich, south of München-Gladbach) of the Reformed Baron Wilhelm Thomas von Quadt (1632-70, censured by Emperor Leopold I in 1663 for having Mennonites in his dominion, but nevertheless confirmed as baron in 1667). In Friedrichstadt there were the merchant Jan Koenen, whose son Abraham (1697-1778) was a preacher for 50 years at the Friedrichstadt Mennonite Church, and the councilor and merchant Lukas Koenen (ca. 1690), whose son Lukas, chairman of the church, moved into the "ferry-house" in Tönning in 1742, and according to a royal contract leased the ferry to Norderdithmarschen, for which he paid an annual sum of 226 Talers. R.Do.

B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn.-Gem. Hamburg-Altona (Hamburg, 1886); R. Dollinger, Gesch. der Menn. in Schleswig-Holstein (Hamburg and Lübeck, 1930); ML II, 517.

Koenen, Abraham, in 1725-*ca.*67 a preacher of the Dutch Mennonite congregation of Hazerswoude (q.v.), was asked to intermediate in the United Flemish, High German, and Frisian congregation of Danzig, West Prussia, where a schism had arisen between its elder Hendrik van Duren (van Dühren) and some of his fellow preachers supported by a large part of the congregation. Koenen stayed in Danzig from September 1740 until May 1741 and succeeded in restoring peace. Called to be elder of the Danzig congregation (November 1740), Koenen refused the call, preferring to return to his home congregation. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2657-59, 2661-71, 2674; II, 2 No. 812.) vdZ.

Koers, a mimeographed periodical, published as an occasional journal for leaders of the Dutch Mennonite youth work, normally seven numbers annually, 20 pages per number, 8½ x 11. H.S.B.

Koffler, Philip, an Anabaptist martyr of Vill in Tirol, Austria, seized in Kaltern at the end of 1532. In the face of death he begged for mercy, but refused it at the price of recantation, and was condemned to death. He is frequently mentioned in Jakob Hutter's (q.v.) letters. In his house Georg Frick (q.v.), who was later put to death for his faith, and others were baptized by Benedict (Gampner), a former chaplain of Bruneck in Tirol, who joined the Anabaptists in the middle of 1529, and who took charge of George Blaurock's (q.v.) group in Vill and Tramin when Blaurock was captured. HEGE.

Loserth, Anabaptismus in Tirol, 487; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 75; ML II, 518.

Koffmane, Gustav (1852-1915), a Lutheran theologian, educated at the University of Breslau, Germany, became pastor in Kunitz, received the doctorate in 1902 and was appointed as Church Superintendent in Krischnitz, where he died. He is the author of the valuable work on the Anabaptists in Silesia (q.v.), "Die Wiedertäufer in Schlesien," which was published in the Correspondenzblatt des Vereins für Geschichte der evangelischen Kirche Schlesiens III (1887) 37-55. (ML II, 517.) NEFF.

Kofler (Koffler), Andreas, a martyr of the Hutterian Brethren, from the Adige, Tirol, Austria, was arrested at Ibbs (Ybbs) near Amstetten in Lower Austria and beheaded in 1545 "for the sake of the Gospel and divine truth."

Mart. Mir. D 72, E 473; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 163; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 209; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 260; ML II, 518.

Kofler, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, one of the first Anabaptists in Tirol, Austria. He was seized in 1528, but was pardoned. At the end of February 1529 he was again captured in Rattenburg, Austria, and executed several weeks later at Sterzing, Austria. (Loserth, Anabaptismus, 472, 477;ML II, 518.) HEGE.

Köhler, Georg, an Anabaptist martyr, an illiterate day laborer of Mülsen St. Michall near Zwickau, Germany, was baptized with Georg Knobloch (q.v.) on Oct. 6, 1534. He at once became a zealous propagandist for his faith, making a deep impression. He was seized at Riestedt near Sangerhausen, Sept. 2, 1535, and was soon afterward executed at Sangerhausen with Georg Möller and an Anabaptist woman. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913) 166 ff.; E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer im Harz," in Ztscht des Harzvereins f. Gesch. u. Altertumskunde XXXII (1899) 440 ff.; ML II, 518.

Köhler, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, stemmed from Heyerode, a village near Mühlhausen in Thuringia, Germany, was seized in November 1537, while he and Hans Scheffer were conversing on matters of faith with Fritz Erbe, who was a prisoner at Eisenach. After long cross-examinations which he had to endure under Justus Menius (q.v.) he was put to death at the end of January 1538. (Wappler, Thüringen, 172-74; ML II, 518.) NEFF.

Köhler, Walther, a Lutheran church historian, b. Dec. 27, 1870, at Elberfeld, Germany, d. Feb. 18, 1946, at Heidelberg. He was professor of church history at the universities of Giessen (1904-9), Zürich (1909-29), and Heidelberg (1929-46). He was an outstanding research scholar in the history of the Reformation. His works on Luther and Zwingli are of superior importance, especially Luther und die Kirchengeschichte (1900), Luther bis 1521 (1921), Luther und die deutsche Reformation (1917), Zwingli als Theologe (1919), Ulrich Zwingli und die Reformation in der Schweiz (1919); Huldrych Zwingli (1923), Zwingli und Luther; ihr Streit über das Abendmahl (1924 and 1953), Das Buch der Reformation H. Zwinglis (1926).

In the field of Anabaptist history he was an authority. His unprejudiced, objective presentation deserves special mention. Some of his works in this field were Reformation und Ketzerprozess (1901); article "Menno und die Mennoniten" in RGG, first edition (1908); edition of the Schleitheim Brüderliche Vereinigung (1908); "Die Züricher Täufer," in Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (1925); "Zur Geschichte des Täufertums in Kempten," in Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten, Festgabe für D. Christian Neff (1938). In the second edition of RGG (1927-32) he wrote among others the articles "Denk," "Grebel," "Hofmann," "Hubmaier," "Hut," "Joris," "Manz," and "Sattler." He published an extensive annotated Anabaptist bibliography in the Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte (1940-48) under the title, "Das Täufertum in der neueren kirchenhistorischen Forschung."

His contributions in the Mennonitische Geschichts-Blätter include "Das Täufertum in Calvins Institutio" (1937, pp. 1-4); "Der Verfasser des Libellus confutationis" (1938, pp. 1-10); "Die Verantwortung im Täufertum des 16. Jahrhunderts" (1940, pp. 10-19). His Dogmengeschichte (Volume II, Zürich, 1951) is the first work of its kind to give due recognition to the Anabaptists. For the Mennonitisches Lexikon he wrote the articles Luther and Catholicism.

Köhler was a close friend of Christian Hege and Christian Neff, a member of the executive committee of the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein, and chiefly responsible for the bestowal of the honorary doctor's degree upon Neff in 1925 by the University of Zürich. Three Mennonite historians took their doctor's degrees in church history under him at Heidelberg in 1935-36—Horst Quiring, Harold Bender, and Cornelius Krahn. On his deathbed he is reported to have said, "Ich möchte am liebsten als Mennonit sterben" ("I would like best to die as a Mennonite"). NEFF, H.S.B.

E. Crous, "Walther Köhler," in Menn. Gesch.-Bl., 1949, 31-33; Rudolf Wihr, Die Rehhütter Chronik (Ludwigshafen, 1937); ML II, 518.

Kohlhof, a hamlet in the Palatinate, Germany, between Speyer and Ludwigshafen. It has existed since the middle of the 17th century, and belonged to the electoral family. It was originally called Kohlloch, for it made charcoal from the wood of the forests. Mennonites have been leasing it as hereditary lessees since 1713.

In that year Ulrich Schneider took it over, and on Feb. 12, 1716, he gave half of it over to Jakob Blickensdörfer and the other half to Joseph Burgholder, the son-in-law of Hans Gochnauer. The Mennonite register in the national archives at Karlsruhe lists five names in 1717: Ulrich Schneider, Hans and Jakob Gochnauer, Matth. Stauffer, and Hans Jakob Blickensdörfer; the register of 1768 names two families, Georg Wagner and a Blickensdörfer widow. Descendants of these families are still living on the Kohlhof, though the Wagners are no longer Mennonites. In 1806 it became the property of the inhabitants.

As a congregation Kohlhof is first mentioned in 1790, when permission was asked at Neustadt to meet for worship and to build a church. Permission was granted in a government rescript of Nov. 5, 1790, with the stipulation that the building should not look like a church and should not have a bell. But the building could not be erected until 100 years later, with gifts from other Mennonite churches and a grant of 500 marks from the local government. It was dedicated Aug. 12, 1888.

Before 1888 meetings had been held in a specially furnished room in the home of a member. The earliest information dates back to 1791; Georg Blickensdörfer, who was the preacher at both Kohlhof and Neuwied (q.v.), wrote soon after permission for meeting had been granted, "On Feb. 20, 1791, the first meeting was held on the Kohlhof with seventy souls."

Live connections existed at that time with the Moravian Brethren; several Kohlhof Mennonite families moved to Neuwied and joined them there. That is probably the reason why the Moravian Brethren still meet annually for a conference at the Kohlhof. These meetings were at first called Gehilfenkonferenz. The first one of which there is record took place on June 13, 1826, and was attended by 28 brethren. Others were held on June 19, 1833, Sept. 16, 1835, and May 24, 1836, on the Kohlhof and in 1827 and 1828 also in Hassloch.

In 1833 the Kohlhof church made an agreement with the Friedelsheim (q.v.) church, whereby they would be served by the Friedelsheim minister, but maintain their congregational independence. Kohlhof early had its own cemetery, and made a new one in 1840. It has been incorporated since 1890. The membership in 1934 was 47, of whom 32 were living on the Kohlhof. In 1953 it was 65. Johannes Foth, pastor of the Friedelsheim Mennonite Church, has been serving the congregation since 1904. J.F.

Menn. Bl., 1888, 101; Gbl., 1888, 91; Gem.-Kal., 1894, 118 with picture; ML II, 518 f.

Köhn, Peter, a Mennonite minister, born at Waldheim near Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine, Russia. He was educated at St. Chrischona in Basel, Switzerland. About 1903, at the age of about 30, he was called as minister to the new Mennonite Brethren congregation at Alexandertal, province of Samara (now Kuibyshev), which had a meetinghouse in Mariental, to help the congregation over some difficulties. Peter Köhn soon saw that it could not survive as an M.B. congregation, and therefore tried to make an Allianz-Gemeinde of it. In this change the principle of rebaptism was sacrificed, so that members of the Mennonite Church could join it. Köhn was a highly esteemed preacher, and was invited to preach in many Mennonite churches. Since the small M.B. congregation was unable to support him, he returned to Waldheim after four years of fruitful service. Nothing is known of his further life, except that in 1936 he wrote a letter to Bernhard Harder in Germany, requesting an artificial leg to replace one he had lost in an accident. B.H.

Kohnert, a Mennonite family, formerly found both in East and West Prussia. This family is of Dutch descent, the name Kohnert being the same as the Dutch Christian name Koenraad (Conrad). Salomon Kohnert was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation of Lithuania (Memel-Niederung, q.v.) in 1743-1800. Andreas Kohnert served as preacher at Schweinsgrube (congregation Stuhmsche Niederung) 1764-d.88; in the same congregation, then called Tragheimerweide, David Kohnert, of Klein Schardau, was a preacher in 1859-*ca.*90. (Naamlijst.) vdZ.

Koker, de, a former Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Flanders, Belgium, many of whose members are found after about 1640 in the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Rotterdam. Among the first of this family found in the Rotterdam records were Gillis de Koker and his son Daniel de Koker. Sara de Koker (1702-58), Daniel's daughter, was married to Petrus Smidt, preacher of the Zonist (q.v.) congregation of Amsterdam and professor at the Zonist Seminary. Johannes and Gillis de Koker of Rotterdam, visiting Jülich, Germany, in 1719, intervened in behalf of some Dompelaars from Crefeld (q.v.), who were imprisoned (DB 1861, 77 f., 80). Three members of this family, viz., Peter (Pieter), Yellis (Gillis), and Michael (Michiel) de Koker, were about 1725 among the proselytes and adherents of Alexander Mack (q.v.), the leader of the Dompelaars or Church of the Brethren; they remained, however, in the Netherlands and did not join the exodus of the Brethren to Pennsylvania in 1729. Members of the de Koker family were also found at Haarlem. Whether the Mennonite Abraham de Koker, who lived near Aardenburg (q.v.) and in 1730 married Tanneken Slock, was related to this family could not be decided.

Nearly all the de Koker family in the 18th century favored the Collegiant movement; some of them, like Pieter de Koker, Sr., Gerrit de Koker, and Gillis de Koker, often delivered addresses at the Collegiant center at Rijnsburg (q.v.). Most of them left the Mennonite Church; e.g., Gerrit de Koker, who in 1786 founded the old people's home "Hofje van Gerrit de Koker" at Rotterdam, and Alida de Koker, died 1794 at Rotterdam, who founded another Hofje there, called "Uit liefde en Voorzorg." A Joris de Coocker (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 539) was a member of the Mennonite congregation of Harlingen, Friesland, in 1612. vdZ.

Martin Grove Brumbaugh, A History of the German Baptist Brethren in Europe and America (Mount Morris, 1899).

Kolb, a Mennonite family, probably of Swiss origin. Caspar Kolb, a peasant of Walkringen in the canton of Bern, attended the disputation at Bern in 1538 as a leader of the Swiss Brethren. Barbara Kolb(in) was in prison at Zürich with three other Anabaptist women in 1639 because of their faith. However, not all the Kolbs in Switzerland were Swiss Brethren.

One of the representatives of the Reformed Church with whom Hans Pfistermeyer (q.v.) had to debate in the prison at Bern on April 19, 1531, was Franz Kolb. In the late 17th and early 18th centuries the Kolbs are found also in the Palatinate; some were preachers and elders in the congregations at Mannheim, Kriegsheim, and other places, among them Peter Kolb, elder at Mannheim.

This family, of slight importance in Europe, has produced numerous leaders in the Mennonite (MC) Church in America, particularly in Eastern Pennsylvania. In 1707 four children of Dielman Kolb (1648-1712) of Wolfsheim in the Palatinate came to Germantown as the very first forerunners of the large migration from that region to Eastern Pennsylvania, and one Dielman came in 1717. They settled early in Skippack (1709). Peter (1671-1727), the oldest of the children, remained in Mannheim where he was a Mennonite preacher. Martin (1680-1761) was ordained preacher at Germantown in 1709, but served at Skippack. Henry (d. 1730) was a preacher at Skippack. Dielman (1691-1756, q.v.) was a preacher at Salford and an associate with Henry (Henrich) Funck (q.v.) in the supervision of the publication of the Ephrata edition of the Martyrs' Mirror. Other prominent leaders in the Franconia Conference (MC) have been: Isaac (1711-76), first bishop of Rockhill; Amos (1879-), bishop at Vincent (Spring City); Elias W. Kulp (1880-), preacher at Bally. A total of 15 Kolbs have served as ordained men in the Franconia Conference. Most of the members of the Vincent congregation are direct or related descendants of Jonathan Kolb (1825-97), long-time deacon at Vincent. Jacob Kolb (1769-1858), preacher, was the founder of the Kolb's and Longenecker's congregation in Holmes Co., Ohio. A. B. Kolb (1862-1925), of the Waterloo Co., Ont., Kolb line, was a prominent layman at Elkhart, Ind., and an editor for many years of church publications in J. F. Funk's Mennonite Publishing House there. J. Z. Kolb (1836-1921), his father, was a long-time influential deacon in Waterloo Co., Ont. His younger brother, A. C. Kolb (1871-1937), who lived at Elkhart in 1888-1904, was the first secretary of the Elkhart Institute (q.v.) and of the Home and Foreign Relief Commission (q.v.). J.C.W., vdZ.

D. K. Cassel, A Genealogical History of the Kolb . . . Family (Norristown, 1895); R. B. Strassburger, "The Kolb Family," 391-413 in The Strassburger and Allied Families of Pennsylvania (Geweynedd Valley, Pa., 1922); Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953); H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown, 1683-1708," MQR VII (October 1933) 227-50.

Kolb, Andreas and Katharina, a married couple who suffered death for their faith. With several like-minded persons they were baptized at Zella Sankt Blasii, Ohrdruf district of Sachsen-Gotha, Germany, on June 7, 1528, by Volkmar of Hildburghausen. Volkmar at this service prepared them for future suffering: whoever would be a true Christian must leave everything he has and suffer persecution unto death. His predictions were promptly fulfilled. The authorities set up a vigorous search for those who had been baptized in Zella. Most of them were young married couples. They fled, leaving their children with relatives. But after only a few weeks some were discovered and brought back. An official list of arrests with its sober figures gives a shocking picture of the suffering that broke upon these families. There were six couples, who had left sixteen children behind, the oldest of whom was thirteen years old and blind. Their names were Andreas Kolb and wife, two children aged one and five; mayor Hans Fock and wife, one child aged two; Balthasar Armknecht and wife, four children aged two, three, five, and nine; Georg Unger (called Bader) and wife, four children aged four, ten, twelve, and thirteen; Kaspar Komel and wife, four children aged one, three, five, and seven; and Kunz Eigeler and wife with one child.

Andreas Kolb was the first arrested. He was sent to Reinhardsbrunn (a former monastery, and later a resort palace of the dukes of Sachsen-Gotha) near Gotha; Elector John (q.v.) of Saxony was notified of the arrest. Kolb confessed that he had been baptized, and at his urging his wife had also been baptized. He asked for instruction; if he had erred he would return to the church. By recanting he won his release, but later returned to the Anabaptists; his wife likewise.

A year later both were again arrested with seven other Anabaptists and taken to Reinhardsbrunn. Here each one was informed on Jan. 10, 1530, that he had forfeited his life and goods, since he had not kept his word to abstain from false doctrine.

After these admonitions they were given time to reflect and to receive further instruction. Andreas Kolb declared that he would stand by his faith. His wife, who had decided to recant, was unable to move him, and withdrew her own recantation. Christoph Ortlep and three women, Elsa Kunz, Barbara Unger, and Katharina König, also remained steadfast. One week later, on Jan. 18, 1530, they were put to death at Reinhardsbrunn. Only two men, Valentin Unger and Balthasar Armknecht, and one woman, Osanna Ortlep, probably some of them related to the above, begged for mercy and recanted (Wappler, Kursachsen, 12, 133-37).

The sentence of death passed on four women and two men who valued their faith above their life stirred up much comment, and resulted in the Wittenberg theologians taking a definite position in regard to the forcible suppression of the Anabaptists. Not only in letters did they express their views, but also in books.

The Gotha superintendent, Friedrich Myconius, had some doubts, because the condemned prisoners had not been convicted of sedition. He wrote to Philip Melanchthon about it, who was at that time making a conspicuous change, "a gradual letting go of the impression of the commands of the Sermon on the Mount" (Lüthje, 518). Melanchthon replied (February 1530) to Myconius that he was in full sympathy with the Reinhardsbrunn verdict. "Anabaptists, even though they are otherwise blameless, reject some of their civic duties. But even if they have no seditious, but obviously blasphemous articles, it is my opinion that it is the duty of government to kill them" (Wappler, Kursachsen, 14). This view was shared by Luther now too. In his exegesis of Psalm 82, two months after the verdict of Reinhardsbrunn had been carried out, he said emphatically that heresy should be punished by the government.

Shortly after this event Myconius and Justus Menius, the general superintendent of Eisenach, decided to refute the Anabaptist teachings in a book. The manuscript was presented to Luther for his opinion; on April 12, 1530, he expressed the desire to add a paragraph on the call to preach. The book appeared soon afterward under Menius' name with the title, Der Widdertauffer lere und geheimnis aus heiliger Schrifft widderlegt; it contained a foreword by Luther and a dedication to Philip of Hesse, dated May 4, 1530. HEGE.

Wappler, Thüringen, 185, 303 f.; idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); H. Lüthje, "Melanchthons Anschauung über das Recht des Widerstandes gegen die Staatsgewalt," in Ztscht für Kirchengesch. XLVII (1928); ML II, 519 f.

Kolb, Dielman, preacher of the Mennonite Church at Salford, Pa., b. Nov. 10, 1691, at Wolfsheim, Palatinate, Germany, the youngest of six children, d. Dec. 28, 1756, at Skippack, Pa. His father, Dielman Kolb, b. 1648 in Wolfsheim, d. Oct. 13, 1712, in Mannheim, Germany, was married to a daughter of Peter Schumacher (a Quaker), who was one of the first Palatines to settle in Germantown in 1785. The son, and also his older brother Peter (d. 1727), who was a preacher at Mannheim, took a warm interest in his brethren who had been banished from Switzerland, sheltered them, and in general did much for them. He continued his correspondence with the Committee for Foreign Needs at Amsterdam after his arrival in America. In 1714 he married Elisabeth Schnebeli of Mannheim. On March 21, 1717, he emigrated to America with his family. They arrived in Philadelphia on Oct. 10. From there Dielman Kolb went to Salford (in Montgomery County), where he bought about 500 acres of land. With Heinrich Funck (q.v.) he founded the Salford congregation (MC) in 1738, and with him supervised the translation of the Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.) from Dutch into German 1745-48. It was through his influence that his close friend Christopher Dock's (q.v.) Schulordnung was written and later (1770) published. In the struggles and needs of a pioneer Mennonite settlement his work and influence were of lasting benefit to the brotherhood. His only child Elizabeth was married to Andrew Ziegler (1707-97), preacher (1746-) and bishop (1762-) at Skippack. HEGE, H.S.B.

D. K. Cassel, A Genealogical History of the Kolb, Kulp or Culp Family (Norristown, 1895); R. B. Strassburger, The Strassburger and Allied Families of Pennsylvania (Gweynedd Valley, 1922); S. W. Pennypacker, "A Noteworthy Book," Penn'a. Mag. of Hist. and Biog. V, No. 3 (1881); J. D. Souder, "The Life and Times of Dielman Kolb, 1691-1756," MQR III (January 1929) 33-41; Dictionary of American Biography X (N.Y., 1933); ML II, 520.

Kolb, Franz, reformer of Bern, Switzerland, a native of Lörrach, Baden, Germany. He studied at the University of Basel, acquiring a Master's degree. After working three years in Bern (1512-14) he moved to Nürnberg. Through Berchthold Haller's (q.v.) mediation he came back to Bern, and became a fiery promoter of the Reformation. Kolb helped Haller compose the ten Schlussreden, which served as the basis for the disputation in Bern (1528), which ended in a decisive victory for the Reformation.

In Anabaptist history Kolb is of importance for his debates with some of the Swiss Brethren. The first one took place on May 21, 1527, with Hunger, Peter Breyt, the "Seckler" Math. Han, Bastian Hammer, and Steffan Haffner. In early February 1530 Kolb and Kaspar Grossman (q.v.), in the presence of the Council, tried to convert the Swiss Brethren leader, Konrad Eichacher, by means of Romans XIII, but was not successful. He also took part in the discussion with Hans Pfistermeyer (q.v.) in Aarau on April 19, 1531, where the preachers had better success. Franz Kolb died in Bern on Nov. 11, 1535. S.G.

S. Scheurer, Mausoleum (Bern, 1742); Endliche Bekanntnus der widertöffer . . . 21 tag may im 1527 jar (Unnütze Papiere LXXX, No. 1); Steck and Tobler, Aktensammlung zur Gesch. der Berner Ref., No. 2718; Ein Christenlich Gespräch, gehallten zu Bernn zwischen den Predicanten vnn Hansen Pfyster Meyer von Arouw, den Widertouff, Eyd, Oberkeyt, ond andere Widertöufferische Artikel Betreffende (1531); Müller, Berner Täufer, 74; ML II, 520.

Kolb, Martin (b. 1680), the third of the seven children of Dielman Kolb, who emigrated from Wolfsheim, Germany, to Germantown, Pa., in 1685. In the spring of 1707 he emigrated to America with three younger brothers, Johannes, Jakob, and Heinrich, and on May 19, 1709, he married Magdalena van Sintern, a daughter of Isaac van Sintern, the Germantown deacon, who had emigrated from the Hamburg-Altona church to Germantown in 1700. In 1709 he was among the first settlers of Skippack, 15 miles north of Germantown, where he lived until his death in 1761. He was the first preacher of Skippack, the first rural congregation in America. He had been ordained on April 20, 1708, perhaps by Elder Jakob Godschalk. There are no records of his 53 years of service at Skippack. With his brother Dielman he wrote a letter, Oct. 9, 1745, to the Commissie voor buitenlandsche nooden in Holland. H.S.B.

A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (3rd ed., Norden, 1912); ML II, 520 f.

Kolb, Peter (Petter, Petrus), was in the first half of the 18th century elder of the Kriegsheim Mennonite congregation in the Palatinate, Germany. In 1709 he visited the Netherlands; presumably was the confidential agent of the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs of Amsterdam. In 1731 he was invited to give information to the Amsterdam Committee concerning the needs of the congregations in the Palatinate. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1430, 1439, 1443, 1470; ML II, 521.) VDZ.

Kolb's and Longenecker's Mennonite (MC) churches, in Holmes Co., Ohio: see Longenecker's.

Kolde, Theodor Hermann Friedrich (1850-1913), Lutheran church historian, professor of theology at the University of Erlangen, Germany, was an opponent of Ludwig Keller (q.v.). His works are valuable in the field of church history (see Beiträge zur bayrischen Kirchengeschichte XX, 1914, 97-166).

Bearing on Mennonite history are Johann Staupitz, ein Waldenser und Wiedertäufer (1885); Zum Prozess des Johann Denk und der drei gottlosen Maler (Leipzig, 1887); "Hans Denk und die gottlosen Maler in Nürnberg," in Beiträge zur bayrischen Kirchengesch. VIII; and Andreas Althamer, der Humanist und Reformator in Brandenburg-Ansbach (Erlangen, 1895). NEFF.

H. Jordan, Theodor Kolde, ein deutscher Kirchenhistoriker (Leipzig, 1914); ML II, 521.

Koldershofje, a former Mennonite old people's home at Haarlem, Holland. It was closed before 1700, apparently by merging with another similar institution. (DB 1876, 116.) vdZ.

Kolhorn, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland. Anabaptism here is of a very early date. On March 6 or 7, 1534, during a raid on the Anabaptists eleven of them from Nieuwe Niedorp were apprehended on the dike near Kolhorn. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 32 persons here in 1563-65. At that time or soon after there was a Frisian congregation here, forming a unit with that of Barsingerhorn. The (lay) preachers of this congregation were Jacob Jacobsz Teeke (1714-57), Frans Albertsz Vrijer (1721-ca. 1756), and his son Albert Fransz Vrijer (1741-55). The preacher Daniel Hovens, who served here 1755-57, had many difficulties with the Reformed ministers and government officials because he had given catechetical instructions to a Reformed girl. The old meetinghouse was restored in 1759. On Sept. 15, 1788, when nearly the whole village of Kolhorn was destroyed by fire, the meetinghouse also burned down. In 1790 the small congregation, numbering hardly 20 members, erected both a meetinghouse and a parsonage. A large number of preachers served here between 1757 and 1784. In this year Claes Stuurman accepted a call; he was the last preacher of the Frisian congregation of Barsingerhorn and Kolhorn. His dedication sermon of the rebuilt church, Dec. 19, 1790: Leerreden ter inwying van de nieuwgebouwde Doopsgezinde Kerk te Kolhorn, was published at Alkmaar in 1792. In 1826 Stuurman died, and in 1827 the congregation, then numbering 14 members, merged with the Waterlander congregation of Barsingerhorn and Wieringerwaard. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 937; II, Nos. 1535-37; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 174; DB 1880, 81-96; Naamlijst 1829, "Kerknieuws," 31; ML II, 521.

Kollum, a village in the northeast of the Dutch province of Friesland, where in the 16th and 17th centuries Mennonites were very numerous. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized four persons here in 1551-54, 21 persons in 1563-65, and 201 persons in 1568-82, totaling 226; besides these, in 1563-65 eight others in the Kollumer Nieuwland.

In the early 17th century there were at Kollum at least three Mennonite congregations: (a) A Waterlander congregation which was represented at the Waterlander conference of 1647 at Amsterdam and in 1695 joined the Sociëteit of Friesland. Its membership then was already very small, probably not more than 30. Its members were for a large part poor and were almost continuously supported by other Mennonites; e.g., in 1658 by the Mennonites from the southwestern part of Friesland and in the 18th century by the Sociëteit of Friesland. Often the pulpit was vacant. Of its meetinghouse at Kollum nothing is known. In 1745 this Kollum congregation united with that of Buitenpost (q.v.) and was then called Kollum and Buitenpost. In 1835 the united congregation, then numbering only 10 members, merged with that of Surhuisterveen (q.v.) and the name of Kollum disappeared. (b) A Groningen Old Flemish congregation called Kollum and Visvliet (q.v.) or also Visvliet and Kollum. This congregation died out before 1700. (c) An Old Frisian, also called Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) group, congregation of which nothing is known but the fact that it died out in the early 18th century, its meetinghouse having been sold before 1729. There may even have been a fourth congregation at Kollum (d) of Pieter-Jeltjes-volk (followers of Elder Pieter Jeltjes, q.v.) of Kollum, who was banned by Jan Jacobsz in December 1599.

In 1932 Mennonites living at Kollum formed a "Menno Simonsz-Kring," which belongs to the congregation of Zwaagwesteinde (q.v.). The membership of this group amounted to 38 in 1955. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim, see Index; DB 1874, 107 f.; 1879, 3; 1892, 71 f.; 1895, 12, 20; 1903, 81, 91, 105; 1905, 29; 1907, 79; 1912, 66, 68; ML II, 522.

Kollumerzwaag, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation about which only scarce particulars are available. The various issues of the Dutch Naamlijst mention this congregation, which often was without a preacher. It is supposed to have been founded about 1600, the membership then numbering about 100. In 1695, when the Sociëteit of Friesland was founded, Kollumerzwaag also joined, having then about 50 members. It often was subsidized by the Conference of Friesland. In 1815 its meetinghouse had become dilapidated and was out of use, and in 1816 was transferred to Zwaagwesteinde (q.v.) and rebuilt there, being dedicated May 6, 1816, by H. A. Bosma, the last (untrained) preacher of Kollumerzwaag. In 1844 the congregation of Kollumerzwaag was dissolved, the remaining members joining the congregation of Dantumawoude (q.v.). vdZ.

DB 1895, 12, 20; 1903, 165; Naamlijst 1829, "Kerknieuws," 47; H. J. Buse, De verdwenen Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland, reprint from De Vrije Fries XXII (1915), 11 f.

Köln: see Cologne.

Köln, Peter von: see Peter van Coelen.

Komander (Dorfmann), Johann (1484-1557), the reformer of the canton of the Grisons (q.v.), Switzerland, studied with his friend Zwingli under Wittenbach in Basel, and in 1524 became pastor of St. Michael's in Chur. Komander achieved prominence as Protestant spokesman at the disputation in Ilanz, Jan. 7-9, 1526, for which he had drawn up 18 theses, which clearly betray Zwingli's influence in form and content. The adherents of the old faith, the abbot of St. Lucius and Theodor Schlegel, tried to sabotage the disputation, but Komander persisted unshakably in defending the Protestant doctrine, so effectively that soon after the disputation at Ilanz the Reformation took great forward strides in the Grisons.

Beginning in 1525 the activities of the Swiss Brethren leaders, Blaurock, Manz, Grebel, and Castelberger, made themselves felt in the Grisons (q.v.), especially in Chur (q.v.). The success of these men not only caused Komander great concern; he thought the progress of the Reformation threatened, since the Anabaptists were being actually supported by the Catholics. The struggle was particularly difficult for Komander for the reason that the Swiss Brethren as a matter of principle based their doctrine on the authority of the Holy Scriptures.

In his distress Komander wrote to Zwingli on Aug. 8, 1525, lamenting (free translation): "In the first place I inform you that the Anabaptists fill us with care and sorrow. People in the Grisons no longer want to hear the pure Gospel. They draw to their sect many of the best-instructed in the Bible, so that they no longer attend our services. Innumerable accusations are made against me. Those citizens who have not signed themselves away to the Anabaptists are waiting in indecision and amazement. The Gospel seems to many to be vain babbling, indeed as something repugnant. As the third party that has the advantage when the other two are engaged in conflict, the Papists rejoice in the schism. They pour oil into the fire and feed it to a mighty flame. The abbot of St. Lucius, for instance, supports our city scribe, whose wife is an Anabaptist and was therefore banished from the city, with word and deed, procures books and other aid for him, and in general promotes the spread of the sect, in order to give the misled ones over to mockery as soon as I am brought to a fall. The city scribe is preparing for a disputation, which is to try me severely, and he is boasting in advance of victory. Then, of course, everything will take a most splendid course: the exiles will return to the family circle, will feel comfortable at home, and I shall have a heavy burden in the turn of events. But as God will. In Zürich the Anabaptists have been defeated, and as long as they are not successful there, other victories will do them no good. I am opposed to a disputation in our town. But if the council should decide in favor of one, then I demand that it be conducted in writing, so that our arguments, the scribe's and mine, can be proved at leisure. Help me, faithful Zwingli, in distress, that the Gospel may not be smothered in Grisons."

In the meantime the struggle against the Anabaptists had become a federal affair. The burgomaster and the council sided against the Anabaptists. To what extent this step was due to Komander's influence is not clear. In connection with a federal diet in Chur, a considerable number of "Anabaptists, iconoclasts, and other disobedient obstinate ones" were seized and tried. At the Davos Diet in May 1526, the Catholic and Zwinglian creeds were accepted as equally valid, but Anabaptist teaching was forever prohibited.

In the spring of 1528, Komander complained again about the difficulty of his position. He told Zwingli that he had to use all his strength to combat the "Catabaptists." They had their meetings in Chur, and there were many among the citizens, who secretly or openly adhered to them. Castelberger (q.v.) was also carrying on his propaganda in the city; many citizens were being confused by him. He (Komander) had to work and worry more about these people than if twice the number of Papists attacked him. Some had been seized, and now people were crying that the pastor was to blame; that it was he who urged expulsion and that he thirsted for innocent blood. Indeed, their death did not please him at all. But he was sorry that they did not stop misleading the people.

For the disputation planned for the day after Easter in 1531, Komander had formulated 12 theses, the last of which stated, "Anabaptism is an error and an enticement against God's Word and doctrine."

In the long dispute and wearisome negotiations with Camillo Renato, the leader of the radical movement in northern Italy, Komander was also involved; but he refused to decide the issue, referring them to Zürich and Basel, "where there are learned men, who are better qualified to mediate between them."

Komander carried on a regular correspondence with Bullinger. In 1550 he fell ill of the plague. His co-worker Johann Blasius was taken by death, but he recovered, though he probably did not regain his vitality. He died in 1557. His successor was Johann Fabricius Montanus of Zürich. S.G.

"Kommander" and "Camillo Renato" in HRE; E. Camenisch, Bündner Ref.-Gesch. (Chur, 1920; J. C. Füsslin, Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Kirchen-Ref.-Gesch. I (Zurich, 1741); J. Stumpf, Chronika vom Leben und Wirken des Ulrich Zwingli (Zürich, 1932) 76; Zwingli's Werke VIII (Leipzig, 1914) 341 f.; ML II, 525 f.

Komejannen, Komejansche Doopsgezinden, or Komen Jans-Volk, name given in the Netherlands to a group of Dutch Mennonites. The name is found in some letters of Jan Theunisz of 1627 and in an old booklet of 1628, now lost, in which Hans Alentsz (H. Alenson, q.v.) is called a bishop among the Koomen-Jannen or Hansijtten (see BRN VII, 143). From this notice it is clear that the Komejannen were a kind of Waterlander Mennonites, whose leader was Hans de Ries. The name was rather common in the province of North Holland. According to J. Adrsz. Leeghwater (q.v.), a preacher Comen (i.e., merchant) Jan preached in De Rijp (q.v.) in this province about 1572, from whom the name may have been derived. vdZ.

BRN VII, 143; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 14-16; DB 1896, 18; 1917, 15, 30.

Komen (Commines), a town in Flanders, Belgium, southwest of Kortrijk (Courtrai), where Mennonites were found about 1550 and there may have been a congregation. Guillaume van Robays died here as a martyr 1552, an unknown blacksmith in 1551. vdZ.

Komes (Comes, Commerts), Teunis (Tönis) (1535-after 1607), owner of the Gatherhof at Rheydt, in 1591 signed the Concept of Cologne (q.v.) as a representative of the Mennonite congregation at München-Gladbach, Rheinland, Germany. He was an ancestor of the Jacob Gottschalk (q.v.) who emigrated to Pennsylvania and was a preacher of the church of Germantown. The family name of Komes, spelled in different ways: Kommes, Komms, Kohmsen, was also found in West Prussia before 1700. They may have been related to the Rhineland branch of this family. VDZ.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 112; Walter Risler, "Das München-Gladbacher Mennonitenverzeichnis von 1654," in Beiträge zur Gesch. rhein. Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 94-130, especially 109; W. Niepoth, "Jakob Gottschalk and His Ancestry," MQR XXIII (January 1949) 35-47.

Kommerau (Polish, Osiec), a hamlet on the left bank of the Vistula River in the district of Graudenz, where on Polish territory (after 1772 German) Dutch Mennonites founded a settlement about 1570. Land leases of 1604, 1656, 1684, and 1773 have been preserved. In 1623 the Mennonites of Kommerau obtained exemption from military taxes and quartering of soldiers. (See Montau.) VDZ.

Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk der Niederl. Mennoniten . . . (Marburg a.d.Lahn, 1952) 23, 80.

Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten — KfK (Committee for Church Affairs) was an organization among Mennonites of Russia (also transplanted to the Mennonite settlements in South America), which contrary to previous practices, represented all Mennonite groups in Russia. In 1910 a Glaubenskommission was appointed at Schönsee by the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz der Mennnonitengemeinden in Russland (q.v.) to deal with the tremendous problems of that time. The Russian parliament had issued a new law regarding religious groups by which the Mennonites were stripped of their former privileges and treated as a "sect." The KfK became an effective agent in these emergency situations. At the conference at Nikolaipol in 1912, the name Glaubenskommission was changed to Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten. This commission became the executive committee of the conference (Bundeskonferenz) to carry out its decisions in so far as they did not conflict with the local autonomy of the congregations and also to represent the collective Mennonite body to the government.

The first committee consisted of Elder Abr. Goerz of Ohrloff; Heinrich Braun (Mennonite Brethren), and D. H. Epp. In 1911 D. H. Epp was appointed chairman and K. Unrau was added as treasurer. Later Wilhelm Dyck took the place of Heinrich Braun. In 1912 the KfK was also charged with the responsibility for arranging the programs and obtaining governmental permission to hold conference sessions. At a meeting of the Allgemeiner Mennonitischer Kongress (q.v.) in Ohrloff in 1917, it was decided that the chairman of the KfK devote his full time to the work of the conference and that he should receive a salary. During the time of the Revolution and the confusion following it, all activities came temporarily to an end. At the first conference after the Revolution, held in Chortitza in October 1922, a new committee was elected composed of Elder Johann Klassen of Schönwiese, Elder Jacob Rempel of Grünfeld, Heinrich Wiebe of Steinfeld, and Jakob Janzen of Tiege. The functions of the committee remained the same with special authorization for action in cases of emergency. The committee chosen in 1925 consisted of Elder Alexander Ediger of Schönsee, Aaron Dyck of Margenau, and Cornelius Martens of Grossweide. Later representatives from Siberia and the Crimea were added. The activities of the KfK in Russia came to a close in 1926-27 when all organized religious activities became impossible.

The Mennonites of Brazil and Paraguay continued the practice of having an inter-Mennonite KfK to take care of all common religious problems of the settlements. The KfK in Brazil had the same name Kommission as the corresponding Russian Mennonite KfK, and continued until 1947, when the withdrawal of the Mennonite Brethren group rendered it moribund. For the Paraguay KfK, see the article Kommission für kirchliche Angelegenheiten. (For bibliography see Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland; ML II, 526.) D.H.E., C.K.

Kommission für kirchliche Angelegenheiten—KfK (Commission for Church Affairs), located in Colonly Fernheim of the Paraguayan Chaco, was organized in late 1930 by the leading ministers of the three newly formed Mennonite churches there—Mennonite Brethren, Mennonite, and Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, as a result of earnest counsel on the part of the German and North American Mennonite leaders, especially in order to be better able to cope with the rigors of pioneering and its effect upon the spiritual life of the settlers, to guide the establishment of schools, and in general to counsel the colony on all cultural and spiritual matters. The purpose of the KfK was the same as that in Russia (see Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten). Considerable difficulty was experienced in the early days of organization. Whereas the first commission consisted of six members, two from each of the three churches (denominations), the new commission, reorganized on Aug. 30, 1932, consisted of eleven members, four from the Mennonite Brethren Church, four from the Mennonite Church, and three from the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, which in turn organized its own executive committee of three ministers: Nicolai Wiebe (EMB) as chairman, Johann Teichgraef (GCM) as secretary, and Gerhard Isaak (MB) as vice-chairman. Statutes drawn up and accepted at that time, but modified and rewritten in 1945, provided a basis upon which the KfK could work, both on internal colony problems and in representing the churches' concerns to the government and foreign organizations. The KfK has proved itself a great blessing to the colony churches at all times, especially in times of common difficulties and in the churches' struggle for a higher cultural and spiritual level within the colonies. It seems indispensable, especially since members of different Mennonite groups are pioneering together and are dependent upon one another daily. The statutes of the KfK follow:

1. Membership: The Commission for Church Affairs is composed of representatives of all existing churches (denominations) in Fernheim. Each church (denomination) has the right to have one representative on the KfK for every hundred members or any part thereof, the denominational leaders automatically becoming these representatives.

2. Method of Procedure: The routine work of the KfK is done by the Executive Committee, consisting of the leaders of the respective churches. In special or emergency cases and at the close of every church year, the larger KfK is present at the meeting.

3. Assignment of the KfK: (a) First, the KfK is to represent the churches to the outside world, i.e., to the Paraguayan government and to the Mennonite and like-minded churches of foreign lands. (b) It is the guardian of the spiritual and cultural values of our Mennonite brotherhood. By this is meant that it is the responsibility of the KfK to guide and supervise the education of our youth and the training of our children on the basis of our Christian Mennonite faith, by virtue of which we receive the Privilegium (privileges) from the Paraguayan government. (c) To co-ordinate and mediate between the churches: (1) In questions of common concern that need clearance. (2) In questions concerning the furthering of cultural and spiritual life and the building of the kingdom of God. (3) In questions concerning the customs and habits of our brotherhood. These questions can be submitted by the churches or raised directly by the KfK.

Internal questions of the individual congregations are not dealt with by the KfK, in so far as they do not adversely affect the total brotherhood. The KfK always works in co-operation with the churches and in contact with the colony administration. J.I.

Konferenz-Jugendblatt der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinden in Kanada is a 32-page, 9 x 12 in. illustrated quarterly periodical published by the Youth Work Committee of the M.B. Conference of Canada, first number July 1944. Until May 1954 it was printed at Winnipeg and edited by H. F. Klassen. Beginning in May 1954 it was printed at Yarrow, B.C., and edited by H. H. Voth. Since it is distributed free to the youth of the church its periodicity and size has been irregular. To the end of 1956 a total of 67 numbers had appeared for an average of five numbers per year. The first four numbers were published by the Manitoba M.B. Committee for Youth Work. H.S.B.

König: see King.

König, Katharina, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Reinhardsbrunn in Sachsen-Gotha, Germany, with three other women and four men (see Kolb, Andreas). This sentence of death caused Friedrich Myconius, the superintendent of Gotha, some uneasiness, which Melanchthon tried to dissipate in a letter dated February 1530. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910) 12, 127, 135, 137; ML II, 537.

Königsbach, a village (pop. 3,399) in Baden, Germany, mostly Protestant. There were Anabaptists here already in the 16th century. Around Bretten (q.v.) and Maulbronn they found temporary refuge about 1530. The wooded border regions of Württemberg, Baden-Durlach, and the bishopric of Speyer were favorable to the spread of the Anabaptist movement during the period of persecution, for they offered some security. In 1531 from 200 to 300 persons met in the forests of Bretten and Reibsheim (Bossert, LIX, 59, 77). Later on, when the group was greatly reduced by emigration to Moravia, it was served by Hans Schoch (Schochhans), who lived in Königsbach. About 1555 he was seized for conducting these meetings, but managed to escape from prison in the tower at Cannstadt (Bossert, Württemberg, 530 and 1021; LIX, 76). Further arrests were made in a forest not far from Königsbach, as reported on Feb. 11, 1572 (Bossert, Württemberg, 346).

After the Thirty Years' War Swiss Mennonites settled in Königsbach. On Aug. 24, 1661, these Mennonites requested that the margrave of Baden confirm their former "privileges." A congregation was organized; a church book has been preserved, giving information dated 1766, besides entries on births, weddings, and funerals for the period 1815-69. Of frequent occurrence are the names Ehrismann, Kempf, Täuscher, Wagner, and Wolber; there are references to families by the name of Egli, Eyer, Funk, Katz, and Oesterle. The church book is in the possession of the local Protestant pastor. The number of Mennonites in Königsbach decreased during the 20th century because of emigration. The census of 1910 enumerated 33, five of whom lived on the Johannestalerhof; in 1925 only ten Mennonites were counted. HEGE.

TA Baden-Pfalz; TA Württemberg; Gustav Bossert, "Beiträge zur badisch-pfälzischen Reformationsgeschichte," in Zeitschrift für die Geschichte des Oberrheins LIX (1905; Mitteilungen der bad. hist. Kommission, No. 27 (1905) 197; ML II, 537.

Königsberg, a town (pop. 1,500) in Lower Franconia, northern Bavaria, Germany, formerly belonging to the duchy of Sachsen-Koburg, and an enclave in the bishopric of Würzburg, 15 miles east of Schweinfurt, today a resort town in a wooded region.

For Anabaptist history the city and its vicinity is important, for from it the Anabaptist movement soon spread over Middle Germany. The first Anabaptist preacher there was Hans Hut, a native of this region. Until 1524 he was a sexton at Bibra, seven miles south of Meiningen, but was expelled when he refused to have his child baptized. He went to Königsberg in Franconia (Meyer, 241). In the spring of 1526 he joined the Anabaptists, and became very active in Königsberg and the vicinity. In his sermons he moved away from the social revolutionary ideas of Thomas Müntzer, under whose spell he had been for a time; he sought instead to prove that the peasants had been in the wrong in the revolt, in that they had sought their own advantage, and not the glory of God (Wappler, Thüringen, 31).

Hut's words fell on receptive soil. In a short time he had won a stately following. The sparsely populated region around Königsberg, which was then an enclave of the electorate of Saxony, offered good opportunities for undisturbed meetings. Besides Hut, also the cabinetmaker Eucharius Binder and Joachim Mertz served as evangelists here for a time; but they soon went into other regions. They devoted themselves completely to the service of the new doctrine, "moved up and down the Main and its tributaries, and everywhere challenged the people to attend their conventicles, which they usually held at night and behind barred doors in remote mills, farms, or suburban homes" (Wappler, Thüringen, 29).

This extensive work could not long remain concealed from the authorities, who scented new calamities everywhere since the bad experiences of the Peasants' War. In the middle of January 1527 the bailiff of Königsberg, Kuntz Gotsmann, received word from the bailiff of Würzburg concerning Anabaptist activities in the Königsberg district with the request that he suppress them, "that no revolt may arise therefrom." Gotsmann accordingly had had three men arrested, among them Hans Beutel (Beutelhans), a Königsberg citizen, who was preaching to the peasants without the knowledge of the government, "in the pretense, as if they were proclaiming God's Word." If such meetings continued, he reported to Koburg, another revolution could be feared. With Hans Beutel another Königsberg citizen, Wolf Schreiner (also called Wolf Schominger) was named, arrested because of the new baptism, furthermore a smith of Friesenhausen, who was returned to Würzburg because he had been seized in the bishopric.

The bishop's representative wished to be present at the cross-examination of the Königsberg prisoners, and after the questioning by the bailiff of Königsberg, with the use of the rack applied by the Koburg executioner, he would also ask the prisoners some questions. Although it had never before been the custom to admit a representative of the bishop to a trial of a Königsberg peasant with torture, the Koburg government acceded to his wish (Berbig, 305 f.). The bailiffs agreed that both would apply the rack. The prisoners were evidently tortured until they admitted that they were planning a rebellion.

At a new hearing without torture, in the presence of the assistant magistrate, Georg von Hassberg, the mayor, and several councilors of Königsberg, they recanted some of their previous statements, saying that they had made them "out of lack of understanding and for fear of the rack." Their statement about the approaching end of the world only meant that "when God comes to judge the world at the end of time and would judge all men, they, as specially chosen Christians, if they remained true to the end, would help Christ judge the survivors, when He comes in His divine majesty in the clouds" (Berbig, 299, 335).

The reports were placed before Elector John of Saxony (q.v.), who decreed in an edict of Feb. 27, 1527, that the accused, Beutelhans and Wolf Schreiner, had, to be sure, forfeited their lives by making pretended baptism a sign of rebellion; but if the prince-bishop of Würzburg, Konrad von Thüngen (governed 1519-40), would not have the prisoners in his realm put to death, he would also show mercy to the poor mortals and grant them their lives. Otherwise, if the two prisoners persisted in their faith they should be killed with the sword. In addition he decreed: In the entire Franconian territory no one is permitted to preach and perform the sacraments except the pastors and preachers ordained for the purpose (Berbig, 297).

Suspects, if someone gives security for them, should do church penance (q.v.), according to the following stipulations: "Every Sunday before the sermon they shall come to Königsberg, report to the bailiff, stand in a row before the church door, without shoes, with a sack hung about each one, all speaking prohibited. At the beginning of the sermon they shall be called before the pulpit and here again stand in a row with downcast eyes and bowed heads. After the sermon a public confession is to be made by the culprits. The people are to be instructed on the error by skillful preachers. The property of the principal offenders shall be described, evaluated, and confiscated, but the offenders shall have the use of the income for their sustenance. All who are subjected to the 'shame punishment,' shall be put into prison one or two days every month and then renew their promise. Obstinate persons are to remain under arrest and be further prosecuted" (Berbig, 297).

Other arrests had meanwhile been made, including women with small children and pregnant women, from the territories of Königsberg, Münnerstadt, Königshofen, Hassfurt, and Staffelstein. The prisons were overflowing (Berbig, 333). In Königsberg, Hans Forster, the son-in-law of Hans Beutel; Thomas and Kaspar Spiegel, brothers from Ostheim; and the miller of Aurach, whose mill was in the bishopric, were seized.

The council of Königsberg at once began the instruction of the prisoners, securing the Koburg preacher Balthasar Düring, a native of Königsberg. He preached there on April 7, 1527 (Berbig, 336), but was apparently not too successful (Wappler, 34).

The death sentence was pronounced on them in spite of a lack of evidence of an intended revolution (all the racked prisoners instead stressing their nonresistance), and in spite of the fact that the burgomaster and council of Königsberg praised their previous conduct, rejected all suspicion of revolutionary plans, and asked that their lives be spared, and that the council of Koburg gave a similar testimonial for Wolf Schreiner. The bishop had Kaspar Spiegel and the miller of Aurach beheaded; thereupon the elector had Beutelhans and Wolf Schreiner put to death (Wappler, Kursachsen, 4, 129-31).

Many families fled before the persecution, but the movement could not be suppressed in Franconia or Saxony. In spite of the newness of the movement and the short time the adherents had belonged to it, their primitive Christian ideals were so deeply implanted that they would not yield it up to violence. As in Zürich, fugitives spread the movement to adjacent countries. Through Hans Hut and his group it spread south to Upper Austria; in the north and west it penetrated into Thuringia as far as the Harz and into Hesse. Even though some excitable spirits became guilty of selfish deeds, for which the leaders were not at all responsible, the religious goals of the original movement remained immovably the basis of the movement. Wappler, the historian of the Anabaptist movement in Thuringia, reaches the following conclusion on the basis of existing government records: "Their ideal is holiness. Therefore there is among them more or less withdrawal from the state and its institutions, a quiet acceptance of suffering as the cross of Christ, and a simple, purely Biblical devotional worship conducted by preachers of their own choice" (Wappler, Thüringen, 221). HEGE.

G. Berbig, "Die Wiedertäufer im Amt Königsberg . . . 1527-28," in Deutsche Ztscht für Kirchenrecht XIII, 291-353; H. Böhmer and P. Kirn, Thomas Müntzers Briefwechsel (1931); Chr. Meyer, "Die Anfänge des Wiedertäufertums in Augsburg," in Ztscht des hist. Vereins f. Schwaben u. Neuburg I (1874) 211-53; K. Schulz, "Thomas Müntzers liturgische Bestrebungen," in Ztscht für Kirchengesch. XLVII (1928); P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen (Jena, 1913); idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); E. Kipp, Kurze Lebensabrisse von Königsbergs (in Franken) berühmten Männern (1924); E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harzvereins . . . XXXII (1899) 466; ML II, 539-41.

Königsberg (now Russian Kaliningrad), the capital (1931 pop. 372,000) of the former German province of East Prussia, a Baltic seaport on the Pregel River. The first official record of Mennonites is of 1579, when they presented a petition to Margrave George Frederick for permission to settle in Königsberg and other towns. The reply was the order of expulsion, later frequently repeated, but apparently never enforced. It is probable that there were some here earlier, for in 1554 the Academy of Königsberg added to its rules the stipulation that every professor must swear neither to consent to nor to defend Anabaptist doctrine.

But the first Mennonite congregation in Königsberg did not come into being until 1722. In 1716 Johann Peter Sprunk (his original Dutch name was Jan Pietersz Spronck) and Heinrich van Höfen, and soon afterwards Jakob Schröder and Isaak Kroecker, were given permission to settle in Königsberg because they could distill rye whiskey "in the Danzig manner." Their skill brought the city considerable revenue, since it was now not necessary to import whiskey from Danzig; thus the Mennonites were permitted to stay in spite of the violent protest of the Lutheran clergy. In 1720 there were at a meeting in the home of the merchant Vos "six Manists and nine women" present. These meetings were allowed to be held only in the family circle. For communion they had to make the long journey to Danzig or Elbing. They therefore asked for permission to hold their services "in all quietness."

Frederick William I granted this request on April 2, 1722, not only because he found nothing dubious in the confession of faith presented by Sprunk, but especially because the Mennonites had paid 6,190 talers in taxes in five years. The practical king exploited their prosperity by requiring an annual fee of 200 talers to be paid to the recruit treasury for permission to organize as a congregation.

Thus the Mennonites could worship very quietly "because they everywhere endeavor to live a pious, quiet, and honorable life, . . . and especially they have tried to fulfill each and every duty of faithful and obedient subjects." The lively commercial connections between Königsberg and Danzig, Elbing, and Holland gradually brought a small congregation into being. The guarantee of freedom from military duty also brought several families from Polish territory. Nevertheless the Königsberg church never had more than 17 families; Sprunk was their first elder. The only knowledge we have of him is that he interceded for the Mennonites in the Tilsit lowlands when they were threatened with exile in 1723; his intervention was fruitless.

In the following years we hear of the attempts of the Mennonites to be admitted to the trades; the border weavers, Jakob Schroeder (of Danzig), Cauenhowen, and Bulert, did not succeed; only Bernd Claassen van Dyck obtained citizenship. A general regulation was passed on Dec. 10, 1730: Mennonites are excluded from citizenship; they may practice their trades upon payment of a protection fee in addition to the regular taxes.

In the midst of the negotiations, the edict of Feb. 22, 1732, was passed, banishing all Mennonites from the country within three months. The reason was their nonresistance. In their place the king wished to settle other Christians (Salzburg exiles; see Carinthian Exiles). Besides, the Sämland consistorium, in an unfavorable report, had charged that the Mennonites, along with the Unitarians, Jews, and Arians, had held public services and conducted their funerals "with a public show with funeral sermons," which was allowed only the three established churches. The Kriegs- und Domänenkammer of East Prussia protested the expulsion, pointing out the profit brought the state treasury by their crafts. The economical king was persuaded to let the Mennonites stay, provided they would establish woolen and cloth mills. Thereupon most of them returned to Königsberg. Frederick the Great gave them citizenship soon after his coronation. From that time on the congregation developed undisturbed, and dedicated its first meetinghouse in 1770.

In 1767 the first Mennonite hymnal in German was published in Königsberg. The publication of a hymnbook in German shows that the Dutch language of the first generations of Mennonites had fallen into disuse. About the Dutch origin of the first Mennonites of Königsberg not much is known. Most of them went to Königsberg after having settled first in West Prussia. Contacts with the Dutch Mennonites, especially with Amsterdam, were still strong in the 18th century. Some Mennonites of Königsberg had moved directly from Holland to Königsberg, as for example Jan Bruinvis(ch), a merchant from Amsterdam, who founded a large business here about 1710, and who, in his capacity of intermediary between the East Prussian (ex-Lithuanian) Mennonites and the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam, wrote a large number of letters to Amsterdam, the first of which is dated Aug. 12, 1711, and the last June 23, 1744. Bruinvis' letters are found in the Mennonite Archives of Amsterdam. Of great interest is a letter dated May 16, 1735, written by Spronck (or Sprunk) to the Committee at Amsterdam, which states that there were two congregations in Königsberg and seven poor families. Spronck also complained that Bruinvis had married outside the church and neglected the congregation (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 796; No. 799 is another interesting letter from Spronck, dated July 5, 1737). It is not quite clear which two branches of Mennonites were meant by Spronck, nor when these two congregations merged. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1743 and following editions mention only one congregation, which belonged to the Old Flemish. The following ministers are named for this church in the 18th century: Jan Pietersz Spronck (elder) serving from 1727, Cornelis Claasen 1731 (or 1738), Lammert van Dijk 1744, Willem Reynke 1751, Pieter Spronck 1758, Izaac Kreker (d. 1786) 1758, elder in 1767, Izaac Kauenhoven 1763-89, Jacob Kreker 1766, Zacharias Schröder 1766, Willem Temerman (or Zimmerman) 1778, Abraham Olffers 1782, Heinrich Penner 1786, and Johann Wieler 1789, elder in 1795.

When universal military service was introduced in Prussia in 1814, and was apparently to include the Mennonites, the church board appealed to the king. The immediate nearness of the Königsberg philosopher Kant is felt in this petition (given in Mannhardt, pp. 176 ff.): "Violation of nonresistance would mean to a Mennonite, who keeps the religion of his fathers and his conscience faithfully, the ruin of the moral person. For only in unwavering faith in the doctrines of his group and in conscientious obedience to them can a man be moral. It is therefore not merely a civic obstacle, it is religion itself which imposes upon us the impossibility of participating in war." This petition brought results.

The church secured a competent minister in Karl Harder (q.v.), who was born in Königsberg in 1820. After the completion of his theological studies he preached in the Elbing (q.v.) and Königsberg churches. On the basis of his Easter sermon at Elbing in 1845, 24 families left the Elbing-Ellerwald church, built a meetinghouse of their own in Elbing, and united with the Königsberg congregation. Harder served the Königsberg congregation until 1857, when he went to Neuwied. Adolf Siebert was pastor at Königsberg in 1898-1938. Josef Gingerich, last chairman of the church council, took pains to develop a feeling of cohesion and to draw the Mennonite youth studying in Königsberg into church life by instituting social evenings with lectures. In 1934 the church had 65 members, including children; in 1941 the same number was reported.

After Siebert's retirement in 1938 the congregation was served by Erich Göttner and Horst Quiring, the Danzig and Berlin Mennonite pastors. The attack and capture of the city by the Russians in 1944 put an end to the congregation, although its last chairman, Josef Gingerich, did not leave the city until 1946.

The congregation belonged to the Vereinigung of the Mennonite churches in Germany. On April 13, 1899, it gave the Vereinigung a sum of 125,000 marks, 60 per cent of the income to be applied to the Elbing and Königsberg churches, and the remaining 40 per cent to be used by the Vereinigung. In 1929, 75 per cent of the income was to be applied to Königsberg; the obligation to pay a certain annual sum to Elbing was canceled. H.Q., VDZ.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Danzig, 1863); Christine Hege, Kurze Geschichte der Menn. (Frankfurt, 1900); E. Randt, Die Mennoniten in Ostpreussen (Königsberg, 1912); J. Gingerich, "Die Mennonitengemeinde Königsberg und ihr Ende," Mennonit II (1949) 22; H. Penner, "The Anabaptists and Mennonites in East Prussia," MQR XXII (1948) 212-25; W. J. Schreiber, The Fate of the Prussian Mennonites (Göttingen, 1955); ML II, 538 f.

Koninck, Isaac Hendriks de, a Dutch Mennonite preacher of the Flemish congregation at Dordrecht, who promoted a union of this congregation and the Old Flemish congregation of Adriaan Cornelisz in this town, which in 1632 led to a fusion of most Flemish and Old Flemish congregations in the Netherlands on the basis of the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.). The de Koninck (Coninck) family was also found at Rotterdam, where David de Koninck was a deacon of the Flemish congregation 1652-55. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 569, 583, 588; DB 1862, 103.) VDZ.

Konopat(h) (Deutsch-Konopath), near Przechovka (Wintersdorf) in the district of Schwetz (q.v.), on the Vistula River, a village where Mennonites lived (in 1772 one third of the population was Mennonite), who, together with those of Przechovka (q.v.), formed a congregation of the Groningen Old Flemish branch. Two elders from the Netherlands, Alle Derks (q.v.) and Hendrik Berends (Hulshoff) (q.v.), who visited the Mennonites of Konopath shortly after 1700 and 1719, made a list of all the names of the members. In this list well-known West Prussian names are found, such as Raatslof (Ratzlaf), Tesmer, Nagtegaal (Nagtigal), Voet (Foth), Smit (Schmidt), Jans, Jansen, Boeler (Buhler), Isaachs, Onrouw (Unruh). In 1719 the group of Mennonites at Konopath (in the Dutch sources called Kunpad or Koenpat) numbered 52. This congregation, regularly found in the Dutch Naamlijst, emigrated to the Molotschna (q.v.) Mennonite settlement in South Russia in 1819-20 and 1823-24.

"Bezoekreis van Hendrik Berends Hulshoff," in Bijdragen en mededeelingen v. h. Hist. Genootschap. LIX (1938) 75, 79; J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76-82.

Konrad von Neuenstadt, an Anabaptist from Neuenstadt near Heilbronn a. N., Württemberg, Germany, who was a prisoner in the Oberhaus at Passau in 1535. In his trial he testified that he had been baptized two years earlier by a Swiss Brother named Julius. He refused to recant. (ML II, 544.) W.W.

Kontenius (Contenius), Samuel (1749-1830), member extraordinary of the Fürsorge-Komitee (q.v.) of the foreign settlers in South Russia. He earned the gratitude of the foreign settlements in Russia for his important services. At the age of 25 he came to Russia from Silesia, in 1785 entered Russian state service, in 1799 received the commission to inspect the foreign settlers in South Russia. In 1800 was appointed chief judge of the Neu-Russische Vormundschafts-Comptoir der Ausländer.

After 1803 Kontenius was occupied with the settlement of many foreigners coming into New Russia: Germans, Bulgarians, Greeks, Swedes, and French. In 1803-5 he directed the founding of 120 villages in the vicinity of Odessa, in the Crimea, and on the Molochna River, and the erection of the necessary buildings. He arranged for fruit culture and supervised the silk and wine industries. He laid the foundation for the future prosperity of the German settlements, especially that in the Molotschna, conscientiously giving his attention to all the branches of business. The founding of the Agricultural Association (q.v.) in 1830 is attributed to his initiative. Johann Cornies was a great admirer of Kontenius. In 1818 poor health compelled him to resign.

On his journey to the Crimea, Alexander I, passing through the Mennonite villages and impressed by the achievements of 15 years in beautiful orchards, splendid woods, and cultivation of the soil, asked Kontenius to continue his aid to the settlers as far as his health permitted. He devoted himself to this task until his death. His small capital he left to the building of schools and churches.

D.H.E.

A. M. Fadeew, Kontenius-Biographie (1831); ML II, 545.

Konteniusfeld (Conteniusfeld), a Mennonite village of the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine, Russia, founded in 1821, named for Samuel Kontenius (q.v.) (located 10 miles from Stulayevo, a railway station, comprised 6,356 acres of land before the Revolution; the population before World War I was 507. The principal industries were the culture of wheat, cattle, fruit, and bees. The village had an elementary school. Formerly there was a large shop which manufactured farm machinery. (Concerning the disintegration of the village see Molotschna and Ukraine; ML II, 545.)

Kontz, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed in Brixen in Tirol, Austria, in the autumn of 1533. Jakob Hutter (q.v.) mentions him in an epistle written in Auspitz, Moravia, Nov. 21, 1533. (Loserth, Anabaptismus, 500; ML II, 545.) Hege.

Konvent: see Kirchenkonvent.

Kooch, Jacob Pietersz van de(r): see Pietersz, Jacob.

Koog (Coogh). According to the minutes (Handelinghe) of the meeting of representatives of Flemish congregations held at Haarlem in 1649, a Flemish Mennonite congregation existed here, which, being vacant at that time, was to be served by Huisduinen (q.v.). Obviously by Koog is meant Valkkoog, not far from Huisduinen in the Dutch province of North Holland. Of this congregation no further information was available; it must have died out in the 17th century. vdZ.

Koog (aan de Zaan), a town about 10 miles north of Amsterdam, in the Zaan district, with a Mennonite congregation, the official name of which is Koog-Zaandijk (Zaandijk being a town adjacent to Koog). Because sources are lacking, it is impossible to state when the congregation of Koog-Zaandijk was founded, but at an early time Anabaptists were already found here. About 1600 the Mennonites comprised the great majority of the inhabitants, both of Zaandijk and Koog. In this time most of them belonged to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch, some were Flemish (q.v.), and a few Frisian. None of these groups formed an independent congregation and only a primitive Flemish meetinghouse was found at Koog. The Waterlanders belonged to the congregation of Westzaan and Oost-Zaandam, the Flemish to the Flemish congregation of West-Zaandam, and the Frisians to the congregation of Zaandam and Westzaan-Zuid. In course of time most Frisians joined the Flemish group, and both Flemish and Waterlanders obtained meeting-houses at Koog and became independent congregations. A Flemish meetinghouse was rebuilt in 1645. Until 1648 the Flemish Mennonites of Zaandam also used to worship in the Koog meetinghouse, but in 1648 a Flemish meetinghouse was built at Zaandam, and the Koog-Zaandijk group including that of Wormerveer (q.v.) became somewhat independent.

A Waterlander meetinghouse was built in 1637 in the northern part of Koog, and in 1646 the Waterlander group became a fully independent congregation. This Waterlander congregation seems to have been more conservative than Waterlander congregations usually were. About 1673 the preacher Pieter Pietersz was dismissed because he tried to introduce the tradition of "free speaking" (i.e., that lay members also be allowed to deliver addresses) as was usual among the Collegiants (q.v.). In 1680 the Waterlander and Flemish congregations of Koog-Zaandijk merged. The Flemish meetinghouse was sold and the Waterlander meetinghouse became a home for poor members. A new meetinghouse was erected on the Hoogstraat. This characteristic frame building of 1680 is still in use. It was largely renovated in 1873 and again in 1931. An organ was installed in 1870. The congregation possesses six silver communion cups, which date from the late 17th century, and which were probably given to the congregation when the new meetinghouse was built in 1680. At the time of the merger in 1680, there were 68 members of the Flemish branch and about 200 Waterlanders. The preachers at that time were Symen Aarjans (Adriaansz) and Dirk Simonsz Moeriaen (q.v.) (of the Waterlanders) and Aris Pieters of Zaandijk and Aris Cornelis Caeskoper (of the Flemish).

The united congregation witnessed a period of prosperity. In 1701 the membership numbered 584, the highest number ever reached. An orphanage was built in 1697, and in 1698 Abraham Verduin (q.v.), who had been trained by Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) of Amsterdam, was called to serve the congregation as preacher. He served until about 1752. The congregation was a member both of the Rijper Sociëteit (Waterlander Conference of North Holland) and of the Zonist Conference.

Among the families of Koog-Zaandijk who promoted Mennonitism was the Honig (q.v.) family; members of this family, who founded the large and well-known Honig grocery factories, are still found here as members of the Mennonite congregation.

In the last part of the 18th and the first decades of the 19th century there was a decline both of activity and of membership. The membership decreased in one century by about 200; but in the 19th century there was a considerable growth: 1808, 417; 1833, 470; 1861, 506; 1900, 516. From then a decrease took place, to 399 in 1955. The congregation always was rather well-to-do. In the early 18th century it contributed liberally to the needs of the Mennonites in Prussia (1727-36 a total of 2,840 guilders). From this time on the congregation was served by the preachers Sjoerd Pietersz van Dokkenburg 1750-75, his son Pieter van Dokkenburg 1770-1811, Jan Visser 1788-1831, Jan Bruin 1827-?, Jan van Gilse 1834-37, Christiaan Muller 1838-68, Jochem Boetje 1868-72, A. W. Huidekoper 1873-77, S. Lulofs 1877-89, P. S. Bakels 1889-1907, J. P. Smidts 1908-22, J. M. Leendertz 1923-27, J. E. van Brakel 1928-45, and E. H. Boer 1946- .

The congregation has an old people's home called the Johanna Elisabeth Stichting. Church activities include ladies' circle, young members' association, Sunday school for children, youth group Elfregi. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 708; II, 2032 f.; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 13, 23, 25, 32, 75, 82, 226; DB 1870, 180; 1874, 144; 1895, 180; 1900, 99; 1918, 65 f., 146; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910) No. 21; ML II, 547.

Kooiman, a Dutch Mennonite family, mostly farmers on the island of Texel (q.v.); Pieter Kooiman, who was then an old man, is mentioned in 1731 as a (lay) preacher of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation of Den Burg, Texel. (In the Naamlijst of 1743 he is listed as a retired minister.) A descendant of this family is Jan Kooiman (1865-1934), who served as pastor of the Mennonite congregations of Oudebildtzijl 1891-93, Barsingerhorn 1893-1911, Workum 1911-14, Akkrum 1914-23, and Ternaard 1923-30. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1632; De Zondagsbode XLVII, Nos. 42-43.) vdZ.

Kool, a Dutch Mennonite family name. Pieter Kool, a brewer of Amsterdam, was married to Anna Roskam of Beverwijk. Soon after his marriage Kool took over his father-in-law's vinegar factory at Beverwijk. Their son was Agge Roskam Kool, b. Oct. 16, 1714, at Amsterdam, d. March 23, 1789, at Beverwijk. This Agge Roskam Kool was a remarkable man. He not only ran the vinegar factory with much ability and profit, but also made a number of useful inventions, for example, the breeches buoy, an apparatus to rescue the shipwrecked. He was the inventor of an improved method of vaccination for a cattle plague. He also made maps of the Dutch coast and low-tide zone. For a large number of years Kool served the Mennonite congregation of Beverwijk as a deacon. At the same time he was an ardent Collegiant (q.v.). He often stayed at Rijnsburg (q.v.), the Collegiant center in the Netherlands, where he delivered many addresses and also performed baptism by immersion after 1753. In 1760 he baptized Aagje Deken (q.v.).

In 1736 Agge Roskam Kool was married to Trijntje Jansd. Honig of Zaandijk. One of their eleven children was Jan Kool, b. 1741 at Beverwijk, d. 1816 at Zaandijk, who in 1766 was married to Stijntje Gerritsd. Honig of Zaandijk and who ran a well-known paper mill at Zaandijk.

Some Kool descendants were later found at Alkmaar, where both Jacob Pieter Kool Jzn and Jacob Pieter Kool Pzn were cheese exporters and also deacons of the congregation 1869-84 and 1881-91, 1894-1919 respectively. P. Schuckink Kool, a descendant of Agge Roskam Kool and like his ancestor a resident of Beverwijk, served his home church as a deacon from 1857 for more than 25 years. A branch of this family lived in Amsterdam. (N.N.B.Wb. IV, 855 ff.; DB 1903, 186; 1909, 100.) vdZ.

Koolaert, Elisabeth, a Dutch Mennonite poet: see Hoofman.

Koolaert de Kuyper, an Anabaptist martyr, who was seized in 1561 at Hondschooten in Flanders and burned at the stake at St.-Winox-bergen (Bergues-St.-Winox) "for the sake of the testimony of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Mart. Mir. D 283, E 651; Bibliographie II, No. 438; ML II, 547.

Koolman: see Coolman.

Ko(o)men, Jan van, author of Belydenisse des Geloofs onder de Doopsgezinde Christenen . . . (Groningen, 1744), which confession was used by the Swiss Mennonites whose ancestors had migrated from Switzerland to the Netherlands in 1711. The confession was edited after the death of van Komen by his son-in-law Hendrik van Kalker (q.v.). It is not clear whether the appendix following the Confession entitled Korte Redengevinge van den dienst der Oudsten was also written by van Komen or by van Kalker. Jan van Komen (ca. 1680-1742) originally belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish congregation of Deventer (q.v.), where he lived. About 1721, together with some other members, he left this congregation because it had, in their opinion, become too much conformed to the world; they moved to Hoogezand in the province of Groningen and joined the congregation of the Old Swiss Brethren at Sappemeer (q.v.), in which congregation van Komen became a preacher (DB 1919, 75).

Jan van Komen was married to Grietje van Calkar, a granddaughter of the Deventer Old Flemish Elder Abraham Willems Cremer (q.v.). A daughter of Jan van Komen named Trijntje was married to Hendrik van Calkar (Kalker), editor of the Confession.

The family name of van Komen (van Koomen, van Coomen, van Comen) whose ancestor originally may have been an inhabitant of the Belgian town of Komen (Commines) is also found among the Flemish Mennonites of West Prussia. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 205 f.; J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 59-61, 63, 75, 82; DB 1918, 75, 77, 109.

Koop, A. J., of Chortitza, South Russia, a leading Mennonite industrialist, received his training as an apprentice in the workshop and factory of P. H.

Lepp (q.v.), who helped him to get started in industry. Koop established his own factory in Chortitza in 1864. He was so successful that additional factories were built at Einlage and Alexandrovsk. In 1908 they had an output of 610,000 rubles. At Alexandrovsk during that year 288 workers were employed, at Chortitza 81, and at Einlage 100. The factories produced the usual agricultural machinery used by the Mennonites and the Russians of the Ukraine. When, in 1914, Koop's enterprise observed its fiftieth anniversary it was listed as the second largest of the Mennonite industries in Russia. During the Russian Revolution the factories were nationalized but continued their work. Little is known about the personal life of the founder. (See also Agriculture Among the Mennonites in Russia and Industry Among Mennonites in Russia.) C.K.

D. Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia" (doctoral dissertation, Stanford University, Cal., 1933); "Mennonite Industry, Russia," Menn. Life X (January 1955) 21.

Koopman, Jan, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Cooman.

Koopmans (formerly often Coopmans, q.v.), a Dutch Mennonite family. Besides Klaas Koopmans and his son Rinse Klaasz Koopmans (q.v.), there have been at least three other preachers of this family. Gerbrand Koopmans, b. 1779 at Leeuwarden, d. 1836 at Koudum, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1801-5 and served the congregations of Zaandam "Oude Huys" 1805-14, Oostzaandam 1814-21, and Bolsward 1821-31 (Naamlijst 1815, 82-84; 1829, 29, 44). Dirk Koopmans, b. 1792 at Leeuwarden, d. 1849 at Amsterdam, served the congregation of Kampen 1818-22. In that year he resigned to move to Amsterdam, where he founded an insurance business (Naamlijst 1829, 39). Lieuwe Koopmans has been the pastor of the De Rijp congregation since 1954. vdZ.

Koopmans, Rinse, the son of Claes Rinses Coopmans (q.v.), a butter merchant, who in 1722-d.92 was a lay preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Leeuwarden. Rinse Koopmans was born March 9, 1770, at Grouw in Friesland; after completing his study at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam in 1794 he was a ministerial candidate and served successfully in Blokzijl (September 1794), Dokkum (April 1795), and Amsterdam (February 1796). This career bears witness to his excellent preaching ability; his skill as a pastor and a comforter of the sick was equally highly praised. In 1812 he was chosen to succeed Hesselink (q.v.) as professor at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam, but could not give his speech of acceptance until two years later when French dominion was overthrown (June 8, 1814). Characteristic of Koopmans is the theme of this address: "To the application of the divine authority of revealed doctrine against those who, while they elevate human speech, the excellence of the Gospel, as well as the wisdom and character of Jesus Christ by their words of praise, reject the divine authority of revelation, especially that of Jesus Christ."

Koopmans had the ability to unfold to his students without partiality the views and opinions of others. Hearty and cheerful as he was, he was rather the type of a pious father—he had a large family—than of a scholar. His Redevoeringen en Verhandelingen (2vv., Amsterdam, 1819) treat literary as much as philosophical subjects. As a theologian he acquired fame by a prize-winning (Teylers Godgeleerd Genootschap award) treatise, "De zoenoffers des Ouden Verbonds en den dood van Christus met derselve vergeleken." In 1797 he married Janke Cnoop (d. 1823) of Bolsward.

On Sept. 5, 1826, Koopmans died at his country home "Bovenburen" near Koudum in Friesland. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 206-10; Naamlijst 1815, 58-63; 1829, 24; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 688, 691-93, 696; DJ 1850, 124 146-53; DB 1892, 86; 1898, 21; 1901, 18; ML II, 547.

Koopmans, Wopko Cnoop, b. Sept. 23, 1800, in Amsterdam, a son of the above. At first he applied himself to literary study. The University of Utrecht awarded him a doctorate in philosophy and de humane Letteren.

Meanwhile Koopmans became interested in theology; in 1823 he became a ministerial candidate at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam. He served the Utrecht congregation 1823-27. In 1827 he was appointed as a professor at the Mennonite Theological Seminary in Amsterdam with Samuel Muller. He lectured on criticism, hermeneutics, and New Testament exegesis, later on Christian ethics. It was a great pity that during his entire career Koopmans felt overshadowed by his colleague Muller. This feeling was so serious an obstacle for one whose demands upon himself were high, that he never published his theological works. He died March 4, 1849. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 210-16; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 546 f.; Naamlijst 1829, 24, 36; DJ 1850, 15, 156-68; DB 1885, 55; 1897, 59; 1901, 19, 144 f.; ML II, 547 f.

Kopf, Daniel, an Anabaptist martyr, mentioned by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 27, E 435), is identical with Daniel Kropf (q.v.). This Kropf was put to death in 1536, not in 1529, as Martyrs' Mirror states. vdZ.

Kopijn (Copijn), Jan, of Amsterdam, who died in 1711 at Dordrecht, living after 1675 at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, was a deacon of the Mennonite church and thereupon a preacher at Middelburg 1680-1706. In this year he moved to Zuilen near Utrecht. Not much is known about Kopijn. He wrote a number of poems, one of which celebrated his fellow preacher Adriaen van Eeghem (q.v.). Another familiar devotional poem by Kopijn was Eenvoudige Samenspraak over het Leeven en Lyden van Kristus, two volumes (Utrecht 1708 and 1736). Kopijn was married in 1690 to Janneken Terwen, of Middelburg. (Biogr. Wb. V, 236 f.) vdZ.

Köppental, a village of the Trakt Mennonite settlement in the province of Samara, Russia, founded in 1855 by Mennonites from Prussia who settled on both banks of the Malyshevka River, was named after the Russian state councilor von Köppen, who promoted the settlement. The village originally consisted of 25 families each farming 175 acres. In 1897 it had 56 farms and a population of 174 and in 1914 there were 168 inhabitants. In 1880-81 some of the settlers followed Claas Epp (q.v.) to Central Asia (q.v.).

The administration of the Trakt settlement (Malyshinskaya Volost, later Köppental Rayon) was located in Köppental. Köppental also built a church in 1866, and had a secondary school (Zentralschule) which was erected before World War I and was the center of many of the organizations and activities of the Trakt settlement. At the beginning of World War II its population with that of the entire Trakt settlement was evacuated to Asiatic Russia. (See also Trakt Mennonite Settlement. Trakt Mennonite Church; Am Trakt, North Kildonan, 1948; ML II, 548.) C.K.

Köppental-Orloff Mennonite Church: see Trakt Mennonite Church.

Kopper, a Mennonite family of West Prussia, Germany, particularly in the Montau-Gruppe (q.v.) congregation. They were mostly farmers living in the adjacent villages of Klein Sanskau and Dragass. Some of them served the church as preachers and elders; e.g., Hans Kopper, preacher 1774 until after 1802; Isaak Kopper (1809-56), preacher from 1831, elder 1850-56; Gerhard Kopper (b. 1840), preacher from 1871, elder from 1881; Bernhard Kopper (1851-1916), preacher 1880-1916; Bernhard Kopper (b. 1893), preacher 1924, elder 1934, serving until the catastrophe of 1945, and since then in West Germany. vdZ.

L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe, ein Gedenkblatt (Montau, 1918); several issues of Gem.-Kal.

Kops (Cops), a Dutch Mennonite family originally from the Rhineland, Germany. Wolter Kops (q.v., ca. 1520-1602 or later), who lived at München-Gladbach in the duchy of Jülich, was the ancestor. His son was Claes Wolters Cops (q.v.), who served as preacher of the München-Gladbach Mennonite congregation and later at Haarlem. Two of Claes Wolters Cops' sons were Goedschalk Cops (1586-1636), a merchant of yarns and linen at Goch, Germany, and Willem Kops, b. 1619 at München-Gladbach, d. 1665 at Haarlem. He also was a linen merchant, living at Nijmegen (q.v.), where he obtained citizenship in 1652, not by swearing an oath of allegiance, but "bij Mannen waerheyt," i.e., by simply making an affirmation of loyalty. He was a deacon of the Nijmegen congregation. About this time Wyand Kops, a deacon, moved from Gladbach to Nijmegen. In 1669 he returned to Gladbach. Descendants of Goedschalk and Willem Kops since the 18th century were especially found at Haarlem, where they often were deacons and trustees of the Mennonite orphanages, and in Amsterdam, where they also served the congregation as deacons. In Amsterdam most of them were members of the Zonist (q.v.) congregation. Jacob Kops, a merchant, lived at Hamburg about 1675. Willem Kops (1724-76), a merchant of Haarlem, was also a man of letters; he is considered the author of Het Leeven van Pieter Langendijk. In 1774 he published the poems of Elisabeth Koolaart-Hoofman (q.v.), with a biography, and in the same year Schets eener geschiedenis der Rederijkeren. The preachers Jan Kops (q.v.) and his grandson Jan Kops were members of this family. In the 19th century there are also a number of descendants by the name of Bruyn Kops, descended from Pieter Kops (Haarlem, 1746-1803), owner of a yarn factory and also serving in some governmental offices, and M. C. van Oosten de Bruyn. Their son Cornelis Johannes de Bruyn Kops (1791-1858) was a mayor of Haarlem. Three sons of this Cornelis de Bruyn Kops, viz., Jacob Leonhard (1827-87), Alexander Louis (1827-92), and Cornelis Johannes (1830-91), occupied prominent places in the Netherlands, the first two as engineers, the last as a political economist. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat X (1919) 1920-2000; XL (1954) 206-28; DB 1874, 6, 13 f., 20; N.N.B.Wb. III, 714-16; IV, 861; B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 74.

Kops (Cops), Claes Wolters (1559-July 1641). He was the son of Wolter Kops (named above). He was a weaver and after 1593 lived on the Aldenhof at München-Gladbach, duchy of Jülich, Germany, but was frequently at Haarlem in connection with his trade or in consequence of persecution. In 1581 he married Grietgen Comes (d. 1616) at Cologne. He was twice remarried. Kops was a Mennonite preacher at München-Gladbach, and for some time also of the High German congregation at Haarlem, Holland, where he became involved in a dispute (about 1610) with his colleague Leenaerdt Clock, apparently concerning marriage with non-members of the group (buitentrouw), Kops taking the more conservative position. Kops thus obstructed the merging of his High German group with the Young Frisians and Waterlanders, a movement initiated by the Concept of Cologne in 1591. In 1619 he was again living at München-Gladbach, where he had a considerable business in yarn and linen. In 1622 he is said to have been a wealthy man, living on a great estate, and was censured for this by Abraham Rietmaker of Aachen. After 1622 there is no further information about Claes Wolters Kops, except the date of his death. His followers were called Claes-Woltersvolk. There was a Claes-Wolters congregation in Friedrichstadt, Germany, as late as 1632. vdZ., W.N.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 554 f.; II, Nos. 1195, 2626 f.; 2789; DB 1874, 6; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 92; Ernst Crous, "Von Täufern zu Mennoniten am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 91, ML I, 364.

Kops, Jan, b. March 6, 1765, at Amsterdam, d. Jan. 9, 1849, at Utrecht. His parents, Jacobus Kops, a yarn merchant, and Hillegond Schotvanger, belonged to the conservative Old Frisian Mennonite congregation, but Jan Kops joined the progressive Lamist congregation. He studied at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary 1781-87, and then served as pastor of the Leiden congregation 1787-1800. He became much interested in politics and was an ardent Patriot (q.v.), and in 1795, when the Dutch Mennonites obtained equal political rights with the members of the Reformed Church, Kops became a member of the city government at Leiden. In 1799 he was appointed director of agriculture in the Netherlands, whereupon he resigned from his ministry and moved to The Hague. In 1815 he became professor of botany and agricultural economics at the University of Utrecht. In 1816-43 he preached in the Utrecht Mennonite congregation. He published a number of books and papers on agricultural economy, but no theological books, except two sermons. One of his outstanding publications in the field of botany (in collaboration with J. C. Sepp, q.v.) is Flora Batava (first vol. at Amsterdam, 1800). In 1830 he became a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference and a curator of its seminary.

Kops was married to Johanna Daams of Haarlem. Albertus Kops, who was one of the children of Jan Kops, b. 1814 at Amsterdam, d. 1874 at Utrecht, married Grietje Cleyndert of Zaandam. Their son Jan Kops, b. 1846 at Utrecht, d. 1872 at Tjalleberd, studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, and became pastor of the Tjalleberd congregation in September 1872. He served only a few months before an untimely death. His daughter Geertruida Kops (1853-1941) was married to W. J. Leendertz (q.v.). vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XL (1954) 209; Biogr. Wb. V, 232-36; L. G. te Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis . . . van de Dg. te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) passim; Naamlijst 1829, 35 f.; DJ 1850, 37; DB 1875, 55; J. Baert, Jan Kops, pionier van Hollands Landbouw (The Hague, 1943); J. M. G. van der Poel, Heren en Boeren (Wageningen, 1949) chapters III-VIII; an autobiographical manuscript by Kops, "Levensbericht," is found in the Utrecht University Library.

Korba Mission Station, one of the five main stations of the General Conference Mennonite Mission in India, is situated 25 miles north of Champa, Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), India. It was opened by C. H. Suckau in 1915. The area of the Korba field covers 2,200 square miles, with a population of 230,000, and over 1,000 villages. There are four outstations. The first church was organized on Dec. 1, 1915; and the first meetinghouse was dedicated in February 1920. The church has not grown very rapidly; some of the first members have reverted to Hinduism. The membership in 1954 was 146, but there are prospects of many children of Christian families being gathered in. The church was served by the Indian pastor, J. R. Singh, for some 15 years, and is now (1955) served by the Indian pastor, Malachi Chawbey.

The station has no institutional work except a primary school and a dispensary. District evangelism has been chiefly emphasized. The most encouraging feature of this work is the increasing interest in literature, a large amount of which, including Bibles, Testaments, Bible portions, tracts, and handbills, is sold and distributed each year. (ML II, 548; ME I, †.) P.W.P.

Korbmacher, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr: see Mändl.

Kornelis and Kornelisz, variant Dutch spellings of Cornelis and Cornelisz (q.v.).

Kort-Adriaentgen van Gent, an Anabaptist martyr: see Adriaen de Hoedemaker.

Kort Onderwys des Christelijke Geloofs (Short Catechism of the Christian Faith) was drawn up by Jan Maarensz Mol (q.v.) of Wormer at the request of the Zonist (q.v.) conference. It was edited at Amsterdam in 1697 by E. A. van Dooregeest, Herman Schijn, and Pieter Beets (reprints 1698, 1710, 1723, 1740, 1753, all at Amsterdam). The Kort Onderwys in all editions is followed by Korte Schets van onderwys voor de aankomende Jeugd (Short Outline of Instruction for the Older Youth), of which there were separate editions at Alkmaar (n.d.) and De Rijp, 1740. vdZ.

Kort Verhael van de Vereeninghe tusschen de Doopsgesinde Ghemeynten, die aen d'eene zijde ghenoemt worden Vlamingen, aen de ander zijde de Vereenigde Vriesen ende Hoogduytschen, Vreedsaem geschiet binnen Amsterdam, den 26. April, des Dingsdaeghs near Paesschen, Anno 1639 (Amsterdam, 1639). This booklet of 42 pages gives a complete account of the service held in the Amsterdam Lamist church to celebrate the union of the Flemish and the Frisian-High German congregations. Speakers at this meeting, which lasted for more than five hours and was attended by more than 3,000 persons, were Pieter Jansz Moyer, Joost Hendricksz, Tielemann Tielen (van Sittert), and Tobias Govertsz (van de Wyngaert). vdZ.

Kort Verhael ende Belijdenisse der ware Religie . . . (Haarlem, 1622) is a Dutch Mennonite confession with a large preface. The author I. P. was probably Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen (q.v.) with his copreachers. vdZ.

Kort Verhael van het Leven ende Daden van Hans de Ries (De Rijp, 1644): see Ries, Hans de.

Korte Belydenis der Waterlandsche Gemeenten (Rotterdam, 1740): see Besluyt der Voornaemste Waterlandsche leeraren.

Korte Belydenisse des Gheloofs, mitsgaders de voornaemste zeden, wetten ende kerckelycke Discipline in de Christelycke Vlaemse Doopsgezinde Ghemeente. This Dutch Mennonite book, mentioned by M. Schagen, of which there seems to be no copy extant, was printed at Haarlem in 1644 and reprinted 1684 and 1685 at Hamburg, Germany, for the Flemish congregation of Hamburg-Altona. vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 60.

Korte Beschrijving, Hoe het met de Doopsgezinden gegaan is van 't begin af (1522) tot dezen tijd toe (1647). This account, written in 1647 by an unknown author, probably belonging to the Waterlander branch of the Dutch Mennonites and already 70 years of age, is only extant in an 18th-century manuscript by J. B. (?), found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library. It was published and commentaried by J. G. de Hoop Scheffer in DB 1876. The Korte Beschrijving is written with strict impartiality and is a valuable source of information on the history of the Dutch Mennonites. (DB 1876, 13-41.) vdZ.

Korte History der protestante Christenen, die men Mennoniten of Doopsgezinden noemt . . . (Amsterdam, 1711): see Schijn, Herman.

Korte, Maeyken de, an Anabaptist martyr: see Maeyken de Corte.

Kortrijk (Courtrai), a town (1949 pop. 40,825) in Flanders, Belgium, was in the 16th century a center of cloth and linen weaving and the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Anabaptists were found here as early as 1533. In this year Jacques van der Mase (q.v.), who had read Rothman's booklet Van de Wrake, traveled to Münster (q.v.) and visited a large number of Anabaptist groups or congregations in Holland. After the fall of Münster (July 1535) he returned to Belgium, apparently cured of his revolutionary ideas. After spending some time in Brugge (q.v.) he returned to Kortrijk in 1537 or 1538. Through the activity of van der Mase and the mysterious Pieter van Gelder (q.v.) a congregation arose in Kortrijk, of which, however, very little is known. In 1553 Kortrijk is said to have been the most infected (with Anabaptism) town of Flanders. In 1553 Joos Kindt (q.v.) was arrested here and put to death. In 1556-61 a number of other victims followed. In 1568-69 other martyrs died, most of them weavers. The total number of Anabaptist-Mennonite martyrs executed at Kortrijk was 24, and one died in prison. A number of Anabaptists from Kortrijk died as martyrs in other towns of Flanders; seven of them suffered death at Gent. In addition to the information concerning the Kortrijk congregation given by its martyrs it is also known that Leenaert Bouwens baptized 14 persons here in 1554-56, and 11 or 18 in 1557-61. Jacob de Rore (q.v.) in his first letter of 1561 greets "the friends of Kortrijk." It is not clear whether the congregation died out or was dispersed in 1569, when on April 30 six Mennonites were put to death here. In any case its activity declined and nothing is heard any more of a congregation in this town. Yet it may have led a hidden existence, since shortly after 1600 some Mennonites from Kortrijk, among whom were members of the de Hauterive (van Outrijve) and the Steenkiste families, moved to Aardenburg in the Dutch province of Zealand and to Haarlem, North Holland. vdZ.

Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, Introduction, 15-30 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 439; ML II, 553.

Kortrijk, an unknown Anabaptist martyr from, executed on July 27, 1553, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium. He was burned at the stake and his corpse hanged outside the Mudepoorte (Verheyden, Gent, 18, No. 37). Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 150, E 540) erroneously identifies this unknown martyr with Joos Kindt, but this latter martyr was put to death at Kortrijk on Jan. 20, 1553. vdZ.

Kortrijk, Adriaen van (Adriaen van Cuertrycke), a deacon (or preacher) of the Mennonite congregation of Gent, Belgium. About 1545 he wrote, in the name of the congregations of Gent, Meenen, Roesselare, Hondschoote, Nijpkerke, and Waastene, a letter to the congregation of Antwerp requesting that an elder might be sent to these congregations because "they are in trouble and young and they do not receive enough visits from elders." No answer to this letter is known. vdZ.

A. L. E. Verheyden, "De Doopsgezinden te Gent 1530-1630," in Bijdrage tot de Geschiedenis en de Oudheidkunde van Gent, 1943, 105-7.

Korver family: see Corver.

Korzeniecer Kämpe was until 1909 an island in the Vistula River on the left bank, opposite Thorn, Germany. In the early days its population was probably exclusively Mennonite (five families: Adrian, Ewert, Funk, Gerbrandt, and Nickel). At the turn of the 20th century there were only three Mennonite families there (widow of Gerhard Dirks, H. Foth, and Nickel). All of these were members of the Obernessau (q.v.) Mennonite Church. In the first decade of the 20th century, a part of Korzeniecer Kämpe was taken to build a stately harbor; the inhabitants had to leave their homes and move to Thorn. (Menn. Bl., 1905, 29, 39; ML II, 553.) NEFF.

Kosciusko, Marshall, and Elkhart County (Ind.) Old Order Amish settlement was started ca. 1850 by families moving from Holmes Co., Ohio, and also from the Amish settlement in eastern Elkhart County-Lagrange County.

In 1954 it consisted of 10 districts (congregations) with a total of 607 members, Nappanee being the largest trading center. In 1940 Bishop Burkholder led a schism which joined the Beachy Amish group, but which has failed to secure more than a small following.

About 1875 a progressive Amish congregation was formed from Old Order Amish background with a meetinghouse erected in 1877 on West Market St. in Nappanee, now G.C. Many of the present members of this congregation as well as of the North Main St. Mennonite (MC) congregation are of Amish background. In 1940 a Beachy Amish congregation (Burkholder) was formed near Nappanee, and in 1954 a Conservative Mennonite congregation (Bethel), also near Nappanee. H.S.B.

Kossen, a Mennonite family name, found in the north of the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly all farmers. Descendants of this family are Dirk Kossen (b. 1865 at Barsingerhorn, d. 1934 at Driehuis), who studied at the university and Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam and then was pastor of Mennonite congregations of Den Helder 1891-95, The Hague 1895-97, Akkrum 1898-1913, and Bolsward 1913-32. He was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) in 1905-31 and the promoter of the "Dienstjarenfonds" (q.v.) in 1911, of which he was president 1924-34. His son Hendrik B. Kossen, b. 1923 at Bolsward, studied at the Amsterdam university and seminary, and served the IJlst congregation 1950-56, and Berlikum 1956- . (Zondagsbode XLVII, Nos. 24-25; DJ 1935, 17-25 with portrait.) vdZ.

Kota Nopan, a station of the former Dutch Mennonite mission in Sumatra, Indonesia, the capital of (Klein-) Mandailing, and the seat of Dutch government officials, 15 miles north of the mission station Pakanten (q.v.), amid a strictly Mohammedan population. About 1923 this station was opened by P. Nachtigal. Several years later some Tobanese

Christians settled here, reinforcing the young church. In 1934 it had 53 members. A church was built in 1938. About 1942 this congregation joined the Batak Christian Church. (ML II, 553.) J.Kl.

Kotlyarevo Mennonite Brethren Church, Memrik, Russia, was founded in 1885 as a subsidiary of Rückenau Mennonite Brethren Church. Its first meetinghouse, acquired in 1887, was replaced by a new structure in 1897. In 1900 the congregation became independent and in 1902 its minister Isaak Fast was ordained elder. In 1909 he died and was succeeded by Jakob Dörksen, who retired in 1926, when Johann M. Janzen, who was exiled in 1934, became the leader.

In 1887 the membership of the congregation was 52. In 1905 it was 345, with a total of 670 worshipers including children. In 1934, when the elder was exiled, the congregation had to discontinue functioning. In addition to the elders the congregation was served by preachers Tobias Voth (from 1895), Franz Fröse (from 1900), Gerhard Berg (from 1901), Kornelius Klaassen (from 1904), Franz Goossen (from 1900), Kornelius Isaak (from 1900), Abraham Pätkau (from 1904), and Peter Rogalsky (from 1908). C.K.

H. Goerz, Memrik (Rosthern, Sask., 1954) 29 ff.

Kotozufka: see Neumannovka.

Kotte (Cotte, Codt, Coodt), Johann Clausen (Jan Claesz), also called Rollwagen (Rolweghen, Rolwaghen), a prominent leader of the Mennonites of Eiderstedt (q.v.), Holstein, Germany, the son of the Flemish Nikolaus Peter Kotte at Oldenswort in the region of Eiderstedt, whence he was banished in 1588. Then he moved to the Netherlands. About 1590 he lived at Amsterdam as a broker and obtained citizenship there. In collaboration with Caspar Coolhaes, a progressive Reformed clergyman, and like Kotte a defender of religious freedom, he wrote in 1601 Tsamenspreeckinge van dry personen over het rigereus Placcaet van Groeningen (n.p., 1601; revised ed.; n.p., 1602), in which they attacked the mandate issued in 1601 by the States of Groningen (q.v.) against the Mennonites. This pamphlet by Coolhaes and Kotte (here called Rolwaghen) caused a literary conflict with the Calvinists. Rolwaghen was sharply attacked by a number of Calvinists, including a certain Wijnant Kras. He defended himself and the Mennonites in Corte Bestraffingh (n.p., 1602) and Tegenbericht (n.p., n.d.). Rolwaghen also attacked the Reformed minister Johannes Acronius (q.v.).

Kotte, who during his stay in the Netherlands called himself Jan Claesz Rolwaghen, seems to have left Amsterdam soon after 1602, and settled in Tönning in Holstein, Germany. Here he was appointed as supervisor of the ocean dike by Duke Johann Adolf of Holstein-Gottorp. He composed a confession of faith in Flemish, "but in such a style that it concealed more than it revealed the Mennonite faith by using dark and ambiguous words."

In the disputation with the Anabaptists held at Tönning on Aug. 31, 1607, he was their spokesman. They were requested to present a clearer statement of their faith. Kotte did this on July 22, 1608. Then on Sept. 14, 1608, a new disputation lasting three days was held in the castle at Schleswig. Very thoroughly Kotte defended the religious principles of his group against Fabricius (q.v.). Kotte was in great favor with the Duke. On Nov. 1, 1614, he achieved a moderation of the edict which had banished the Mennonites from Holstein territory.

The information concerning the origin of the name Rollwagen in the periodical Die Heimat of March and July 1934 (published by Karl Wachholtz, Neumünster) is incorrect. The question has not yet been clarified. In the Nordfriesisches Jahrbuch (Husum, 1934, 93-99) Albert Vlamynck published a letter written by the dike engineer C. J. Rolweghen in Tönning, July 2, 1611, in which Rolweghen encloses the plan for a dike, and refers to the dike builder Jan Claas Coott. (N.N.B.Wb. II, 1227; Catalogus Amst., 193 f.; ML II, 553 f.) Neff, vdZ.

Kottenem, Matthijs van: see Matthias Servaes.

Kotter, Eustachius (Eustace Kuter), a Hutterite martyr, a stone mason, who was seized with Hans Mändl (q.v.) and Georg Rack (q.v.) in 1560 near Rosenheim in Bavaria, Germany, and sent to prison in Innsbruck. He was a native of Tirol, Austria. On November 22-24 he was cross-examined on the rack; he gave an excellent confession of his faith which was taken down "word for word" and has been preserved by the Hutterian Brethren (Wolkan, 308). From it we learn that he was baptized by Leonhard Lanzenstiel (q.v.) in 1540, had been captured four or five years before in the Puster Valley and taken to castle Neuhaus, later was captured again, but obtained his freedom once more.

The pastor of Hall attempted to win the three prisoners to the Catholic faith, but had no success. On June 5, 1561, Kotter and Rack wrote an epistle to the brotherhood in Moravia, stating that they were to be executed on Tuesday after Corpus Christi. "We are paying God our vow. We do this with joy and are not sad, for this day is holy unto the Lord" (Loserth, 206).

On June 13 all three were sentenced to death. When the imperial mandate was read to them, according to which they merited death, Eustachius Kotter said, "What concern of ours is the imperial mandate, that you read it to us? Read our confession, to which we have testified with holy, also divine and Biblical writing, that it is the real truth of God, for which we must suffer today."

At the execution site they prayed earnestly and commended body and soul to the Lord. "First Kotter was beheaded because he was sick or weak in the flesh." Their martyrdom is commemorated in the song, "Hört nun, alle Fromme," in 81 stanzas (Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 415-22).

Eustachius Kotter is the author of two hymns (Loserth credits him with three), which he wrote in prison: (1) "Mein Gott und Herr, dir sei viel Ehr," 25 stanzas; in acrostics it reads, "Mein lieber Bruder Hans Mändl, ich Stächl, schicke dir ein Lied, schau, obs recht sei, wo nicht, tus aus. O Gott, erlös die Gefangenen." (2) "Stärk uns, O Gott, in dieser

Not," 17 stanzas, the first 13 of which contain the acrostic "Stachius Koter." Neff.

Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 3, 636-39; Wolkan, Lieder, 228; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 206; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Mart. Mir. D 276, E 645; ML II, 554.

Kotzenbüll, a village in the south of the Eiderstedt (q.v.) region, west of Tönning, Germany, early settled by Mennonites because of its favorable location for the Dutch Mennonites; the first proscription took place in 1566. In 1577 other Mennonites were examined by the provost. The "privilege" of 1623, which applied also to residents of the region, gave them peace. Yet they never grew strong; there were only individual families. In 1738 there were still four families. Later Mennonitism disappeared from the region because of families dying out and mixed marriages. (ML II, 554.) R.Do.

Koudum, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, had two small Mennonite congregations soon after 1600, one of them a Waterlander congregation, which merged in the course of the 17th century, and in 1695 had a combined membership of 80. It was always served by lay preachers. After the departure of its last preacher, Tjalling Tjallingius, in 1803 it was served by the neighboring Molkwerum; but when this pulpit also became vacant about 1813, the few remaining members joined Hindeloopen (q.v.). In 1867 an independent congregation was again established at Koudum, chiefly through the efforts of Pastor Lodeesen of Hindeloopen, which, since 1870, has had a hall of its own for meetings. The congregation was served by the Hindeloopen (q.v.) ministers until 1942, and since then by those of Workum (q.v.). A new room for a meetinghouse was acquired in 1899 and rebuilt in 1903. The membership was 31 in 1900, 36 in 1932, 26 in 1955. Church activities include a ladies' circle and Sunday school for children. vdZ.

DB 1869, 156; 1870, 32-44, 177; 1874, 87; 1890, 137; 1903, 82, 189; ML II, 554.

Kouwer, a Mennonite family, found in the Zaan district, Dutch province of North Holland, living at Zaandam, Wormerveer, and Koog aan de Zaan. Some members of this family have served the church as deacons. Benjamin Jan Kouwer (b. 1861 at Wormerveer, d. 1933 at Utrecht), a noted physician at Haarlem and later professor of gynecology at the University of Utrecht, was a member of the church. vdZ.

Kraak-Mennisten, a name given in the 18th century in the Dutch province of Groningen to the conservative Mennonites or "Fijne Mennisten," whereas the progressive Mennonites sometimes were called "Balder Mennisten." vdZ.

K. Vos, Het honderdjarig bestaan van de Sociëteit van Doopsgez. Gemeenten in Groningen (Groningen, 1926) 6.

Kraen (Craen, Kranen), a Mennonite family living in Antwerp, Belgium; from this town Peter Kraen (Kranen), a button maker, had a narrow escape in 1571. His wife was for a while in prison at Antwerp. Peter Kraen moved to Cologne, Germany, where his daughter Sara, b. 1566 at Antwerp, in 1585 married Joost van den Vondel, a hatmaker, also of Antwerp, who had also fled from there to Cologne because of his Mennonite conviction. This Joost van den Vondel and Sara Kranen (Kraen) were the parents of the famous Dutch poet Joost van den Vondel (q.v., b. 1587). In 1596 the van den Vondel family moved to Amsterdam. Sara Kranen died here in 1638; she belonged to the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam. Whether the West-Prussian Mennonite Krahn (q.v.) family (Kraan, Kran) is related to the Antwerp Kraen family could not be ascertained. It is not very likely that Huyge Jacob Kraen (q.v.), who died as an Anabaptist martyr in 1534 at The Hague, belonged to this family. vdZ.

Krafft, Adam (1493-1553), Hessian reformer, became acquainted with Luther at the Leipzig disputation (1519), became a Lutheran preacher at Erfurt, returned to Fulda in 1521, then worked in Hersfeld, came in contact with Landgrave Philip (q.v.), who appointed him court preacher in 1525. As such he accompanied the prince to Speyer, where he preached almost daily during the session of the diet (1526), participated in the Homburg Synod (Oct. 20, 1526), and with Lambert von Avignon he drew up the Homburg liturgy (Kirchenordnung), became chief inspector of the church in Hesse (1526-27), and was the spiritual counselor at the Hessian criminal court, where he also had to deal with the Anabaptists. He took a lenient attitude on the Anabaptist question, and observed that "a conversion of the Anabaptists can be expected when the vices of adultery and drunkenness and the like are removed." In 1527 he was appointed professor of theology at Marburg, and continued to work for the promotion of the Lutheran Reformation until his death. (ML II, 555.) Neff.

Krafft, Hans, a knifesmith of Eismersberg near Augsburg, Germany, and his wife Apollonia were among the first Anabaptists cross-examined by the Augsburg city council. Both declared in October 1527 that they would not "desist from their position" and were then permanently expelled from the city. Hans Krafft, however, returned and was again "put out" on Jan. 13, 1528. In that summer he came back again. In the meantime he had lived for a time in Esslingen a.N., according to a letter from Esslingen dated Jan. 23, 1528. He was again examined in Augsburg in April 1528, when he admitted that he had wanted to settle in Alt-Hegenberg, but had been driven out with other Anabaptists by the Bavarian rulers. He was twice examined in Strasbourg in 1528, once in the presence of Bucer and Capito. He admitted that he had baptized four persons at Mundelsheim near Strasbourg, and declared that he "would stay with Christ" and refused instruction. E.T.

T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Geschichte der Strassburgischen Wiedertäufer in den Jahren 1527 bis 1543," in Ztscht für die historische Theologie, 1860, 36.

Kraggehuis, a Dutch Mennonite recreation center on the lake near Giethoorn (q.v.), formerly much used for youth camps. vdZ.

Krahn (Kran, Kraan, Kraen, Kranen) is a Dutch-Prussian Mennonite name which occurred among the Mennonites of the Lower Rhine (Joost van den Vondel's mother was a Kraen) and is still found among the Dutch Mennonites. In the Danzig Mennonite Church record the name is first mentioned in 1689. Representatives of this family were found in Tiegenhagen, Rosenort, and Heubuden. Franz Crous's study shows that there were only a few Mennonites by this name in Prussia after World War I.

Among the first six families who went from Danzig to the Ukraine in 1787 was a bachelor, Abraham Krahn. Others followed. This name did not occur in the Molotschna settlement. A number of sons and daughters of Cornelius Krahn went to Manitoba during the migration of 1874, and spread to Saskatchewan, North Dakota, Minnesota, Mexico, and Paraguay. Among those remaining in Russia, Georg I. Krahn (q.v.) should be mentioned. Cornelius P. Krahn is a minister in Reinland, Man., and Peter B. Krahn, his brother, is a teacher and church worker near Altona, Man. Cornelius Krahn is the editor of Mennonite Life and director of the Bethel College Historical Library, North Newton, Kan. (Reimer, Familiennamen; see also Kraen.) C.K.

Krahn, Isaak Georg, was born Oct. 21, 1882, in Schönhorst, a village in South Russia. He attended the Chortitza Zentralschule and pedagogical courses. After passing the teachers' examinations he went to the Orenburg Mennonite settlement, where, with a few interruptions, he served as a generally respected teacher for 20 years. On June 27, 1911, Krahn was ordained as minister of the Deyevka Mennonite congregation. Equipped with a thorough knowledge of the Bible and the gift of fluent speech, he had good attendance at the services he conducted. The confidence of the congregation is shown by the fact that they chose him as elder by a large majority and ordained him in 1926. With great devotion he performed the duties of this office until 1930, when he was sent into exile for a period of ten years. He did not return home.

Elder Krahn was a very decisive character. In his native village he was loved and respected by the young people as well as the congregation. In his private life he went through many a difficult experience. In her prime his wife was taken by death, leaving him in impoverished circumstances with nine young children. His son Peter was later exiled from the village with his wife, and died of starvation near the home village. His second wife was also sent into banishment. "These are they that have come out of the great tribulation and have washed their garments white in the blood of the Lamb." J.P.P.

P. P. Dyck, Orenburg am Ural (Clearbrook, B.C., 1951) 62 f., with portrait.

Kraichgau, formerly a part of the Palatinate, later a part of northern Baden, Germany, a fertile region, devastated in the Thirty Years' War, where many Swiss Mennonite exiles settled in 1652 on estates of the imperial knights. Some of their descendants are still living there, especially in the Sinsheim district. HEGE.

Bossert, TA I: Württemberg, 682, 818; "Der Kraichgau Adel," in Ztscht f. Gesch. des Oberrheins VIII (1857) 391-92; ML II, 555.

Kräl, Hans, the head of the collective Hutterian brotherhood in Moravia 1578-83. The chronicles designate him: "who is usually called the Kitzbüchler." The records of his trial indicate that he stemmed from the "Brichsental." He was one of the most active itinerant preachers until the spring of 1557, when he was seized in Taufers (q.v.) in the Puster Valley. The Geschicht-Buch gives an extremely graphic and detailed description (from his pen) of his capture and of his severe imprisonment, first in the dungeon of the castle tower, where his clothing rotted from his body and he nearly perished in filth and vermin, and then 37 weeks in the Block. He also described in a poem these sufferings as well as his steadfastness proved in "kindly" and in "racked" examinations. His imprisonment lasted 23 months. Since his conversion was apparently out of the question, and since he had furthermore won the admiration of Hans Fünger, who was holding him for the government, by his faithful and brave attitude, Fünger appealed to the emperor to have Kräl sentenced not to death, but to the galleys. Ferdinand granted this request on Jan. 19, 1559, on condition that expenses be paid by Kräl's relatives or the judges. On the transport Kräl escaped, when the guards became intoxicated at an inn at Niederdorf: he went to Moravia, where he was chosen Diener der Notdurft in 1560, and Diener des Evangeliums in 1561, confirmed the following year (Beck, 24).

In spite of the risks he had undergone in Tirol, Kräl again ventured several times into that area, and was one of the most courageous Hutterite preachers. He was an eyewitness of the execution of Mändl at Innsbruck in 1561. The following year the government learned that he had held meetings, preaching and baptizing in Kitzbühel around Götzens and Schwaz. In 1562 Kräl was again in Moravia, where he was made preacher. He went back to Tirol several times without being caught.

After the death of Peter Walpot the Bruderhof at Neumühl elected him as their leader on Feb. 5, 1578. He held office in the "golden time of the brotherhood" in Moravia. Except for the temporary clouding of his relations with John, Lord of Zierotin, at Ludenburg (q.v.) and the temporary closing of the household at Sobotiste as well as the evacuation of Wostitz there was only progress to record, in spite of heavy taxation in the country. In Frischau and Porlitz and (for the third time) in Schäckwitz new Bruderhofs were set up.

On Nov. 9, 1583, Kräl became seriously ill; he summoned the elders once more to his deathbed, admonished them to hold fast to the brotherhood and to be faithful in performing their duty. He also charged them especially with the care of widows and orphans. At the age of about 63 he died at Neumühl, Nov. 14, 1583. The Väterlied characterizes him thus: "Constantly kind, of peaceful bearing, meek, also inclined to gentleness, well preserved in stocks and chains, in which he lay a long time, a man with whom good counsel could always be found, gifted with modesty." His particular merit lies in his continuation of the chronicle begun and carried to 1542 by Kaspar Braitmichel (q.v.), the Geschicht-Buch, which he undertook with Haupprecht Zapff. P.De.

The epistle written by Kräl to Melchior Platzer was published in the Familien-Kalender (Scottdale, 1928) 20-26; R. Friedmann, "Die Briefe der österreichischen Täufer," in ARG XXVI (1929); XXVIII (1931); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892); R. v. Lilienkron, Zur Liederdichtung der Wiedertäufer (Munich, 1875) 158-66; Th. Unger, "Ueber eine Wiedertäuferhandschrift des XVII. Jahrhunderts," in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft f. d. Gesch. d. Prot. in Oesterreich XVIII (Vienna, 1897); Loesche, Tirolensia; ML II, 555 f.

Krall Mennonite Church (MC), the second oldest meetinghouse in the Lancaster Conference still in use, is located in Lebanon Co., Pa., near Buffalo Springs. When Lebanon Township was a part of Lancaster County the Mennonites settled in this area, but later were largely absorbed by the Church of the Brethren. Within the last 15 years in particular, due to the high prices of land in Lancaster County, part of the overflow is going to Krall. The membership (1954) is 84. Simon G. Bucher is bishop, Martin E. Weaver and Sidney B. Gingrich ministers, and Norman G. Shue deacon. I.D.L.

Kralltown Mennonite Mission (MC), located in York Co., Pa., was built in 1888 as a union house. The membership, never numerous, had all passed away or moved out, and all services were discontinued. The East Petersburg congregation, following a summer Bible school in 1950, reopened the church. James B. Siegrist has located here as minister. Although no membership is claimed here as yet, the average Sunday-school attendance is 48 and the summer Bible school averages 179. I.D.L.

Kramer, a Mennonite family of Hamburg, Germany, now extinct. They were a wealthy mercantile family, probably originally from Holland. Lourens Kramer (d. 1714), married to Adriana de Vos(z), and his brother Lucas Kramer (d. 1719), married to Sara de Vos(z), were important Greenland whalers. Lucas Kramer and Elisabeth and Susanna Kramer supported the building of a new meetinghouse at Altona in 1796. Pieter Kramer (d. 1796), three times a deacon of the church, bequeathed it 1,000 Marks. vdZ.

B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Menn.-Gemeinde Hamburg-Altona II (Hamburg, 1887) 6, 82, 84.

Kramer (Krämer, Kremer), Peter, an Anabaptist martyr, "a servant (minister) of the church and a deacon in Jülich-Berg," Germany, who was seized in 1558 with Gotthard (q.v.) of Nonnenberg, and, when all attempts to convert them proved futile, beheaded at Windeck castle. Their brave death made a deep impression. "The common people were amazed, and said: 'What a marvelous thing behold we here! These men so willingly to go to death, when they could easily obtain their liberty.' . . . The executioner said with fear and trepidation that he would never execute such men again." A song of 15 stanzas was written about their death, No. 21 in the Ausbund: "Merkt auf, ihr Völker überall" (Wolkan, Lieder, 101, 136). John Horsch (Kurzgefasste Geschichte, 130) says: "Kramer, Heinrich, Three epistles to the brethren imprisoned with him, 1558." This is obviously Peter Kramer. Neff.

Mart. Mir. D 207, E 590; Wolkan, Lieder, 101, 136; John Horsch, Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Elkhart, 1890); ML II, 556.

Kranewetter, Peter (Pieter Kraneweter), a Hutterite martyr, was executed in 1536 with Christian Alseider (q.v.) and four companions at Gufidaun (q.v.), Austria. In prison they wrote two epistles: one to Jakob Hutter and the brotherhood in Moravia, and the other to the brotherhood in the Adige. Neff.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 75; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 108 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 104; Mart. Mir. D 38, E 444; ML II, 556.

Kratz, Clayton (1896-1920), a Mennonite relief worker who gave his life in the service of the Mennonite Central Committee in the relief program for the Mennonites of South Russia following World War I. He was born Nov. 5, 1896, at Blooming Glen, Pa., he was an outstanding student of Goshen College, and was president-elect of the student religious organization (Y.P.C.A.) when he accepted appointment of the first relief team, with Orie O. Miller, Arthur W. Slagel, which was sent out by the newly organized MCC (q.v.). After arrival at Constantinople Sept. 27, 1920, Miller and Kratz pressed on to the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine, which was at that time under General Wrangel and the White (anti-communist) Army. After an inspection tour Kratz was left at Halbstadt to set up a headquarters while Miller returned to Sevastopol to arrange for the transport of the supplies which Slagel was to bring from Constantinople. Before the relief program could get started the Red Army overran the Ukraine, forcing Wrangel into precipitous retreat into the Crimea. The Russian Mennonites urged Kratz to flee, but he chose to stay as long as possible, believing that American relief workers as neutrals would be safe. He planned to leave the day before the White Army withdrew from Halbstadt but was trapped by an overnight advance of the Reds, who at first arrested him and then released him upon the pleas of the Mennonite leaders. Two weeks later he was again arrested, having been last seen in Fürstenwerder.

G. A. Peters, who gives the only firsthand account of Kratz's disappearance (Die Hungersnot, 11-16), reports that his endeavors to discover what had happened produced only the information that the Red Commander for Halbstadt had sent him by way of Bachmut to Kharkov, from where he would probably be sent to Moscow and home to the United States by way of Sweden. Peters believes that in view of the manner of his arrest and the attitude of the officials, Kratz was not executed but probably died of some disease before being released.

Endeavors of the following year by A. J. Miller, then director of the MCC relief program in Russia, to determine what happened to Kratz, which included inquiries in Kharkov and Moscow (Foreign Office), were completely fruitless. He deposited a memorandum on Oct. 10, 1921, on the case, with Foreign Minister Litvinov, and later a similar memorandum with Minister Rakovsky in Kharkov, but neither brought any results. Miller investigated the case thoroughly locally and speculates that the arrest may have been instigated by the highest volost official, Bagon, a Lett who had previously worked in a Halbstadt printing plant. At this time of disorganization it was impossible for the central government officials to properly control the local underlings, many of whom were of a hoodlum type and were a disgrace to the party they pretended to represent, and it is quite possible that the arrest was a purely local blood-lust matter. It is known that Kratz was struck brutally on the occasion of his final arrest. H.S.B.

In Memoriam, Clayton H. Kratz (n.p., ca. 1945) a 4-page leaflet; P. C. Hiebert, Feeding the Hungry (Scottdale, 1929); G. A. Peters, Die Hungersnot in den mennonitischen Kolonien in Süd-Russland (Scottdale, 1923); ML II, 556.

Kratz, Maxwell H. (1875-1939), was born at Frederick, Pa., on Nov. 17, 1875. His early years were spent there and in Philadelphia, Pa. He studied at Sumneytown Academy, Perkiomen Seminary, and at Princeton University, where he was graduated in 1899 with honors. Later he served as Vice Principal of Perkiomen Seminary. From 1905 to 1908 he attended the University of Pennsylvania Law School, was admitted to the bar, and practiced law until his death. In the last ten years of his life he conducted his own private law course, and it is estimated that about half of the 5,000 law candidates in Pennsylvania attended his school. He was a deep thinker and he served more as an adviser and interpreter of the law than as a practitioner. His emphasis was always on the essentials of the law and the righteousness of the law. To him law was a sense of divine justice. He was a legal theologian. He was baptized in the Schwenksville Mennonite Church (GCM) and became an active member in the Second Mennonite Church, Philadelphia. He was a fervent speaker and promoter of the work of the church. Throughout the Mennonite church he will be best remembered as one of the three men elected to the first Mennonite Central Committee on Sept. 27, 1920. He was active in the leadership of the MCC during its first projects of Russian relief, the purchase of land in Paraguay, and its incorporation. He was also one of the pioneers of laymen's work in the Mennonite church (GCM), being one of the founders of the Brotherhood in the Eastern District Conference in the early 20's. He died Nov. 19, 1939. J.H.F.

Obituary in G.C.M. Yearbook for 1941, p. 31; J. D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ (Scottdale, 1952).

Kratzer, a Mennonite family, originally found at Aeschi in the Bernese Oberland, Switzerland. In 1711 members of this family emigrated to the Netherlands because of persecution and settled near the town of Groningen. Anthony Kratzer (Krätzer, Kratser), who was born in Switzerland, was an elder of the Nieuwe Zwitsers (q.v.) congregation near Groningen 1740-79. Others served as deacons both in the Nieuwe and Oude Zwitsers church. vdZ.

Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 49; J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Fiepke Foppes (Groningen, 1887) passim, see Index.

Krauel, a former colony of Russian Mennonites located in the district of Alto Krauel, Santa Catarina, Brazil, was founded in 1930, dissolved in 1952 after a gradual disintegration. The colony was more commonly known as Witmarsum, after the name of the central village. The name Krauel is derived from a small river which flows into the Itajahy some distance above Blumenau. Alto Krauel is a deep valley lying about 40 miles from the railhead at Hansa Hammonica, about 12 miles long and 1½ to 4 miles wide. The sides of the valley rise to a maximum of 2,300 ft. above sea level, the ridges of the low mountains being 500-1,000 feet above the valley floor. However, the valley floor itself is not flat but rolling, and covered with thick forest. Hence, although the climate is good and rainfall plentiful, agriculture is not very profitable because of the cost of clearing the land, the distance from the markets, and the medium quality of the soil. It takes 6-8 years to make the land cultivable with horse-drawn implements. The chief crops are corn, aipim (a starch-bearing tuber which must be converted to starch for profitable sale), and sweet potatoes. Attempts at dairying and logging were not too successful. After a few years beginning in 1934, families began to leave because of the poor economic prospects, cultural isolation, and internal social and ecclesiastical weakness of the colony. By 1952, practically all had left, and the history of the colony came to an end. The earlier emigration had been to Curitiba (q.v.). At the end about 70 families, chiefly M.B., left to found a new colony at Bage (q.v.) north of Curitiba city.

The reason for the now clearly mistaken location of the Krauel colony is to be sought in the difficult situation in which the refugees from Russia found themselves in the camps in Germany November 1929-January 1930. The German government had generously granted temporary asylum in Germany but was pressing for early resettlement. Since Canada at that time had very strict health requirements for immigrants and barred completely those who had had trachoma, and the United States was even stricter, these two destinations were impossible. The arrangements for Paraguay which the MCC was making were not yet complete in January 1930, and in any case Paraguay was not attractive because of its poverty and isolation. The Hanseatic Colonization Co. of Hamburg, a close ally of the German government in colonization matters, owned land in Santa Catarina which it was willing to sell on credit, but the only tract available for sale in a compact area such as the Mennonites sought was the Krauel tract, hence the choice. The Krauel tract was not large enough to accommodate the entire group which wanted to go to Brazil; so the remainder, some 130 families with 500 souls, was settled on a small high plateau (2,300 ft. above sea level) some 20 miles from the Krauel, an almost criminally impossible location, which was soon abandoned.

The original Krauel settlement consisted of 152 families ranged along both sides of the river, each family owning and living on 40 to 100 acres of land with a frontage of 700 feet on the river. For administrative purposes the colony was divided into three villages (civil districts: Witmarsum with 70 families, Waldheim with 46, and Gnadental with 36). Each village had a Schulze and a school. An Oberschulze was the colony leader. The colony had no civil autonomy; this organization handled only internal social, educational, and economic matters. The "town" of Witmarsum was in effect the capital of the colony. David Nikkel was the long-time Oberschulze.

The Krauel colony had two Mennonite churches, M.B. with 200 baptized members in 1934, and the Mennonite Church with 65 members. Church meetings were held in the schoolhouses, until in the last years (1950) a commodious meetinghouse was built by the Mennonite Church in Witmarsum.

In 1934 the settlement was relatively complete and at the high point in population—159 families, mostly from Siberia, with 846 souls, distributed as follows among the three "villages": Witmarsum 341, Waldheim 290, Gnadental 202. (For further information see the article Brazil.) (ML II, 556-58.) H.S.B.

Kraut, Heinz, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor of Esperstedt near Frankenhausen in Thuringia, Germany, was baptized by Alexander, the Anabaptist leader of Thuringia, whose position he fell heir to when Alexander was put to death. In 1530 he was seized, purchased his freedom by recanting, but immediately joined them again, becoming a very successful "apostle." He traveled as far as Moravia to visit the believers (Jacobs, 440). On Nov. 20, 1535, he was captured in the home of Hans Peisker, a miller. Peisker, Kraut, and Jobst Möller (q.v.) were given several hearings before Cruciger (q.v.) and Melanchthon (q.v.), and were beheaded at Jena on Jan. 26, 1536. (See Möller, Jobst, for extended account.) NEFF.

Wappler, Thüringen; E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harzvereins XXXII (1899) 445 f.; ML II, 558.

Krautschlögel, Jörg, an Anabaptist martyr of Austria, was put to death at the stake with his wife at Melk, a town near St. Pölten in Lower Austria in 1527 (Loserth, 151). From the cross-examinations it is known that he was a toll collector at the Danube bridge in Vienna. He was one of the first Anabaptist preachers in Austria. He lived later in Melk and was very zealous for the spread of the movement in that region. In 1526 he won Leonhard Lochmaier (q.v.), who had been a Catholic priest for eight years, to his faith. HEGE.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz (Berlin, 1893); Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML II, 558.

Kraybill Mennonite Church (MC), located in the fertile Donegal Valley, Lancaster Co., Pa., first met in the homes of members and Kraybill's Mill. In 1810 Jacob Kraybill donated the ground for a building and cemetery. The third church is now on the site. In 1908 a church was built in Mt. Joy and gradually the congregation was moving that way, until by 1949 the building was turned over to the Kraybill Christian School Board for a school (ten grades). Ministers who served here are Jacob Hershey, the two Peter Nissleys, and Kraybills. The cemetery is still used by the congregation. I.D.L.

Krebs (Kreps), a Swiss Mennonite family, originally from Reutigen in the Bernese Oberland, a number of whom moved to the Netherlands because of the harsh measures of the Bern government against the Mennonites. Some of them settled near Kampen, others near Groningen. In the Netherlands as in Switzerland they were engaged in farming. Peter Krebes (Pieter Kreps) (d. 1741) was a deacon of the Oude Zwitsers (q.v.) near Groningen. Hans Krebs, a deacon of the Swiss Mennonite congregation of Kampen, promoted the merging (1822) with the local Mennonite congregation in this town. vdZ.

Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 49, 65; J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Derk Pieters . . . (Groningen, 1883) see Index.

Krechting, Bernd (Bernhard), a brother of Hinrich Krechting (q.v.), was a Catholic priest and educator at the court of the Count of Bentheim, Westphalia, Germany, and later a priest at Gildehaus. Here he began to preach Anabaptist views and consequently had to leave. He proceeded to Münster in 1534 and began to take an active part in the establishment of the Anabaptist kingdom, functioning as a minister and member of the council of Jan van Leiden. When the city was conquered by the bishop's troops he was tried, cruelly tortured, and put to death on Jan. 22, 1536, together with Jan van Leyden and Bernhard Knipperdolling. C.K.

Gerhard de Buhr, "Der Wiedertäufer Hinrich Krechting und seine Sippe" (ms in BeCL); C. A. Cornelius, Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster, 1853) 375 ff., 405 ff.

Krechting, Hinrich (1501-80), a leader in the Münsterite "kingdom," born at Schöppingen, Westphalia, Germany, and later a priest at Gildehaus. (q.v.). In 1533 Krechting was appointed administrator of the territory of Sandwelle near Ahaus by the Bishop of Münster. In this capacity he received an order to arrest Arnd Belholt, who was a supporter of Bernhard Rothmann at Münster. When Jan van Leyden came to Schöppingen in 1533 he stayed in Krechting's home. Krechting resigned from his office because he refused to comply with the bishop's orders to execute Johann van der Wiek, a Lutheran minister. Summoned by the Bishop, he fled to Münster, arriving there on Feb. 15, 1534. His brother Bernd Krechting (q.v.) was already there. Both became outstanding leaders in the religious and political development of the city. Hinrich became the chancellor of the Münsterite kingdom and the supreme chancellor of "King" Jan van Leyden. The other relatives and friends he had brought with him from Schöppingen also received special positions.

When the decisive battle between the forces of Jan van Leyden and the Bishop took place, Hinrich Krechting received the opportunity through Johann von Raesfeld, an acquaintance of his, to escape with a small remnant. For a while he remained at Lingen, Westphalia, then fled to Oldenburg, where he continued to promote the cause of the Anabaptists as a follower of David Joris. In May 1538 he took part (opposite side) in the debate with David Joris in Oldenburg, emphasizing the significance of the Bible against Joris's visionary views. Because of the insecurity of his position Krechting left Oldenburg after 1538 and settled in Gödens, Friesland, on the land of the Count Hero von Oldersum. Under the influence of John á Lasco he became Reformed, and in 1545 became the Vorsteher of the Reformed Church at Dykhausen, where he died June 28, 1580. He was probably the only leader who survived the Münster catastrophe. The Münsterites were sometimes called the "Crechtingsvolk" after the Krechting brothers. C.K.

Gerhard de Buhr, "Der Wiedertäufer Hinrich Krechting und seine Sippe" (ms in BeCL); C. A. Cornelius, Bericht der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster, 1853) 379 ff., 405 ff.; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index; ML II, 558.

Krefeld: see Crefeld.

Krehbiel (Krehbill, Krebell, Kraybill, Krayenbuhl, Crayenbühl, Craybill, Grabill, Graybill), a name of frequent occurrence among the Mennonites of Germany and America, originally Krayenbühl. The family stems from the parish of Grosshöchstetten at a place near Signau, in the canton of Bern, Switzerland (Gem.-Kal., 1905, 143).

The first member of this family known to have been an Anabaptist was one Hans Krähenbühl from Signau who attended the Anabaptist disputation in the city of Bern in March 1538. In a list of Anabaptists living in the vicinity of Langnau, canton of Bern, in 1621, one Anna Krayenbühl is mentioned. The following members of the Krähenbühl family were brought before the Bernese authorities in the 17th century because of their Anabaptist beliefs: Barbara 1645, Peter 1655, and Margredt 1678.

The Krehbiel family has figured in practically all of the migrations in which Bernese Anabaptists have taken part. The first of which we have record who left Bernese territory was Jost Krähenbühl, who with others went to the Palatinate, Germany, in 1671. In 1709 he purchased the Pfrimmerhof near Sippersfeld in the Palatinate. In 1682 Peter Krehbiel settled on the Weierhof near Bolanden. In 1770 a member of this family migrated to Galicia (q.v.) and 15 years later to Russia. This family as well as a number of members from the families in the Palatinate migrated to America in the 19th century. They first settled in New York and Ohio but are now located mostly in Iowa and Kansas. The family name is still well known among Mennonites in the Palatinate today.

The family was found in Ste.-Suzanne, Montbéliard, and Allenjoie in the Princely County of Montbéliard as early as 1719. Most found their way to America in the following century.

In Germany the following Krehbiels were of note. Adam Krehbiel (q.v., 1766-1804) was a preacher in the Weierhof congregation (q.v.), who influenced and was influenced by Tersteegen. Jakob Krehbiel (1835-1918) was a deacon and an active leader in the Sembach congregation (q.v.). J. J. Krehbiel (1841-95) was a farmer at Weierhof and a leader in the church, who helped to found the South German Conference.

In 1851 a descendant of Jost, John Krehbiel, migrated to America; he was the father of Christian (q.v.), who was in turn the father of Henry P. (q.v.) and Christian E. (q.v.), the latter being the father of Olin Krehbiel. All of these men were prominent leaders in the General Conference Mennonite Church, Christian E. and Olin being presidents of the conference. In 1770 a grandson of Jost emigrated to Galicia, and 15 years later to Russia, and his descendants went on to Marion and McPherson counties in Kansas 1874 ff.

Jacob Krehbiel (1781-1860), Pfrimmerhof, a descendant of Jost and minister of the Weierhof congregation, emigrated to Clarence, N.Y., near Buffalo in 1831, where he became a bishop (1839) in the Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference. He prepared an account of the Krehbiel family (extended to 1880 by J. C. Krehbiel), which was translated and reprinted in W. J. Krehbiel's One Branch of the Krehbiel Family (McPherson, 1950). He was somewhat of a historian and wrote a pamphlet which was published at Speyer, Germany, under the title Letter from America and a Report About Conditions There (1832). His valuable manuscript, "A Few Words About the Mennonites in America in 1841," was published in the MQR VI (1932) 43-57, 110-21. J. C. Krehbiel (1811-86) moved to Lee County, Iowa, in 1839 and became a prominent minister in the G.C. Mennonite Church, being one of the original promoters of the organization of the conference in 1859-60. His son J. J. Krehbiel (1838-1921) of Newton, Kan., was a prominent layman (GCM) and for 20 years president of the Bethel College board of trustees. Another scion of Jost Krehbiel, also of Lee County, Iowa, was Henry J. (q.v., 1865-1940), a prominent G.C.M. minister and president of the conference. Daniel Krehbiel (1812-88, q.v.) of West Point, Iowa, and Cleveland, Ohio, was a prominent worker in the General Conference Mennonite Church. A Krehbiel family from Alsace settled in Allen Co., Ind., in the mid-19th century, where they changed their name to Grabill. The town of Grabill north of Ft. Wayne was named after a member of this family.

For the branch of the family that settled in Lancaster Co., Pa., and became prominent in the Mennonite Church (MC), see Grabill. D.L.G.

J. J. Krehbiel, Jost Krehbiel auf dem Pfrimmerhof (Moundridge, Kan., 1903) a genealogical chart; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 190; ML II, 565.

Krehbiel, Adam (1766-1804), a Mennonite farmer-preacher at the Weierhof, Palatinate, Germany. He was a personal friend of Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v.), exchanged letters with him and visited him at Mülheim. Tersteegen called him "a man after God's own heart." One of his letters was printed in Tersteegen's Weg zur Wahrheit (Cologne, 1865, 12-14). In this letter of Aug. 30, 1766, Adam Krehbiel expresses his gratitude for Tersteegen's writings, for now he sees that "rest is to be found . . . in self-denial, love, dying, and conquering in God's will and favor." He asks for Tersteegen's prayers, that he may be completely turned away from everything material and be led into sweet fellowship with God (Menn. Bl., 1875, 42).

Krehbiel's childlike faith and sincere piety are clearly shown in his correspondence with P. Weber (q.v.) of Hardenburg, whom he thanks (1771) for the stimulation and encouragement he had received from the books, Lebensbeschreibung heiliger Seelen and Swedenborg's Offenbarung von der gemeinschaftlichen Liebe und deren herrlichen Früchten. On March 25, 1773, he sent him a note to be forwarded to Johannes Deknatel (q.v.). The last years of his life were saddened by the distress of war. The French used his beloved chapel as a barracks, and meetings had to be held in his modest living room. The weaknesses of age gradually prevented him from performing the duties of his office. He died in 1804. (ML II, 565.) NEFF.

Krehbiel, Christian (1832-1909), the son of John and Katharine (Krehbiel) Krehbiel, was born Oct. 18, 1832, at Weierhof, Germany. He was the third child in a family of twelve children of which six boys and four girls grew to maturity. His ancestry traces back to Switzerland. About 1671 Jost Krähenbühl, under the pressure of persecution, left that country and settled in South Germany. Christian attended school in the Palatinate for five years and then three more years in Bavaria, his family having moved to Kleinschwabhausen, Bavaria, in 1844. He continued to receive religious instruction until the age of 17 as required by law, but was baptized at the age of 15.

When Christian's older brother Jacob was drafted into the army, the parents were anxious to shield their sons from military service. So they sold their farm at a great loss, paid 1,000 guilders for Jacob's release, and made preparation to go to America. In 1851, after some difficulty in getting the necessary papers, the family sailed for America, taking 35 days for the ocean voyage. They landed at New York, then continued to Buffalo, Cleveland, and Ashland, Ohio. That fall Christian with another young man took a river boat down the Ohio and up the Mississippi to St. Louis and Iowa to prepare the way for a group of families to come west in the spring. Christian was a strong young man and well able to do hard pioneer work such as cutting trees and helping build a log house and barn on the 100 acres of land which his parents bought for $800. He also became an expert at butchering and an amateur veterinarian.

On March 14, 1858, he married Susanna A. Ruth, the daughter of David Ruth, and to them were born 16 children. Nine sons and three daughters grew to adulthood. Two sons were listed in Who's Who. Three sons became ministers. For two years he lived with his father-in-law. During this time he was afflicted with an eye trouble and it was feared he would become permanently blind. In 1860 he moved to Summerfield, Ill., which at that time offered better farm advantages. In 1864 by election and lot he became a minister and soon after was made elder of the Summerfield Mennonite Church. In addition to the local church work he had much to do with conference. He promoted the starting of the Western District Conference (now Middle District) in 1868, and then later in 1877 helped organize the Kansas Conference (now Western District). At the sixth General Conference he was asked to be one of three traveling ministers for the Conference. He took an interest in the Wadsworth School development and delivered one of the dedicatory sermons at the opening of this school. Through his guidance, S. S. Haury, a member of his congregation preparing for mission work, was led to offer himself to the conference. This led to the creation of the Foreign Mission Board in 1872 with Krehbiel elected as president, which position he held for 24 years.

Along about 1869 he advocated the idea of colonization farther west and this brought him in contact with the Russian Mennonites who came in 1873 to look for land. He played an important part in assisting that large body of Mennonites to make the shift from the steppes of Russia to the plains of Kansas. In order to help the settlers the Mennonite Board of Guardians was formed with Christian Krehbiel, president; David Goertz, secretary, and John F. Funk, treasurer.

In 1879 he moved his family to Halstead, Kan., where four years before an offspring church of the Summerfield congregation had been organized.

In connection with the foreign mission work among the American Indians, Krehbiel conducted an Indian Industrial School on his farm in Kansas 1887-96. When this had to be discontinued, he initiated an Orphan and Children's Aid Society (q.v.) and operated its orphanage in his home 1896—?. He promoted the plan of a school for Kansas and this developed into the Halstead Seminary which was later moved to Newton and became Bethel College. He was instrumental in organizing the Mennonite Charité which aided Dr. Arthur E. Hertzler (the Horse and Buggy Doctor) to build his hospital. Besides farming, he was interested in other business enterprises, helping his sons get started in the flour milling and in the book and publishing business.

He served as pastor of the Summerfield and Halstead congregations for 45 years without a salary. When on his 70th birthday the church took a love offering of $400.00 for him, he turned it over to missions. He died April 30, 1909, and is buried at Halstead. O.A.K.

"Autobiography of Christian Krehbiel" (manuscript translated by Edward Krehbiel and Mrs. Elva K. Leisy); Margaret Krehbiel Goerz, "Christian Krehbiel" (in manuscript form); H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of North America I (n.p., 1898) 428-35; Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931); C. Krahn, ed. From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949; M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939): ML II, 565 f.

Krehbiel, Christian Emmanuel (1869-1948), b. Sept. 25, 1869, at Summerfield, Ill., was the seventh of the 16 children of Christian and Susanna Ruth Krehbiel, who came from the Palatinate, Germany. C. E. Krehbiel received his training at the Mennonite Preparatory School at Halstead, Kan., and the Kansas State Normal at Emporia. After teaching a year he entered Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Bloomfield, N.J. He attended the University of Berlin, Germany, 1899-1901. He married Mary A. Wirkler of Newton, Kan., on July 27, 1902, and two children, Olin and Florence, were born to them.

In 1901-20 Krehbiel was secretary of the Western Book and Publishing Company (later the Herald Book and Publishing Company) and did editorial work for several German periodicals. He started and edited The Sower, the young people's section of the Mennonite. He also served as the secretary of the Mennonite Charité 1908-31, and superintendent of the Leisy Orphan Aid Society 1901-48.

About 1921 Krehbiel retired from business to devote the rest of his life to Christian work. He served as field secretary for the General Conference Mennonite Church 1921-30. In 1922-23 he was in Russia in relief work for the MCC. He was ordained as minister on Dec. 2, 1923, and held many offices, both in the Western District Conference and the General Conference. He was General Conference statistician in 1923-38, chairman of the Board of Publication 1923-26, secretary of the General Conference 1926-38, president of the General Conference 1938-45, member of the Mennonite Biblical Seminary Board 1941-47, of the Home Mission Board 1945-47, and editor of the Christlicher Bundesbote (q.v.) 1930-46.

Krehbiel was a member of the Bethel College Mennonite Church at North Newton, Kan., where he served as deacon for many years. He organized the Lorraine Avenue Mennonite Church of Wichita, Kan., and was its pastor in 1931-35. He served as supply pastor of the Eden Mennonite Church, Moundridge, Kan., while their pastor was doing relief work in Europe.

Krehbiel wrote the following: Historical Sketch, First Mennonite Church, Halstead, Kansas (Newton, 1925); the chapter on clothing in the book Feeding the Hungry (Scottdale, 1929); numerous articles, short stories, and some poems.

Following several heart attacks, he died on June 9, 1948, at Newton, and was buried in the Halstead cemetery. O.A.K.

Krehbiel, Daniel (1812-88), the son of Jakob and Elizabeth Kapp Krehbiel, was born at Weierhof, Germany, April 22, 1812. He received the usual education of that day and took up the saddler trade. In 1832, because of his convictions that a Christian should have no part in military service as required in Germany, he came to America.

At first he located in western New York where he had relatives and worked at his trade. He started in business for himself near Buffalo in 1836. He was married to Mary Leisy of Cleveland, Ohio, July 18, 1841, and five years later they moved to that city. Although Krehbiel's business prospered he missed the blessings of a Mennonite church, and after an unsuccessful attempt to gather the scattered Mennonites of the city together into a church, he moved to West Point, Iowa, in 1856, where some of his brothers from Germany had recently settled.

Daniel united with the Mennonite church at West Point. Nine miles away was the Zion Mennonite Church where his brother Jacob was pastor. Observing that these congregations had little in common, he was concerned that isolated and scattered Mennonites be brought together. At his suggestion the two congregations met in 1859; he expressed his ideas on union to do mission work and so a call was issued for a general conference in 1860.

In 1862 he returned to Cleveland, but he continued active in the new organization which he had founded. The Conference placed him on the building committee and in 1872 elected him as treasurer of the mission board, which office he held until 1881.

He died at his home in Cleveland, on Jan. 4, 1888. O.A.K.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939); H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Canference of Mennonites of North America I (n.p., 1898) 401-6; ML II, 566.

Krehbiel, David (1849-1908), a teacher in the Realschule at Weierhof, Palatinate, Germany, b. May 17, 1849, at Ramsen, d. July 7, 1908. He attended the Gymnasium at Basel and the normal school at Schiers in Switzerland, and then the universities at Neuchâtel and Basel, accepted a position at the Realschule at Weierhof in 1873, which he resigned in 1900 because of ill health. He won enduring merit by his long service as bookkeeper of the Mennonite school association, by his warm advocacy of the principles of the Mennonite brotherhood, and by his well-written articles in Mennonitische Blätter and clever stories in Pilgerleben and Christlicher Gemeindekalender. His deeply felt religious verses, one of which, "Ja, liebster Jesu, Dein sind wir," is found in the South German Mennonite hymnal, were collected and published by his son under the title Religiöse Gedichte. (ML II, 566.) NEFF.

Krehbiel, Henry J. (1865-1940), a leading minister of the General Conference Mennonite Church, was born at Franklin, Iowa, Sept. 8, 1865, the son of Jacob and Katherine Ruth Krehbiel. His father served many years as pastor of the Summerfield, Ill., Mennonite Church. Henry was baptized in 1880. His education included attendance at McKendry College at Lebanon, Ill., and graduation from the Evangelical Theological Semiary (now Eden Theological Seminary) at St. Louis, Mo. He served two pastorates—Trenton, Ohio, 1892-1907, and Reedley, Cal., 1908-38. He served as president of the conference 1920-26, on the Board of Publication for 42 years, part of the time as president, and as the only American delegate to the first Mennonite World Conference of 1925 at Basel, Switzerland. A Trip Through Europe, A Plea for the Abolition of War, and A Report of the 400th Anniversary of the Denomination (Newton, 1926) was the fruit of the European trip. He was active in the founding and promotion of Bluffton College and received the honorary D.D. from it in 1930. He was married to Lydia Ruth in 1893; they had four sons and one daughter. He died on Oct. 5, 1940, and is buried at Reedley. W.H.KR.

Krehbiel, Henry Peter (1862-1940), was born at Summerfield, Ill., on April 13, 1862, the third child of Christian and Susanna Amalie Ruth Krehbiel. He had three living sisters and eight brothers, of whom three preceded him in death. His parents immigrated from the Palatinate. On Nov. 21, 1887, he was married to Matilda Emelia Kruse of Halstead, Kan. To this union two children were born, Elva Agnes (Leisy) of Dallas, Tex., and Ariel Kruse, deceased in infancy. In 1878 he and his brother J. W. Krehbiel went to Kansas to break prairie for the coming of the Christian Krehbiel family to Kansas. In 1881 Henry attended Emporia Normal at Emporia, Kan., then taught the Quaker School in Harvey

County for one year, after which he attended Kansas University for a year. For five years he was manager of a hardware store in Halstead. Then in 1892, feeling called to the ministry, he took his family to Oberlin, Ohio, and in 1897 received the B.D. degree from the Oberlin Theological Seminary.

During the years at Oberlin he was supply pastor for the Mennonite churches in Sterling and Wadsworth, Ohio. In 1897-1900 he was pastor of the First Mennonite Church at Canton, Ohio, continuing to serve the church at Sterling. While here he also founded and edited a Mennonite paper, The Review (q.v.). He also was active in promoting Bluffton College, at Bluffton, Ohio. In October 1900 the family returned to Newton, where he took over the management of the bookstore later known as The Herald Book and Publishing Co. He also published and edited the German Mennonite newspaper Post und Volksblatt, later named Der Herold. In 1923 he established The Mennonite Weekly Review.

In 1905 he began his regular trips to Burrton, Kan., where he organized a church at the request of the Home Mission Board of the Western District Conference. Later he was ordained as elder of the church. In 1912 he started a mission church in Hutchinson, Kan.

Krehbiel held many offices and committee posts in various conferences. He was secretary of the Home Mission Board of the General Conference, 1914-23; member of the Mennonite Immigration Bureau which he helped organize in 1906; member of the special committee on merger of Bethel College with the Western District Conference, 1916; member of the Committee on Exemptions for both the Western District and General Conferences, 1917; member of Committee on War Exemptions for All Mennonites, 1918. In 1917 he was elected Conference representative for Bethel College. He organized the Mennonite Settlers' Aid Society in 1918. From 1908- he was statistician for the General Conference, and from 1913 the American representative for the Mennonitisches Lexikon.

Among his publications are numerous pamphlets. War Being Inconsistent with the Teachings and Spirit of Christ won first prize in a Quaker contest in 1895. Others were: "How Can Mennonite Doctrines Receive More Recognition," Bundesbote, 1895; "Mennonite Settlements in Kansas," Mennonite Yearbook, 1896; "Our Position Toward Secret Societies," Conference paper, 1896 (Mennonite Book Concern, 1898); "History of Education Among the Mennonites" (Herald Publishing Co., 1925), a paper read at the Bethel College Bible Course; "What Is a Pacifist?" (Herald Publishing Co., 1931), a paper read at the Quaker-Mennonite-Brethren Conference at Mount Morris, Ill.

He further wrote: History of the Mennonite General Conference, Vol. I, 1898 and Vol. II, 1938 (Vol. III of the history was projected but not completed); War, Peace, Amity, 1937.

His activities were varied. In 1896 he invented an endless sickle; in 1900 a newspaper file for libraries. In 1909 he was a member of the Kansas Legislature as representative from Harvey County. In 1914-18 he interested himself in Mennonite expansion by opening a colony in Wyoming. During World War I he concerned himself with the position of the conscientious objector and traveled with a committee to Washington, D.C., for conferences with the Secretary of War, and also visited Mennonite boys in military camps. After the war he turned his energies to helping refugee Mennonites abroad. He opened two colonies, one near Spokane, Wash., and the other at Cuauhtemoc, Mex. He was greatly interested in the historical background of the Mennonites. In 1927 he and his wife undertook a trip around the world which carried them to many Mennonite churches in Europe, and to Mennonite missions in India.

In 1931 he lost his wife. In 1936 he married Katie A. Friesen of Burrton. On Dec. 2, 1940, he passed away at his home in Newton. He lies buried in the mausoleum at Halstead, Kan. E.K.L.

Krehbiel, Jakob, a Mennonite farmer on the Randeckerhof near Alsenborn, Palatinate, Germany, b. Jan. 5, 1835, at Obersülzen, d. July 26, 1918. Besides being a very successful farmer, he also did considerable writing. He wrote various stories, "Der Engel Wacht," "Die Werber," "Der Bubendieb," "Aus dem Kavalleristenleben," "Ein passiver Soldat," "Der Rote," and "Wer mag's deuten?" which were published in Jugendblätter (1865-69). Without formal education, he was well informed in several intellectual fields, as history, religion, politics, etc. He was also active in the Sembach (q.v.) church, serving as its president after 1885 with great devotion, and attended and took part in the south German Mennonite conferences. As a citizen he was always ready by word or deed to serve any cause for the common good (Gem.-Kal., 1920, 37-50). Worthy of mention is his energetic rejection of the brochure by pastor Helferich (q.v.) on infant baptism (Menn. Bl. 1865, 78 f.). (ML II, 566.) NEFF.

Krehbiel, Johann Jakob (1841-95), a Mennonite farmer on the Weierhof, Palatinate, Germany, b. April 10, 1841, became chairman of the Mennonite Educational Association in 1882; in 1886 he was appointed the first Palatine member of the curatorium of the Vereinigung (q.v.). At the Palatine-Hessian conference at Eppstein (May 27, 1886), he urged closer union with the Baden Mennonites; this union resulted in the establishment of the Badisch-Pfälzische Konferenz, which was later called the Conference of the South German Mennonites. With sacrificial devotion and deep understanding he shared in all the endeavors to gather and preserve the brotherhood, as well as in many branches of charitable work in the Protestant church. Still in the prime of life, he was snatched away by pneumonia on June 10, 1895. (Gem.-Kal., 1897, 1-37; ML II, 566.)
NEFF.

Kreider (Kreiter, Greider), a Mennonite family which migrated from the Palatinate to Pennsylvania in the early 18th century. Jacob Kreider (d. 1751) came in 1716 to Lancaster County, settling south of the city of Lancaster. The family spread from Lancaster County to a few other communities in Ohio (Wadsworth), Indiana (Elkhart Co.), Illinois (Sterling), and Missouri (Palmyra). A number of ordained men have borne the name. In the Lancaster Conference (MC) there were Tobias (d. 1791), deacon at Mellinger's; Tobias, preacher at the same place 1847-64; Frank (1868-), preacher at East Petersburg since 1908. Jacob M. Greider (1835-1931) was a prominent deacon at Salunga. Jacob's brother, Bishop John M. Greider (1823-91), served as bishop 1872-91 in the Medway church, Montgomery Co., Ohio. Daniel Kreider (1782-1860) served as a minister, first in York Co., Ont., from about 1825 on, then moved to Wadsworth, Ohio, where a relative, Jonas M. Kreider (1857-1933), was a long-time preacher. One of the latter's grandsons, Robert (1919-), served as preacher in the same congregation since 1943; and another, Carl, is serving as dean of Goshen College 1944- . Amos E. Kreider, a prominent minister in the General Conference Mennonite Church, came from the Sterling, Ill., congregation (MC). His son Robert is dean of Bluffton College 1954- . Bishop J. M. Kreider (1869-1946) was a long-time minister (MC) in northeastern Missouri, preacher from 1898 and bishop from 1912 to his death. His son John F. (deacon since 1928) and grandson Harold (preacher since 1950) serve the same district. H.S.B.

Kreider, John Mellinger (J. M.) was born May 24, 1869, at Soudersburg, Lancaster Co., Pa., the oldest of the 12 children of George and Anna Mellinger Kreider. He received all his formal education in the Soudersburg public elementary school. On Nov. 24, 1890, he was married to Hettie Elvina Buckwalter and became the father of nine children. He was a member of the Paradise Mennonite Church, Lancaster, and as a young man was very active in Sunday-school work. He lived in Lancaster County until 1898, when he was ordained to the ministry and moved to Palmyra, Mo., to be the pastor of the Mennonite church there. He was ordained bishop for the Northeast Missouri churches in 1912. He served as a member of the Mennonite Board of Education for many years, conducted evangelistic meetings throughout the United States and Canada, and served on many committees of the church.

He supported his family on a dairy farm at Palmyra, on which he lived till his death on Feb. 28, 1946. N.E.K.

Kremer, Lubbert Janz: see Cremer.

Kremper and Wilster Marsch, the marshy region to the right of the lower Elbe near the villages Krempe and Wilster; the nearest city is Glückstadt, Prussia, Germany. In the middle of the 16th century Mennonites were already located in the "royal wilderness"; the pastor of Wilster requested the king to watch the "Hollanders" suspected of Anabaptism. Nevertheless they established themselves in such numbers that they brought about a change in agriculture from mere cattle raising to dairying that gradually spread to the east coast of Holstein. Great quantities of cheese were shipped to Lübeck around 1600.

Gradually sharper measures were taken against the Mennonites. The provost of Itzehoe complained in 1635 about the great "applausum" they were winning, and ordered that citizens who had given the oath of loyalty to state and church should see to it that none charged with false doctrine stayed in the parishes. Christian IV decided that the "Manists" should cease their "exercise of baptism and other ceremonies" and "turn to our religion," or leave the country. The alarmed immigrants claimed the (see Glückstadt) Privilegium of 1631, asking for three years' grace on account of flood damage and the building of expensive dikes. This request was refused. But by 1642 it was again reported that Mennonites had again entered the country, and were ordered out of the Steinburg district within four weeks. In August 1643 Christian IV again directed the authorities to "keep a watchful eye on sects like Anabaptists, Mennonites, and others in the marshes." Now it became quiet. Most of them likely took refuge in Glückstadt.

A possible attempt to settle in the adjacent Süderdiethmarschen is inferred from a prohibition of such settlement issued by the king in 1637.

They were more leniently treated in the parishes of Brockdorf and Wewelsfleth, where a Mennonite applied for a teaching position. These two parishes belonged to the same district (Steinburg) as the Kremper and Wilster Marsch. R.Do.

E. George, "Die wirtschaftlichen und kulturellen Beziehungen der Westküste Schleswig-Holsteins zu den Niederlanden," in Nordelbingen I; Heimatbuch des Kreises Steinburg II; W. Jensen, Die Wilstermarsch; ML II, 566 f.

Krems, a city (pop. 20,359) in the Wachau region of the Danube Valley in lower Austria. Anabaptists appeared here as early as 1527. On Nov. 15, 1527, the magistrate of Krems inquired of the government what attitude he should take toward the Anabaptists staying at Gedersdorf; six days later he ordered them all arrested. In its ensuing report the council stated that there were respected citizens among the Anabaptists; that Jörg Krautschlögel (q.v.) had been known to be one. Among those seized were some illiterates, who were therefore less responsible, and some pregnant women and mothers of infants. A backslidden monk from Gleink together with his wife and child were arrested on suspicion of this doctrine. The government ordered on Dec. 13 that the pregnant women and nursing mothers be released on bail; the council asked grace for the citizen Joh. Ernst, stated that the trial would demand much effort and money, and inquired what further steps should be taken. The government ordered on Feb. 8, 1528, that the council should proceed according to the mandates and the degree of responsibility of the prisoners. The register of martyrs lists three executions in Krems.

Since Krems lay on the route most travelers took from Tirol or Switzerland to Moravia (and the Moravian Anabaptist brotherhood was augmented for decades chiefly by additions from Tirol) they are often mentioned here. Although special mandates had been issued to the boatmen strictly forbidding the transport of Anabaptists, the refugees continued to prefer the Danube trip, leaving the boat at Stein, opposite Krems. In the village of Hohenwart (q.v.) near Krems several Anabaptists lay in prison in 1534. Hutter addressed an epistle to them. After some time they were taken to Egginburg, where their cheeks were burned through and they were released. The feet of one had been in the stocks so long that they had to be amputated in Moravia.

In the 1540's especially large numbers of Tyrolese migrated to Moravia via Krems. In spite of the watchfulness of the authorities, most of them arrived safely in Moravia. Nevertheless some were seized. A group led by Sebastian Leutner, a binder from the Adige, who had led four transports safely, was caught in Stein. He recanted, but died of the plague before he could be released by penance. Konrad Heinzemann, however, who was seized there two days later leading a Swabian group, was more steadfast (1558). He was taken to Vienna with Christel Kircher, who had been Leutner's traveling companion, where he was released in the following year through the intervention of Pfauser, the Lutheran court preacher of Archduke Maximilian, before the bishop of Vienna, Anton Brus, could initiate the trial.

Magister Gangolf Wagner, the preacher of Krems, was called to Vienna in 1573 by the Lower Austrian Landmarschall, Hans Wilhelm, Baron of Rogendorf, to convert the brothers Marx and Bernhard Klampferer (q.v.), but to no avail.

In the 1580's several Swiss groups touched Krems en route to Moravia. The Zürich council complained about the emigration of so many people, especially about the Moravian emissaries, who lured them with small gifts, especially with little knives of their own production. In 1608, when a Swiss group was arrested by the magistrate in Krems, who took from them their possessions and sent them into the community for forced labor, the Moravian authorities, including Cardinal Dietrichstein, protested this act to the emperor on Oct. 17, and demanded their immediate release; they declared that because of war there was in many localities a shortage of inhabitants and that the immigration of the Swiss was very desirable (Pamatkenbuch, 1601 ff., Brno, State archives). P.De.

Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672); J. Kinzl, Chronik der Städte Krems und Stein (Krems, 1869); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Communismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 567.

Kress, Simon, of Gündelbach, Maulbronn district of Württemberg, Germany, the home of Bartholomäus Riegel (q.v.). Simon Kress was an unusually zealous missionary for the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia, preaching in his home town and vicinity (1574) and in the region of Schorndorf, was seized in Oberurbach near Schorndorf and taken to Wittlingen on Nov. 12, 1582.

In 1589 it was reported in the synodus, which was a conference of the consistory, the church council, and the general superintendent, that the bailiff of the castle was permitting Kress to go about freely and work outside the castle grounds. Although the magistrate and superintendent of Urach had protested, it remained thus. In 1596 Pastor Tobias Fetzer in Wittlingen admitted that the two Anabaptist prisoners, Simon Kress of Gündelbach and Hans Dauber of Illingen, conducted themselves modestly, kindly, and friendly, and had asked to be permitted to go to church. They actually came to church, accompanied by the bailiff of the castle, sang the psalms with the rest, listened to the sermon, by nods and gestures indicated their approval of the pastor's words, and indicated disapproval by shaking their heads. This confused the congregation; it seemed to them that something contrary to Scripture was being said. Therefore the permission to attend church was withdrawn. The bailiff thought the prisoners ought to cut down some willow thickets into pasture. With pick and hoe it would be easier to convert them than with the Bible.

Their imprisonment continued. The Urach Pfarrelationen of 1603 state that Kress has become quieter, less defiant than Hans Dauber. In 1605 Kress received a visit from his wife and son, who persuaded him to present a petition: if he could return to his home, he would promise not to enter into a discussion with anyone, but attend quietly to his business. It is not known whether or not he was released. In any case, by 1617 he had died. G.Bo.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 198; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 567 f.

Kretz, Matthias (1480-1543), a Catholic theologian, cathedral deacon in München, did not (contrary to information from the antiquariat of Calvary) expressly and specifically attack the Anabaptists in his frequently reprinted sermon on the Mass (1524). E.C.

ADB IX, 645 ("Gretz"); Calvary, Verzeichnis seltener und wertvoller Werke (Berlin, 1869) 29 and 53; ML II, 568.

Kreutzinger, Jörg, a baker's assistant, an Anabaptist martyr, was killed with the sword and then burned with seven brethren at Wels (q.v.) in Upper Austria, June 28, 1528. Three days later two women were drowned, and six persons who recanted were pardoned, subject to public penitence (see Penance and Haslinger). Neff.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin (Berlin, 1893) 100, 187; ML II, 568.

Kreuzenstein (Grätzenstein), a castle in Lower Austria near the Manhartsberg, has a long, involved history extending back to 1000.

On March 22, 1523, Archduke Ferdinand, the brother of Charles V, assigned the management of the castle, the criminal court, and the money for their upkeep from the income from districts of Korneuburg, to his councilor, Count Niklas von Salm. Two years later Niklas distinguished himself in the army of Charles V at Pavia, in the capture of the French king, Francis I, and as a reward received the castle as a hereditary fief. To it belonged the outlying villages, Gerasdorf, Leobendorf, Perzendorf, and Kleinkötz.

This was about the time, the end of 1527, when Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) was arrested and imprisoned in Kreuzenstein. Imprisonment in the dilapidated rooms was particularly hard. Here Hubmaier received visits from distinguished men, and had his famous interview with Johannes Fabri, who had been a fellow student, and who later became bishop of Vienna, in a futile attempt to persuade him to recant; the only concession Hubmaier made was to leave the decision to a general council. His fate took its course, and he died at the stake on March 10, 1528, in Vienna.

The castle remained in possession of the family of Count Niklas von Salm und Neuburg am Inn until 1585, when it was sold to Count Ferdinand von Hardegg, and finally to the Count of Wilczeck.

The old castle in which Hubmaier lay imprisoned so long has long since become a ruin, and has been replaced by a splendid edifice put up by Count Johann von Wilczek in 1879. In 1928, at the formal commemoration of the quadricentennial of Hubmaier's death, visitors from many nations made an excursion to Kreuzenstein. They found in a window nook an old etching: the familiar picture of Hubmaier. On the original there are two sketches beside his head, one depicting the burning of Hubmaier, the other depicting the drowning of his wife (Menn. Bl., 1928, 38). LOSERTH.

The literature on Kreuzenstein is best found in the Topographie von Niederösterreich IV, 490-98. A picture of the old castle is found in Vischer, Topographia archiducatus Austriaē, 1672; a picture of the new castle by Camillo Sitte, in Monatsschrift des Oesterreichischen Museums I; ML II, 568 f.

Kreuznach, a city (pop. 26,557) in the southern Rhine Province of Prussia, formerly under Palatine jurisdiction, where in 1529 the Anabaptist, Philip of Langenlonsheim, was beheaded. There seems to have been an Anabaptist congregation here very early, but no particulars are known before 1556, when a division occurred. The Hutterite chronicle records the following account:

Several members of the group around Kreuznach, who were called the Swiss, had left it because of sin and transgression within the group, and were won to the Hutterian brotherhood by Hans Schmidt (q.v.). The reasons for this step were: (1) Although they have taught and learned that one should give himself completely to God, with all that he has, they have granted that each may use his own goods for himself and give to the poor what will benefit them. (2) Although they have taught that no one should call anything his own, but that what one has is also one's neighbor's, nevertheless if anyone needs anything he has to buy it of the other. (3) Because they do not teach the truth on original sin, pay taxes for war, and secretly discipline misdeeds, so that they may not become public. (4) Because they are not truly separated from the people of the world, but in many regards mingle with them, and because their preachers disagree and quarrel among themselves. Diebold (Winter) and Farwendel (q.v.) are named.

Among those dissatisfied with the group were Lorenz Hueff (q.v.) of Sprendlingen, a preacher; Rupp Gellner (q.v.) or Kern, Matthes Stroh, and Wilhelm Henchen. Thoman Neuman of Wolfsheim, a cobbler, journeyed to Moravia to get acquainted with the Hutterian Brethren. He brought back a favorable report. These men then decided to join the Hutterian brotherhood. After long oral and written negotiations an agreement was reached on Nov. 26, 1556, on various points (marriage, war taxes, separation, support of preachers, purchase of houses and land, and moving to Moravia). In Moravia Lorenz Hueff was accepted as a preacher.

The Concept of Cologne was signed in 1591 by a representative of the Kreuznach congregation. Nothing further is known of it, but it is inferred that remnants survived the Thirty Years' War, for right after the war ended, Swiss Mennonite refugees settled here and a new congregation was formed, which existed a long time under the name of Rheingrafenstein (q.v.), more recently called Neudorferhof. NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 270-78; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 357-60; ML II, 569.

Kriegsheim, a village near Worms in Rheinhessen, Germany, which until 1815 belonged to the Alzey district of the Palatinate. It was the seat of a Mennonite congregation until 1820; since 1821 the adjacent Monsheim is its center.

The origins of the congregation here presumably lie in the early period of the Anabaptist movement. For the period 1588-1608 there are sparse official records, which afford a glance into the lot of an oppressed, long-established Anabaptist group (reports of the local Reformed pastor and his inspector to the church council, measures passed by the Burgrave of Alzey and the government at Heidelberg), which is typical of the suppressive attitude of the Palatinate, especially in the Alzey district. In 1600 there were 13 couples in Kriegsheim; in 1601 a report mentions 66 persons. Cross-examinations by the Burgrave of Alzey on Dec. 29, 1601, and Jan. 11, 1602, were fruitless. The Anabaptists did not have the local clergy marry them, were designated as "despisers of the holy sacraments" by the state church, were even said to have mocked churchgoers. They were by trade craftsmen and peasants (weavers, farmers, saw filers, glaziers, cobblers, and vinedressers).

The following family names are listed: Strohm, Zunich, Moroldt, Meyer, Schmidt, Labach, Scherer, Bidinger, Herstein, Bekker, Mezger, Brosam, and Bischoff. Among the citizens they seem to have been respected, since they were apparently given public office "before other subjects" (in the list of 1608 a field-keeper was arrested). "Subjects" even married the children of Anabaptists, which is the more remarkable because the Burgrave of Alzey had in 1588 reckoned the Kriegsheim heretics among the serfs. This group of Anabaptists apparently did not disapprove of mixed marriages or holding civil office; in this respect the original Palatine Anabaptists differed from the stricter Swiss Brethren, who came after the Thirty Years' War. They had a leader (Vorsteher) and held their meetings at night. In a house between Kriegsheim and Pfeddersheim a well-attended meeting was surprised on Aug. 13, 1608, and two Vorsteher who preached were arrested. The Kriegsheim congregation appears to have survived the storms of the Thirty Years' War which devastated the Palatinate; it was augmented by Swiss Brethren who began to arrive in 1650.

About 1657 a group of Kriegsheim Mennonites joined the Quakers through the influence of Ames (q.v.). But this Quaker group emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1685; thus members of the Kriegsheim group were a part of the early German settlement at Germantown. The brief period during which there were Quakers at Kriegsheim was marked by a series of conflicts with the church and the state. There was also tension between them and the Mennonites, as a letter written by Hinrich Cassel, a Mennonite preacher of Gerolsheim, in 1679 shows. The Quaker writings breathe the spirit of the English Revolution, in sharp contrast to the "devoted subject" style of Mennonite petitions. In contrast to the Mennonites, the Quakers refused all payment of taxes to church or state, the large or small tithe, or even congregational fees. "It seems strange to us that money is required of us to pay for our liberty of conscience." Confiscation of crops, cattle, furniture, and wine, as well as arrest and imprisonment were the order of the day. It is to be feared, writes the "entire poor congregation at Kriegsheim" to the Oberamt in 1680, that "the best inhabitants will leave the village and settle elsewhere."

The Quakers were strengthened in their radical position by emissaries from England, who reported back to the Quaker annual conference in London—William Penn was also in Kriegsheim in 1667; nevertheless in 1664 they succeeded in obtaining an investigation of events in Kriegsheim, probably by means of a letter written by the village schoolmaster, John Philley, to the elector, which resulted in negotiations with the Quakers and Mennonites in the presence of the author of the letter. In consequence the Mennonites were granted toleration on Aug. 4, 1664, which also applied to the Quakers, who were frequently officially called "Manists." In 1669 the government decided "that the Quakers either pay money for their religious freedom as the Anabaptists did or be put out of the country." In 1685 they were expelled.

In 1710 the Mennonites of Kriegsheim were compelled to do military service, not only to be a guard under arms, but even to join the regular militia. Their protest to the government at Heidelberg in 1711 resulted in their release from these duties the following year.

The size of the Kriegsheim church can be estimated from the tables drawn up for the electoral cabinet for the levy of the protection fee. According to these lists of Mennonites, Kriegsheim had 52 persons in 1680, and 41 in 1773. In 1738 the following family names were registered: Voldt, Bäcker, Strohm, Kühn, Krämer, Janson, Müller, Hüthwohl.

A protocol of 1768 shows that the Mennonites of the Zeller Valley (Lichti and Linscheid of Harxheim) were members of the Kriegsheim church. The same is true of Monsheim; for this protocol is signed by David Möllinger (q.v.) as the president of the Kriegsheim church. The Kindenheim Mennonites were also counted as part of Kriegsheim. In 1803 Preacher Christian Eymann signed the Ibersheim Resolutions for Kriegsheim.

Peter Kolb (q.v.) was an elder of the Kriegsheim congregation in the early 18th century; in 1728 he was succeeded by Christian Weber, who served until about 1770. The Dutch Naamlijst, which always lists Kriegsheim as "Griesheim," names the following ministers of the 18th century: Wilhelm Krämer, Johann Schörger, Henrich Müller, all serving until about 1769, Henrich Strohm 1758-90, Peter Müller until about 1775, Michel Stiess, preacher from 1766, elder from 1772 until after 1802, Jacob Krehbiel 1763-ca. 84, Jacob Kägy 1771-ca 84, Christian Eymann from 1774, Peter Weber 1778-81, Johann Dettweiler from 1784, Heinrich Krämer from 1788.

A complete list of the localities belonging to the Kriegsheim church at the beginning of the 19th century is found in a register drawn up for the erection of a new church about 1820. When the first theologically trained minister in South Germany, Leonhard Weydmann, was employed (1818-36 at Monsheim, then at Crefeld), he was promised a new church building. The villages enumerated are Biedesheim, Bockenheim, Bubenheim, Dirmstein, Kindenheim, Kriegsheim, Monsheim, Niederflörsheim, Pfeddersheim, and Offstein; and the family names were Bühm, Christoffel, Dettweiler, Eymann, Geber, Hahn, Hüthwohl, Hirschler, Hiestand, Janson, Krehbühl, Kieferndorf, Neef, Krämer, Möllinger, Kaege, Rupp, Seitz, Stauffer, Strohm, Schneider, Vogt, Weis, Weber, Wiehner.

The Kriegsheim Mennonites had their own cemetery; the Catholic church now stands on the site. The hall in which they had held their meetings being in need of repair as well as being too small, it was sold in May 1820, especially since it was exposed to floods of the Pfrimm. The proceeds were applied to the new building at Monsheim (q.v.).

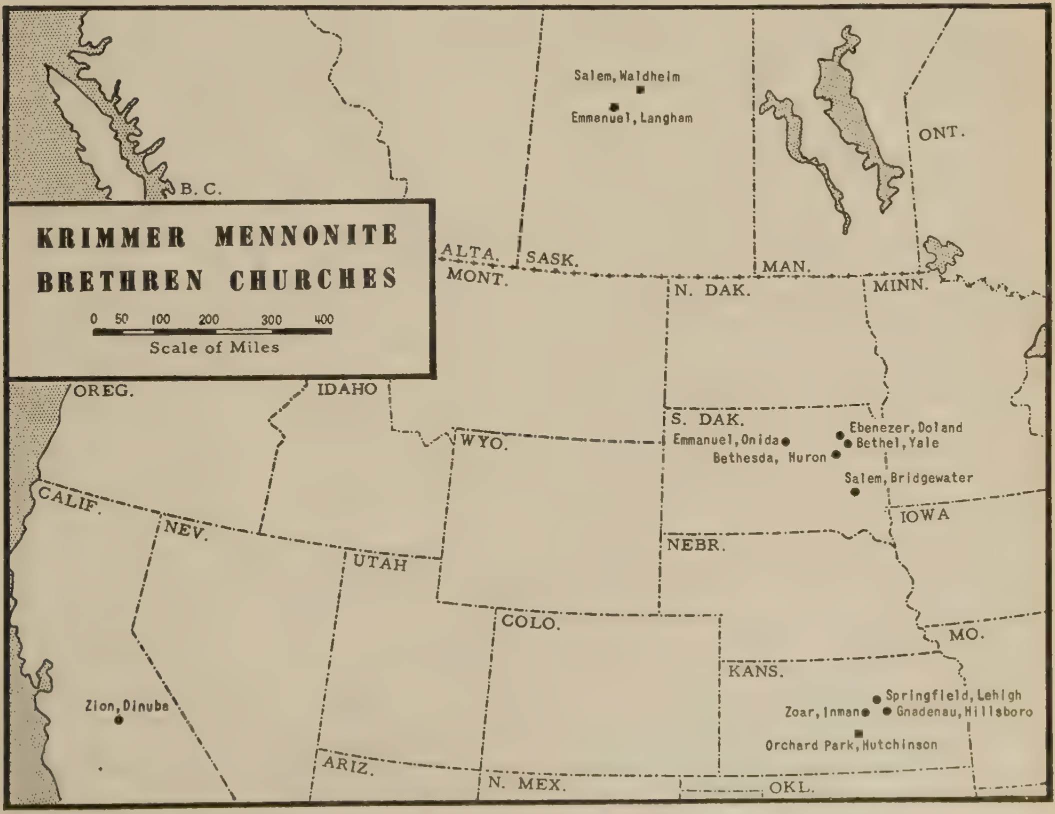
W.F.

Chr. Neff, "Geschichtliches aus der Gemeinde Monsheim," Menn. Bl., 1892, Nos. 1-4; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); E. Correll, Das Schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); W. Hubben, Die Quäker in der deutschen Vergangenheit (Leipzig, 1929); W. Fellmann, "Kriegsheimer Mennoniten und Quäker in ihrer religiösen Verschiedenheit," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten (Festgabe für D. Christian Neff, Weierhof, 1938) 19-24; ML II, 572 f.

Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church had its origin in the village of Annafeld near Simferopol, Crimea, Russia, on Sept. 21, 1869, as a group of 19 persons, with Jacob A. Wiebe (1839-1921) as the actual founder. A group of Mennonite families from the Molotschna (Wiebe himself was from Ohrloff) about 1860 had bought a Mohammedan village in the Crimea, which they named Annafeld. Through a spontaneous religious revival most of the families in the village began to seek a more earnest Christian life and experienced conversion, Wiebe among them. Since Wiebe had become acquainted with a leader of the Kleine Gemeinde during a period of work as a hired hand in the Molotschna, he invited the Kleine Gemeinde elder, Johann Friesen, to visit the Annafeld group and organize them as a Kleine Gemeinde congregation, which the latter did in 1867. Wiebe was ordained as preacher, and soon thereafter as elder. Elder Peter Bärg, who had transferred to the Kleine Gemeinde as preacher, was also accepted by the new group as their preacher. Friesen had refused to accede to the request of the Annafeld group for rebaptism, but the group remained dissatisfied on this point and finally proceeded to have one of their members (Kornelius Enns was chosen) rebaptize Elder Wiebe, who in turn on Sept. 21, 1869, rebaptized 18 others. This is considered by the K.M.B. group as their founding date. Trine immersion forward in a flowing stream was adopted as the mode. The group chose the name "Brüdergemeinde" but was soon called "Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde" to distinguish it from the Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde founded in the Molotschna in 1860, with which it had no connection. (Krim is the German name for Crimea.) The act of rebaptism constituted in effect a withdrawal of the Wiebe group from the Kleine Gemeinde, with which it had had fellowship for only a few years, although it was not a true schism from the historic Kleine Gemeinde group, since the entire Annafeld group continued under Wiebe's leadership. However, much of the ultraconservative spirit of the Kleine Gemeinde was transmitted into the K.M.B. group, in combination with the new K.M.B. emphasis on conversion, assurance, and experience. There was little further connection between the K.M.B. and the Kleine Gemeinde, but in the United States a Kleine Gemeinde preacher, Abraham Klaassen, who had been ordained in 1869 in Russia, joined the K.M.B. group in Kansas about 1879.

The new church grew slowly, and when they left for America in 1874 numbered only about 40 baptized members. All of the group emigrated except three families, a total of 20 families, the vanguard (the K.M.B. group were the first to receive passports) of the great emigration of Mennonites from Russia 1874-80 to the prairie states of the United States and to Manitoba. Their leaders on arrival were Elder Wiebe and Preacher Johann Harder (1836-1930), earlier from the Ohrloff Mennonite congregation at Blumstein in the Molotschna settlement, who had been elected minister in 1871 before the departure from Russia.

The K.M.B. group arrived in New York on July 15, 1874, and after some delay incurred in searching for land, during which the group as a whole remained at Elkhart, Ind., they arrived at this new home, 14 miles northwest of Peabody, Marion Co., Kan., on Aug. 16. Accustomed to village type settlement in Russia, the entire group settled as one village called Gnadenau, destined to become the most perfect of the few communal villages organized by the Mennonites in Kansas, although even it lasted only two or three years. The village never had a post office, and when in 1879 a branch of the Santa Fe railroad went through the north edge of the settlement, and Hillsboro was built on the line two miles north of the village, Gnadenau lost its future. The Gnadenau K.M.B. group was very strict in various ways and this together with its variant practice of immersion (forward) prevented two M.B. families which settled in the community in 1875 from joining it and led to the foundation of the Ebenfeld M.B. congregation.



KRIMMER MENNONITE BRETHREN CHURCHES
0 50 100 200 300 400
Scale of Miles
B. C.
ALTA.
SASK.
MAN.
ONT.
Salem, Waldheim
Emmanuel, Langham
MONT.
N. DAK.
MINN.
OREG.
IDAHO
WYO.
S. DAK.
Emmanuel, Onida
Ebenezer, Doland
Bethel, Yale
Bethesda, Huron
Salem, Bridgewater
IOWA
CALIF.
NEV.
UTAH
NEBR.
COLO.
MO.
KANS.
Springfield, Lehigh
Zoar, Inman
Gnadenau, Hillsboro
Orchard Park, Hutchinson
Zion, Dinuba
ARIZ.
N. MEX.
OKL.

The first Gnadenau church building, erected in 1874 of adobe walls with thatched roof, did not stand the weather; so a frame building was erected in 1877. On Feb. 15, 1877, the congregation was incorporated as the "Gnadenau Mennonite Church." On March 30, 1899, the name was changed in the charter to "Crimean Mennonite Brethren Church," but popularly the name remained "Krimmer M.B." In 1895 a new building was erected 2½ miles south of Hillboro, and is still in use.

Elder Jacob A. Wiebe served until his resignation in 1900, then was succeeded as elder by his brother Henry (1900-10), and he in turn by John J. Friesen (1910-37). The group suffered a heavy loss in membership when Elder Wiebe resigned. On July 12, 1917, the "Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church of North America" was incorporated at Hillsboro.

Four additional K.M.B. congregations were established in Kansas: Springfield at Lehigh (1902), Zoar at Inman, Lyons in Rice County, and one in Butler County. The last two did not survive long. Additional congregations were established as follows: South Dakota (Bridgewater 1886, Yale 1902, Doland 1919, Onida 1920, Huron 1947); Saskatchewan (Waldheim 1899, Langham 1901); California (Dinuba 1911). The following further congregations did not survive: Oklahoma (Bethel near Hooker 1907-19, and Bethel near Weatherford 1897-1937); Kansas (Emmanuel near Garden City 1918-36); North Dakota (Emmanuel near Chasely 1921-32). A small congregation was established at Jansen (near Fairbury, Neb.) in 1880, largely out of converts from the Kleine Gemeinde, which continued until 1930. In the same year 1880 John Holdeman attempted to win the K.M.B. group at Gnadenau to his views, but failed. In that year or 1879 Abr. Klassen, a Kleine Gemeinde preacher from Jansen, joined the K.M.B. group.

The K.M.B. Conference counts its first regular session to have been held in 1880, although records were not kept before 1882. It has met annually ever since.

On Sept. 15, 1890, the K.M.B. Conference was granted a charter for the "Industrial School and Hygenic Home for Friendless Persons," an orphans' home which was built just north of the original Gnadenau village site in 1894. It was operated for about 20 years, then was converted into the Salem Home for the Aged and Helpless. In 1918 the K.M.B. group joined with the M.B. group to establish the Salem Hospital in Hillsboro.

In 1886 the K.M.B. Conference opened mission work among the colored people at Elk Park, N.C., the first Mennonite Negro work. The conference has never had a foreign mission board but has supported foreign missionaries at work under other boards. Its Foreign Missions Committee represents the mission interests of the conference. In 1940 the K.M.B. Conference officially joined in the support of Tabor College (M.B. Church) by appointing a member on the Tabor board.

Always deeply religious in nature and emphasizing a deep inner experience, regeneration, assurance of salvation, and holy living, the K.M.B. group has stood for an intensely serious and strict manner of life. The group was very conservative and very slow to make changes in outward forms in dress and in general habits and customs, insisting upon maintaining the customs brought along from Russia and resisting Americanization and worldliness. Clothing was made of good materials but no lace or ornamentation was allowed. For many years the women were not allowed to wear hats to church but wore kerchiefs, shawls, or bonnets on their heads, and always wore white aprons to church. Children were dressed like their parents. The wearing of neckties and detachable collars by the men was banned. Since about 1900, however, the K.M.B. have adopted the common dress of the American community.

In worship the simple older practices were long observed. Musical instruments and choirs were introduced only about 1940. Part singing was long forbidden. Other prohibitions included life insurance, voting at elections other than school elections, taking photographs, and serving on juries. Shunning of excommunicated was practiced. All these practices have now been dropped, although a certain heritage of strictness, earnestness, and warmth characterizes the religious spirit of the group.

In recent years negotiations have been carried on looking toward a merger with the M.B. group on the basis of an overture of 1951 from the M.B. group. These plans were finally dropped at the 1954 conference, but the original Gnadenau congregation withdrew from the K.M.B. Conference in that year and merged with the near-by Lehigh M.B. congregation. But plans have been made for a complete conference merger with the M.B. Conference in July 1957.

Before the Gnadenau withdrawal the 1954 conference statistical report revealed the following membership figures: Kansas, 3 congregations, Gnadenau (1874) 120, Springfield at Lehigh (1902) 90, Zoar (1879) 349; California, 1 congregation, Zion at Dinuba (1911) 262; South Dakota, 5 congregations, Bethel at Yale (1902) 315, Salem at Bridgewater (1886) 222, Emmanuel at Onida (1920) 92, Ebenezer at Doland 105, Bethesda at Huron (1947) 52; Saskatchewan, 2 congregations, Salem at Waldheim (1899) ca. 100, Emmanuel at Langham (1901) 52. The reported membership in the eleven congregations was 1,791. In addition there were nine mission points, not including the work among the Negroes in North Carolina.

D. M. Hofer and J. W. Tschetter were joint founders of the K.M.B. city mission at 2182 Lincoln Ave., Chicago, and also joint publishers of the periodical Der Wahrheitsfreund (q.v.), which served as the conference organ 1915-47. Since then the Christian Witness (1941-) has been the conference organ.

Among the outstanding leaders of the K.M.B. group in the first third of the 20th century were David E. Harder (1872-1930), son of the noted preacher Johann Harder, who has also served on the faculties of three Mennonite colleges: Tabor, Bethel, and Freeman; P. A. Wiebe, D. M. Hofer, and J. W. Tschetter. H. C. Barthel founded and led for many years the first Mennonite mission in China (1901-49), which was largely staffed and supported by the K.M.B. Church, though never officially conducted by the board. H.S.B.

J. A. Wiebe, Das Entstehen der Krimmer Mennoniten Brüder Gemeinde in Süd-Russland im Jahre 1869 (Elkhart, 1905) (7 pp.); P. A. Wiebe, Kurze Biographie des Bruders Jakob A. Wiebe, Seine Jugend, Seine Bekehrung, und wie die Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde gegründet wurde (Hillsboro, 1924) (27 pp.); Friesen, Brüderschaft; Albert Pantle, "Settlement of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren at Gnadenau, Marion County" (Kan.), Kansas Historical Quarterly XIII (1945) 259-85; L. L. Waters, Steel Trails to Santa Fe (Lawrence, Kan., 1950) contains (229-31) an account by Elder Jakob Wiebe of the early years of the Gnadenau village written in Wiebe's old age for A. E. Case of the Santa Fe Railway and deposited in manuscript in the possession of the company; Konstitution der Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde von Nord-Amerika nebst Freibrief (n.p., 1927); Yearbook of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church of North America; Die Geistreiche Lieder-Auswahl für Familien und öffentliche Erbauungen mit Sorgfalt gesammelt von der Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde. Erste Auflage (Elkhart, Ind., Mennonite Publishing Co., 1884); Konferenzbeschlüsse der Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde von Nord-Amerika, zwischen den Jahren 1882 bis 1940 (Inman, Kan.); Bericht über die zwei Beratungen, die am 21. Oct. und 11. Nov. 1895 stattfanden. (Hillsboro, Kan., 1895); Der Wahrheitsfreund contains scattered historical articles (1944, Nos. 13 and 15; 1946, Nos. 9-14 and 18-21; No. 22); ML II, 574 f.

Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Publications Committee was created at the 36th annual conference session, which met in 1915, to meet the need of printing a conference periodical and to supervise conference publications. The Committee is composed of six members elected by the delegates at the annual conference session for a term of three years. The editor of the Conference periodical is usually called in in an advisory capacity for the Publications Committee meetings. The current budget of the Committee is $4,200.00.

Since its establishment the Committee has functioned in publishing the Conference Yearbooks, Articles of Faith, the Constitution, a résumé of Conference recommendations and decisions under the title Konferenzbeschlüsse, and the Conference periodicals, Wahrheitsfreund 1915-47 and Christian Witness 1941- . W.O.E.

Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Publishing House, Chicago, Ill. At their annual session in 1914 the K.M.B. Conference elected a committee and authorized it to proceed in establishing a conference paper and if possible a publishing house to be owned and operated by the Conference. D. M. Hofer and J. W. Tschetter provided the necessary funds for the purchase of a building at 2812 Lincoln Ave., Chicago, and the needed printing equipment, on the condition that a city mission could be conducted in a part of the building housing the publishing activities. The first issue of the K.M.B. Conference paper Der Wahrheitsfreund (q.v.) appeared on July 28, 1915. It was discontinued in 1947 after the Christian Witness (q.v.) had become the official Conference paper. Meanwhile the printing equipment was sold to John H. Klassen and moved to Inman, Kan., where he continued to print for the K.M.B. Conference for several years. M.S.H.

Kripp zu Krippach und Prunberg, Johann Nepomuk von (1821-82), a historian. He was educated at the Gymnasium at Hall and the University at Innsbruck, Tirol, Austria. From 1850 to 1881 he was a teacher of geography and history at the Innsbruck Gymnasium. In connection with the history of his local community he wrote "Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Tirol" (8. Programm des k. k. Staatsgymnasiums zu Innsbruck, Innsbruck, 1857, 3-60). As sources he used manuscripts in the Innsbruck archives and in the Stiftsregistratur in Brixen. By way of introduction he gives a detailed account of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia. E.C.

33. Program des k. k. Staatsgymnasiums zu Innsbruck (1882) 51-53; ML II, 575.

Kristkovo (Christkovo; German, Christfelde) and the neighboring hamlet of Kossovo, situated in the Polish territory of Schwetz (q.v.) near the left bank of the Vistula River, were in the 17th and 18th centuries occupied by Mennonite farmers of Dutch descent. In 1650 the Mennonites of Kristkovo and Kossovo obtained a charter of protection granted them by King Johann II Casimir of Poland. They were granted freedom of religion and the privilege of choosing their own Schulze (magistrate) and conducting their own schools. They also had an economic privilege, permitting them to transport their grain without paying taxes to Danzig, in order to sell it there. A congregation of Kristkovo is not known; these Mennonites may have belonged to a congregation of a neighboring town. (See Przechovka.) vdZ.

F. Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolsche tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 143 f.

Kroeker (Kroecker, Kreker, Kröckert, Krueger, Kröger), a Prussian Mennonite name, first recorded in Tiegenhagen in 1627. The name occurred in the following congregations and communities: Danzig, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, and Königsberg, and from here spread to Poland, Russia, and North and South America. In 1940 there were only about 40 Mennonite bearers of this name in its various forms in East Germany. Outstanding representatives of this name were Isaac Kroeker, elder (1767-87) of the Königsberg Mennonite congregation, Jakob Kroeker, elder of the Elbing Mennonite Church (1808-46), Jakob Kroeker (q.v.) of Russia and Germany, Abraham J. Kroeker (q.v.) of Russia and Mountain Lake, Minn., and M. A. Kroeker, M.B. minister at Mountain Lake and Hillsboro, Kan. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 112.) C.K.

Kroeker, Abraham Jakob (1863-1944), a minister and writer of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in Rosenort, Halbstadt District, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, on Dec. 11, 1863, the son of Jakob and Sarah Wiens Kröker. He received some secondary education by private instruction, and at 17 began his teaching service in Mennonite village schools, 1881-88. He was converted at 19 and joined the M.B. Church. In 1891 he went to Rumania for three years as a missionary. He married Agatha Langemann on Sept. 10, 1892. To them nine children were born. In 1894 he established his home at Spat, Crimea. Here his chief occupation for ten years was farming. He moved to Halbstadt in 1904.

In 1897 Kroeker entered publication work, in part with his cousin, Jakob Kroeker (q.v.). From 1897 to 1918 he published the Christlicher Familien-

Kalender (q.v.), 1900-5 the Christliches Jahrbuch, and 1899-1917 the Christlicher Abreisskalender (q.v.), all of which were widely circulated among Mennonites in Russia as well as in America. From 1903 to 1920 Kroeker edited and published the Friedensstimme, the organ of the M.B. Church in Russia, which had, however, a much wider circle of readers. In 1904 he was one of the founders of Raduga (q.v.), a publishing house at Halbstadt, Molotschna, of which he was manager until 1920.

Kroeker left Russia in 1921, came to America in April 1922, by way of Constantinople, lived in Winnipeg, Man., a year; then moved to Mountain Lake, Minn., his family following in 1924. Here he established and operated a bookstore a number of years and also for some time was joint editor of Der Mithelfer (q.v.) with N. N. Hiebert.

He wrote the following books: Für freie Stunden (Odessa, 1902); Pfarrer Eduard Wüst (Hillsboro, 1903); Meine Flucht (1922), enlarged as Jehova Hilft (Mt. Lake, ca. 1925), English as My Flight from Russia (Scottdale, 1932); Bilder aus Sowiet Russland (Hillsboro, ca. 1922); Unsere Brüder in Not (Striegau, 1930); Auf dunklen Pfaden (Striegau, 1933, in collaboration with a fellow minister); Als die Sterbenden (in collaboration with his daughter Margaret). Meine Flucht and Bilder went through numerous editions. He also compiled and published a revised (1927?) edition of the songbook Heimatklänge, first published in 1889 at Halbstadt, Russia, compiled by Isaak Born.

Kroeker died at Mountain Lake on Nov. 22, 1944, and was buried there. J.H.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; M. Kroeker, Ein reiches Leben (Wüstenrot, 1940); "Abraham J. Kroeker—Writer and Publisher," Menn. Life VII (1952) 165; ML II, 575.

Kroeker, Jakob, a leading Mennonite theologian and writer, b. Oct. 31, 1872, in Gnadental, Molotschna, in South Russia, d. Dec. 12, 1948, near Stuttgart, Germany. After passing the state examination he spent two years as a teacher at a Mennonite school at Menlarstchick, near Spat (Crimea). He was married to Anna Langemann on July 18, 1894. Then he spent four years at the Baptist theological seminary at Hamburg, and upon his return to Russia was ordained preacher and elder by David Schellenberg, Aug. 18, 1898. He and David Dürksen (q.v.) served as traveling evangelists. In 1906 Kroeker settled at Halbstadt; with Abraham Kroeker (q.v.) he published Die Friedensstimme (q.v.), the first Mennonite church paper in Russia, and a widely used Christlicher Abreisskalender (q.v.). He was also one of the founders of Raduga, the first Mennonite publishing concern, and the deaconess home in Halbstadt.

About that time he was deeply impressed by the revivalist Dr. Baedeker and through him made contacts with the flourishing evangelical circles in St. Petersburg, which extended into the circles of the nobility, and with the Alliance movement in Germany and the Baltic states. He attended the Alliance Conference at Blankenburg almost every year, and was a member of its committee. In addition he worked with great success at Bible conferences in Russia, an activity he continued even after he moved to Wernigerode a.H., Germany, in July 1910. This extensive service was interrupted by the first World War.

Now Kroeker devoted himself to theological study, particularly of the Old Testament; the mature fruit of this study is the series Das lebendige Wort, planned to comprise 14 volumes of 400 pages each, eight of which had appeared in 1934. Other smaller works by Kroeker have been published: Allein mit dem Meister; Der verborgene Umgang mit Gott; Gottes Segensträger; Licht von seinem Lichte; Verhüllte Segenswege des Glaubens; Weltstaat und Gottesreich; Vom Heimweh der Seele; and Er sprach zu mir. His Römerbrief-Kommentar Kapitel 1-8, Ein Handkommentar, was published after his death in 1949. Some books went through numerous editions.

In collaboration with Pastor Jack he served Russian prisoners of war in camps through the distribution of Bibles and preaching, and called the missionary society Licht im Osten (q.v.) into being in 1918, which for years educated Russian preachers at a seminary in Wernigerode, gave relief to the needy in Russia, published a missionary paper, Dein Reich komme (q.v.), and conducted an annual conference (Glaubenskonferenz). In addition Kroeker was a speaker at many Bible conferences and recognized as a theologian by leaders of the German, Swiss, and Dutch, Lutheran, Reformed, and free churches. He exerted lasting influence upon the Mennonites of Germany, Switzerland, and North America by his lecture tours.

During World War II the Kroekers celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. After the German collapse they had to leave Wernigerode because it was in the Russian zone. The aging couple and ailing husband found a home near Stuttgart, where he died in 1948. Some of the children have meanwhile emigrated to Canada, while Mrs. Kroeker and some of the children remain in Germany.†
NEFF., C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, pp. 468, 659, and 671; M. Kroeker, Ein reiches Leben (Wüstenrot, 1949); ML II, 576.

Kroeker, Johann F., missionary (GCM) at Janjgir (q.v.) India, was born in Gnadenfeld, Russia. He attended St. Chrischona Bible School, Switzerland, and Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., graduating from the academy in 1899. He married Susanna Schowalter of Mühlhausen, Germany. He, his wife, and the P. A. Penners were the first General Conference missionaries to India, arriving at Bombay on Dec. 9, 1900. The Kroekers opened the mission station at Janjgir, erected the first buildings, organized the school, and opened evangelistic work. Because of ill health they returned to Russia in 1909, where he served as itinerant evangelist of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church among the Mennonites of Siberia. The date of his death is not known. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 708, 718, 149 ff.; Twenty-five Years with God in India (Berne, 1929) 185.

Krohn, Barthold Nikolaus (1722-95), a German Protestant theologian, was employed as a tutor in the home of the Mennonite Hermann Goverts of Hamburg and later became a preacher in the church of St. Mary Magdalene in Hamburg. He is the author of a book titled Geschichte der fanatischen und enthusiastischen Wiedertäufer vornehmlich in Niederdeutschland. Melchior Hofmann und die Secte der Hofmannianer (Leipzig, 1758). The book is based on sound scholarly research and for its time represents a notable achievement. But it has been far overtaken by the writings of M. L. Leendertz and F. O. zur Linden.

Of particular interest is the promise of the author to continue his work in the form of a general history of the Anabaptists and Mennonites in the following series: The second book, Jan Matthys, Jan van Leyden, Johann Theodorici Batenburg, oder die Sekten der aufrührerischen Wiedertäufer und sogenannten Schwerdtgeister in den Niederlanden und in Westphalen; the third book, Ubbo Philipps oder die Sekte der Ubboniten; the fourth book, Menno Simons oder die Sekte der Mennonisten, das ist der wehrlosen und waffenlosen Taufgesinnten in den Niederlanden und in den von ihnen an andere Orte gepflanzten Gemeinen. But he did not get beyond gathering the material. In 1782 he gave his entire collection of manuscript notes to the city library of Hamburg, consisting of 36 volumes folio and 22 volumes quarto. This material was destroyed during World War II. Most of it was taken from Ottius (q.v.). The Amsterdam Mennonite library has a paper by Krohn, copied by A. M. Cramer from the original manuscript, "Allgemeine Geschichte der Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten in den Niederlanden." (ML II, 576.) NEFF.

Kromau, a town (pop. 3,500) in western Moravia, of German and Czech stock. During the Reformation it was the center of the domain of Berthold von Lipa, who also possessed the Göding domain. In both domains he favored Anabaptism, so that several Bruderhofs arose here. By orders from Vienna he was compelled to expel them in 1534; but in 1545, 46 new settlements were made at Kromau, Rackschitz, Schackwitz, Gurdau, Kobelitz, Pavlovitz. During the persecution of 1550 they had much to endure, and some had to leave temporarily, but later were permitted to develop undisturbed. In 1622 the Bruderhofs here suffered severely at the hands of imperial troops; 500 men of the Löbel regiment were quartered in Kromau and Eibenschitz (Ivancice). The confiscated domain became the property of Gundakar von Liechtenstein.

The Bruderhof at Kromau was paid a visit in 1620 by King Frederick of the Palatinate on his way to Brno. He writes about it to his consort on Feb. 6, saying that the Brethren had given him specimens of their artistic products, including a splendid iron bedstead, a quantity of knives, and beautifully stitched gloves; for the queen they had given him very lovely china (see Ceramics); if they were living nearer Prague he would visit them frequently. P.DE.

J. Schmidl, Hist. soc. Jesu prov. Boh. III (Prague, 1754); C. Aretin, Beiträge zur Gesch. der Lit. VII (Munich, 1806); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Communismus; P. Dedic, "Die religiösen und kirchl. Verhältnisse in Mahren," ms.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; ML II, 576.

Kromayer, Hieronymus (1610-70), a German Lutheran theologian, professor at the University of Leipzig, wrote a series of books frequently reprinted on exegetical, dogmatic, and ethical subjects, often quite polemic in nature. In his late years he produced a church history (Ecclesia in politia), which also mentions the Anabaptists and Mennonites, and a Theologia positivo-polemica, which deals in objective order with the controversies of the Lutherans with the Catholics, Calvinists, and Remonstrants, Socinians, Anabaptists, Weigelians, Jews, etc. In 1670, posthumously, his Scrutinium religionum tum falsarum, Paganismi . . . tum unice verae et orthodoxae, Luteranismi was published for the first time. He treats each religion by first presenting it and then refuting it. It is interesting to note that in obviously ascending order he ranks "Catabaptism and Quakerism" immediately after "Paganism, Islam, and Judaism," and before "Weigelianism, Rosicrucianism, Socinianism, Arminianism, Calvinism, Abyssinism, Anatolicism, Papism," and "the only true and orthodox Lutheranism." Of the Quinque Disputationes selectiores, at least the first, De satisfactione Christi (1642), refers once more to the Anabaptists. (ADB XVII; RGG III; ML II, 577.) E.C.

Kromhorn: see Krummhörn.

Krommenie, a town (pop. 7,000) in the Dutch province of North Holland. There were Anabaptists here very early. Dirk Gerritsz van den Busch from the vicinity of Krommenie was burned at the stake as a martyr in The Hague on April 15, 1534. Just as in the neighboring villages, a congregation no doubt was also formed here at Krommenie. Of its history not much is known. It belonged to the Waterlander wing. It is said to have numbered 300 members in 1675, but this may be exaggerated. Already by that time the congregation was rather liberal, most members being under Collegiant (q.v.) influence. On July 22, 1702, many homes were burned down; the church also fell a victim to the flames. In its place a beautiful new frame church was built. It was dedicated on May 17, 1703 (Ascension Day), by C. van Diepenbroek of Haarlem. It is still in use. It has an oak pulpit, old benches and a cabinet organ from the 18th century. The meetinghouse is to be renovated in the near future. In the 18th century the membership decreased. In 1826 it numbered only 73; then it increased: 104 in 1836, 126 in 1861, 197 in 1900, 248 in 1927; from then there has been a decline: 170 in 1955. Since 1923 the pastor of this congregation has been also serving Wormer and Jisp (q.v.). The first minister of Krommenie who was educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary was Jan Walig, serving here 1821-64; he was followed by Jeronimo de Vries 1865-70, J. W. van der Linden 1870-73, J. P. van der Vegte 1874-80, J. de Stoppelaar 1881-85, J. G. Boekenoogen 1885-1922, R. C. de Lange 1923-27, F. Kuiper 1928-32, J. Maarse 1932-47, J. H. Hylkema 1949- . Church activities include a ladies' circle and Sunday school for children.

Krommenie, whose population numbered about 2,000 in 1700, 3,050 in 1867, and about 7,000 in 1957, has always been an industrial town. Formerly it was known for its manufacture of canvas (in 1725 as much as 33,271 pieces); at present it has a number of factories, one of which is the widely known linoleum factory owned by the Mennonite Kaars Sypesteyn (q.v.) family. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, see Index; Kühler, Geschiedenis I. 87, 108; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 708; II, Nos. 2036-38; II 2, Nos. 267, 324; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 194-96; DB 1863, 97; 1883, 72; Contactbrief van de Doopsgez. Gemeente Krommenie, 1953; DJ 1955, 18-20; ML II, 577.

Krommeniedijk, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, was in the earliest times the home of numerous Anabaptists. In 1534 no fewer than 69 persons of this community were accused of "Anabaptism." In that year Jan Dirks Walen (or Walig) and Cornelis Luytgens of Krommeniedijk suffered a martyr's death by burning at The Hague. A congregation was organized here early, belonging to the Waterlander branch, but it always remained small and soon joined the neighboring church at Knollendam (q.v.) in supporting a minister, Simon Kalverboer, who served 1786-1828; in 1804 the two congregations formally merged. The combined congregation had only 14 members at that time. In 1847 a new meetinghouse was built in Krommeniedijk; it acquired an organ in 1897. Services were held here by the Knollendam pastor until 1921, when the building was sold. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I. Nos. 14, 17, 20, 892, 896, 1180; II, 2, Nos. 225, 243; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 108; DJ 1850, 25; DB 1902, 244; 1907, 36 f., 40-42, 72-76; Naamlijst 1806, 68; ML II, 577.

Kromwal was once a Mennonite church in the Dutch province of Friesland. It was a hamlet situated between Witmarsum and Sneek on a high sandy plateau, surrounded at that time by swamps. Here the Anabaptists met at night in the olden times, coming from the neighboring localities; for example, from Hennaard, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized 110 persons. According to the Frisian historian Schotanus, who was born in the vicinity, there was a meetinghouse here as early as 1615. Little is known of the fate of this congregation. When the Frisian Sociëteit was established (1695) it had a membership of 50. In 1835 the number was 65; in 1861, 98. Since Kromwal was no longer the center of the congregation, the members took over a new church and parsonage at Ytens (q.v.) in 1865, and changed their name accordingly. Since 1923 this church has united with Baard (q.v.) for its pastoral service. The area covered by the charge of the minister of Ytens and Baard is the most extensive in the province of Friesland. (See Ytens.) vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, see Index; DJ 1840, 21 f., DB 1864, 75-81; 1865, 161; ML II, 577.

Kronsfeld, a common Mennonite village name transplanted from the Chortitza settlement of South Russia to Canada and South America. The name appeared in the following settlements: Neu-Rosengart, Ukraine; West Reserve, Man.; Cuauhtemoc, Mexico; and Neuland, Paraguay. C.K.

Kronsfeld, a Mennonite village in the Chortitza settlement in South Russia, founded in 1880 by Heinrich Rempel. The first settlers were Johann Rempel, Julius Wall, Jakob Ketler, Heinrich Wall, and Wilhelm Wieler. The lease contract covered a period of 25 years; the rental amounted to about one ruble per acre. In 1900 a school was built. In 1907 the land was purchased through a Farmers' Bank, each settler receiving a farm of 32-37 acres. (ML II, 577.) D.H.E.

Kronsgart Mennonite Brethren Church, near Winkler, Man., had its beginning in 1896 when some members of the Winkler M.B. Church bought farms 8-12 miles northwest of Winkler. The congregation was organized in 1896 with 13 members and Jacob Heide as pastor. J. B. Penner was ordained as minister in 1917. After using schools for meeting places, a church building was erected one-half mile north of the station of Kronsgart. Ministers who have served the congregation were J. Heide, B. Penner, leader, J. J. Buller, P. Shultz, G. Klassen, John J. Neufeld, and A. A. Hyde. The membership in 1955 was 174. The church is a member of the Manitoba Provincial Conference of the M.B. Church. H.H.R.

Kronsthal, a Mennonite village of the Chortitza settlement in the province of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia. When the original Chortitza settlement was founded in 1789-1802, the government purchased an adjacent area of 5,400 acres to be added to it. On this land the village Kronstal was settled in 1809, and at the west end of Kronstal a sister village, Neu-Osterwick, was settled in 1812. The first 12 farmers came from Kronsweide and Rosental. In addition to agriculture the villagers engaged in wagon building and cabinet making, for which there was a good demand. In the first decades crop failures and diseases of the cattle made progress difficult. But gradually the village achieved prosperity, especially in the two decades before World War I. During the Revolution, and especially from Sept. 21 to Dec. 31, 1919, Kronstal suffered just as severely as the other villages at the hands of the Machno robber bands. Most of the stables were robbed of the last colt and the last cow. The Mennonite population at this time was 460. The typhus epidemic brought by the Machno bands attacked 406 persons between November and the following April; 66 died; only 80 did not contract the disease. Two persons were murdered, four died of starvation (1922). By Jan. 1, 1927, a total of 151 Mennonites had emigrated to Canada from here. In 1929-41, 70 persons were exiled and during the outbreak of the war between Germany and Russia (1941) 21 were evacuated eastward. Those remaining were evacuated to Germany (1943), whence some were returned to Russia by the Russian Army and others proceeded to America. (K. Stumpp, Chortitza, Berlin, 1943; ML II, 577 f.) C.K.

Kronsthal, like many village names in Russia, was transplanted to Mennonite settlements in the New World, among them to the West Reserve in Manitoba and to the Hague settlement in Saskatchewan. C.K.

Kronsweide, a village in the Chortitza Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, South Russia, was founded in 1790 by Frisian Mennonites near Einlage, and was first called Alt-Kronsweide (q.v.). Shortage of water compelled its abandonment in 1833; only five or six farmers remained. About four versts away, in a deep valley, Neu-Kronsweide was built, which in the course of 85 years grew into a thriving colony. Here was located the central church of the Kronsweide congregation; a second one was built in Schönsee in 1862. In October 1919, while the revolution was raging, Neu-Kronsweide was destroyed by fire and sword; 14 men were murdered; only the bare walls were left of the church. In 1925 the village began to be slowly rebuilt by returning fugitives, but it was as laborious as 130 years earlier. No village in the Kronsweide congregation suffered so disastrously as Neu-Kronsweide and Andreasfeld (q.v.), which was also wiped out. (ML II, 578.)
D.H.E.

Kronsweide Mennonite Church in the Chortitza settlement of South Russia had its principal church in Neu-Kronsweide; the congregation also met in churches at Schönwiese (q.v.), Kronsgarten (q.v.), and Einlage (q.v.), and in schools in the villages of Insel Chortitza (an island in the Dniepr), Neu-Schönwiese, and Jakovlevo. The Kronsweide Mennonite Church represented the Frisian (q.v.) Mennonites, while the Chortitza Mennonite Church was of Flemish (q.v.) background. The first elder of the congregation was (?) Klassen, who died in 1794. In that year a preacher (or elder?) was chosen at a meeting in charge of Cornelius Warkentin, an elder of the Prussian brotherhood. It is, however, not known who was at the head of the congregation before 1800. Since that time the elders were Heinrich Janzen 1800-24; Jakob Hildebrand (son of Peter Hildebrand, q.v.) 1825-67; Peter Klassen 1867-1902; Jakob Wiebe 1902-7; Johann Klassen 1907-23; Johann Martens, who was chosen in 1924, was exiled in the Ural territory 1930-36, returned and was exiled again in 1938. During this time public worship and religious activities were made impossible.

In 1887 (Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 67 f.) the Kronsweide congregation numbered 750 baptized members and 765 children. Meetinghouses then were found at Neu-Kronsweide and Schönwiese (q.v.), and in all seven villages schools of good quality were being conducted.

In 1905 the Kronsweide Mennonite Church had a population of 1,925, of whom 900 were members. Unser Blatt reported in 1928 that the total population was 860 and the membership was 489. This apparently refers to the Kronsweide congregation and does not include the other Frisian branches. If it does, it would indicate that many of the members had emigrated to Canada. The same statistics reveal that the congregation had five ministers, four ministerial candidates, four deacons, in addition to the Elder Johann Martens. The majority of them had a secondary school training. Of the total congregation, 686 had Zentralschule education, 10 normal training, 52 secondary, and 3 university training.

Of the 80 families of Kronsweide who were taken to Germany by the German army in 1943, some 350 persons were sent back to Russia by the Russian army. (H. Dirks, Statistik, 1905; Unser Blatt III, May 1928, 193.)
J.H.En., C.K.

Kropf, Daniel, an Anabaptist martyr, claimed by the Hutterian Brethren in their songs and chronicles as one of their number.

In 1533, when the persecution of Anabaptists grew more and more severe in Tirol, Austria, many fled into adjacent regions, spreading the movement into new territory. On June 4, 1532, a strict command was sent to Styria to hunt out the Anabaptists who might be there, for it had been reported that several had been seen in the Enns Valley.

But there was no need of orders to Styria. The Lutheran authorities were no less intent than the Catholics on preventing Anabaptist infiltration, and refugee Anabaptists, like Jakob Hutter, went to Moravia instead of Styria. Styrian authorities, however, succeeded in apprehending an outstanding Anabaptist preacher and writer of hymns, Daniel Kropf. All that is known of his life is found in the Geschicht-Buch, p. 48, in an entry of 1534: "Daniel Kropf, a servant of the truth, was seized in Styria at Graz with six others; with the two men he was sentenced to die by the sword, but the four women were drowned. Have testified with their body and life. Of this Daniel there are four songs which he made; also other writings on baptism and other points."

The Märtyrertafel (Geschicht-Buch, 182) also names the seven who testified to their faith with their blood. Of the writings mentioned in the Geschicht-Buch, the only ones known are the songs and his confession of faith, which he composed in prison in the name of his fellow prisoners to present to the council of Graz, and which is here summarized: To know the articles of our faith, for which we have left wife, children, goods, and been imprisoned by you and held and tortured a long time as evildoers. The Apostles' Creed follows, which is nearly identical with the Catholic version, except that the prisoners said. "We believe also, that there is a Christian church, in which the Holy Spirit has His work." He rejects water baptism and infant baptism. Of the communion he says that Christ is present in it figuratively; for those who eat of the Lord's bread and drink the cup, and thereby proclaim the Lord's death with humble thanksgiving and in faith of the body and blood of Christ. We do not believe like Antichrist (the pope), who with his following has desecrated the Lord's Supper and thinks he has conjured the physical Christ into the bread. In water baptism we see only a symbol of the bond which unites God with man through Christ. Salvation cannot lie therein, for it does not "stand in baptism," but alone in faith in Him whom God has sent. Herein the Antichrist has taken the liberty of mingling poison with His word.

Only three of the four songs mentioned by the Geschicht-Buch are known; they are printed in Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (pp. 59-67). One song of 26 stanzas forms an acrostic of his name, thus identifying him as the author. It begins, "Das Himmelreich sich nahet, freut euch, ihr Christen, sehr." The second song begins, "Wer da christlich leben will, der heb' sich auf, setz ihm (sich) kein Ziel." It is a didactic poem of 33 stanzas with five lines in each. The last song, 19 stanzas of eight lines each, begins, "Wohl auf, O Gott vom Himmel, schweig jetzt nicht länger still"; it laments the sorrows the people of God now suffer. "Herr, stärk Herz und Sinnen dem armen Häuflein klein." LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 48; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); J. Loserth, "Die Wiedertäufer in Steiermark," in Mitteilungen des hist. Vereins für Steiermark, No. 42, pp. 142 ff.; ML II, 578 f. Kropf's confession of faith is found in Codex 190 at Bratislava (Pressburg) in a copy made by Beck in the archives at Brno.

Krufft, Heinrich (von), a capmaker, a preacher of the Anabaptists at Cologne (q.v.). As early as 1560 the council of this city had learned that the Anabaptists numbered 40, and that their head was Heinrich Krufft, "a small squat man, who also dispenses baptism outside the city." Little is known of him; nothing concerning his death. His wife, Anna Derenbach, was expelled from Cologne in August 1565. Perhaps he is identical with Johann Krufft, who was baptized in the fall of 1534, by Gerhard (or Arnold) Westerburg. Ludwig Keller surmises that he is Pastor Johann at Rodenkirchen (Rembert, 475, note 1). Heinrich Krufft was a close friend of Matthias Servaes (q.v.). With him he traveled to München-Gladbach, preaching and baptizing. Servaes wrote him two letters from prison. Heinrich Krufft wrote two songs: "Herr Gott, ich muss nun klagen," and "Hinweg ist mit genommen," which name him acrostically. (Wolkan, Lieder, 100; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 475 ff.; ML II, 579.) NEFF.

Kruikjes, bij de (at the jugs, i.e., near a house where the stone tablet in the facade showed six jars or stone bottles), name of a Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, Holland, belonging to the Old Flemish branch, also called "Huiskopers" (q.v.), or "Dantsikers" (Danzig Old Flemish), meeting here from 1620 to 1788. They merged with the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation on Jan. 1, 1789. The last preachers of the congregation "bij de Kruikjes," Cornelis Focking, serving after 1767 (d. 1791), Jan Christiaan Sepp (q.v.) after 1781 (d. 1811), Abraham Tieleman after 1786 (d. 1820), became the preachers of the Zonist congregation at the time of merging. Before this congregation began to meet here in 1620, this meetinghouse had apparently been used by another Old Flemish congregation from 1586 on. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 117-30; Naamlijst 1789, 57 f.) vdZ.

Krumau: see Kromau.

Krummhörn (Dutch, Kromhorn) is a district of East Friesland, Germany, located northwest of Emden (q.v.), between Emden and Greetsiel west of the line Emden-Wirdum, which in former times had a large Anabaptist-Mennonite population. In 1551-61 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized in the village of Wirdum (1 baptism, 3 baptismal candidates), Hinte (1 baptism), Groothausen (1 baptism, 2 candidates), and especially in Hamswehrum (3 baptisms, 9 candidates), making a total of 6 baptisms and 15 baptismal candidates. In 1563-65 he baptized in Wirdum (5 baptisms, 28 candidates), Woquard (1 baptism, 2 candidates), Wybelsum (4 baptisms, 9 candidates), and Pewsum (3 baptisms, 5 candidates), a total of 13 baptisms and 44 candidates. In 1633 there were in the Krummhörn, from north to south along the west bank, the following numbers of families: Greetsiel 1, Hauen 4, Pilsum 3, Manslagt 1, Groothusen 5, Hamswehrum 9, Upleward 3, and Heiselhusen 1; further inland, Wirdum 2, Visquard 1, Eilsum 5, Dykhausen 2, and Syhlmönken 2.

In 1622 the separation of the Groningen Old Flemish under the influence of Uko Walles (q.v.) becomes stronger here. In the newly reclaimed land at Wirdum lived Abraham Nannings, the preacher of the Eilsum congregation, which met in the home of Rottger Rolef. He had at first been of a different mind, but was later rebaptized in the Dutch province of Groningen. He officiated at marriages, but for baptism an elder came from Leer, and after this elder's death, someone from Groningen. All the Mennonites registered in the Greetsiel area had probably been rebaptized in the previous decade. In official questionings the authorities sought information concerning the relations with other Mennonite groups and concerning any proselytizing in the recognized churches. Nannings replied by referring to their letter of protection.

In the following 125 years the trend to the city became effective among the Mennonites. In 1769 there were in Eilsum 3 baptized members, in Greetsiel 5, and in Wirdum 1; they united at that time with the larger Norden congregation. In the following years the preacher of Norden held three or four sermons annually at Krummhörn until there were no members left (about 1780). The Naamlijst does not mention Krummhörn (Kromhorn) in 1731 ff. E.C.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Friesland I; J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland vom 16. biz zum 18. Jahrhundert (Emden and Borkum-Amsterdam, 1887); Leonardus Hesta, "De laatste bladzijde van de geschiedenis der oud-vlaamsche gemeente te Norden," DB 1895, 74-100, especially 82, 85, 88; ML II, 577.

Krüsi, Johannes, one of the first martyrs of the Anabaptist movement. Concerning his life and work little is known. In the middle of 1525 he was arrested in St. Gall, but released upon oath not to return to the city (see St. Gall). In the canton of Appenzell he won the Reformed congregation at Teusen to himself. In the abbey of St. Gall he also had some success; but all evangelization was forbidden him by a decision of the four protectorates of the abbey (Zurich, Lucerne, Schwyz, and Glarus). The abbot Franz von Gaisberg gave orders to seize every Anabaptist who came into his realm preaching (Götzinger, 407). On June 3, 1525, Krüsi was still preaching in the vicinity of Tablat; when the magistrate and his servants ordered him to stop preaching, the large crowd listening protested (Eidgenössische Abschiede). Krüsi was soon afterward seized at night in bed in his native town, St. Georgen, and was later taken secretly (as Kessler says, contrary to custom) to Lucerne. The council of Lucerne asked St. Gall for instructions on Aug. 11, 1525, relating what was reported about him, that Krüsi urged disobedience to the government, rejected infant baptism, advocated adult baptism and community of goods, rejected the holy Sacrament, instead of which he invented the breaking of bread and observed it in his own way (Strickler, 399).

The reply from St. Gall seems to have been lost. Krüsi was condemned to death at the stake, and was put to death in 1525 (Kessler). He was the second blood witness of the Swiss Brethren known by name. The first martyr was Eberli Bolt (q.v.), who was burned at the stake in Schwyz on May 29, 1525.

Some later historiographers have confused Johannes Krüsi with Anton Kürsiner of Schwyz (or Roggenach; see Zwingliana I, 139); Nitsche (64) considers the two to be the same person (see also Egli, 26, who states that Krüsi was also called Hans Kern of Klingnau).

In Teufen the Anabaptists persisted for some time after Krüsi's death. About Christmas 1528 an Anabaptist council was held here, attended by representatives of other countries (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 64). Not much is known about it, but it seems to have been held for the purpose of purging the brotherhood of impure elements. One of the visitors was Augustine Bader (q.v.), whose fantastic ideas were rejected by the hundred or more representatives at the council, whereupon he left the brotherhood and went his own way. Teufen seems to have been important in the further history of the Swiss Brethren. In November 1529 the Appenzell clergy, including Walter Klarer and Matthias Kessler, held a disputation with the Swiss Brethren here (Zwingliana I, 367; IV, 58). HEGE.

H. Bullinger, Ref.-Gesch. I (Frauenfeld, 1838); E. Götzinger, Joachim v. Watt: Deutsche Historische Schriften II (St. Gall, 1877); J. Kessler, Sabbata (St. Gall, 1902); R. Nitsche, Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in der Schweiz (Einsiedeln, 1885); J. Strickler, Aktensammlung zur Schweiz. Ref.-Gesch. I (Zürich, 1878); idem, Eidgenossische Abschiede IV, Part Ia (1873) 672, 692, 705, 734; ML II, 579 f.

Kruydt-Hofken, a Dutch hymnbook: see Gheestelijck Kruydt-Hofken.

Kuban, a Mennonite settlement in the Kuban district of the Northern Caucasus, Russia, on the Kuban River, which flows from the east into the Black Sea. This region had previously been inhabited by Nogais, who had emigrated to Turkey. In connection with the organization of the Mennonite Brethren in the parent settlements, the Mennonites in the Molotschna and Chortitza requested an additional grant of 17,500 acres of the government, through Johann Claassen (q.v.) of Liebenau, for a new settlement on the Kuban. On this tract the villages Wohldemfürst (later Velikoknyazheskoye) and Alexanderfeld (later Alexandrodar) were founded in 1862 and 1866. In 1866 the settlement, which throughout its brief history consisted predominantly of Mennonite Brethren, had its Mennonite privileges confirmed.

The early settlement was confronted with serious difficulties. Only 67 of the 100 families for whom land had been granted settled there by 1866. In part the difficulties were internal, caused by Templers (q.v.) and Adventists (q.v.), and were removed to a large extent when these elements withdrew. Then there were also economic difficulties. From the neighboring natives (Tatars, Circassians) with their primitive methods, they could get no help in agriculture. They had to learn by trial and error; gradually cattle raising and fruit culture proved most successful. There was a ready market for the Mennonite bred Red cow; and horses were bought by the army.

Fruit culture was brought to an even higher state of development. Well-developed nurseries distributed millions of improved strains of fruit trees, berries, and ornamental trees. Industry related to these occupations was also thriving: there were two factories which made farm implements, mills of various kinds, and stores. There was a co-operative for cheese making and grape growers (since 1890), a credit union, a grain storage elevator, and an association of consumers.

In 1910 there were ten landless day laborers, 150 landless craftsmen and factory workers, eight small farms, 22 half farms and 57 full farms; the owners of the full farms often owned several; and 15 owners of larger farms outside the settlement, who kept their connection with the villages by owning land there too.

Intellectual and spiritual life were also maintained on a high level. Their schools with eight-year courses (ages 7-15) and excellent teachers, were unique for their high standards even among the Mennonites. In addition there was a music club, which owned a hall, and a library club. Each wing had its own church, Mennonite Church (see Wohldemfürst-Alexandrodar Mennonite Church), Mennonite Brethren, and the Jerusalemsfreunde. All Mennonite groups had their own volost administration in Velikoknyazheskaye; here the district administrative center common to all groups was also located.

The settlement achieved great prosperity. The outstanding success of the Mennonites in the Kuban in the fields of pedagogy and agriculture was repeatedly given recognition by the Czarist government, even to the extent of granting titles of personal nobility, more than in any other Mennonite settlement. "The Kubans were unusual workers" and "savers." Here the "intelligent village," "the combination of intellectual and physical work," the ideal of the sociologists, became a reality. Their highly developed economic system was destroyed by Communism, through no fault of their own. The number of Mennonites in the Kuban in 1904 was about 2,000 (Friesen, 455); in 1914 it had declined to 1,500, and in 1926 to 1,400 (Ehrt, 78 and 152).

During the Revolution the settlement suffered like the others. A small group left the Kuban for Canada in 1924-25. During the following years many were exiled, particularly 1937-38. Gradually the settlement disintegrated. During the Russo-German War (1941) all remaining Mennonites were sent to Kazakhstan. A few refugees who had escaped to the Ukraine have reached Canada. T.B.

A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland; Friesen, Brüderschaft; K. Lindmann, Von den deutschen Kolonisten in Russland (Stuttgart, 1924); Die Kubaner Ansiedlung (North Kildonan, 1953); ML II, 580.

Kudus (Koedoes) is the largest city (1954 pop. 55,000) of the former Dutch Mennonite mission field in Java, Indonesia; the population in 1930 was distributed as follows: 43,697 Javanese, 4,386 Chinese, 180 Arabians and other Asians, and 381 Europeans. Kudus is the government center of the province, covering 295 sq. miles, and comprising 147 villages, total population (1930) 305,942. The principal industry is the manufacture of cigarettes. The native population is Mohammedan.

The interest of the mission turned to Kudus when work in the city of Japara seemed unfruitful, and work was opened in the villages. Some Chinese, who had been converted by the Salvation Army, refused the oath of citizenship, and as a result of Bible study desired to be baptized. Since Kaju-Apu was then unoccupied, they called N. Thiessen, stationed at Margaredjo, to baptize them. This was the beginning of a revival that soon reached the villages of Tandjung and Majong. At Kudus, Tandjung, and Majong mission schools were opened in the Malayan language, but could not long be maintained because of the increasing demand for schools using the Dutch language.

In 1921, after Johann Fast returned to Kaju-Apu from Europe, there were 49 baptized Chinese in Kudus. Besides the missionary, a native Christian, Tee Siem Tat, did much to develop the congregation. It was incorporated in 1927, and in the same year Tee Siem Tat received permission from the Dutch colonial government to preach and establish churches. The church, with a membership of about 200, became independent of the mission. In 1928 it built its own meetinghouse. To the subsidiary congregations in Tandjung and Majong a third was added in Japara. When new missionaries came to Kaju-Apu, it was decided that Hermann Schmitt should locate in the city of Kudus (Jaaresverslag, 1928, 17).

The mission work in Kudus consisted of evangelization, colportage, and a school. Evangelization and pastoral care were in the hands of the pastor and a native helper for Kudus and its subsidiary, Pendo-Rabajan, which came into being in 1931 chiefly through colportage. The combined membership at the end of 1932 was 51, besides 34 children. Services were attended by an average of 59 persons. From Kudus as a center other stations were served: Kaju-Apu (q.v.); Pati (q.v.), a city 15 miles from Kudus, with a native helper (Albonese) and 28 baptized members and 30 children, and an average attendance of 62. The hospital at Kelet (q.v.) also belonged to the Kudus field. Kudus was the colportage center for the entire field. There were five colporteurs who sold about 200 Bibles a month and distributed more than 1,000 tracts.

The Dutch language school for Chinese children was built in 1924 by Fast and his niece, Miss Jansz. In 1927 its enrollment was 57. In 1932, when Tjen A. Kwoei from the Mennonite Brethren mission in Surinam was made head of this school, it increased to 160 pupils, with several additional teachers. Besides the Chinese, Javanese children also attended this school. It was the only Christian school of its kind on the Mennonite field, preparing for secondary schools, and was therefore of great importance to the community.

The small Javanese congregation of Kudus was until 1940 conducted by Hermann Schmitt (q.v.) and some native assistant preachers and teachers. On Nov. 24, 1940, the congregation became independent. Then Sastroadi became its preacher. In 1949 the total membership of this Javanese congregation numbered 78 baptized and 63 children, in 1955, 130 and 150.

In Kudus there is also a Chinese Mennonite congregation with a membership in 1955 of about 450. Tan King Ien is its pastor. (ML II, 516 f.)
H.Sc., vdZ.

Kuesen, Cathrijn, an Anabaptist martyr: see Trijnken Keuts.

Kufstein (Kofstein), a city (pop. 11,844) in the Inn Valley of Tirol, Austria, played an outstanding role in Anabaptist history. The number of executions was given as 16 in the record of 1581, placing it fourth among the 13 towns and villages of the valley.

Leonhard Schiemer's writings indicate that there were Anabaptists in Kufstein as early as 1527. Three are named in 1528: the knifesmith's wife, Jörg Held, and his wife. In spite of all the harshness of the suppressive mandates and the vigor of their application there were Anabaptists in and around Kufstein in 1529-30; the bloody trial of Georg Grünwald (q.v.) and 15 other Anabaptists was brought to its conclusion here. The teacher of these persons, the former chaplain of Kitzbühel, Jakob Portzner, escaped with his life by recantation. Anabaptists who fled lost their property by confiscation; among these were Wolfgang of Elmau, Michael of Weissenbach, Lienhard Hofer, and Paul Frauenhofer.

The mandates brought results. In June 1533 the government reported to the king "that in the three domains of Rattenberg, Kufstein, and Kitzbühel no one is known to be contaminated with Anabaptism, or that it is making inroads," welcome news to Ferdinand, who had just sent further admonitions to the archbishop of Salzburg to wipe out the Anabaptists at Kufstein.

Since Hutter's death in 1536 there had indeed been a weakening in Anabaptist propaganda, but it was by no means extinguished. In 1540 "Black Lindl" of the Puster Valley lay in prison at Kufstein. Special care was taken to apprehend the Anabaptists traveling up and down the Inn to Krems (q.v.) en route to Moravia. When a group of these was imprisoned in Wasserburg, the judge of Kufstein was told the boatmen should also have been arrested.

In later decades there is only occasional reference to Anabaptists in Kufstein; in 1577 caution is again urged to prevent their traveling down the river to go to Moravia, and an order was issued on June 10, 1578, strictly forbidding the transport of Anabaptists on the river. As at the turn of the century the situation of the Anabaptists in Moravia also became precarious, immigration from the Inn became less frequent, and finally stopped. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 581.

Kühbörncheshof, a Mennonite church in the northwest of the Rhenish Palatinate, Germany, which is united with Zweibrücken (q.v.), Kaiserslautern (q.v.), and Saarland (q.v.) into a single congregational circuit.

The estate where once "a pure wilderness" reigned was returned to agriculture by Hans Heinrich Latscha, a Swiss Mennonite refugee. In 1717 Latscha acquired 220 acres of field and woods from the Palatine government, for which he paid an initial sum of 85 florins, and a rental of eight malters of oats to the secretariat at Kaiserslautern, in addition to eight florins as an annual fee. He had as capital four oxen, two cows, and two steers (Karlsruher Generallandesarchiv Akten: Mennoniten-Verzeichnis). Johannes Risser (Menn. Bl., 1855, 50) states that Latscha and his wife Maria came from Maasmünster in Upper Alsace in 1715. The Latscha family has remained on the farm to the present. Other Mennonite families, for instance, Rink, settled there too.

The neighboring Stockborn was also settled by Mennonites; especially the Koller family is represented here. A record of Jan. 27, 1727, shows that the inhabitants of Kühbörncheshof were permitted by the government to have private worship services. They joined the Sembach congregation and in spite of the great distance, did not form an independent congregation until 1832, when the new chapel was dedicated (Gem.-Kal., 1901, 108 with picture). Their first preacher was Heinrich Koller (1832-46), who until then had served the Sembach congregation. On May 10, 1852, a conference was held at the Kühbörncheshof, which passed a resolution to publish and use the Pfälzisch-hessisches Formularbuch.

In 1802, according to Frey's Statistik der Pfalz, there were in Erfenbach 16 Mennonites, Stockborn 7, Rodenbach 12, Kühbörncheshof 28, and Otterbach 7; in 1834, Stockborn 36, Trippstadt 37, Weilerbach 15, Kühbörncheshof 48. In 1934 there were on the Kühbörncheshof 11 families with 53 souls; Stockborn 7 families with 35, Olsbrücken 2 families with 6, Horterhof 2 families with 8 (the register of 1752 lists Jakob Borckholder at Horterhof with 7 members in the family), Schallodenbach one family with 13, Kottweiler one family with 11, Rodenbach one family with 3, Oberstaufenbach one family with 4, Katzweiler 2 persons: a total of 26 families with 128 souls.

In 1878 Kühbörncheshof was united into a single preaching charge with Ernstweiler and Neudorferhof, called Kaiserslautern (q.v.). The last lay preacher of Kühbörncheshof was Jakob Rinck (d. 1891), who served until 1877. The first salaried minister (after the union) was Samuel Blickensdörfer, who served 1878-80. He was followed by Abraham Hirschler 1880-1931, Abraham Harder 1931-37, Hugo Scheffler 1937-51, and Theo Hotel 1951- . In 1954 the Kaiserslautern circuit consisted of the congregations of Zweibrücken and Saarland, in addition to Kaiserslautern and Kühbörncheshof. The 1954 membership of Kühbörncheshof was 159 baptized, plus 56 children. The congregation is a member of the Vereinigung of Mennonite Churches in Germany, the Palatine-Hessian Conference, and the Conference of South German Mennonites. (ML II, 581 f.) NEFF.

Kühler, Wilhelmus Johannes (1874-1946), a Dutch Mennonite church historian, professor at the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam and the University of Amsterdam, was born at Amsterdam on Dec. 8, 1874. Like his cousin Karel Vos (q.v.) he was descended on his mother's side from the Wybrands family, which had already produced two Mennonite church historians (Aemilius Willem and Christiaan Nicolaas). His father, Paulus Frans Kühler, a businessman of Amsterdam, was a member of the Walloon Reformed Church. W. J. Kühler was educated at the Amsterdam seminary and university, studying under Samuel Cramer (q.v.) and I. J. de Bussy (q.v.) in 1892-97.

In 1897 W. J. Kühler entered his first position as a minister, serving the Terschelling (q.v.) congregation until 1902, when he accepted a call to the congregation of Meppel-Assen in the province of Drente, and in 1905 to the Leiden congregation. He made use of the facilities of the University of Leiden for research into history, and in 1906 published in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen an article on Het Offer des Heeren (q.v.), the oldest Dutch martyrbook, which had just been republished. He had previously published studies in the Theologisch Tijdschrift on the Confessio Tetrapolitana and on D. R. Camphuyzen.

Then Kühler turned his attention to the Middle Ages, especially G. Groote and his following. He published an article, "De prediking van Geert Groote," in Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift. Then he made himself responsible for the publication of Horn's Vita Gerardi Magni (Archief voor Kerkgeschiendenis) and the Biographien van devote zusters te Deventer (Archief voor de geschiedenis van het Aartsbisdom Utrecht). In further research he discovered that the Vita Gerardi Magni was not an original work by Thomas à Kempis, but was a propagandistic excerpt from an older work, which was then intentionally destroyed. His chief contribution in this field was his dissertation, Johannes Brinckerinck en zijn klooster te Diepenveen (Rotterdam, 1908). This study was very favorably received, also by Catholic scholars. Hensen, who later became the director of the Dutch Historical Institute at Rome, wrote, "I know of no Protestant writer who has penetrated so deeply into delicately developed Catholic religious life." Kühler's next important work was Het Socinianisme in Nederland (1912), which includes the relations between Socinianism and the Dutch Mennonites in the 16th-18th centuries.

When Samuel Cramer retired from his professorship at the Mennonite Seminary, W. J. Kühler succeeded him on Sept. 1, 1912, in Mennonitica and practical theology and on Feb. 10, 1913, in church history at the University of Amsterdam. His installation lecture was on "De beteekenis der Dissenters in de Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland." In 1913 he also became the librarian of the Mennonite Library of Amsterdam; with great care he had many of the old unbound books bound in bindings suited to the age of the book. In 1916 he became the editor of the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, which he was unfortunately unable to publish beyond 1919.

In addition to several minor studies, Kühler now devoted more and more interest to the history of the Dutch Mennonites. The church history written by Blaupot ten Cate having become antiquated, Kühler published the first volume of his painstaking history, based on the sources, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (Amsterdam, 1932).

In 1940 Kühler published at Haarlem the first part of the second volume of his lifework, entitled Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden in Nederland, Tweede helft 1600-1735, eerste helft. When he died only one chapter of the sequel was ready. This was printed under the title Gemeentelijk Leven (Haarlem, 1950), followed by a biography of Kühler by Chr. P. van Eeghen. In the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen Kühler published the following papers: "Gesprek met Menno" (1905), Het Offer des Heeren (1906), "Het vrouwtje van Gouda," a short story (1907), "S. Cramer," a biography (1916), "De strijd om de belijdenis in de vereenigde Vlaamsche, Friesche en Hoogduitsche gemeente te Utrecht" (1916), "De vier tijdvakken van de geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland" (1917), "De oprichting der Amsterdamsche Kweekschool in 1735" (1918), and "Het Nederlandsche Anabaptisme en de revolutionnaire woelingen der zestiende eeuw" (1919). Mention should be made besides of a large number of articles in the field of Mennonite history published in De Zondagsbode, and also of his important paper, "Het Anabaptisme in Nederland" in De Gids (1921), in which he defended the peaceful character of Anabaptism in the Netherlands against the views of Karel Vos.

W. J. Kühler's son Paulus F. Kühler has been a treasurer of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite General Conference) since 1951. C.K.

Biographical sketch of W. J. Kühler by Chr. P. van Eeghen, in Kühler's Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde in Nederland; DB 1912, 201, Verslag A.D.S. 1944, 16; Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad 1946, Nos. 7 and 8; DJ 1949, 38 f.; ML II, 582.

Kuhn (Kaumuff, Khumbauf), Blasius (Blasy), was one of the early Anabaptist preachers of the bishopric of Speyer on the right side of the Rhine and in adjacent regions. When persecution grew more violent he led the group around Bruchsal (q.v.) and Bretten, which had gained about 500 adherents by 1530 and 1531, to Auspitz (q.v.) in Moravia. (ML II, 582.) HEGE.

Kühn, Johannes, author of Toleranz und Offenbarung, eine Untersuchung der Motive der Toleranz im offenbarungsgläubigen Protestantismus (Leipzig, 1923, 473 p.), perhaps the first book to present an adequate and fair interpretation of Anabaptism in general. Kühn posed the question of the motivation of the different denominations within Protestantism which accept the revelation of the Holy Scripture as the final authority (offenbarungsgläubig is his term) for toleration or the opposite. In this field the book is a valuable contribution to the history of ideas in the 16th and 17th centuries. Kühn discovered that the groups were by no means uniform in their spiritual attitudes, and thus he had to develop a typology of his own to make the attitudes for or against freedom of conscience understandable. He was of course familiar with the typology of Troeltsch (church and sect) and the latter's term "spiritual reformers," and F. Heiler's typology of prophetic and mystical religion; but he found such a condensation into polar groups wanting in the face of the many-sidedness of the real history of ideas. Thus he developed a five-point typology which surprised many but which is fairly generally accepted today.

Kühn proposes five types: (1) the prophetically preached religion of revelation, Martin Luther being an example. The Word of God has been revealed to us, hence we have but to preach it (verkündigen) and cannot permit any deviation from it. No room is left for effective toleration (except in the private sphere of unspoken thoughts). (2) The spiritualistic motive (this term Kühn borrowed from Troeltsch). As an example Schwenckfeld is named, and for the Anglo-Saxon world Roger Williams, the Baptists, Congregationalists, and John Milton (whom Kühn describes as half way between Luther and the rational idealists of type 5). This type of Protestantism has no objective (formulated) creed; it believes in a "concrete" spiritualism and in figurative interpretation of the Scriptures. The church concept is accordingly loose and without much obligatory discipline. (3) The motive of Anabaptist discipleship (täuferische Nachfolge), where the teachings of Jesus and His message of the kingdom overshadow the doctrinal formulations of Paul. Two representatives are discussed: the Anabaptists for Central Europe, and the Quakers for the Anglo-Saxon world. Both emphasize the intention of active sonship of God (tätige Gotteskindschaft) which issues in a sacred communal life (heiliges Gemeinschaftsleben). The two great symbols of such a discipleship Christianity are (a) love and (b) the cross. For the Anabaptists the cross (i.e., the suffering church) is almost more significant than love since the principle of separation from the world restricts the latter to their own group. Quakers, who are more open to the world, do not emphasize the cross so much (although they knew it only too well in the 17th century) but prefer to teach love in action. It implies also toleration, as the church concept is one of voluntary association (Freiwilligkeitskirche).

Kühn effectively defends the Anabaptists against the reproach of "legalism" and stresses their Biblical concreteness, namely, to actually live the way which Jesus has shown. Here the difference from the basic theological structure of the great reformers becomes particularly evident (224). Love assumes the connotation of nonresistance and nonvengeance; faith is considered a free gift of grace which cannot be constrained (hence liberty of conscience). The fight for the kingdom of God is exclusively done with the "sword of the spirit."

It was not until 20 years later that H. S. Bender introduced the idea of discipleship into the discussion of the essence of Anabaptism again; since that time it has become more and more evident that this is perhaps the most adequate interpretation of the spirit of Anabaptism which can be formulated. To be sure, however, it does not yet exhaust the theological basis of this orientation.

(4) The next type is the mystical form of Biblical Protestantism. Actually and strangely, there are very few mystics within Protestantism (over against Catholicism). Apparently Protestantism does not lend itself easily to this type. Kühn discusses as an example David Joris (was he really a mystic?) and Jacob Boehme (in whom, incidentally, Rufus M. Jones recognizes a forerunner of Quakerism). In Joris the motives are rather mixed but the idea of dying (to the world) and resurrection (to celestial vision) is present in any case. The final unio mystica with the divine is the very goal of all meditation. This type of Christianity dissolves to a large extent the idea of Scriptural revelation (over against the spiritual reformers), and is little interested in group or church life, thus working strongly for individualism.

(5) The last type: ethical and rational religion, actually a form of Christian "idealism" (or, in the 19th century, liberal Protestantism), has finally lost all concreteness of the Scriptural revelation, reducing Christianity to a sort of ethical reasonableness or humanism. It is a cool and intellectual affair with Sebastian Castellio (Switzerland) and Arminius (Netherlands) of the 16th century, and with Hugo Grotius and Chillingworth of the 17th century, and similar forerunners of rationalism and enlightenment as examples. Strangely enough Kühn includes in this type also Philipp Spener, the "father of Pietism," known for his emphasis upon emotional inwardness and subjectivism. But a finer analysis proves that his roots were of the same kind; revelation is now dissolved (hence toleration promoted) and emphasis is shifted to the ethical aspect.

Needless to say, this typology, like all other typologies, is not always fitting. Historic realities do not exactly match given categories, and most persons and movements cut across different types. Also the concept of the "spirit" within the many Christian groups of modern times is oscillating and many sided. Still, a framework like the one described helps much toward a clearer picture of the development of ideas, and in particular its interpretation of Anabaptism may be called new and highly acceptable. R.F.

Kuhr (Gor), Joseph, a Hutterite preacher at Alwinc (q.v.) in Transylvania during the reign of Maria Theresa, and the leader of the group which in the face of severe persecution and augmented by the refugees from Carinthia fled to Walachia (q.v.) and thence to Vishenka (q.v.) in Russia; in Walachia he was chosen as head of the brotherhood, serving thus 1779-94.

From the pen of his successor, the historiographer Johannes Waldner (1749-1824), we learn many facts concerning the unparalleled energy of this man, who saved this Alwinc and Carinthian group from threatening extinction and led it to great prosperity in Russia. Before they left he was ill six months of the plague, which killed many of the Brethren at Alwinc and took its toll in his own family. On Aug. 15, 1774, he was chosen as a preacher and confirmed the following year.

In 1762 began the struggle of the Transylvanian authorities to compel the Hutterian Brethren to sacrifice their faith. Only the leaders were to be banished from the country. Their chief opponent was the Jesuit Delpini (called "Delphini" in the chronicles), who placed himself at the disposal of the government for this very purpose. An imperial mandate was issued in 1762, that the Brethren would be tolerated in the country only on the condition that they would abandon their faith and join one of the three established churches. The Brethren replied that they preferred to leave, but the government refused to permit this, insisting on conversion instead.

The initial steps were taken by the Catholic bishop; if they would not comply voluntarily, they would be forced to do so. Kuhr undertook to defend the Hutterites before the bishop. In the spring of 1763, the government had Kuhr and the head of the brotherhood imprisoned; but in September they were released.

Six weeks later Delpini appeared, and made daily visits among the Brethren. First they had to give up their books. Then the elder, Mertl Roth, and the brotherhood were officially ordered to transfer to the Catholic faith. He, Delpini, would instruct them. On Sunday Delpini came to their chapel and preached on John 16: "I have yet many things to say unto you." At the close of the sermon he asked how they had liked his sermon. All were silent. Kuhr arose and said: "What you have said from the Gospel I know as well as you do; what you have said about the many saints I do not believe; and what you said about the Jesuit who moved a mountain is a Jesuit lie. The meaning of this part of the Gospel is quite different: Jesus means the rulers of the world, who like a mountain stand in the way of the truth, they shall be moved by the firm faith of the God-fearing." Then began an argument on infant baptism, in which Kuhr refuted Delpini. "You have made no Catholic of me," said Kuhr in conclusion.

But what followed was ominous. When the Jesuit rose to go, Kuhr cried out that he would not attend any more of his sermons: "He who still calls himself a brother or sister, let him decide to follow me!" But not a person, not even his son, went. Not a person, not even an elder, said a single word against the Jesuit. But the Jesuit, meeting Kuhr on the street, said, "Just wait; I'll teach you!" Kuhr replied, "You can teach me nothing; you can not do more to me than God permits."

Delpini recognized that if he was to achieve his end he must render Kuhr innocuous. Kuhr was imprisoned in Klausenburg three years. Continued attempts were made to convert him, but to no avail. Waldner repeats some of the conversations between Kuhr and his adversaries, and they are indeed evidence of courage and talent. "He did not find it difficult to forsake his wealth and worldly possessions . . . yea, even his children for Christ's sake, for he loved God above all things." After three years he was released. He was asked to promise not to escape. "I am not a rogue nor an evildoer, and will await what God sends me."

The resistance of the Alwinc Anabaptists grew weaker. Mertl Roth, the elder of the group, was persuaded to recant, and the others followed. Roth's excuse for his step was, "We do not observe our faith right, and community of goods has disappeared. Even if we resist a long time, we must finally become Catholic. God may still turn the tide; a war may come, and then we may live for our faith under another government."

Kuhr proved that a brotherhood does not have to perish unless it gives itself up. Kuhr made an essential contribution, not only in the fact that the Hutterian Brethren still exist, but also that they are growing and thriving. He organized the resistance and persuaded the brethren who still had a spark of resistance in them to flee from Alwinc to Kreuz, where with the help of the Carinthian emigrees a new brotherhood was set up in the old spirit, in which Kuhr was the active ferment. With him went Johannes Stahl with wife and four children, Anna Wipf with five children, Jakob Stutz with his mother, a weaver named Joseph with his mother, and Lorenz Tschetterle. But of these some were seized. When Kuhr was informed that the entire brotherhood in Alwinc had confessed the new faith and fallen on their knees before the bishop, and Kuhr was urged to let himself be taught too, he said. "What shall I do? Each must carry his own burden and answer for himself on the Last Day."

Since Kuhr's presence in the country constituted a threat to the new Catholics, he and Johannes Stahl were conducted to the Polish border. Thus ended the Alwinc brotherhood. A total of 19 persons, whose names Waldner has recorded, escaped.

Who should know better than Kuhr that Transylvania would be no home for a new brotherhood? They found no favor in the eyes of Joseph II, who issued the Edict of Toleration for the two Protestant churches.

Kuhr and Stahl wandered through Poland to Moldavia and on to Walachia, seeking a suitable site to set up their religious brotherhood. Walachia seemed favorable. There was land, no religious compulsion, and German settlers welcomed. And so the Hutterites of Kreuz, increased by the Alwinc remnant, migrated in October 1767 over the Transylvanian Alps. It was a very difficult journey with women and children on rough paths. Many a one, says Waldner, discovered that a sleeper can walk and a walker sleep. In Walachia Kuhr helped to establish the colony on a sound basis, for he understood the native tongue.

But the fortunate beginnings were interrupted by the Russo-Turkish war. Turkish robber bands plundered the Bruderhof and mistreated the people in a barbarous way. Then the colony accepted the offer of the Russian field marshal, Count Romyanzov, to settle on his estates in Vishenka on the Desna. They spent several decades in Russia, making rapid progress. Kuhr introduced all the old institutions of the brotherhood, which had been lost during the migratory years. But to him his most important task was to return to Transylvania and get his three children who were still living in Alwinc; he brought two out, his son Joseph and his daughter Gretel; but his son Michel had married a Hungarian wife and could not leave then. He promised to come the following year, but he died in 1786.

Kuhr held the office of preacher for many years, until old age compelled him to turn it over to Johannes Waldner, the historian, retaining, however, the headship of the brotherhood. He died May 2, 1794, at the age of 80. A week before his death he delivered his last Rede und Vermahnung to the assembled elders. He had been a preacher for 46 years; the entire brotherhood was under his care 15 years. (From the "Denkwürdigkeiten Johannes Waldners," kindly loaned to the author by Elias Walter, Macleod, Alberta.) LOSERTH.

Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; J. Loserth, "Decline and Revival of the Hutterites," MQR IV (1930) 93-112; ML II, 582-84.

Kuinre (De Kuinder), a town in the Dutch province of Overijssel, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. Apparently this congregation, of which Jan Gerts, a carpenter, was chosen preacher in 1648, died out soon after. (DB 1879, 7, 90.) vdZ.

Kuiper (Kuyper, Cuiper, Cuyper), a common Dutch family name, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. Since Kuiper means cooper, the 16th-century Anabaptist leaders, such as Dirck Cuper (q.v.) and Frans Reines Kuiper (Frans de Kuyper, q.v.), may have been coopers. On the Mennonite Kuyper family which has been living at Krommenie, Dutch province of North Holland, since the last quarter of the 18th century a history was published by Jan Aten, titled De Doopsgezinde Krommenieër Zeildoekfabrikeursfamilie Kuyper (n.p., n.d., 1953). They were usually manufacturers of canvas, and played an important part both in the history of the town and the Krommenie Mennonite Church.

One Kuiper family is of special importance to the Dutch Mennonites. This family originally lived at Leeuwarden. Tako Kuiper was the first of this family to study theology and to become a Mennonite minister. He was born at Leeuwarden, and died at Blokzijl on Sept. 7, 1813, studied at the Amsterdam Lamist Seminary 1784-89, and served as minister of the following congregations: Grouw (Groote Huys) 1790-99, Neustadt-Gödens 1799-1804, Midwolda 1804-7, and Blokzijl 1807-13. His son Jan Kuiper, b. Jan. 4, 1794, at Blokzijl, d. Sept. 24, 1882, at Sneek, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1813-19, and was pastor at Emmerich 1819-20, Dantumawoude 1820-27, and IJlst 1827-70 (he also served the Old Flemish congregation at Sneek 1835-38). He published Lijkrede op Uilke Reitses (Leeuwarden, 1823) and Tweetal Voorlezingen (Sneek, 1835). Taco Kuiper's grandson was Tako Kuiper (q.v.); his great-grandson was Abraham Kornelis Kuiper (q.v.), and his great-great-grandson (son of A. K. Kuiper) Frederik (Frits) Kuiper, b. 1898 at Amsterdam, pastor of Amersfoort 1924-28, Krommenie, Wormer, and Jisp 1928-32, Alkmaar 1932-45, and Amsterdam since 1947. Frits Kuiper is the author of "Karl Barth en de Kinderdoop," in the Zondagsbode 111, Nos. 22-25, and reprint; De Opstanding (Assen, 1928); Sovjet-Rusland en het Christendom (Amsterdam, 1937); De Gemeente in de Wereld (Haarlem, 1941); Gelooft het Evangelie (n.p., n.d.-1945); De ware Vrijheid, Paulus' Brief aan de Galaten (Haarlem, 1947); Ontmoeting met het Oude Testament (Haarlem, 1950); Israel en de Goijem (Haarlem, 1951); Wij en ons erfdeel (Amsterdam, 1952). Johanna E. Kuiper (1896-1956), a daughter of A. K. Kuiper, wrote Bijbel voor de Jeugd (1948); she died unexpectedly while visiting the former Dutch mission fields in Java. To this family also belonged Koenraad Kuiper (1854-1922), a brother of A. K. Kuiper, professor of Greek literature at the University of Amsterdam, who served the church as deacon and was for a number of years a trustee of the A.D.S. and curator of its theological seminary. Gerrit T. J. Kuiper of Rotterdam (where his father, Koenraad Kuiper, was director of the zoo and president of the Mennonite church board), a member of the same family, is an architect, one of whose creations is the new Mennonite church of Rotterdam, built 1950-51. vdZ.

Kuiper, Abraham Kornelis, a Dutch Mennonite minister, the son of Taco Kuiper (q.v.), b. Sept. 20, 1864, at Amsterdam, d. June 29, 1944, at Amsterdam. He studied at the University of Amsterdam and the Mennonite Seminary under Hoekstra and de Hoop Scheffer. On Jan. 5, 1890, he preached his introductory sermon at Rottevalle and Witveen, Friesland. In 1893 he married Henriette Sophia Muller, the youngest daughter of the noted Frederik Muller, who in turn was the son of Samuel Muller (q.v.).

On Feb. 19, 1894, he received his doctorate from the University of Amsterdam with a dissertation on Zechariah 9-14. He served the congregations of Rottevalle until 1895, Warga 1895-99, Wormerveer 1899-1901, Amsterdam 1901 until his retirement in 1930. He died on June 29, 1944. His sermons, like those of his father, drew large audiences even outside the Mennonite fold. He published three volumes of sermons: Als ziende den Onzienlijke (Amsterdam, 1923), In de schuilplaats des Allerhoogsten (Amsterdam, 1926), and Vernieuwd van dag tot dag (Amsterdam, 1930). He also wrote Industrie en persoonlijkheid (Haarlem, 1915), Het toevertrouwde goed (n.p., n.d.), Geschiedenis van het volk Gods in het Oude Testament (Amsterdam, 1933), Geschiedenis van het volk Gods in het Nieuwe Testament (Amsterdam, 1934), Heilig onze gedachten (Amsterdam, 1938). Numerous devotional contributions appeared in the magazine Overdenkingen, of which he was coeditor. Kuiper was active in the Gemeentedagbeweging (q.v.), and promoted the cause of missions among the Dutch Mennonites. From 1914-24 he was chairman of the Doopsgezinde Zendingsvereniging. He was also active in the peace movement and was for some time a member of the executive committee of Kerk en Vrede. Frits Kuiper, a minister in Amsterdam, is his son. (ML II, 584 f.). C.K.

Kuiper (Cuiper), Egbert, was an elder of the Mennonite church of Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, who played a part in the Frisian-Flemish schism 1566-69. (DB 1893, 54, 57, 65, 79.) vdZ.

Kuiper, Jacob, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, b. at Koog aan de Zaan, d. 1825 at Deventer. After studying at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, he served Makkum 1773-75 and Deventer 1775-1820. He was an ardent Patriot (q.v.), who in 1788 had to leave the town of Deventer for some time because he was threatened by the wrath of the Orange party. Kuiper published three philosophical treatises, all awarded prizes and published by the Teyler Society at Haarlem: Over Gods byzondere Voorzienigheid (1782), Over de onverschilligheid en den verstandigen ijver voor Godsdienstige waarheden (1788), and Over de grondregel der Protestanten of het regt op en de verpligting tot eigen oordeel in den Godsdienst (1791). (Biogr. Wb. V, 317.) vdZ.

Kuiper, Taco, a Dutch Mennonite minister, b. Nov. 17, 1824, at Bolsward, Friesland, d. Oct. 15, 1906, at Haarlem. Like his grandfather Taco Kuiper he chose the ministry as his life's vocation after having been graduated from the Mennonite Seminary and the Athenaeum of Amsterdam in 1849. He served the congregations of Zuid-Zijpe until 1850, Warga, Zaandam-Westzijde 1852-59, and Zwolle 1859-62. He then was called to the Amsterdam Mennonite Church which he served until his retirement in 1890. Kuiper was an outstanding preacher, the large Singelkerk always being filled when he preached. In his theological views he adhered to a Biblical and ethical orthodoxy in a time when modernism was the trend among the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood. For some time he served as a member of the Executive Committee of the A.D.S. and secretary of the Doopsgezinde Zendingsvereniging (mission society). He published some sermons, Tiental Leerredenen (Zwolle, 1893) and translated Uhlhorn's Der Kampf des Christentums mit dem Heidentum, which appeared under the title Strijd en overwinning . . . of which the third edition appeared in 1879. Some articles by Kuiper are found in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (1877, 1880, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893). Taco Kuiper was a son of Esgo Taco Kuiper, a notary at Bolsward, and Neeltje Feenstra, daughter of Pastor P. W. Feenstra of Sneek. He was married to Elizabeth Hovens Greve, a daughter of Pastor K. H. Hovens Greve of Steenwijk. Kuiper died on Oct. 15, 1906, at Haarlem. (Biogr. Wb. V, 318-20; DB 1901, 36; 1907, 177-83; ML II, 585.) C.K.

Kükenbieter, Joachim, a Lutheran divine of Schwerin, Germany, wrote a letter to Pastor Johann Garthe at Hamburg in 1539 about Obbe Philips (q.v.). He says that Obbe had in that year moved to the territory of Mecklenburg in Germany, where he had a large following called "Obbiten," and intended to go to Rostock. This letter, which states emphatically that Obbe was a peaceful Anabaptist leader, is important for our knowledge of Obbe's activities shortly before he left the Mennonites. (DB 1884, 15 f.) vdZ.

Kulenkamp, Gerardus (Bremen, 1700-Amsterdam, 1775), was a Reformed minister from 1725, serving Amsterdam in 1733-75. He attacked the Moravian Brethren in three books; in the first of these, De naakt ontdekte enthousiasterij, geest-driverij, en bedorven mystikerij der zo genaamde Hernhuthers (Amsterdam, 1739-40, 2 vv.), he also accused the Mennonites of heterodoxy. In a paper published by Kulenkamp in the periodical De Boekzaal of October 1740 he sharply accused Joannes Deknatel, the Mennonite minister at Amsterdam, of having forsaken the basic creed of the Mennonites as summarized in the Oprecht Verbondt van Eenigheyd (q.v.) of 1664, and of teaching Socinian (q.v.) heresies. Many Mennonites, including Deknatel (q.v.), were at this time much in sympathy with the Moravians. Kulenkamp's charges against the Moravian Brethren and the Mennonites were refuted in a Brief aan een Vriend (Amsterdam, 1740) by an anonymous author, who signed his work as "Irenophilus," and who was apparently a Mennonite. vdZ.

Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stintra en zijn tijd (Amsterdam, 1865-66, 2 vols.), passim; Biogr. Wb. V, 322-27; DB 1868, 57.

Kulm: see Culm.

Kunders, Thones, head of one of the first 13 German Quaker-Mennonite families from Crefeld who arrived at Philadelphia on Oct. 6, 1683, beginning the German immigration to America. Kunders, who later called himself Anthony Conrads and still later Cunard, and was also called Dennis Conrad, was born in Gladbach, and was a citizen of Crefeld. He was Quaker, but had formerly been a Mennonite. In his house in Germantown (q.v.) were held the first German services in America, attended by both Mennonites and Quakers. (Pastorius says Kunders and his wife were Mennonites, as was also her brother, William Streypers, who had immigrated with them, but Hull has shown this to be an error.) It was in Kunders' home that the first protest against slavery in America was signed in 1688. Kunders was one of the eleven citizens to whom Penn granted the charter of Germantown in 1689, and was appointed as one of the first burgesses, a proof that he could not have been a Mennonite. He died in 1729.

A descendant of Thones Kunders in the fifth generation was Sir Samuel Cunard (1787-1865), who founded the first steamship line between England and America, known as the Cunard Line. Hege, H.S.B.

D. K. Cassel, Gesch. der Menn. (Philadelphia, 1890); Die Heimat X (Crefeld, 1931) 86; W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1935) 218 et passim; C. Henry Smith, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania (Norristown, 1929); ML II, 585.

Künigl, Master Wolfgang, a royal procurator in Austria. It is not known whether he belonged to the noble house of that name. From the court records of the Anabaptists in Austria on and below the Enns we learn that in the persecution of the Anabaptists in 1527-28 he played a role which was not pleasant to him, as court prosecutor.

King Ferdinand was shocked by the increasing Anabaptist movement in his Austrian hereditary lands. From all sides came word that the authorities were lax toward the ecclesiastical innovations, and that Austria was the hotbed of sectarianism. Therefore Ferdinand issued not only the general mandate of Aug. 28, 1527, but also many special mandates, obliging the officials to persecute the Anabaptists.

In October 1527 Wolfgang Künigl received instructions to cross-examine the Anabaptists imprisoned in Steyr (q.v.) and Freistadt (q.v.) and to proceed according to the mandates. On Oct. 29 he began his work in Styria. The case was to be tried in the presence of representatives of the five cities. Of unusual interest is the report he sent three days later to the governor and regents of the cantons of Lower Austria. He related what had taken place in Steyr, and recommended for persons of their type a fine instead of the penalty of Horb (q.v.) and Rottenburg, which was degrading, and would cause many prisoners to escape, deserting their families. There were, to be sure, people who deserved a more severe sentence than that of Horb, people who say the sacrament is mere bread and disregard baptism. There were Anabaptists held secretly, not yet put into prison, by abbots, noblemen, and prelates. At Melk it was no better; two Melk citizens had conducted Hans Hut to Steyr.

Two days later he reported that more Anabaptists were reported every day. If he would proceed with the Horb penalty they would all run away, and a great insurrection might take place. This could be avoided by levying a fine. With the Horb penalty he would not be sure of his life. In other words, he hoped to be able to persuade the prisoners to recant, and earn the lighter penalty; the obstinate would be punished in accord with the mandates. But the king disagreed. One could be lenient only in the case of the young and simple.

On Nov. 16 Künigl came to Freistadt. There the magistrate had not made the necessary provisions, for he thought he did not have the right to take steps against Anabaptists, not having the "regalia." Künigl was quite annoyed by his dealings with these Upper Austrian citizens. Here in Freistadt all had recanted. He requested that the Horb penalty be lightened.

Since the authorities inferred from Künigl's letters that many Anabaptists had fled, a special mandate was sent out on Dec. 23, 1527, making it a crime to shelter or feed fugitive Anabaptists. Not until February 1528 was the case against the Freistadt Anabaptists continued, and Künigl was again appointed to conduct the prosecution. On April 8 the accused swore to leave the country. Loserth.

J. Jäkel, Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich (Report 47 of the Francisco-Carolinum, Linz, 1889); ML II, 585 f.

Kunpad: see Konopat(h).

Kunstbuch, Das, a codex of about 740 pages, 22 x 16 cm, in the Bürgerbibliothek at Bern, Switzerland, containing a collection of 42 letters and documents of 1527-55. The editor and copyist was Jörg Maler (q.v.) of Augsburg, who signed his work on Sept. 4, 1561. The following writers and writings are represented in the codex: Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) fifteen letters and one tract, Leopold Scharnschlager (q.v.) three letters and three tracts, Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) two letters and two tracts, Jörg Maler (q.v.) two letters and one tract, Sigmund Bosch (q.v.) two letters; Hans Hut (q.v.), Hans Has, Cornelius Vech, Helena Freiberger (von Freyberg, q.v.), Hans Bichel (Büchel, q.v.), Christian Entfelder (q.v.), Valentin Eckelsamer (Ickelsamer, q.v.), and Hans Schlaffer (q.v.) represented by one document each; two anonymous tracts; one letter from the churches in Moravia to Marpeck. None of these documents are known from any other printed or manuscript source except the one by Han Hut and two of those by Schiemer. The codex was first reported to the learned world in July 1955 by Heinold Fast and Gerhard Goeters, who noticed it in the Bürgerbibliothek. It is of extraordinary importance, throwing new light on South German and Swiss Anabaptism particularly of the period of 1540-60. A detailed analysis and evaluation of the Kunstbuch is given by Heinold Fast in the Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte for 1957, No. 1. H.S.B.

Kuntersweg, a part of the ancient route from Italy to Germany in the scenic mountain valley of the Eisack in southern Tirol (formerly Austrian, now Italian). The localities in or above this valley to be considered here are Atzwang in the jurisdiction of Ritten, and Völs and Blumau in the jurisdiction of Kastelruth.

In most of its copies the Hutterite Chronicle lists eight blood witnesses "on the Kuntersweg"; some say nine without specifying the localities. Martyrs' deaths are listed in the persecution period of 1529; but 1528 is probably correct. On May 9, 1528, Augustin Heurling informed the government that in Lower Atzwang several Anabaptists who had recanted and had assumed the prescribed penance were again obstinately holding to their old error. Four days later the government at Innsbruck ordered that they be prosecuted and appointed the Altenburg judge to take charge. Jurors were to be chosen from other localities, since many of those to be sentenced had a large, influential relationship in the local region. Proceedings against Margaret Köblin were to wait until after the birth of her child.

Among those sentenced at this time was Matthes Kerschbaumer. His wife Margaret, who had not asked for pardon at the proper time, had her sentence commuted on June 3 from burning at the stake to drowning. When the judge, Jakob Fuchs von Fuchsberg, twice postponed the execution because relatives and even clergy wanted to ask the government for clemency, he was reprimanded and ordered to execute the death sentence at once. The official of Spaur on the Ritten was given orders to rebuke the clergy for intervening in a "matter of faith."

It can be assumed that most of the executions occurred at Völs, in which village the Kopialbuch, causa Domini, preserved in the archives at Innsbruck (vol. II, fol. 226 f., 229, 232 f., 240 f., 320, 330, 370 f., 420, 518) mentions Anabaptists several times. In June 1528 Jörg Zaunried was operating in Völs, who baptized the local historiographer, Michel Kürschner (q.v.), and appointed him head of the brotherhood; Kürschner was very active in the Adige. On Dec. 5, 1528, Augustin Heurling and the judge of Bozen were charged with sentencing the Anabaptists imprisoned at Völs. Several days later the captain on the Adige set the date for calling the jurors on Dec. 18, 1528. Several names are known: Magdalena, wife of Hans Bair; Elisabeth, sister of Wolfram; Lienhard Fundnatscher, and Hans Voll persisted in their faith and were put to death.

Fundnatscher's wife, Christoph Mesner, and Melchior Schneider repented and were pardoned to blows with a rod on the public square. It also happened that Melchior Schneider's brother offered to try to catch the "Anabaptist principals," Michel Kürschner, Matthias Waldner, and the wife of Gallbüchel, if he were pardoned. These people were very active in the region, and the government was employing all the means at its disposal to apprehend them. The Adige authorities agreed. Kürschner was imprisoned in Innsbruck and executed on June 2, 1529.

In April 1529 two young shepherds of Völs were arrested, but they were pardoned because they repented and because of their youth and lack of understanding. In 1532 several persons were seized at Völs on a suspicion of Anabaptism, but the outcome of the case is not known. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loesche, Tirolensia; ML II, 586 f.

Küntsche (Küentsche), Hans Friedrich, originally of Württemberg, Germany (according to Bossert the name must have been Kündscher or Kündscheer, named in the records of 1609), a Hutterite brother, from 1641 preacher, d. 1659 in Kesselsdorf (q.v.), Slovakia. He was the most outstanding author of (written) sermons, usually called Vorreden and Lehren by the Hutterites (see Sermons, Hutterites). He more than anyone else promoted the system of writing down sermons for each Sunday and other occasions. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch mentions frequently "pious and inspired teachers at Gesselsdorf" who produced sermons, excerpts of which Johannes Waldner (q.v.) inserted in his chronicle (Zieglschmid, 204-21). The modern Hutterites in Canada still have some of the original sermon-notebooks signed "H. F. K.," containing sermons on Isaiah 9 (no year), Isaiah 11 (1650), Isaiah 49 (1655), Isaiah 58 (1658), Matt. 5 (1659), Luke 3 (1652), Acts 2 (1659; this is a set of sermons for the celebration of Pentecost, still in use today), and Rom. 8 (1656). Both "teachings" on Acts 2 and Romans 8 are actually voluminous books, copied and recopied ever since. It is not impossible that many more of the existing sermons go back to this preacher, or Lehrer as he is often called. During the first period of the Hutterite stay in the Ukraine (about 1770-1810) all these numerous sermons were collected anew and put together into "sermon-collections," still extant today in western Canada and still in use. Most of them are anonymous, but one finds also not infrequently at the end notes such as "H. F. K.," or "Kesselsdorf," and a year, usually between 1650 and 1660. R.F.

Wolkan, note in the Geschicht-Buch, 646; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; TA Württemberg.

Kuntz (Cuntz), Elsa, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death at Reinhardsbrunn near Gotha, Germany, with five companions on Jan. 18, 1530, because she refused to recant. The execution attracted much attention. Melanchthon (q.v.) tried to defend her, and Justus Menius (q.v.) in this connection published his book, Der Widdertauffer lere (1530), with a foreword by Luther, in which he takes a position of opposition to the Anabaptists (see Kolb, Andreas and Katharina). (ML II, 587.) HEGE.

Küntzi, Hans, and his son Kleinhans (or Junghans), both wool weavers of Oberglatt, canton of Zürich, Switzerland. They were natives of Klingnau in the canton of Aargau, and in 1526 were among the Anabaptists there. Kleinhans Küntzi was active in the canton of Zürich, from which he was banished between 1526 and 1529. He baptized many Anabaptist converts. He was executed at Liechtenstein before Dec. 26, 1529. A Paul(li) Küntzi from Stalden in the canton of Bern was named as Anabaptist in 1535. vdZ.

TA Zürich; P. Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 45, 117, No. 181 f., 131, No. 502.

Kunz, an Anabaptist who died as a martyr between Christmas 1536 and April 10, 1537, at Bozen, Austria (now Italy). Particulars are not known. The cross-examination of his traveling companion, Kaspar Huber, under Christoph Ochs in Michelsburg (q.v.) in the Puster Valley, revealed that both had come into Tirol from Moravia. Huber had been baptized at Auspitz by Jakob Hutter in 1535, was imprisoned at Schöneck in Tirol, and was likewise put to death for his faith. (Loserth, Anabaptismus, 141; ML II, 587.) HEGE.

Künzelsau, a town (pop. 5,559) on the Kocher, in the Jagst district of Württemberg, Germany, where Anabaptism found adherents soon after its inception (see Hohenlohe). (ML II, 587.)

Kuonle, Lienhard, an Anabaptist of Oberschlechtbach, a village near Rudersberg in Württemberg, Germany, confessed at his trial at Schorndorf (q.v.) on March 21, 1613, that "eighteen years previously he had regularly attended church. But when he was elected burgomaster and was required to swear an oath, he refused; for he considered it a sin. For that reason he was arrested and kept confined at Schorndorf for four weeks. Then he began to associate with the Anabaptists; he joined the Swiss brotherhood and was baptized in a woods near Frankenstein (in the Palatinate) belonging, he supposed, to some nobleman, because he did not consider his first baptism in infancy valid." On April 16 he was again questioned. He had been persuaded to be baptized by a brother from Moravia. Then he bought a New Testament and found his faith therein. He had been at Aschhausen near Oehringen nine of the eighteen years. Orders came from Stuttgart to deal leniently with him; he was banished. Nothing more is known of him. (TA Württemberg, 841-43; ML II, 587.) NEFF.

Kürnbach, a town in the Bretten district of Baden, Germany, with (1933) 1,202 Protestant inhabitants. In 1525 the pastor Wendel Ziegler used German in baptizing and at the insistence of the congregation distributed communion in both kinds. After the Peasants' War the Austrian government suppressed Protestantism in Stuttgart. Consequently the evangelically-minded went to the adjacent villages of the Imperial Knights for their spiritual food, thereby coming in contact with the Anabaptists.

About 1530 Michel Jungmann, approximately 45 years old, was baptized by Blasius (Kuhn, q.v.) of Bruchsal at Zaberfeld (in the jurisdiction of the barons von Sternenfels zu Ochsenburg) in the home of Stratz Bernhard, together with Bernhard's wife, Bastian N., and Hans Lemmer of Ochsenburg (the last two deserted the movement later on) and Bärbel Bender of Sulzfeld, who died in Moravia. As his motive for joining the Anabaptist movement Jungmann stated that he had heard in sermons, "He who believes and is baptized shall be saved." Also the offensive life of the priests repelled him.

Not long after, Jungmann was arrested by the mayor of Güglingen. With the executioner at his side he was commanded to go to church, hear Mass, and accept the papacy. In the face of fire, Jungmann consented and was released. But when he was to swear to leave the town forever he could not commit such an "abomination and idolatry," and fled to Moravia, where he lived in "Augsten" (Auspitz?). When he heard that Duke Ulrich had returned he hastened home. About 1543 he was again banished, but soon returned, only to be banished once more.

During the interim the Anabaptist movement spread. The Brethren easily found shelter in the many localities owned by the Imperial Knights. They met in the forest of Bretten near Flehingen, where Schoch Hans of Königsbach (q.v.) preached and baptized, also a Bastian of Dinglingen from Strasbourg. There was no need of a special "sign" by which they could recognize each other. They soon learned to know each other. From Durlach there were Martin Schneider; Margaretha, wife of Matheis Starcker; a farm hand, Simon N., from Alsace; Katharina, the wife of Augustin N.; and Jakob Hartmann; from Knielingen (near Karlsruhe), Cyriakus N. and Wendel N.; from Eggenstein (near Karlsruhe), Matheis N.; from Kürnbach, Michel Zainer and Heinrich Bierer, who had however not been baptized; and one from Diefenbach (Maulbronn district), who recanted.

Michel Jungmann also took part in these meetings.

But as he was once coming to Kürnbach he was seized and taken to Güglingen. He was cross-examined three times; viz., on March 18, March 25, and June 14, 1555. With warmth he confessed: he placed his salvation on Christ our Lord, and wanted to become a partaker in it, by believing His words and living according to them. On the questions in which he differed from the church, he at first evaded the issue, but then he said concerning infant baptism: he knew nothing to say about it, knew no Scripture for it, and therefore let it stand on its own merit. Concerning the Lord's Supper he said in reply to the question whether he believed that the true body and blood of Christ were distributed in the sacrament: No, the bread and wine were rather symbols and remembrances. He had not preached or baptized, because he had not been called to do so. At the third hearing, when the executioner placed the rack beside him, he also gave the names of the leaders and the brethren and the place of meeting. To the magistrate he said he was a weak old man, not a sectarian, and only wanted to please God and his neighbor. He promised that if he was freed he would attend church; as God gave him warning and light he would live; but one must live according to Protestant doctrine. Upon the signed promise to leave the country he was permitted to return to Durlach.

About two years later Jungmann was again at Kürnbach in spite of his promise, together with his son Hans and Margarete Bierer of Pfaffenhofen, who were mentioned several times in previous hearings. They were all arrested. Michel was again cross-examined, and said he "would have all things in common." The magistrate banished him again. This time Hans Jungmann knew the appropriate Scripture passages and argued with the pastor nine weeks in prison. Finally he declared he was willing to go to church. Margarete Bierer agreed with him. They went to church, even took communion and attended the baptismal service of an infant, and were then set free. Jungmann died soon afterward in the Palatinate; Margarete stayed in Durlach three years, returned to Pfaffenhofen, and in 1562 was once more among the Anabaptists.

In 1572 new trials were held for Anabaptists whose names are not known. In 1576 two new adherents were baptized: Michel Jungmann, probably a son of Hans and grandson of the older Michel, and Joachim Roth. They were questioned in Stuttgart. Roth promised to join the church and leave the Anabaptists. a formal trial was arranged for Jungmann. But he apparently submitted too; for in 1583 he was again held in Kürnbach, as well as the backslidden Roth, Katharina, the wife of Jakob Ludwig, the gatekeeper and the riding servant and other subjects of Bernhard von Sternenfels. Jungmann seems to have persisted in his faith and been banished, but was protected by von Sternenfels who needed him as a builder. In 1586 Sternenfels was still employing the gatekeeper, and also Reichardus Reichart of Endersbach (near Stuttgart) as cooper. The duke demanded that proceedings be initiated against all of them because they adhered to Anabaptist doctrine.

In 1602 a servant at the castle was called a "Wiedertäufer." Then all trace of the Anabaptist movement disappeared from Kürnbach. The revelations made in the trials concerning the piety of the Anabaptists are a pleasant picture; they wanted to live for their faith as God-fearing people, resisted the government only when it violated their conscience (oath, war); the judgment of the officials varied, but generally there was a feeling of human pity for their destruction. E.Be.

G. Bossert, "Die Ref. in Kürnbach bei Eppingen," in Ztscht f. d. Gesch. des Oberrheins LI (1897) 83-107; TA Württemberg; TA Baden-Pfalz; E. Becker, "Die Wiedertäufer zu Kürnbach," in Beitr. zur Hess. Kirchengesch. I (1903) 113-39; ML II, 587 f.

Kurpfalz: see Palatinate.

Kürschner (Kirsner, Kirschner, Klesinger), Michael, an Anabaptist martyr, was baptized in June 1528 in Eisack Valley of Tirol, Austria (now Italy), by Georg Zaunring (q.v.), who was later the traveling companion of Jakob Hutter (q.v.), and was appointed by Zaunring as the head of the local Anabaptist group. His mission field after August was the Eisack and Adige Valley, especially around Teutsch-Noffen, Gufidaun, Kurtatsch, Kaltern, Leifers, and Klausen, where he baptized over 100 persons. Before his conversion to Anabaptism he had been court recorder at Völs. The authorities kept a sharp lookout for him and caught him and seven others at a service on the night of April 25, 1529, at Kitzbühel. He was taken to Innsbruck and imprisoned in the Kräuter tower. He refused all attempts to convert him, and died at the stake on June 2, 1529, at Innsbruck. The authorities were in such haste with this execution that they did not even wait for word from Ferdinand, to whom the case had been reported (Loserth, 468, 470 f.).

Georg Blaurock (q.v.), one of the founders of the movement, took charge of the orphaned congregation. He arrived here in May 1529, accompanied by Hans Langegger of Ritten in the Eisack Valley, and after a brief period of work also died at the stake in Klausen (q.v.). (See Kuntersweg.) Hege.

Loserth, Anabaptismus; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 90; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74; ML II, 602.

Kürschner, Wolf (Laupt, Hussbecken), was one of a group of Anabaptists who under the pressure of persecution went from Bretten (q.v.), Germany, to Moravia; but when government pressure made it difficult for the barons to tolerate them on their lands he returned to his old home. Before he reached his family he was seized on Nov. 14, 1535, by spies of the magistrate Ulrich Winzelhäuser of Güglingen, Württemberg, Germany, with a married couple from Knittlingen, and was placed in the tower of Güglingen. Leonhard Eheim, pastor of Pfaffenhofen, was assigned to work with them, discussing with them especially infant baptism and the oath, but to no avail.

The ensuing trial by the magistrate revealed that Wolf Kürschner and several women had been baptized at Oberacker by Hans Beringer of Knittlingen. His statements give a picture of the religious views of the once stately congregation around Bretten, concerning which there is little other information. The prisoners placed no value on infant baptism. They did not hold that the sacrament contained the flesh and blood of Christ, and opposed the oath, warfare, and capital punishment. A Christian might hold a public office in government if the government were Christian and acted accordingly. They did not believe that the devil and all the damned would ultimately be saved. They accepted as completely true the teaching of the Protestant Church on the person and the work of Christ.

The prisoners were released from the tower on Dec. 2, 1535, by their brothers, who were not Anabaptists. The brothers were later found out and arrested, but released upon the request of the nobility, officials, relatives, and neighbors; the petition stressed the brotherly love that bade them do this. They had also taken great pains to make Kürschner change his views, with success. His fellow prisoners had to attend the torture and beheading of a murderer, whereupon they declared they would do all that they were shown and taught. Hege.

G. Bossert, "Wolf Kürschner, der Täufer von Bretten," in Ztscht f. d. Gesch. des Oberrheins (1910) 431-52; TA Baden-Pfalz; TA Württemberg, 46, 995; ML II, 602.

Kürssner, Mathis, an Anabaptist martyr, apparently a member of the congregation at Horb on the Neckar, was seized with Michael Sattler (q.v.) after the meeting at Schleitheim in which the first Anabaptist-Mennonite confession of faith was formulated. After Sattler's execution on May 21, 1527, on the evening of the same day, Kürssner was put to death with Stoffel Schuhmacher, Michel Lenzi, and the aged Geiger, at Rottenburg am Neckar, Germany. Hege.

W. Köhler, Brüderliche Vereinigung etzlicher Kinder Gottes sieben Artikel, in Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation II (Leipzig, 1908) 303; ML II, 602.

Kurtatsch, a locality in the Eisack Valley in Tirol, Austria (now Italy), a scene of Georg Blaurock's (q.v.) activity after his exile from Zürich. Here he took the place of the leader Michael Kürschner (q.v.), who was in prison in Kitzbühel. In Kurtatsch Anabaptism had spread as early as 1528; in 1529 its adherents, with the exception of the leaders, were punished for leaving the church by being publicly beaten and banished (Loesche, 36). Blaurock proclaimed the Gospel here in July 1529 with outstanding success. But in August he was caught by bailiff Preu, held prisoner in Gufidaun (q.v.) castle (Loserth, 486), and burned at the stake on Sept. 6 at Klausen. Hege.

G. Loesche, Archivalische Beiträge zur Gesch. des Täufertums und des Protestantismus in Tirol (1926); Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML II, 602 f.

Kurtz, Jonathan, b. July 8, 1848, near Lancaster, Fairfield Co., Ohio, d. July 10, 1930, in Mishawaka, Ind., was a leading bishop in the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference, and the merged Mennonite (MC) Conference. He was ordained preacher in 1882, and bishop in 1888, serving the Maple Grove congregation near Topeka, Ind. He was an early and active supporter of progressive activities of all kinds, and helped in establishing missionary and educational work (Goshen College) in the activities of the church. He was married to Lizzie Byler on March 19, 1878, who with their five children survived him. H.S.B.

Kurtzville, Ont., a small village six miles northwest of Gowanstown in Wallace Township, where a Mennonite church (MC) and cemetery were located about 1865. A German Sunday school is known to have been conducted there in the 1880's under the Mennonite Conference of Ontario. (See the Wallace Mennonite Church.) J.C.F.

Kusters, Paulus (d. 1707), emigrated from Crefeld, Germany, to America with his wife Gertrude Streypers and three sons Arnold, Hermanus, and Johannes, all Mennonites, and settled at Germantown, Pa., about 1693. vdZ.

H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown, 1683-1708," MQR VII (October 1933) 232, 235.

Kutter, Eustachius: see Kotter.

Kuyper (Cuyper, Kuiper), Cornelis (de), a Dutch Mennonite elder of the Flemish congregation at Haarlem, who died before 1617. He was a partisan of the well-known Dutch elder Jacques Outerman (q.v.) of Haarlem. He defended the doctrine of the Incarnation (Christ did not receive His flesh from Mary) as taught by Menno Simons. He was attacked by Pieter Matthysz and two Reformed ministers of Middelburg, Johannes Seu and Herman Faukelius, on a charge of Socinian views. In September 1609 de Kuyper, Francois de Knuyt, Mennonite preacher of Zierikzee, and Jan van Voorden, elder of Utrecht, had a disputation at Zierikzee with Reformed ministers. De Kuyper published Eenvuldighe verantwoordinge met corte Verklaringhe onses Geloofs van den Eenighen God . . . als oock van de Heylige Menschwerdinge onses Salichmakers . . . (n.p., n.d., ca. 1604). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 408-10; W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 92, 101; DB 1908, 23-26.

Kuyper (Cuypers), Frans (de) (1629-ca. 1691), became a Remonstrant (q.v.) preacher at Vlaardingen, Dutch province of South Holland, in 1652, but resigned in 1653, because he did not agree with infant baptism. He moved to Amsterdam and later to Rotterdam and became a book printer. Among the most important publications by Kuyper are Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, quos unitarios vocant, i.e., the Socinians (q.v.). In the Dutch Collegiant movement Kuyper was a prominent member, though his stubbornness caused discord with many of them, especially with Joannes Breedenburg, whom he accused of Spinozism. Through his adherence to the philosophical principles of Spinoza he had a wide influence on the growing liberalism of his time. In the Collegiant movement he met with numerous Mennonites; he had some sympathy for Mennonite principles, especially for nonresistance; the booklet De recht weereloozе Christen of verdeediging van het gevoelen der eerste Christenen en gemartelde Doops-gezinden, published by Kuyper (Rotterdam, 1678), however, was not written by him, as has sometimes been supposed, but by Joan Hartigveldt (q.v.). De Kuyper published Broederlijke Onderhandeling van de Waterdoop tusschen Klaas Stapel en Frans Kuyper (Rotterdam, 1680), and is supposed to be the author of Den Philosopheerende Boer (1676). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 332-43; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 868; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) see Index; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs I (Haarlem, 1900) II (Haarlem, 1902) passim, see Index; W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 246; DB 1900, 184 ff.

Kuyper, Teunis Dirksz, of Huisduinen, dates of birth and death unknown, was a Dutch Mennonite preacher, at first on the island of Texel, then of the congregation of Huisduinen, of Haarlem (from 1668) and from 1670 of the Flemish congregation at Alkmaar. Here a quarrel arose in 1672, when Gerrit Jansz Veerom, who had been banned in Amsterdam, was called to the ministry at Alkmaar. In 1674 Kuyper with a number of followers separated from the main body, opening a "preeckhuys" near the Oude Veste, where Kuyper promised to allow "freedom of speech" according to Collegiant practice. But this separate group soon declined, chiefly because of the stubbornness of Kuyper. In 1683 he moved to Friesland, probably to Harlingen. Before his departure from Alkmaar, Kuyper published Verzoenschrift dienende om de Vereenigde Waterlanders en Vlamingen op de Koningswegh tot versoeninghe te brengen met de Waterlandsche Doopsgesinde op de Oude Veste tot Alckmaer (n.p., 1683). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 343 f.; DB 1891, 4-6, 8; (J. de Lange C. Jzn) Beknopte Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Alkmaar (1927) 24-27, 156.

Kwango Mennonite Brethren Mission in the Belgian Congo is one of the M.B. mission fields in Africa. The other, the Kasai (q.v.) field, is located near by. The Kwango field, embracing the district capital of Kikwit, extends 110 miles east and west and 150 miles north and south. The population of the Kwango field is approximately 500,000, living in approximately 1,000 villages and several hundred company posts. The chief mission stations are located at Kafumba, Matende, Kipungu, Lusemvu, Kajiji, Panzi, and Belle Vue. Kajiji and Panzi were taken over in 1954 from the liquidated Unevangelized Tribes Mission. In 1955, 12 missionaries were located at Kafumba, 4 at Matende, 7 at Kipungu, 5 at Lusemvu, 6 at Kajiji, 6 at Panzi, and 6 at Belle Vue, where the school for missionary children is located. The native church in the Kwango area numbers around 6,000. A.E.J.

Kweekschool tot opleiding van Doopsgezinde leraren (Seminary for the training of Mennonite ministers): see Amsterdam Theological Seminary.

Kymäus (Kymeus), Johann (1498-1552), a Protestant minister at the time the Ziegenhain church discipline (Zuchtordnung) was introduced in Hesse. He was at first a Franciscan monk, then pastor at Homburg, Hesse, Germany, and later superintendent at Kassel. Kymäus was one of the theologians appointed to reply to the Restitution sent to Philipp of Hesse by the Münster Anabaptists in 1534 (Rembert, 296). In 1537 he published a booklet on the synod of 355 held at Gangra (60 miles northeast of Angora) with the title, Ein Alt Christlich Concilium fur 1200 jaren zu Gangra jnn Paphlagonia gehalten, wider die hoch genante heiligkeit der Mönchen vnd Wiederteuffer . . . verdeutscht und ausgelegt, for which Martin Luther wrote a preface. The booklet attacks especially the Anabaptists and their "false doctrines"; an evil tree cannot bear good fruit (Keller, 163).

After the trial of the Anabaptists at Marburg, which led to the introduction of confirmation (q.v.) in the Protestant churches, he was a coauthor of the opinion titled Bekenntniss oder Antwort etlicher Fragestücke oder Artikeln der gefangenen Täufer und Anderer im Land zu Hessen, which led to the conclusion "that they would gladly forgive these brethren in the Lord" (Hochhuth, 612-26; Hessen). Hege.

K. W. H. Hochhuth, Ztscht f. d. hist. Theol., 1858; L. Keller, Johann von Staupitz und die Anfänge der Reformation (Leipzig, 1888); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; TA Hessen; ML II, 603.

La Ferrière: see Ferrière.

La Glace Mennonite Brethren Church, located two miles south of La Glace in the Peace River area of northwest Alberta, was organized about 1928 when newly arrived Mennonite immigrants from Russia settled here. Its largest membership was well over 100 but in 1955 it numbered only 52. A Bible school has been conducted by this congregation on the church premises for a number of years. The following ministers have served this church: G. Wiens, J. Schmidt, M. Hamm, N. Siebert, and A. Janz. A.A.T.

La Gloria Mennonite Church (MC), located along Highway 281, 2½ miles south of Premont, Jim Wells Co., Tex., until recently known as the Falfurrias Mennonite Church, was organized March 18, 1928. It is a member of the South Central Mennonite Conference. The membership in 1955 was 21, with H. F. Reist as bishop and Samuel C. Swartz as minister. H.F.R.

La Junta (Col.) Mennonite (MC) Church was organized May 4, 1903. J. M. Nunemaker, a minister of Roseland, Neb., decided on this location in the irrigated land of eastern Colorado as the place of settlement for a Mennonite farm colony after several investigative trips through eastern Colorado in 1902. Two congregations were finally established, East Holbrook (q.v.) in the country and La Junta in the city. A few of the original settlers came from Roseland, but most came from Elida, Ohio, led by a minister, D. S. Brunk, and his son J. M. Brunk, later made a minister at La Junta, who arrived at Pueblo in December 1902 and joined forces with Nunemaker. A few others came from Harrisonburg, Va., including the Rhodes and Heatwole families. The Holbrook settlement, 12 miles northeast of La Junta, was begun by Nunemaker on Feb. 17, 1903. The J. M. Brunk family started the Fairmount settlement four miles west of La Junta in the same month. On May 4, 1903, the La Junta Mennonite Church was organized with 20 charter members living in two settlements, among them two ministers, J. M. Nunemaker and George Ross. The first La Junta meetinghouse was an old Presbyterian church given by the city and occupied on March 6, 1905. On Dec. 31, 1916, a new brick church was dedicated. The congregation at once joined the Kansas-Nebraska Conference (q.v.) and received S. C. Miller of Jet, Okla., as its first bishop. Later bishops were ordained from the congregation—J. A. Heatwole, who served 1910-40, and Allen Erb 1939- . In 1954 the membership was 168, with Wilbur Nachtigall as pastor 1954- .

The La Junta congregation was the mother church of Mennonites (MC) in Colorado. From it were organized East Holbrook in 1904, Denver in 1941, Pueblo in 1949, and a Spanish (Mexican) congregation in La Junta in 1941, which in 1954 had 42 members, with David Castillo as pastor.

Because of the healthful dry climate and the (former) belief that tuberculosis could best be treated in such climates, local Mennonites established a sanitarium in 1908, located 4½ miles west of La Junta, and operated until 1927. In 1920 the city of La Junta asked the Mennonites to take over the hospital, which they did, and operated it until 1927, when a new Mennonite hospital and sanitarium were erected. A school of nursing was operated in connection with the hospital in 1915-58. H.S.B.

La Junta Mennonite (MC) School of Nursing. The Mennonite Sanitarium Training School for nurses was founded in 1915 by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, under whose general control it operated until the fall of 1949, when it was transferred to the Mennonite Board of Education, whose primary purpose is to administer the educational institutions of the church. Until 1946 the school was an integral part of the Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium. At this time the organizational pattern was revised, the school being set up as an independent institution under the direct supervision of a school board of control. The name was then changed to its present form. Since its beginning the purpose of the school has been to "give Christian young women training in the care of the sick in such an environment that they may develop in Christian life and character." The motto of the school, "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister," is the basis for the formulation of the philosophy which underlies its total program. The school has been fully accredited by the Colorado State Board of Nurse Examiners since its beginning and received temporary accreditment by the National Accrediting Service in 1951.

The program covers a period of 39 months: 9 months in an accredited college, where the prenursing sciences are studied, and 30 months in the nursing school, where the clinical instruction and practice is secured. Clinical practice in medical and surgical nursing, maternity, operating room, tuberculosis, and diet therapy are obtained in the Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium at La Junta. Pediatric and Psychiatric Nursing is obtained by affiliation with the Children's Hospital in Denver and Colorado University School of Nursing at the State Hospital in Pueblo. An elective in Public Health Nursing is also available through the University.

A total of 343 nurses have been graduated to date. The current enrollment is 51. Lydia Heatwole, a graduate of the first class, director 1918-32, and Nora Mae Miller, of the class of 1923, director of education 1925-50, were the guiding personalities in the history of the school. Maude Swartzendruber has been director since 1943 and Edna Amstutz director of education since 1950. Because of a decline in the patient census at the Mennonite Hospital it has been decided to discontinue the School of Nursing with the class graduating in 1958. (See also Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium.) M.Sw.

La Junta (Col.) Mennonite Hospital (MC) had its beginning on Jan. 1, 1920, when control of the previous city hospital was granted to the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. Before that the Board had owned and operated the Mennonite Sanitarium (tuberculosis), located 4½ miles east of La Junta, which had been acquired on March 19, 1906, from the Mennonite Sanitarium Association, although the building was not completed until Oct. 25, 1908. After 1920 the combined institution was called Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium (q.v.). H.S.B.

La Maie, in France, north of Belfort, the seat of a former Mennonite congregation, marked on the map (ME I, 67) as an extinct Mennonite congregation.

La Mesa, Cundinamarca, Colombia, South America. Mission work was begun in this center by the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1953. Miss Alice Bachert, then living in near-by San Javier, and LaVerne A. Rutschman were instrumental in gathering a formerly disorganized group of believers and organizing them into a church in November 1953. A lot and building on Calle 6a, #21-69 were purchased in July 1954, and the building was remodeled to serve as a chapel and day school. The day school was named Colegio Meno and was opened in 1955. Lic. Luis Rodriguez is the minister-in-charge of preaching and teaching. The baptized membership numbers 23. G.S.

La Plata, Puerto Rico, was the location of a unit in Civilian Public Service Camp No. 43, which was approved in June 1942 and closed in March 1947. Operated jointly by the Brethren Service Committee and the MCC, it served under the Puerto Rican Reconstruction Administration in the area of public health. In April 1943 the MCC, upon the invitation of the Brethren, approved the establishment of its own service unit under CPS No. 43 in Puerto Rico and in the following month sent its first workers to this assignment. Co-operating with the P.R.R.A., the Mennonites first undertook medical work, opened a clinic in December, and in August opened the 24-bed La Plata hospital which they had built. In addition the Mennonite unit opened clinics in four outlying districts and offered dental services. The second part of the work consisted of community service, particularly the direction of recreational activities. When in 1947 the P.R.R.A. liquidated its program in the La Plata area, the Mennonte Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind., purchased the property. The Mission Board is now not only operating the La Plata hospital but has built churches and other institutions. In 1955 there were 267 members in 12 Mennonite churches and missions on the island, all an outgrowth of the work begun by the MCC in 1943. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 263-70; J. Holsinger, Serving Rural Puerto Rico (Scottdale, 1952).

La Salle, originally a town on the southern limits of Niagara Falls, N.Y., now a part of the city, is the location where Jacob Krehbiel (1835-1917), who affiliated with the G.C.M. Church about 1880, held services for a small group of followers. Situated in Niagara County and near the Sanborn Mennonite Church (q.v.), it was neighbor to Preacher David Habecker. Habecker's grandchildren moved into this urban center. There have been no members here since early in the 20th century. J.C.F.

La Salle Mennonite Brethren Church, of the municipality of MacDonald, Man., was organized by 17 families of La Salle and Osborne on Sept. 19, 1926. Its church building was erected in 1930, the lumber having been given by a friend of the Mennonites. In 1954 the baptized membership was 58. It is a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District Conferences of the Mennonite Brethren Church. Jacob Pauls is the minister. H.NE.

La Voz Menonita (The Mennonite Voice) is the official monthly organ (16 pp., 7 x 10½ in.) of the Argentine Mennonite Church. The first issue appeared in March 1932 with Albano Luayza as editor. Ernesto Suarez succeeded him in January 1949. Its purpose is to present the message of salvation and to expound Mennonite doctrines and practices. L.S.W.

Laakeman (Laekeman, Lakeman), Melis Pietersz, b. about 1670, d. Jan. 9, 1699, at Zaandijk, where he was a blacksmith, was preacher of the Mennonite congregation (Frisians) at Oosthuizen about 1691-93 and of Wormerveer (Frisians) 1693 until his death. Laakeman, a blacksmith's servant at Purmerend, was baptized in 1691 in the Frisian congregation of Oosthuizen; later he worked in Hoorn. He was married twice; both times his wife died only one year after marriage. Laakeman was a pious man, who had to struggle with poverty.

After his death a volume of his sermons was published: XXXVI Predicatiën (Amsterdam, 1700). These sermons were very popular; the book was used in the congregation of Balk, Friesland, until the middle of the 19th century (DB 1892, 76). Other members of the Lakeman family served also as preachers at Wormerveer. Some members of this family were found at neighboring Krommenie, and later also at Amsterdam. VDZ.

Het Leven en sterven van M. P. Laakeman (Amsterdam, n.d.—about 1700); Biogr. Wb. V, 434 f.; ML II, 604.

Laan, a Dutch Mennonite family found in the province of North Holland. Originally they were farmers at Middelie. Remmelt Laan (1645-1731) moved from Middelie to Wormerveer about 1720. His grandson Jan Dirksz Laan (1719-64), not a farmer like his ancestors, but a grocer, was preacher of the Frisian Mennonite congregation of Wormerveer 1746-64. He adopted Hartog (q.v.) as his family name. Also Remmert Laan, b. 1775 at Enge Wormer, d. 1831 at Wormerveer, went into business. He became a partner in the Wessanen en Laan factories (flour, cocoa, etc.) at Wormerveer, which had been founded in 1765 by his uncle Dirk Remmeltsz Laan. Like this uncle Remmert Laan was at the same time a deacon of the Wormerveer Frisian congregation, as were his sons Jan Laan (1803-91) and Adriaan Laan (1810-51). His grandson Dirk Laan (1843-1905), also director of the Wessanen en Laaen factories, was a senator 1897-1905. Reyer Laan, who belonged to the same family, was an untrained preacher of the congregation of Middelie-Axwijk 1746-81. Jan Jansz Laan of Amsterdam, d. 1738, apparently of the same family, was a member of the Lamist Mennonite congregation, being at the same time an active Collegiant (q.v.) and in 1712-38 serving as a "regent" (trustee) of the Oranjeappel Collegiant orphanage, as was his wife Agatha Bruin from 1718-d. 49. Some members of this family are still farmers in North Holland. vdZ.

J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 173, 175, 289, 291; Ned. Patriciaat XII (1921-22) 71-86; Naamlijst 1755 ff.

Labadists, the followers of Jean de Labadie (1610-74), a native of Boury, near Bordeaux, France. De Labadie had a Jesuit education. After his withdrawal from the order he preached on the freedom of the will and on grace as against the merit of works, and in 1650 he joined the French Reformed Church. Sixteen years later he was a preacher at Middelburg (Holland). Removed from office in 1668 because of his attacks on the secularized church, he founded a separatist church in Amsterdam, with well-attended meetings. When the magistrate forbade outsiders to attend worship in a home, the group found asylum with Princess Elisabeth, abbess at Herford, Westphalia, Germany, until they were banished as "sectarians, Anabaptists, and Quakers." Then they settled in Altona. After Labadie's death the group with 162 members returned to Holland, and located at the castle of Wiewerd. The colony was dissolved in 1732. There were several points of ideological contact between the Labadists and the Mennonites, since the Labadists tried to realize the ideal of the early Christian Church, requiring community of goods and a serious, holy life; but there is no evidence of any specific connections between the two groups. Labadie's ideas are best known from his book Le discernement d'une veritable église selon l'Ecriture (Amsterdam, 1668); in this book concerning the practice of free prophecy especially his pietism appears. His Manuel de piété (Middelburg, 1668), translated into German by G. Tersteegen under the title Handbüchlein der wahren Gottseligkeit, was once popular among the American Mennonites. Neff, vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 456-67; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs I and II (Haarlem, 1900, 1902) passim; H. Heppe, Geschichte des Pietismus (Leiden, 1879) 241-374; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 59 f., 218; Wilhelm Goeters, Die Vorbereitung des Pietismus in der Reformierten Kirche der Niederlande bis zur Labadistischen Krisis 1670 (Leipzig, 1911); Friedrich Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940); ML II, 603.

Labor Unions. The official attitude of the Mennonite Church (MC) to labor unions is described as follows in a report (1954) of the Committee on Economic and Social Relations (q.v.) of its General Conference: "In a manner analogous to that of the state, labor organizations as we know them serve a useful purpose for the maintenance of justice and a balance of power in a sub-Christian society. For this reason the Christian may co-operate with the union (as he does with the state) in so far as doing so does not conflict with his Christian testimony. Since they are power organizations, however, placing the demand for justice above the way of love, most unions reserve the right to use methods out of harmony with the Christian testimony, the strike, which violates the principle of nonresistance, being an obvious example. For this reason it is believed that the Christian must find the place where he can most consistently draw the line between co-operation and non-co-operation with the union." This is the general position of the more conservative American Mennonite groups, including the Brethren in Christ Church. It has come to explicit formulation in the past 20 years.

Continuous witness over a period of more than two decades has resulted in a rather general, and sometimes surprisingly sympathetic understanding of the Mennonite (MC) position by organized labor. One result of this has been a series of formal understandings with numerous unions in which the conscience of the nonresistant employee is recognized, he being excused from union membership and activity with the understanding that in case of conflict between employees resulting in a strike he maintains a position of neutrality, taking part on neither side of the conflict. The nonresistant employee accepts the conditions of work as determined by the union and management, and he pays to the union the equivalent of union dues, which in numerous cases are specified as a contribution for the benevolent and welfare services of the union. By 1956 the Committee on Economic and Social Relations had signed general understandings of this type with six international unions, the agreements applying to every local of these internationals. In the case of numerous other unions regional and local understandings had been entered into with the support of the international office, as well as many local understandings which did not necessarily have such support.

Although in 1956 hundreds of members of the church (MC) were working in union shop industries under the terms outlined above, and although this solution was generally considered satisfactory, the practice within the brotherhood with respect to labor relations was not uniform; and there was a general recognition that as in the case of the Christian's relation to the state so likewise his relation to the changing economic order requires continuous study in order that his witness concerning social justice, love, and nonresistance be kept clear, and that he be enabled to make a positive contribution toward harmonious human relations in the industrial world.

In line with this conviction the Committee on Economic and Social Relations was giving special attention to the responsibility of Mennonite industrial managers and their employees for mutual co-operation in the development of management-labor relations on the basis of Christian brotherhood, rather than by means of power in which management and labor are pitted against each other. Thus it was believed that the brotherhood would not only be giving a witness through the manner of its own economic relations, but would also be in a position to make a contribution to the achievement of harmonious management-labor relations in general.

After 1950 occasional meetings of Mennonite industrial employers and employees were held under the sponsorship of this committee looking toward this end, and a special study conference for the further examination of the Christian's relation to labor organizations was being planned for the autumn of 1957.

In other Mennonite groups having a considerable number of men employed in industry, no similar explicit position has been formulated, although similar basic concerns are present. In groups which are exclusively rural there has been no need for a clear position. In Europe, where Mennonites have not maintained a clear position on nonresistance, no particular position on labor unions has been taken.

G.F.H.

Lachmann, Johann (ca. 1492-1538), reformer of Heilbronn (q.v.), Württemberg, Germany, studied at the University of Heidelberg, became a priest in Heilbronn in 1514, sided with the Reformation in 1524, led it safely through the conflict with powerful opponents, tried with some success to lead the peasant movement along more moderate paths, and took a lenient attitude toward the Anabaptists. Neff.

HRE II, 197 f. _RGG_ (3d ed.) II, Col. 1447; M. von Rauch, _Johann Lachmann, der Reformator Heilbronns_ (Heilbronn, 1923); _ML_ II, 603.

Lachmund, a woman of Wintershausen, Thuringia, Germany, was seized in March 1543, at the instigation of Justus Menius (q.v.), with Franz Erbe and the wife of Betzenhans (q.v.), on the suspicion of having joined the Anabaptists. At the cross-examination conducted by Menius on July 16 at Eisenach, she declared that she confessed Anabaptist doctrine and would stay by it. The electoral councilors gave as their opinion that she was not to be subjected to a painful hearing (i.e., on the rack), because she had neither baptized nor been baptized, and recommended banishment. Elector John Frederick imposed this sentence on July 18, because "she would not desist from her unchristian and offensive errors on baptism, the sacrament, and other points." The same sentence with the same argument was also passed on Betzenhans's wife. Hege.

P. Wappler, _Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung_ (Münster, 1910) 94 f., 213 f.; _idem, Thüringen,_ 179; _ML_ II, 603.

Ladekopp, an ancient village in the Free State of Danzig, in the middle of the Vistula-Nogat delta. It is known to have existed in 1255. A Mennonite church was organized here in 1735 with the same name. In 1935 it had 537 baptized members and 213 children. The members were mostly farmers, owning 545 ha. of land, some merchants, industrialists, and retired persons. The Flemish Mennonites who settled in Ladekopp and surrounding localities belonged to the Grosswerder church, while the Frisian Mennonites united with the Orlofferfelde church. In 1735-40, when the Grosswerder congregation was divided into four parts, Ladekopp became the Orloff Quarter. They had their own preachers and deacons, but the elder served all four quarters.. The Naamlijst of 1743 names as preachers of Ladekopp (Flemish church) Jakob Wiebe, Abraham Wiebe, Hans Penner, and Pieter Klaassen (Clasen). They were followed by Gillis Wiens, Jakob Suckau, Cornelis Suckau 1753-*ca.*83, Abraham Konrath 1759, Peter Wiebe 1758-before 1800, Cornelis Wall 1762-before 1800, Isaak Teeuws (Töws) 1762-after 1802, Hans Wall 1762-before 1780, Peter Klaassen 1777-after 1802, Cornelis Klaassen 1782-*ca.*96, Johann Töws Jr. 1787-after 1802, Johann Wall 1787-*ca.*97, Hans Wall 1798-?, Peter Regier 1799-?, Abraham von Riesen 1801-? In later years Ladekopp was served by its own elder, six preachers, and two deacons. The later elders of Ladekopp with year of ordination were Jakob Wiebe 1833, Johann Töws 1853, Johann Wiens 1873, Johann Neufeldt 1905, and Johann Penner 1919.

In 1768 the congregation, with the consent of the bishop of the state church, built a meetinghouse in Ladekopp which seated 600 persons. For the members living in the southwest a church was built at Pordenau in 1800, with a seating capacity of 250. Both churches had adjoining cemeteries for their members. The home for poor members, built in 1800, was sold in 1894; needy members were by that time supported in their homes. Church records were kept from 1775 to the end of World War II (q.v.). The baptized membership of Ladekopp-Pordenau was 564 in 1852, 400 in 1882; that of Ladekopp-Pordenau-Orlofferfelde 707 (1,114 souls) in 1888; 1,141 souls in 1928; 1,021 souls in 1941 (739 baptized members). The last elders were Johann Penner of Prangenau (preacher 1903, elder 1919-d. 43) and Johannes Dyck II (preacher 1919-?).

In 1882 the congregation was incorporated. Since the members of the Ladekopp congregation and the Frisians of the Orlofferfelde church lived side by side in the same village, and since to obtain corporation rights it was necessary to define limits, these congregations merged for business purposes. Their leaders met for the discussion of common problems.

The Ladekopp church belonged to the Conference of the East and West Prussian Mennonite Churches, and from 1892 was a member of the Vereinigung (q.v.). In the fighting at the end of World War II in 1945 the meetinghouses at Ladekopp and Pordenau were burned down. The members were all evacuated westward into Denmark and Germany. (ML II, 604.) A.J., vdZ.

Ladekopp, a village on the left bank of the Tokmak River of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, Russia, named after a Mennonite village in West Prussia, was established in 1806 by 26 Mennonite families from Prussia, being one of the oldest villages of the Molotschna settlement. In 1914 it had 100 Mennonite families with 460 inhabitants. The village had a school and was primarily occupied with agriculture. Most of the inhabitants belonged to the Petershagen Mennonite Church (q.v.).

In 1929-30 the collectivization of agriculture took place and the first families were sent to Siberia as kulaks. In 1941 only one third of the population was Mennonite. At the outbreak of the war some men were drafted into the army and some had to dig trenches. Soon all men above 16 years of age were sent east. The women and children were gathered at the station of Gross-Tokmak on Sept.

30, 1941, to be transported east. When the Germans approached they returned to their homes. On Sept. 12, 1943, the Mennonite population of the village, some 140 persons, was evacuated to Germany. Only about 25 persons succeeded in going to Canada and two to Paraguay; the rest were returned to Russia. (ML II, 604.) C.K.

Laer, van, an aristocratic Dutch Mennonite family of businessmen. Jan van Laer, a deacon of the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam, was excommunicated in 1623 by the Flemish Elder Jan Luies (q.v.), because van Laer did not agree with his strict ideas (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 562; N.N.B.Wb. III, 709). Willem van Laer, originally from Amsterdam, then living at Hamburg, Germany, married Levina Coppenol (about 1700) of Amsterdam. Their son Cornelis van Laer of Amsterdam in 1746 joined the Moravian Brethren in the Netherlands and became treasurer of their Mission Association. Some of the van Laer family were deacons at Amsterdam. A side branch of this family has the name Blo(c)k van Laer. There are some descendants in the United States who spell their name Black van Lear. vdZ.

Lafayette First Mennonite Church (EMC), South 26th and Kossuth Streets, Lafayette, Ind., was organized on Aug. 2, 1942, with 24 members under District Superintendent N. J. Schmucker. The first pastor was Reuben C. Cantrell. The concrete block building was erected in 1941 and the auditorium enlarged in 1951. E. G. Steiner served as pastor 1946-51, Paul A. McCoy 1951-55, and Owen Haifley 1956- . The membership was 70 in 1956.

The congregation is actually the direct successor to an older congregation, whose meetinghouse, built in 1885, was located about eight miles east of Lafayette, north of the village of Perth, and was sold in 1941. The community here was started in the 1850's by Amish settlers from Butler Co., Ohio, and some direct from Germany. The chief family names were Gingerich, Ehresman, Imhoff, Zimmerman, Amstutz, Mellinger, and Gerber. Earlier ministers were Christian Zimmerman, John Zimmerman, and Christian Gerber, in that order, all of whom are buried in the Mennonite cemetery just south of Edna Mills. E.G.St.

Lagrange County, Ind., which lies directly east of Elkhart County, on the Michigan border, is an integral part of the Elkhart-Lagrange County Mennonite and Amish settlement. The first to arrive here were a group of Amish families from Somerset Co., Pa., and Holmes Co., Ohio, who settled first in Clinton Twp., Elkhart Co., in 1841, a portion of this group moving 15 miles further east to Newberry Twp., Lagrange Co. The descendants of this group divided about 1860 into the Old Order Amish and the more progressive element who later became a part of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, largely in the Forks congregation, whose meetinghouse lies just east of the Elkhart County boundary. A second group of Amish, progressive from the beginning, came from Fairfield Co., Ohio, to organize the Maple Grove Mennonite Church at Topeka about 1855. This group suffered two divisions, one before 1900, and one in 1923, which resulted in the Topeka Mennonite (GCM) Church.

The Townline Conservative Mennonite Church was formed out of former Old Order Amish about 1885, with its meetinghouse just across the eastern border of Elkhart County. Mennonite settlers from Somerset Co., Pa., near Johnstown, were the majority element in the settlement made about 1860, which led to the formation of the Shore Mennonite Church (1874) near Shipshewana, later the Emma Mennonite Church (1901), the Marion Mennonite Church (1947), and the Plato Mennonite Church (1950). All these churches are west of the city of Lagrange, except the latter which is five miles east of Lagrange.

In 1954 there were the following congregations in Lagrange County: Old Order Amish, 17 congregations with ca. 1,000 members; 6 Mennonite (MC) congregations with 1,132; one Conservative Mennonite with 120; one General Conference Mennonite with 235. The total Mennonite and Amish baptized membership in Lagrange County in 1954 was thus ca. 2,500 in 25 congregations. H.S.B.

Lahoma Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located in Lahoma, Garfield Co., Okla., was founded about 1906 as an affiliate of the Sued-Hoffnungsfeld congregation of Fairview, Okla., a member of the Southern District Conference. The congregation built a church and chose John Schneider as its leader. The largest total membership (baptized) was about 30 (1914).

Among the reasons for its disbanding in 1923 were that some families moved away, others found other church homes, and lack of a leader, although several ministers of the near-by M.B. congregations upon request from the Southern District Conference tried hard to keep it going.

The members of the Lahoma M.B. congregation, together with members of the North Enid M.B. Church that had meanwhile settled in Enid, began to gather in the city for services and organized as the Enid-Lahoma M.B. Church. The name is now Enid City Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.). P.C.G.

Laird is a district of the large Rosenort Mennonite (GCM) Church of Saskatchewan, centering in the town of Laird (pop. 400), about 50 miles north of the city of Saskatoon. The Rosenort Mennonite Church, established in 1894 by the newly arrived Elder Peter Regier from Prussia, contains eleven church districts and has over 1,400 baptized members. Laird was one of the first organized districts of this congregation. It has had a church building since 1910. The first ministers were Heinrich Warkentin, Jacob Janzen, Cornelius K. Ens, David Epp (1953). Among the ministers now living are C. F. Sawatzky and Arthur Friesen, the leader of the church. At present four ministers and one deacon are serving the Laird district, which has over 100 members. The elder (1954) is J. G. Rempel, who lives in the main district of the congregation, Rosthern. The town also has an M.B. church. J.G.R.

Laird (Sask.) Mennonite Brethren Church is a member of the Canadian M.B. Conference. The Laird congregation was organized in 1898 with approximately 60 members under the leadership of Jacob B. Wiens, apparently the first organized M.B. church in Saskatchewan. The meetinghouse was first built in the country and later moved into town. Men who have served as ministers and leaders of the church are Jacob B. Wiens, Elder David Dyck, P. A. Penner, D. D. P. Epp, Jacob Wieler, J. B. Fischer, and the present leader Henry Speiser. The 1954 membership was 47. J.H.E.

Lake Charles (La.) Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, began in 1898, when the first settlers moved down from the northern states. A few families came from Austell, Ga., in 1905. The largest membership was about 40. The bishops serving have been Andrew Shenk, J. M. Kreider, J. N. Durr, and E. S. Hallman. The ministers have been Jonas Nice, Clarence Bontrager, and John E. Wenger. At present (1954) the E. G. Leidig family alone remains in the community. E.S.H.

Lake Region Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the North Central Conference, was organized in May 1928, nine miles from Detroit Lakes in Becker Co., Minn. This is predominantly a dairy section and cheap land has been a major attraction. There are 412 lakes in a radius of 25 miles from Detroit Lakes, and the land is quite hilly and covered with second growth timber except where farmers have cleared it and built homes.

The J. B. Stehman, J. D. Stoll, and J. C. Gingerich families moved to the Detroit Lakes community in the fall of 1926; the first family was from South Dakota, and the last two from Ulen, Minn. Later others came from Cass Co., Mo., South Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, Montana, and Pennsylvania. Nineteen families from Nebraska represent the greatest influx from any one state.

The seven rural mission (MC) stations in northern Minnesota sprang up following work started at White Earth in a schoolhouse as a branch Sunday school of the Lake Region Mennonite Church. The Lake Region meetinghouse was dedicated on July 1, 1936, and enlarged in 1948. In 1954 the membership was 87, with Elmer D. Hershberger as bishop and Menno Erb as preacher. J. C. Gingerich was minister 1926-53. E.D.He.

Lakenbereider, een (a cloth manufacturer), an unknown person, was burned at the stake on Aug. 18, 1550, at Antwerp, Belgium. The Antwerpsch Chronykje (quoted by Génard in Antw. Arch.-Blad) relates that when an Anabaptist baker of Gent was burned at the stake on the market place of Antwerp, this Lakenbereider approached the victim and kissed him, exhorting him to remain steadfast. He was at once arrested and executed a few days after, because he was "unwilling to abandon his error." This martyr could not be identified. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 390, 393.) vdZ.

Lakeside Hutterite Bruderhof, located near Cranford, Alta., was founded in 1935. Their preacher Peter Hofer, who was chosen in the Wolf Creek, S.D., Bruderhof in 1926, moved to the Wolf Creek commune near Stirling, Alta., and from there went with several families to found the Lakeside Bruderhof. Joseph Wipf was chosen to the ministry here in 1944. In 1947 the commune numbered 162 souls, with 64 baptized members. D.D.

Lakeside Hutterite Bruderhof, located nine miles west of Headingly, Man., was founded in 1947 by Preacher Jörg Wipf and ten families from the Maxwell Bruderhof six miles west of Lakeside. The Brethren bought land and built houses and stables. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 78 souls, 28 of them being baptized members. D.D.

Lakeview Mennonite Church (MC), a rural congregation, located at Wolford, Pierce Co., N.D., a member of the North Central Conference. The first preaching service was held on Nov. —, 1913. In July 1916 a series of meetings was held by I. S. Mast and 22 members were received into the church. A congregation was then organized, a church was built, and a Bible conference was held. In May 1916 J. C. Gingerich of Missouri was ordained and given charge of the congregation, serving until he moved to Ulen, Minn. In 1919 Eli G. Hochstetler was ordained deacon, 1923 minister, and 1926 bishop; he is still (1955) serving the congregation. In 1926 Calvin Ringler was ordained a minister, serving until he moved to Colorado for his health. In 1931 John Stoll was ordained minister. Summer Bible school has been held each summer since 1939. The congregation came largely from an Amish background. The membership in 1955 was 112, with Rufus Beachy as minister. F.E.K.

Lambach: see Lembach.

Lambert (John Nycolsen), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Nov. 22, 1538, at Smithfield in London, England, together with three unknown martyrs from Flanders. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Lambert Dirks, an Anabaptist martyr, executed Jan. 1, 1539, at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland. (DB 1891, 1; ML I, 451.) vdZ.

Lambert van Doornick, an Anabaptist martyr, was seized with five brethren, Adriaen van Hee, Joos Meeuwens, Willem de Hoedemaeker, Goossen de Hoedemaecker, and Egbert de Hoedemaecker, as they were holding an evening service near Doornik (Tournai) in Flanders in 1558, and burned at the stake in a forest on Hennegau territory. (Mart. Mir. D 202, E 584; ML II, 606.) Neff.

Lambert, Sidenham (1855-1937), a minister in the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, was born in Northampton Co., Pa. He was ordained in 1876. He was married to Emma Hosller in 1876, who died in 1903. Among their eight children was Mrs. J. A. Huffman. He was later married twice more, to Amanda Long in 1905, and to Anna Flatter in 1915. He held pastorates in Fleetwood, Pa., Bethel Church in Elkhart Co., Ind., Potsdam, Ohio, and Beech Grove, Darke Co., Ohio. He served as presiding elder in the Indiana and Ohio Conference for a number of years; was president of the General Conference Executive Board for eight years, treasurer of the Indiana and Ohio Conference for six years, and a member of the General Conference for many years as well as its chairman in 1900. J.A.Hu.

Lambert Mennonite Church (MC), located 7½ miles west of Job, in Dry Fork District, Randolph Co., W. Va., is operated by the Home Mission Board of the Middle District of Virginia Conference. Work was begun here in 1900. The meetinghouse was built in 1949. The church serves the people of Middle Mountain and Lambert Hollow. Services had been held in the Wymer and Lambert schoolhouses for 50 years. The membership in 1956 was 35, with Paul Good serving as minister. H.A.B.

Lambrecht (Lambert) Duppijns of Haarlem, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on June 2, 1539, at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. Duppijns was arrested in his own house on May 23, with his wife and a few other Anabaptists. When the house was searched about 500 copies of unbound books by David Joris (q.v.) were found and confiscated. On May 24 Duppijns was tried; he refused to admit the stay of David Joris at his house. Thereupon the officials took recourse to a trick. Adriaen Adriaensz, an Anabaptist who had recanted, was imprisoned with Duppijns, pretending to Duppijns that he was still a loyal member. So the officials learned the secret. On May 28 Duppijns was tortured a second time. Duppijns, who was a native of the bishopric of Münster, Westphalia, Germany, was a David-Jorist, as were also his wife and the whole company meeting in his house. VDZ.

Bijdr. en Mededeelingen Hist. Genootschap, Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 199-201, 208 f., 211, 217 f.

Lambrecht Henricx, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on Dec. 16, 1575, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Augustijn de Vuelpere. Lambrecht was sentenced to death because he had attended Mennonite meetings and possessed "heretical" books. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 197; XIV, 96 f., No. 1102.) VDZ.

Lambrecht Jacobs (Grootboot) of Purmerend, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, had sailed in March 1534 from Amsterdam en route to Münster, but was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). He obviously was set free here but was rearrested in 1540, and sentenced to death on Sept. 22, 1540, by the Court of Holland. The execution by the sword took place at The Hague. Lambrecht belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism, being a follower of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 232, 744 f.) VDZ.

Lambrecht Linthermans, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake in 1537 (exact date unknown) at Antwerp, Belgium. Linthermans was a wool weaver. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 434; XIV, 14 f., No. 159.) VDZ.

Lambrechts-Vos, Anna (b. 1876 at Rotterdam, d. 1932 at Soest), was a Dutch Mennonite musician and composer of cantatas and songs, and 1894-1928 organist of the Rotterdam Mennonite Church. She was a sister of Karel Vos (q.v.), a Mennonite minister and outstanding historian. (Zondagsbode XLV, 1931-32, No. 13.) VDZ.

Lame Deer Mennonite Mission Church (GCM): see Petter Memorial Mennonite Church.

Lamist Mennonite Church (Kerk bij 't Lam) in Amsterdam, now known as the Singelkerk. In 1607 Harmen Hendricks van Warendorp, a native of Aachen, Germany, purchased a lot on the Singel for 5,000 gilders, beside the brewery "'t Lam" (i.e., at the sign of the Lamb). There he had a church building erected (1608) that cost him 7,800 gilders, "out of love to God and the church." It became the place of worship of the Flemish branch of the Mennonites. The church was completely remodeled in 1639-40. It remained the property of the van Warendorps until 1740, when the congregation bought it with the adjacent houses for the sum of 29,573 gilders. In 1777 an organ was put into the church. In 1840 it was remodeled again. It is still the meeting place of the Mennonites of Amsterdam. Thorough and costly repairs were made in 1953-54, when the decaying wooden pillars of 1609 on which the church was built were replaced by concrete pillars.

The Flemish group in Amsterdam was given the name "bij 't Lam" in 1608. It was a large, important congregation. In 1632, on the basis of the Dordrecht Confession, part of the Old Flemish joined the Lamist congregation; in 1639 it was still further augmented by its union with the United Frisians and High Germans. It had a membership of about 1,000 at this time. In 1664 a split occurred in consequence of a dispute between Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and Samuel Apostool (q.v.), when the latter withdrew with 500 members and henceforth met in a house with the sign of the sun (see Zonists and Lammerenkrijgh). Four years later, June 1, 1668, the Waterlander congregation "bij den Toren" united with the "Lamb" congregation. The united church (vereenigde Gemeente) used both church buildings until 1812; after this the church "bij den Toren" was no longer in use. In 1728 the small Old Frisian (or Jan Jacobs group) congregation, meeting in the Bloemstraat, joined the Lamist congregation. In 1801 the Zonist congregation united with the Lamist and Toren groups.

The church known as "van 't Lam en Toren" assumed responsibility for the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary (q.v.) in 1735, thus laying the foundation for the A.D.S. (1811). It had at an earlier period helped poor congregations to engage trained ministers. Thus the Lamist church has been a great blessing to the Mennonites, not only in Amsterdam, but also in all the Netherlands. VDZ.

DB 1863, 1-42; 1898, 1-54; Naamlijst 1802, 59-68; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 131-228, 1243-1343; ML II, 606.

Lamistische Sociëteit (Lamist Conference): see Zuid-Hollandsche Sociëteit.

Lamists (also called Galenists after their leader Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan) was the name of the group of 1,500 left in the Mennonite church at Amsterdam after Samuel Apostool in consequence of the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) separated from the Flemish "bij 't Lam" group in 1664 with 500 members, and met for worship in a house with a gable sign "to the sun." Hence the Apostool group were known as Zonists (q.v.). The division extended to almost all the Mennonites of Holland. In the new names, Lamist and Zonist, the old distinctions between Flemish, Frisian, etc., were swallowed up. The Lamist, the more liberal wing, was the larger. Even today one can see on the weather vane on many a Dutch Mennonite church a sketch of a lamb. By the end of the 18th century the gulf between the Zonists and Lamists was largely bridged over. At the beginning of the 19th century union was achieved everywhere. Nevertheless throughout the 19th century traces of the division were still perceptible. (ML II, 606.) vdZ.

Lammerenkrijgh (War of the Lambs), the name of the dispute which broke out soon after 1650 in the Flemish Lamist congregation (bij 't Lam) in Amsterdam on the question whether the Flemish was the (only) true church and whether or not a confession is essential to salvation. The older party in the church was opposed to Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and his Collegiant ideas. While Galenus and his followers stressed "life" rather than doctrine, the conservative party held to the unabridged confession of faith. Thus the lamentable strife ensued, which first split the Amsterdam church and then burst apart the recently won unification of the Mennonites in all Holland (see Amsterdam Mennonite Church). Conflicts at Rotterdam and Utrecht, like the Amsterdam quarrel, had as early as 1660-61 ended in a victory of the conservatives.

This quarrel has become known in history as the "Lammerenkrijgh." The name is a derisive epithet for the unpleasant bickering of the lambs of God, borrowed from one of the innumerable polemics of the time. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 54-98; W. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 149-75; DB 1901, 1-37; 1916, 145-95; ML II, 606.

Lammertsz, Lammert, living at Haarlem, Holland, about 1644 (biographical data not available), participated in the controversy between Petrus Bontemps (q.v.), Joost Hendriksz (q.v.), and Passchier de Fijne, by publishing in 1644 two pamphlets in which he attacked both Bontemps, who had combatted the Mennonites, and the liberal ideas of Hendriksz and de Fijne, who had defended the Mennonites. (Biogr. Wb. V, 507; Catalogus Amst., 201.) vdZ.

Lamotte (Mich.) United Missionary Church had a membership of 28 in 1953. Its pastor was B. H. Surbrook.

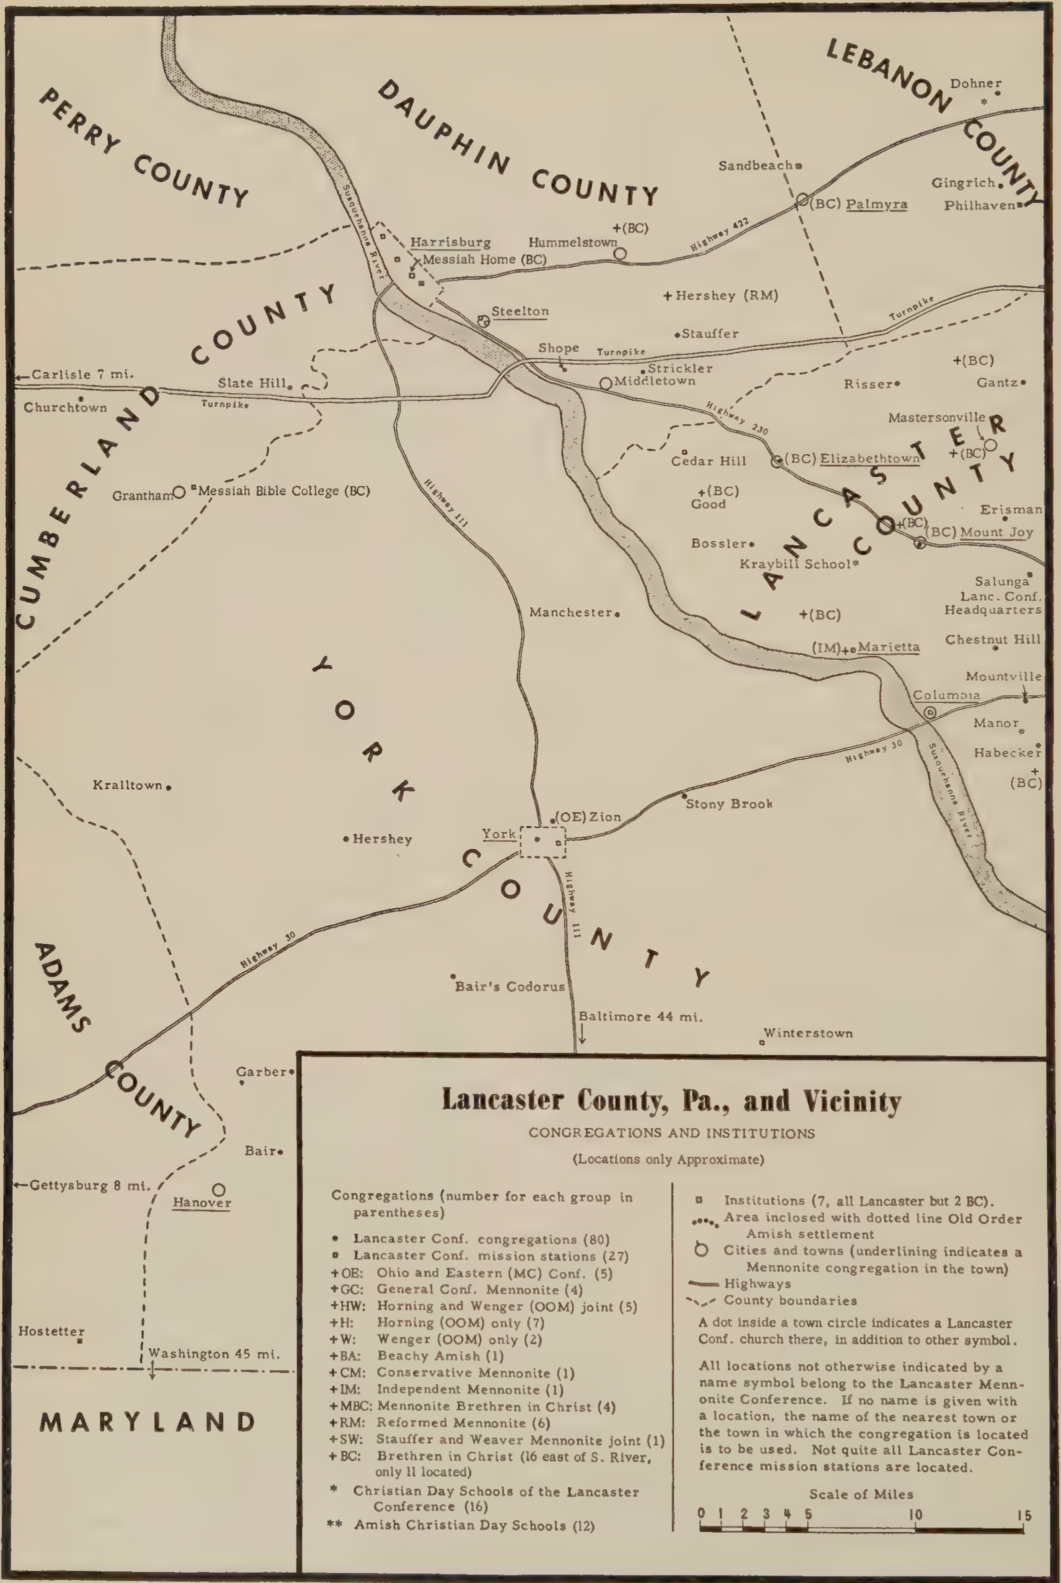
Lampeter Music Hall, located in Lampeter, Lancaster Co., Pa., has this foundation marker: "Lampeter Music, Lecture and Bible School lovingly dedicated to the memory of the early settlers of Lancaster County 1898." To Henry B. Herr belongs most of the credit for this structure. It became a preaching point for the Brick Mennonite (MC) congregation, two miles away. In November 1905 A. D. Wenger conducted here one of the first revivals held in Lancaster Conference, following approval of such work in the fall Conference. Amos Geigley and others held continued meetings here and it was a preaching point, somewhat under Henry B. Herr's supervision. By about 1915 this mission moved back to the Brick church. Later the local school board bought the building, and it is still being used as a school. I.D.L.

Lancaster, Pa. (pop. 64,000), the "Hickory Town" laid out in 1730, was the first inland town of William Penn's backwoods, almost 70 miles west of his Philadelphia settlement of 1681. James Hamilton, whose family named Hamilton, Ont., had earlier circumscribed a hickory tree at George Gibson's Tavern, a frequent Indian rendezvous. This tavern was near a fine spring, and was the only house in Lancaster. The log courthouse was built on the square in 1730. The town soon became a shopping center for a strong Mennonite community. By 1752 the population was 311. It was the seat of the Continental Congress of the Thirteen Colonies, meeting from Oct. 1, 1777, for nine months. It was the state capital 1799 to 1812, when Harrisburg permanently claimed this honor. It was the home of President James Buchanan. The Mennonite community in this agricultural Eden and this rapidly growing inland metropolis in the heart of Lancaster County were mutually benefited. It is the home of Armstrong Linoleum, RCA, Alcoa, Hamilton Watch, of silks and New Holland farm machinery. One Mennonite (MC) church, the Chestnut Street church, built in 1879, has spread so that today there are eight missions in and on the borders of this city. In addition there is one Reformed Mennonite, one General Conference Mennonite, and one Mennonite Brethren in Christ church here. The total Mennonite membership in the city in 1956 was about 600.

Lancaster city is the head and trading center of the largest compact Mennonite and Amish community in North America, and since the dissolution of the Mennonite settlements in Russia, probably of the world, with a total of over 25,000 baptized members living within a radius of 25 miles, in over 150 congregations. (ML II, 606.) I.D.L.

Lancaster Christian Street Mission (MC), a mission for colored, was opened in 1933 as an outpost for the E. Vine Street Mission, Lancaster Mennonite Conference. It opened on Howard Street, moved to 460 Rockland Street, but since 1939 has been located in a new meetinghouse at S. Christian and Locust Street. Joseph S. Lehman was superintendent of the work from the start and was also pastor 1935-55. In 1955 D. Stoner Krady was bishop and Lester T. Weaver minister. The membership in 1956 was 51. I.D.L.

Lancaster County, Pa., was carved out of Chester County and incorporated as the fourth in Pennsylvania in 1729. Named after Lancashire in North England, this county of the Indian country had but a few explorers and Indian exploiters before the Swiss and Palatine immigrants of 1710 arrived, who settled along Pequea Creek for 20 miles. Large influxes of Mennonites (1717-56) from the Palatinate (some from Switzerland direct) followed, with contingents of Lutherans and Reformed. By 1738



PERRY COUNTY
DAUPHIN COUNTY
LEBANON COUNTY
CUMBERLAND COUNTY
YORK COUNTY
LANCASTER COUNTY
ADAMS COUNTY
MARYLAND
Susquehanna River
Dohner
Sandbeach
(BC) Palmyra
Gingrich
Philhaven
Highway 422
+(BC)
Harrisburg
Hummelstown
Messiah Home (BC)
+ Hershey (RM)
Steelton
Stauffer
Turnpike
Shope
Strickler
Middletown
+(BC)
Risser
Gantz
Carlisle 7 mi.
Slate Hill
Churchtown
Highway 230
Mastersonville
+(BC)
Cedar Hill
(BC) Elizabethtown
Grantham
Messiah Bible College (BC)
+(BC)
Good
Erisman
Highway 111
(BC)
(BC) Mount Joy
Bossler
Kraybill School*
Salunga
Lanc. Conf. Headquarters
Manchester
+(BC)
(IM)+ Marietta
Chestnut Hill
Mountville
Columbia
Manor
Habecker
+ (BC)
Highway 30
Kralltown
Stony Brook
(OE) Zion
York
Hershey
Bair's Codorus
Baltimore 44 mi.
Winterstown
Garber
Bair
Gettysburg 8 mi.
Hanover
Hostetter
Washington 45 mi.

Lancaster County, Pa., and Vicinity

CONGREGATIONS AND INSTITUTIONS

(Locations only Approximate)

Congregations (number for each group in parentheses)

- • Lancaster Conf. congregations (80)
- ▪ Lancaster Conf. mission stations (27)
- +OE: Ohio and Eastern (MC) Conf. (5)
- +GC: General Conf. Mennonite (4)
- +HW: Horning and Wenger (OOM) joint (5)
- +H: Horning (OOM) only (7)
- +W: Wenger (OOM) only (2)
- +BA: Beachy Amish (1)
- +CM: Conservative Mennonite (1)
- +IM: Independent Mennonite (1)
- +MBC: Mennonite Brethren in Christ (4)
- +RM: Reformed Mennonite (6)
- +SW: Stauffer and Weaver Mennonite joint (1)
- +BC: Brethren in Christ (16 east of S. River, only 11 located)
- * Christian Day Schools of the Lancaster Conference (16)
-  Amish Christian Day Schools (12)

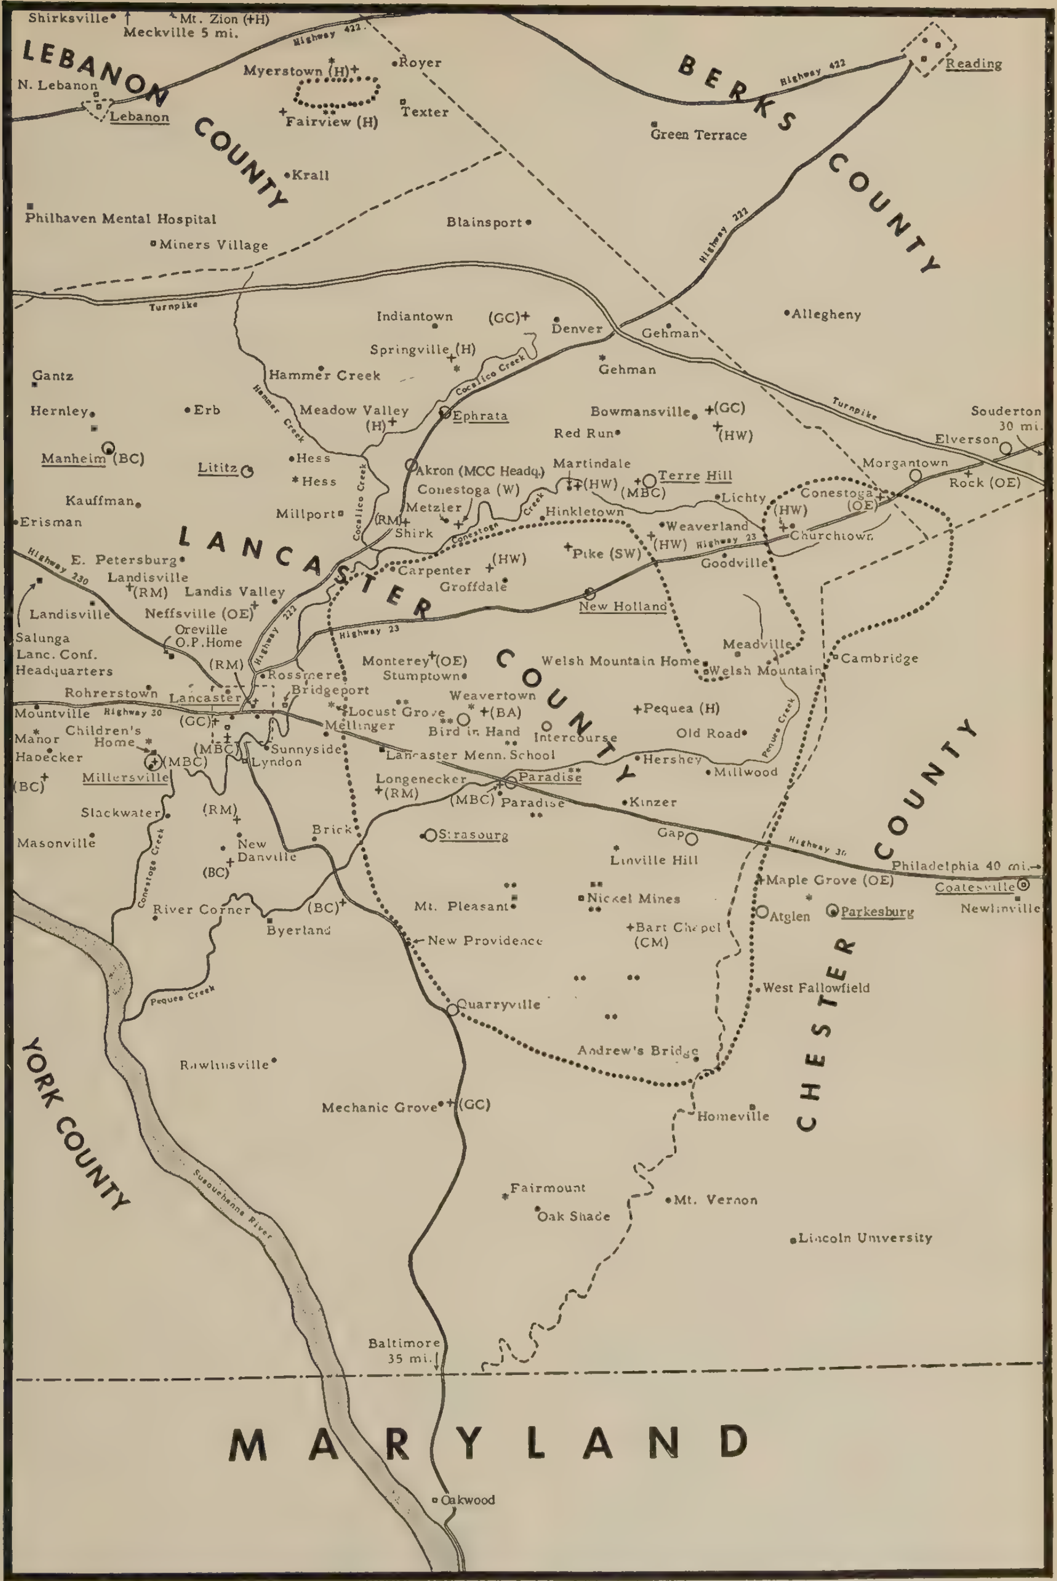
- ▫ Institutions (7, all Lancaster but 2 BC).
- •••. Area inclosed with dotted line Old Order Amish settlement
- ○ Cities and towns (underlining indicates a Mennonite congregation in the town)
- — Highways
- -.- County boundaries

A dot inside a town circle indicates a Lancaster Conf. church there, in addition to other symbol.

All locations not otherwise indicated by a name symbol belong to the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. If no name is given with a location, the name of the nearest town or the town in which the congregation is located is to be used. Not quite all Lancaster Conference mission stations are located.

Scale of Miles

0 1 2 3 4 5 10 15



Shirksville
Mt. Zion (+H)
Meckville 5 mi.
Highway 422
LEBANON COUNTY
N. Lebanon
Lebanon
Myerstown (H)
Royer
Fairview (H)
Texter
BERKS COUNTY
Highway 422
Reading
Green Terrace
Krall
Philhaven Mental Hospital
Miners Village
Blainsport
Highway 222
Turnpike
Indiantown
(GC)
Denver
Springville (H)
Gehman
Gehman
Allegheny
Cocalico Creek
Hammer Creek
Gantz
Hernley
Erb
Hammer Creek
Meadow Valley (H)
Ephrata
Bowmansville
(GC)
(HW)
Red Run
Souderton 30 mi.
Turnpike
Elverson
Manheim (BC)
Lititz
Hess
Hess
Cocalico Creek
Akron (MCC Headq.)
Martindale
(HW)
(MBC)
Terre Hill
Morgantown
Rock (OE)
Kauffman
Erisman
Millport
Conestoga (W)
Metzler
(RM)
Shirk
Creek
Hinkletown
Lichty
Conestoga (OE)
(HW)
LANCASTER COUNTY
Conestoga
Weaverland
(HW)
Highway 23
Churchtown
Highway 230
E. Petersburg
Landisville (RM)
Carpenter
(HW)
Pike (SW)
Goodville
Groffdale
Landis Valley
Neffsville (OE)
Landisville
New Holland
Salunga Lanc. Conf. Headquarters
Oreville O.P. Home
Highway 222
Highway 23
Meadville
(RM)
Monterey (OE)
Stumptown
Welsh Mountain Home
Welsh Mountain
Cambridge
Rossmere
Bridgeport
Rohrerstown
Lancaster
Weavertown
Mountville
Highway 30
(GC)
Locust Grove
(BA)
Pequea (H)
Pequea Creek
Mellinger
Bird in Hand
Intercourse
Old Road
Manor
Children's Home
(MBC)
Sunnyside
Hapecker
(MBC)
Lyndon
Lancaster Menn. School
Hershey
Millwood
(BC)
Millersville
Longenecker
(RM)
Paradise
(MBC)
Paradise
Kinzer
Slackwater
(RM)
Brick
Strasburg
Gap
Highway 30
CHESTER COUNTY
Masonville
Conestoga Creek
New Danville
(BC)
Linville Hill
Philadelphia 40 mi.
Maple Grove (OE)
Coatesville
River Corner
(BC)
Mt. Pleasant
Nickel Mines
Atglen
Parkesburg
Newlinville
Byerland
New Providence
Bart Chapel (CM)
West Fallowfield
Pequea Creek
Quarryville
Andrew's Bridge
Rawlinsville
YORK COUNTY
Mechanic Grove
(GC)
Homeville
Susquehanna River
Fairmount
Oak Shade
Mt. Vernon
Lincoln University
Baltimore 35 mi.
MARYLAND
Oakwood

the population was 2,560; by 1752, 3,977; by 1850, 98,944; and by 1954, 241,000. From the first settlement, which was made at Lampeter, the Mennonites went north to the city and then branched over the county, leaving the south for the Scotch-Irish and Friends, and the east for the Welsh. Postlethwaite was the first seat of local government, but by 1730 it was moved to "Hickory Town" (Lancaster), where it has remained. The Mennonites, so strongly entrenched as farmers in the county, for decades played a strong role in the county's prosperity. The United Brethren, Reformed Mennonite, Evangelical Church, and Brethren in Christ groups started here, and the Church of God had very early essential support in the county.

In Lancaster County there are about 12,600 Mennonites (MC) in 80 congregations or preaching points, 3,100 Old Order Amish in 30 congregations, 2,900 Old Order Mennonites in 17 congregations, 318 Stauffer, Reidenbach, and Weaver (a type of Old Order) Mennonites. The Beachy Amish have two congregations with 269 members. The Ohio and Eastern Conference has eight congregations with 1,400 members in this area, although part of the membership is in the bordering territory of Berks County and Chester County. The General Conference Mennonites have three congregations, in Lancaster, Bowmansville, and Denver, with 207 members. The Reformed Mennonites (Herrites) have 225 members in this area, their original starting point having been near Lancaster city. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ have two congregations, Lancaster and Terre Hill, with 110 members, also a mission point at Paradise. Thus these eight distinct groups of Mennonites had in 1954, 21,300 baptized members in over 150 congregations. This is the largest concentration of Mennonites in such a compact area anywhere in North America, and since the dissolution of the compact Mennonite settlements in Russia, anywhere in the world.

Two related peace church groups, the Church of the Brethren and the Brethren in Christ, also have numerous strong congregations in the county, the former having 21 congregations with 7,500 members, the latter 12 congregations with 1,200 members.

Lancaster County Mennonites have several institutions in addition to a number of elementary schools. These are all under the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference: Lancaster Mennonite School (1942, Lancaster), two homes for the aged, i.e., Mennonite Home (1903, Lancaster) and Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home (1898, New Holland), the Mennonite Children's Home (1911, Millersville), and Philhaven Hospital (1952, Lebanon, Pa., for mental and nervous diseases). A headquarters center for the Lancaster Mennonite Conference and its mission board is being developed at Salunga. The Mennonite Central Committee's headquarters have been at Akron since 1937.

The Lancaster County area is noted for its outstanding agricultural production, in which the Mennonites and Amish have always played a major role. It has often ranked in the first three counties in the United States for total value of agricultural production and is justly called the "Garden Spot." It also presents a beautiful landscape with its gently rolling valleys and well-kept farms and countryside.

I.D.L.

Ira D. Landis, "Mennonite Agriculture in Colonial Lancaster County, Pennsylvania," MQR XIX (1945) 254-72; H. M. J. Klein, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, A History (N.Y., 1924) 4 vols.; H. Roddy, Physical and Industrial Geography of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania (Lancaster, 1916); I. D. Rupp, History of Lancaster County (Lancaster, 1844); Proceedings of the Lancaster County Historical Society, 1895- (Lancaster); W. Kollmorgen, The Old Order Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania (Washington, D.C., U.S.D.A., 1942); ML II, 607 f.

Lancaster County (Pa.) Amish first settled in that part of the county which in 1752 was organized as Berks County (q.v.). Some Palatine Amish settled north and west of the present site of Reading as early as the second decade of the 18th century. They were joined later by Amish from Switzerland. Settlement within the present boundaries of Lancaster County began in 1759 when John Hertzler and his wife Veronica moved south from the northern frontiers of the county in consequence of Indian raids and the massacre of some Amish settlers during the French and Indian War. The Hertzlers were joined in 1760 in the Conestoga Valley (q.v.) near Morgantown by the family of Jacob Mast, also his father-in-law, Michael Hoelley (Hooley), and John Lapp.

Jacob Mast seems to have been the first Amish minister to serve the new congregation, but Christian Stoltzfus, son of Nicholas Stoltzfus, a Palatine immigrant who arrived in 1766, is said to have been the first ordained Amish minister to settle within the present bounds of Lancaster County. Family names which occur most frequently among the Amish in the county are Beiler, Fisher, Glick, Kauffman, Hertzler, Mast, King, Zook, Stoltzfus, Lantz, Lapp, Esh, and Blank.

Jacob Hertzler, living in the northern part of what is now Berks County, served the Conestoga group as bishop until his death in 1786. He was succeeded by Jacob Mast, ordained bishop in 1787. He in turn was followed by Peter Blank and John P. Mast. From the beginning of Jacob Mast's service as bishop the colony flourished. He was a prosperous farmer but he found time to visit and help build the other Amish settlements in Berks, Chester, and Lancaster counties. He is said to have visited also the congregations in Cambria and Somerset counties. His 12 children all married Amish mates and reared families in the Amish church. By 1850 nearly the entire membership of the large congregation was related to this Mast family by marriage or direct descent. A large percentage of the 6,000 descendants of Nicholas Stoltzfus are known for their conservatism and have remained loyal to the Amish or Amish Mennonite Church. David Beiler of Gap held firmly to the old order when western congregations began to erect meetinghouses in 1862 and to introduce other innovations. On the other hand, the Millers, Kurtzes, Zooks, Hertzlers, Reichenbachs, and others have hundreds of descendants in the Lutheran, Reformed, and United Evangelical denominations of Berks County and throughout the nation. There is always the possibility, to be sure, that many of these are the descendants of early non-Amish Swiss and Palatine settlers. Since the Amish rarely receive any non-Amish into their congregations, and since those who "marry out" very rarely remain in an Amish congregation, the Lancaster County Amish have remained an almost purely Swiss-Palatine racial group within the bounds of their adopted country and retain the cultural mores of their ancestors.

The Amish by natural increase and immigration have spread over a large part of the eastern and southeastern part of Lancaster County. Camp meetings and revival meetings by pietistic groups have swept away a considerable number of the Amish from their quiet, less emotional denominational heritage. Failure to provide service opportunities for the young people caused scores of Amish young people to unite with other denominations. One Amish family produced three Methodist ministers.

After some Amish congregations in states farther west began to erect meetinghouses, the Lancaster Amish gradually (1877-82) divided into two main groups: the "Church Amish," which adopted the name Amish Mennonites (q.v.), and the "Old Order Amish" (q.v.). But in spite of numerous defections Lancaster County still has the second largest number of Amish congregations in any one county in America, next to Holmes County, Ohio. Ohio now surpasses Pennsylvania in the total number of congregations.

Some family names listed among the early Lancaster County Amish immigrants have disappeared to a large extent. The Hershbergers and Hostetlers, for instance, moved to Mifflin Co., Pa., and are now numerous in Holmes Co., Ohio. The Yoders also are much more numerous in Ohio and Indiana than in Lancaster County, although a certain Barbara Yoder and her children were among the first Amish settlers in what is now Berks County.

In 1955 there were in Lancaster County or the immediately adjacent Berks and Chester County borders 30 Old Order Amish congregations with 3,100 baptized members. The following additional congregations descend directly from O.O. Amish origins by schism: Conestoga A.M. (1877) and its daughter congregations of Zion, Oley, and Rock, with a total of 664 members; Maple Grove (1882) and its daughter congregations of Media Chapel and Sandy Hill, with a total of 580 members. Both of these groups are in the Ohio and Eastern Conference. The Millwood congregation broke off from the Maple Grove congregation in 1945 to join the Lancaster Conference; it has 431 members with its five daughter congregations. One small congregation, Bart, with 31 members, left the O.O. Amish ca. 1950 to join the Conservative Mennonites. Two congregations, Weavertown and Maple Grove A.M., with 269 members, formed from the O.O. Amish ca. 1925, have joined the Beachy Amish group.

Thus the original pre-Revolutionary Amish immigrants, less than 200 souls in total number, according to C. H. Smith's estimate, have now grown to over 5,000 baptized members with some 10,000 souls, still adherents to the Amish-Mennonite faith.

J.S.U.

C. G. Bachman, The Old Order Amish of Lancaster County (Norristown, 1942); C. Z. Mast and R. E. Simpson, Annals of the Conestoga Valley in Lancaster, Berks, and Chester Counties, Pennsylvania, (Elverson, 1942); M. L. Montgomery, Historical and Biographical Annals of Berks County, Pennsylvania I (1909); C. H. Smith, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the Eighteenth Century (Norristown, 1929); G. M. Stoltzfus, "History of the First Amish Mennonite Communities in America," MQR XXVIII (October 1954) 235-62.

Lancaster Mennonite Conference. The Lancaster (Pa.) Mennonite Conference (MC) first convened in 1711, a few months after the Swiss-Palatine immigrants had established themselves in their new home, to select by lot one of their number to return to Europe. Hans Herr, their bishop and general adviser, was chosen, but Martin Kendig actually returned. In 1725 five representatives, Martin Baer, Hans Burkholtzer, Christian Herr, Benedikt Hirsche, and Johannes Bowman, attended the first general Mennonite Conference, held probably in Manatawny, when the historic Dordrecht Confession was translated into English and signed by 16 leaders, for all American Mennonites. The Conference always established peaceful relationships with the Indians, so that within the confines of the central county no blood was spilled on either side.

The Christian Herr house, built in 1719 on the Conestoga Road, connecting Indiantown, Brandywine, and Germantown, is the oldest meetinghouse-dwelling still standing in the county. The John Herr house, built in 1740, for 60 years provided a large room on the second floor as a place of worship. Abbeyville and Weaverland were built before 1750, the members having previously met in private houses and barns. Hernley (1745), Habecker (1760), and Bair's Hanover (1774) were built on Penn grants. The Byerland house (1747) is preserved as a sample of the simplicity and miniature size of the meetinghouses in the woods of that day. Today many are about 50-60 ft. x 100 ft. They still are conservative in architecture, economically built with considerable free labor by the members, simple but practical, of brick or substantial blocks, with a raised pulpit at one end, and the floor sloping toward it, and furnished with basements for religious education and meals for all-day meetings.

Fifteen years after the first settlement in Lampeter, the Mennonites were located throughout Lancaster County and ready to overflow. The Conference nurtured some of the scattered daughter colonies until full-fledged in the Ontario, Virginia, Washington County (Md.)-Franklin County (Pa.), and the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conferences. The Conference gave not only Benjamin Eby to Ontario, but most of the pioneers of both Waterloo and Woolwich Townships (Ont.), to establish two strong Mennonite communities in Upper Canada. It sent Ebersoles, Lehmans, Horsts, and Martins to people Franklin Co., Pa., and Washington Co., Md., mostly in 1790 and later. It gave Weavers, Abraham Brubaker, Rhodes, Stricklers, Heistands, etc., first to the northern Shenandoah Valley, Va.; then by 1790 David Heatwole, Joseph Wenger, Peter Burkholder, and others to Rockingham Co., Va. John Graybill went to Juniata County in the early 1770's, followed by Brubakers and Shellenbergers; they in turn peopled Blair County and Freeport, Ill. John Brubaker started Rockton, Pa. J. A. Ressler opened the India Mission in 1899. The Snyders and Abram Metzler established the church at Martinsburg in Morrison's Cove, Blair Co. Bishop Michael Horst went from here to Stark County, Ohio, the Metzlers to Columbiana County, John M. Greider to Clark County, William Westheffer and Henry Martin to Martin's Church, Wayne Co., Ohio. Christian Snavely went to Sterling and Simon Graybill to Freeport, Ill. David B., John M. R., and Reuben M. Weaver, Daniel A. Diener, Tillman Erb, J. D. Charles, and Abram Hess went to Hesston and elsewhere in Kansas. John M. Kreider went to Palmyra, Mo.

They were always thrifty, with large families earlier, and of the middle class of Americans, preferring independence of one another, but in times of stress and strain, ready for the necessary relief. As pioneers they had more extensive barns than houses, so that both in this area are considerably larger than in most other large American communities. The best agricultural practices are followed. Some hemp and flax were raised in the first century. Dairying, beef fattening, and now poultry raising, including broiler production, was a big factor in preserving the fertility of the soil. This with industry, diversification, and crop rotation has always placed Lancaster County as the first in America in agricultural wealth. The land values, increased from 35 cents to $1,800 per acre, would mean smaller farms, but the cost of building mostly offsets this trend. At first the parents retired on the farm, but in later times in towns. There were town meetinghouses in Lancaster (1879), Elizabethtown (1905), Lititz (1906), and Mt. Joy (1908). Others were built later. Now 60 per cent of the members are still dependent upon agriculture. The rest are in industry, domestic employment, and the professions, especially teaching.

During the German ferment period, 1729-ca. 90, their preachers were not permitted to perform marriages. They became naturalized beginning with 1729, under the British Crown. By 1742 Hans Tschantz called a conference to reprimand Martin Meylin for his large, extravagant sandstone house, to hold to simplicity and allay any undue suspicions among the neighbors concerning their prosperity. On Sept. 7, 1758, a committee was sent to Holland to obtain aid for the suffering Virginia brethren. On Nov. 7, 1775, they appealed to the Colonial Assembly for recognition of their conscientious scruples, which resulted in favorable legislation.

It was during the Revolutionary days that the United Brethren Church started here, when a Mennonite bishop, Martin Boehm, and a Reformed minister, Philip W. Otterbein, met in 1767 in Isaac Long's barn. The former was excommunicated in 1777 and the new church began 1780, and was revived by another ex-Mennonite, Christian Newcomer, at the turn of the century. The Brethren in Christ in Conoy Twp., Lancaster Co., started about 1780. The Reformed Mennonites came later but officially started in 1812. The Stauffer division occurred in 1845, the Martinite (Old Order Mennonite) in 1893, which in turn suffered the Joseph Wenger division in 1926. The Ridenbach division in the Stauffer group occurred in 1946.

Semiannual conferences have been held at the Mellinger meetinghouse in the fall and at one of the three Rohrerstown meetinghouses in the spring as far back as records are extant, about 1740. (Beginning in 1953 the latter was moved to East Petersburg.) Here all Conference decisions were made and approved or rejected. This was the practice up to 40 years ago, with no long meeting of the Bishop Board prior to the session, at which the actual decisions are made for the Conference, with only nominal ratification by the total conference body. Now the bishops meet monthly or oftener for a day or more before the meeting of Conference.

The moderators of Lancaster Conference in order were Hans Herr, Hans Burkholder, Hans Tschantz, Bentz Hirschi, Christian Burkholder, Jacob Brubaker, Samuel Nissley, Peter Eby, Jacob Hostetter, Benjamin Herr, Jacob N. Brubacher, Benjamin Zimmerman, Benjamin Weaver, Noah L. Landis, W. W. Graybill, and Henry E. Lutz. By 1912 Peter R. Nissley became the first secretary. The present officers are H. E. Lutz, Moderator, Noah W. Risser, Assistant Moderator, Amos S. Horst, Secretary, Richard Danner, Assistant Secretary, and Mahlon Witmer, Treasurer. Until very recently the senior bishop in order of service served as moderator. Henry Lutz was the first elected moderator.

The Conference with more than 150 preaching points includes within Lancaster County (q.v.) 78 churches from Blainsport to Oak Shade, from Churchtown to Elizabethtown, with 640 and 621 members in the two largest, Weaverland and Mellinger, both distinctly rural. Then there are eight in Lebanon County, three in Cumberland County, ten in York and Adams, five in Dauphin, three in Berks, seven in Juniata, Snyder, and Union Counties, with many more scattered (see missions below).

These are divided into 19 bishop districts. Weaverland, the largest, has 18 preaching points, 1,897 members, 17 Sunday schools with an enrollment of 3,012 and an average attendance of 2,520, and 19 summer Bible schools with 2,925 and 2,477 respectively, and two young people's Bible meetings with 180 in attendance. Bishop J. Paul Graybill is assisted by 20 ministers and 10 deacons. The total membership in 1954 was 15,166, with 23 bishops, 193 ministers, and 102 deacons.

The Spring Conference in 1871 sanctioned the Sunday-school movement and today in 148 schools, there is an enrollment of 22,706 and an attendance of 18,175. Following the first (1927) summer Bible school at Norris Square, Philadelphia, the movement has grown until in 1953 there were in the Conference 165 with 26,116 enrolled and an average attendance for the ten nights of 23,312. The young people's Bible meetings started almost 50 years ago and the number is slowly increasing, with 6,724 attending, meetings customarily held on Saturday evenings.

In this, the largest and second oldest conference, close communion is observed with unfermented wine. Adult baptism by pouring is generally held in the meetinghouse (now). Anointing with oil is a bit more prominent than a few decades ago. Divorce is not sanctioned and weddings within the church are encouraged; in either home or church they are to be held with simplicity. The holy kiss is still practiced. The devotional covering is conscientiously and continuously worn. A distinct garb, both for the men and women, is strongly advocated and observed by most. The plain garb is required of the women for membership, and of the men for active participation in church work, though not for membership.

The ministers have other vocations; formerly they were all farmers. They receive no salary and frequently no support. There are five ministers who can still preach German; the transition to English was at its peak by 1900. For two centuries the types and figures and the sufferings of our Lord were rehearsed at communion time. At the semiannual counsel meeting, Matt. 18:1-22 is the Scriptural basis of the sermon. At preparatory services, generally on the Saturday before communion, Matt. 6:1-18 is used; at the ordination of a deacon Acts 6:1-7, of a minister Luke 10:1-20, and of a bishop John 21:15-17. The ministers are chosen by lot in the established congregation, unless there is but one candidate. When the votes are to be taken, the qualifications in I Tim. 3, Tit. 1, etc., for the office are stressed. The congregation is given the opportunity to present their choices to the bishops present. One vote for the offices of deacon and minister and five for the bishop place the recipient in a class for examination. The ordination then follows in two to seven days.

Since October 1905 a revival meeting has been held annually or biennially in each congregation. At Elizabethtown in early 1906 there was a class of 130 converts. There have been numerous large classes, but the largest were in the first two decades. While the number in classes is low generally, the revival does much to revive a congregation and is an additional blessing to our ministers.

The Mission Movement beginning in the mid-1890's received real impetus from this Conference. With John Mellinger and the Paradise district we have not only what was necessary to crystallize and establish local and foreign missions here, but as a spur into other areas. With the organization in 1916 of the present mission board (Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, q.v.), the earlier missions in many cases took on new life, but the work also spread, so that today there are six missions in central Maryland, a large field developed on the Alabama-Florida border, three missions each in Tampa (Fla.), New York, Philadelphia, and Reading, two in Coatesville, one each in Lebanon and Harrisburg. In addition to the eight in and around Lancaster, there are numerous other missions in and within driving distance of the central county. Some are also in prospect in central and northern Pennsylvania and rural New York. In 1934 the first foreign missionaries were sent to Tanganyika, in 1948 to Ethiopia, in 1950 to northern Honduras, in 1951 to Luxembourg in Europe, and to Somalia in Africa in 1953. On Jan. 1, 1954, there were 86 missionaries attached to the foreign mission fields and about 67 stations with 360 missionary workers in America, besides the established congregations and their work.

In the early day the children were given all their schooling in their homes. At the turn of the 18th century the school and church were often under one roof. Our home township had four of these—Landis, Lehn, Rudy, and Frick. Then with the enactment of the public school laws in 1834 and 1835, the Mennonites were opposed to sending their children to such schools, for the blessings of education in their schools under their own supervision would be lost. At Erisman, Risser, Hammer Creek, Stumptown, Cross Roads, Bossler, Chestnut Hill, Metzler, and Weaverland, the school was then placed on the adjoining grounds. Now again with the school far removed geographically and spiritually from the church, there is a retrenchment in the present Christian Day School movement. The first school of this kind was opened at Locust Grove in 1939. Now there are 19 in the area, exclusive of Old Order Amish and the Shaeffer Private School, with 45 teachers and about 1,228 pupils.

Although requested in 1922, the first Ephrata Winter Bible school was held in 1938, and after five terms the Lancaster Mennonite School opened in the fall of 1942, with a special Bible term added in 1953. It is a full high school, operated by a board of trustees appointed by the conference. The enrollment in 1954-55 was 303, with a faculty of 18. Some of the above elementary schools have ninth and tenth grades. In Tanganyika there are 60 bush schools with a thousand pupils, with some primary and middle schools started.

The winter Bible schools were placed at pivotal points in the Conference, beginning in 1943, meeting Tuesday and Thursday evenings for six weeks in January and February, until now there are 13 such, with an additional day school of two weeks at Millwood. These reach 2,200-2,500 of our constituency. They include book study, the Bible, missions, Christian education, Christian ethics, theology, and pedagogy, using chiefly our own literature as texts. Like the Sunday school they reach all ages.

There are now three old people's homes in this Conference. Oreville in 1903 was the first. The Welsh Mountain Mission (1898) gradually developed into the Good Samaritan Home. In 1953 the Philadelphia Colored Home was opened. Together about 185 are provided for within these three institutions. A girls' home for Mennonites working as domestics in Reading has been serving for many years. A children's home in Millersville in 1911 began to invite unfortunate children of all ages into its sphere, with Levi Sauder serving as superintendent until his death in October 1940. 1,215 children have received physical and spiritual nurture here.

In loving appreciation of what God through the Dutch Foreign Relief Committee accomplished in bringing the Mennonites to America, they aided wherever possible, not only in the early years when it was a case of mutual survival, but throughout the years. In the 1870's and 1922 they did their part in settling the Russian Mennonites on this continent. Following World War I Orie O. Miller, the Myers, Zimmermans, and others served in France and Near East Relief. The MCC has been a channel for immigration and relief funds from the Conference since 1920, aggregating in 1949-52 alone more than $224,500. The Conference has always had a member on the MCC, first John Mellinger, and more recently Henry F. Garber. The sewing circles were a substantial aid in giving materials in kind over the years. The movement began in 1895 in the Paradise district, developing into a general circle by 1911. Many tons have moved out from and through the Ephrata Clothing Depot, into overseas relief distribution. The Mary Mellinger cutting room at Paradise (1948) is serving an ever-enlarging constituency and service both local and world-wide.

Through itinerant evangelism and Voluntary Service, the summer Bible schools have not only spread over the southeastern states, central Maryland, and northern Pennsylvania, but have exceeded the Sunday-school figures by 3,400; they have reached the unreached, not only in isolated places, but in migrant work camps the year round and among the Puerto Ricans in the Lancaster County area and have established missions and congregations.

The Peace Problems Committee, earlier the Bishop Board, helped to steer the church through the war years, promoted nonresistance teaching, provided for the pastoral care of men in CPS and I-W service, and represented the church in its peace testimony.

The Lancaster (Mental) Hospital was opened in 1952 on the north edge of Mt. Gretna, with a maximum capacity of 35 patients, with one doctor, two nurses, and numerous helpers. A large farm is attached. It is called Philhaven (q.v.).

The historic German Martyrs' Mirror (1748), with the Ephrata prints of Ernsthafte Christenpflicht of 1745, 1770, 1785, and 1808, and the 1769 Christliches Gemüthsgespräch, following the English translation (1727) of the historic Dordrecht Confession, adopted by the 1725 Conference, were the known extent of our Mennonite publications for this century. But in the next 15 decades this changed. The Ernsthafte Christenpflicht appeared in Lancaster in 1826, 1841, 1852, 1862, 1868, 1875, 1876, 1892, 1904, and 1927, and the Gemüthsgespräch there in 1811, 1836, 1869, and 1892, English 1857, 1870, 1878, 1892, and at Union Grove in 1921. The Ausbund was reprinted at Lancaster eight times, 1815, 1834, 1846, 1856, 1868, 1880, 1908, and 1912. The Unparteyisches Gesangbuch (1804-1923) appeared in 17 editions as the official conference hymnbook. The Ehrenfried Martyrs' Mirror was published in 1814 and the Lampeter edition of I. D. Rupp in 1836. Menno Simons' Fundamentbuch appeared in German at Lancaster in 1794, 1835, 1853, and 1876, in English in 1835, 1863, and 1869. Christian Spiritual Conversation in Saving Faith (1857, 1870, 1878, 1892, and 1921), a translation of Christliches Gemüthsgespräch, included Christian Burkholder's Counsel for Youth, a translation of Anrede an die Jugend, which appeared in two editions in Ephrata in 1804, and was added to the Gemüthsgespräch in its editions of 1839, 1848, 1868, 1869, and 1873, but had a separate edition at Allentown in 1829. The Wandering Soul, which appeared in 8 German and 10 English editions in Pennsylvania 1768-1919, appeared in English in Lancaster in 1874. In 1787 the Froschauer New Testament was published in German at Ephrata.

One of the first original writings known aside from Christian Burkholder's was a series of three Question and Answer Booklets for the Sunday School, prepared by Amos Herr and other leaders with John F. Funk in 1880 and 1881. Earlier was the Conference Meeting Calendar in 1854, prepared by Abraham Martin. The other Calendar editors for the century were Abraham Brubaker, John W. Weaver, and since 1940 Ira D. Landis.

The Rules and Discipline of Lancaster Conference was put into a printed leaflet in 1881 and has appeared since in numerous revisions, the last in 1954. In the same decade (1880) appeared Jacob N. Brubacher's Brubaker Genealogy and in 1896 John Hess's second Hess Genealogy. In 1902 A. D. Wenger's Six Months in Bible Lands was published and in 1931 M. G. Weaver's Lancaster Mennonite Conference, the first conference history attempted by any Mennonite.

Since 1924 the Missionary Messenger is the official organ of the Mission Board and since 1941 the Pastoral Messenger of the Conference. The Mennonite Youth Service (1951) is a monthly, Victory Calls (1949), an annual, and now many congregations have weekly or fortnightly bulletins.

The Christian Nurture Committee has revised the weekday Bible school manuals of the late thirties, so that by 1955 there will be new courses from kindergarten I to grade VIII, with two for high-school grades. This committee has prepared Youth Faces Life and Making Our Homes Christian, two smaller publications for religious education. It has a ten-year program of Bible Memory work for school and Sunday school, and a Bible reading program for family altars, beginning with the whole New Testament in 1954.

The Hershey Genealogy by Henry Hershey appeared in 1929, the Missionary Movement Among Lancaster Conference Mennonites in 1937, Faith of Our Fathers on Eschatology (1946), The Landis Family Book, Sections I-IV (1950-54), and I Must See Switzerland (1954) by Ira D. Landis. Africa Calls (1936) by Catherine Leatherman and Ada Zimmerman, Africa Answers (1951) by Merle Eshleman, Noah Mack, His Life and Times (1952) by Graybill, Landis, and Sauder, and Christian Manhood (1948) by Eshleman and Mack were other publications by Lancaster authors.

The Conference has had outstanding leaders in Hans Herr (1639-1725), Benedict Brackbill (1665-1720), Bentz Hirsche (1697-1789), Christian Burkholder (1746-1809), Peter Eby (1766-1843), Jacob Hostetter (1774-1865), Jacob N. Brubacher (1838-1913), and layman John H. Mellinger (1858-1952). With their foundations and links in co-operation with every member, today on nonconformity, including apparel, the Conference is conservative, on nonresistance officially solid, considerably opposed to Calvinism and eternal security, but slightly colored by fundamentalism and pietism. I.D.L.

M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Scottdale, 1931); Ira D. Landis, The Missionary Movement Among Lancaster Conference Mennonites (Scottdale, 1938); idem, The Lancaster Mennonite Conference History and Background (Lancaster, 1956); ML II, 608.

Lancaster Mennonite Mission (MC), often called the "Vine Street Mission," located in a former Baptist church at 112 E. Vine Street, Lancaster, Pa., was opened on North Street on July 4, 1896, following the organization of the Lancaster Sunday School Mission (q.v.). B. F. Herr and David Lantz were the first superintendents. By 1899 the mission was located at 462 Rockland Street, and by 1908 at the present address. The John Mosemanns, D. Parke Lantz, D. Stoner Krady, and others received valuable missionary experience here. For a time Weaver's Book Store and Printery was housed in the basement. The 1954 membership was 85, with Frank M. Enck as pastor. I.D.L.

Lancaster Mennonite School (MC) is a secondary school opened in September 1942 by the Lancaster Conference and operated by a board of directors elected by that body. It is located on the Lincoln Highway (Route 30), four miles east of Lancaster, Pa. The buildings, built for use as a mill and farm, and the grounds had been used earlier by the Yeates School, which was a boys' preparatory school operated by the Episcopal Church. The property includes about 88 acres of land, about half of which is under cultivation, the rest in pasture, woods, and stream. A strong spring supplies the water. There is at present a large barn for the farm, in addition to seven buildings used for school activities.

Grades nine to twelve are offered in college preparatory, commercial, home economics, and Bible curriculums. A two-year Bible course is offered for those who do not want or need the four-year course and are interested in taking Bible courses until they can legally leave school. A six-week winter Bible school offers short courses in Bible on the school campus. The school emphasizes Christian service, missionary interests, and evangelism. The school maintains high scholastic standards to assure equality with comparable public high schools and admission to colleges and professions. Its monthly student publication is called The Mill Stream.

In addition to the local young people who come as day students there are also some from such areas as Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, and New York, also a few foreign students and missionaries' children. Though the school has been Mennonite in emphasis and attendance, pupils of all denominations are welcome and each year there are some students from other denominational groups.

Principals have been J. Paul Graybill (1942-54) and Amos W. Weaver (1954-). Noah Good has been dean from the beginning. The enrollment in 1956-57 was 385. N.G.

Lancaster (Pa.) Reformed Mennonite Church secured its first meetinghouse in 1855 by purchasing a building which was used until 1905. Its present meetinghouse, located at the corner of E. James and Cherry Streets, was erected in 1904. J.L.K.

Landau (pop. 22,870), formerly a free city, under French occupation 1648-1816, then a fortified city in the Palatinate, Germany. There was very probably an Anabaptist group here as early as 1526, to whom Hans Denk (q.v.) brought a letter of recommendation from the Strasbourg Anabaptists after his banishment from Strasbourg. Johannes Bader (q.v.), the reformer of the city, was probably not aware of their presence before his disputation with Hans Denk.

At Bader's advice the council decided to expel the Anabaptists from the city. Early in January 1527 an order was issued to all the guilds, making it a criminal offense to harbor Anabaptists. In the same month the mayor notified the authorities that "Jakob Kremer has a maid who was baptized at Rott near Weissenburg [Alsace] about three years ago." On April 26, 1528, Georg Brauner, Wolf Hitschler's son-in-law, Master Lorenz, Peter Hammer, and Stoffel Lauinger with his wife and children were banished.

Shortly before Pentecost in 1528 many men, women, servants, and maids were questioned by the council. Most denied any Anabaptist leanings; they were admonished to abstain "from Anabaptism and secret mutiny." Those who confessed Anabaptist connections were ordered to leave the city. The banishments continued. Johannes Bader wanted to hold a disputation with them, but was refused.

After Bader's death the suppression continued. In 1556-58 all Schwenckfelders and Anabaptists were banished from the city. In 1582 again they were driven out. Yet the Anabaptist movement succeeded in maintaining itself in secret. In 1591 the Landau congregation signed the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). Nothing further is known of it. NEFF.

J. P. Gelbert, Magister Johannes Baders Leben und Schriften (Neustadt, 1868) 181 ff.; E. F. H. Medicus, Gesch. der evangelischen Kirche der bayrischen Rheinpfalz (Erlangen, 1865), supplementary volume 25 and 27; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 15-21; ML II, 608.

Landeck, a town (pop. 5,534) in the Upper Inn Valley, Austria, one of the centers of the Anabaptist movement in northern Tirol. In 1529 Bartlmä Has was examined on a charge of Anabaptist inclinations; he was probably put to death. At least the martyr list in the Geschicht-Buch mentions a blood witness in Landeck. In 1539 a group of Anabaptists including a widow were questioned on the rack.

An indication of the strong growth of the movement is the series of Anabaptists imprisoned during the following years; they were "safely kept in the dark dungeon with warm water or goat soup made with little fat, otherwise fed once a day on bread and water." In 1543 some escaped; one of these was Hans Prugger, who was to be taken to the galleys via Hungary; in 1544 Hans Mändl (q.v.) escaped after 22 weeks of imprisonment with frequent trials on the rack, by beating his foot-chains with stones until he could slip out of them, and letting himself down on the rope used to bring up his food. In the 1540's several groups from Landeck migrated to Moravia; their property was secured by the government for the use of the children they left behind. In 1556 there was a larger emigration. In 1574 the Moravian Hutterites sent a special epistle to Landeck. Up into the 1580's there is mention of Anabaptists at Landeck. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Anabaptistmus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 608 f.

Landersheim (Landesheym), in the Lower Rhine district, Germany, was in the 16th century the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Klaus (Claes) von Landerschrift(?) in 1591 signed the Concept of Cologne in the name of this congregation. Further particulars about this congregation were not available. VDZ.

Landes (Landis), a widely ramified Mennonite family in South Germany and in the United States. It stems from the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, where it is found (spelled Landis) in Pfäffikon on Lake Zürich in 1417, Hirzel in 1438, and Menzingen in 1454.

Horgenberg near Hirzel was the birthplace of Hans Landis (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher who died as a martyr on Sept. 29, 1614, in his seventieth year. He left a large family. His wife Margaretha Hochstrasser was 60 years old and stood loyally at his side. The father's steadfastness engraved itself deeply into the hearts of his children, who preserved his spiritual legacy for the most part, resisting the pressure of the government on their faith. His son Felix (q.v.) died in prison in 1642 in consequence of inhuman treatment, but Felix's wife Adelheid Egli managed to escape after four years. Another son, Hans, married to Elisabeth Erzinger, was also a preacher; his daughter Margaretha lay in prison with him for 60 weeks. The martyr's daughter Verena was married to the weaver Jacob Suners of Holland(?); she died in prison at Zürich in 1643 at an advanced age in consequence of maltreatment (Mart. Mir. D 822, E 1121), one of the last victims of the persecution of the Zürich Swiss Brethren. Through Hans Suner, probably a son of Jacob Suner, frequent relief offerings of the Dutch Mennonites passed to the Swiss Brethren.

After the execution of Hans Landis the Zürich council decided to confiscate Anabaptist property without respite. On Oct. 22, 1614, it ordered the confiscation of the property of exiles. The property left by Hans Landis was indeed promised to his wife and children on Feb. 23, 1615, but only on the condition that they join the state church within two weeks. Otherwise they could expect only exile and loss of property. Since the sorely tried widow could not make such a promise she was "laid in bonds" on May 24. The Reformed preacher tried to win her to his church in prison. It is not known how long she was held. Her children were at first intimidated, but finally most of them decided to stay with the Swiss Brethren. The government then confiscated the property and put dependent members of the family among strangers. About 1640 the property of Rudolf, Hans, and Felix Landis, all sons of the martyr, was sold.

The descendants of the martyr Hans who were loyal to the faith of their fathers left the country. Some of them settled in Alsace (especially in the Rappoltstein region). The first mention of the family in the Palatinate occurred on March 2, 1661, when a group of 50 persons was surprised at an evening meeting at Steinsfurt near Sinsheim on the Elsenz; they were heavily fined (see Hasselbach). Among them were Hans Heinrich Landes of Rohrbach, his son Rudolf Landes of Weiler, and his mother and sister.

In the 18th century there were Mennonite members of the Landes family in the Palatinate at Steinsfurt, Zuzenhausen, Schatthausen, Richen, Bockschaft, Kirschgartshausen, Ibersheim, Heppenheim, Hochheim, and Herrnsheim. In Monzernheim near Alzey a member of the Landes family (his Christian name is not stated; it was probably Johann Jakob Landes who was at this time a renter of the Dalberg estate near Herrnsheim) wanted to purchase an estate owned by a merchant living in the Dutch province of Groningen. He had already paid, but the Catholic renters (Roll and Walldorf) objected and demanded that the sale be nullified; they also demanded a decision as to whether a Mennonite in the Palatinate could buy land at all and own it like a Catholic citizen. On Jan. 24, 1726, an electoral decision compelled Landes to yield the land to the plaintiffs upon repayment of the purchase price and other expenses. On Jan. 18 a decree was issued by which any member of the three established churches could require a Mennonite purchaser to return it for the original sale price. This regulation remained effective until 1801, with the modification in 1737 limiting the right of redemption to three years (see Jus Retractus).

In the 19th century the family produced personalities whose influence on the Mennonite churches in Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria was very beneficial. Heinrich Landes (d. 1886) of Ehrstädt, later at Lautenbach near Heilbronn (q.v.), was one of the leading elders (see Baden and Hege). In a similar spirit his sons worked, Christian Landes (d. Oct. 10, 1933) and Heinrich Landes (d. June 24, 1918) at Lautenbach. The former was a cofounder of the Mennonite deaconess work taken up in 1904 in Baden and Württemberg, and was for many years the director of this charitable work (see Deaconess, and Gem.-Kal., 1933, 36-38), and a cofounder of the Heilbronn branch of the Evangelical Alliance (q.v.). A son of Heinrich, Walter, is elder of the church at Heilbronn, and another son, Christian, is a preacher there.

The task of visiting minister among the Mennonites of Baden was undertaken by Michael Landes of Albertshausen in 1872 after completing his training at St. Chrischona. He was the first full-time visiting preacher (Reiseprediger) in Germany. In his later years he preached for the congregations at Eichstock and Ingolstadt (d. July 13, 1926). His deep piety and humility won him honor and appreciation even on the part of the Catholic clergy of his vicinity (Gem.-Kal., 1928, 63-74). Emanuel Landes served the congregations of Munich, Regensburg, and Eichstock as pastor for many years until his retirement in 1954 at the age of 74.

The members of the family expelled from Switzerland who did not settle in the Palatinate, emigrated to America in the 18th century, retaining the Swiss spelling of their name. In 1717, with the first German mass immigration, three brothers, Benjamin, Felix, and Johannes Landes of Mannheim, landed in Pennsylvania. American immigration lists of 1727, 1732, 1734, 1736, and 1745 contain the names of other members of the family. The towns Landisville and Landis Valley were named for them, in which large Mennonite churches were established. The name is of frequent occurrence among the Mennonite preachers in Pennsylvania. The Dutch Naamlijst names Jacob Landis as a preacher at Indian Creek in the late 18th century, and Abraham Landis from about 1790 at Deep Run.

John Landis settled at Quakertown in Bucks Co., Pa., Franconia Conference (MC) district. Jacob, who settled in Lancaster County, had one son Benjamin (1700-81), ordained to the ministry before 1746, who became the progenitor of the widespread Lancaster Landis line. Among the prominent Lancaster Conference (MC) ministers have been John B. Landis (1820-1902) of East Petersburg, John L. Landis (1832-1914) of Mellinger's, Sanford B. Landis (1869-1926) of Mellinger's, and Noah L. Landis (1857-1940) of Landis Valley, preacher from 1898 and bishop from 1905, moderator of the conference 1928-40. His son Ira D. Landis (1899-), also of Landis Valley, preacher since 1921, is the historian of the Lancaster district. Noah E. Landis (1893-) is a bishop at Alpha, Minn. In 1954 eight ministers in Eastern Pennsylvania bore the name Landis. HEGE.

C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916); E. Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); D. B. Landis, The Landis Family (Lancaster, 1888); C. Henry Smith, The Menn. Immigration to Pennsylvania (Norristown, 1929); M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Scottdale, 1931); Ira D. Landis, The Landis Family Book, 4 vv. (Lancaster, 1950, 1952, 1953, 1954); Henry S. Landes, Descendants of Jacob Landes of Salford Township, Montgomery Co., Pennsylvania (Souderton, 1943); Jakob Landes, "Hans Landes und seine Kinder," a manuscript in Goshen College Library; ML II, 609 f.

Landis Derry Meetinghouse, located in Derry Twp., Dauphin Co., Pa., on the north edge of Hershey, was erected probably as an "Unpartisan Mennonite Meetinghouse" as was Shirk's in East Hanover Twp., Lebanon Co., which by 1854 was transferred to the United Brethren. This Spring Creek Meetinghouse tract came from John Landis (1753-1829), a great-grandson of Felix Landis, a pioneer of East Lampeter, Lancaster Co. Henry Landis (1764-1844), another great-grandson of Felix, was a minister of the Landis congregation. There is a small cemetery here, in which are the graves of John Landis and others bearing this family name. The United Brethren absorbed most of the Mennonite membership. Henry's son Henry Jr. (1794-1885) founded the Landis Meetinghouse (congregation) at Palmyra, Lebanon Co., Pa. I.D.L.

Landis, Felix, a son of the martyr Hans Landis (q.v.), a member of the Anabaptist congregation at Horgerberg, canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was held with his wife Adelheid Egli in the Ortenbach prison in Zürich with inhumane treatment until death released him from his suffering about 1642. His wife languished in prison for four years before she managed to escape. But her household had been destroyed, her children given to strangers, house and furniture sold, and the proceeds of 5,000 florins confiscated. (Mart. Mir. D 821, E 1120; ML II, 612.) NEFF.

Landis, Hans, a Swiss Brethren martyr, a preacher from Wädenswil in the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was imprisoned in the Wellenberg in 1608; after a few months his fellow prisoners managed to release him from the chains, and all escaped. The others were soon captured, but Hans reached his native village. Another attempt was made to indoctrinate the Anabaptists to win them to the state church. On Jan. 21, 1613, the first disputation of the government with them took place at Wädenswil. It was fruitless, as was also the second one, held on Feb. 23. Thereupon Hans Landis was again put in prison with five other Brethren. In early August negotiations were begun. Landis remained "stiffnecked." He refused to emigrate, saying that the earth was the Lord's; no one had authority to send them away out of the country; they were going to stay in the country.

On Aug. 25, 1613, all six Brethren were condemned to galley service and were to be delivered to the French minister at Solothurn on the next day. Once more they were given permission to emigrate, with a week's time to decide. Three wavered and consented; the others encouraged Landis to be faithful. These three (Hans Landis, Galli Fuchs, and Stephan Zehnder) were taken to Solothurn and lodged in prison to await transport. In three days they escaped.

In December 1613 Hans Landis, having returned to minister to his flock, was again seized. In prison he wrote to his church and his friends. He asked his wife for the Doms-büchli (the Confessio of the martyr Thomas von Imbroich, q.v.). He was questioned on the rack. On Sept. 29, 1614, he was sentenced to death and was beheaded the next day. This was the last Anabaptist execution in Zürich.

Hans Landis had a stately figure (Mart. Mir. D 804-6, E 1103-51), "a long black beard mixed with gray and a manly voice." The executioner asked his pardon for what he was about to do; Landis replied that "he had already forgiven him; may God also forgive him; he knew very well that he must carry out the government's orders." When his wife and children came to the place of execution with "sorrowful crying and mourning, to bid him at the end an eternal good night," he asked that they leave him, so that "his good resolution and his good courage for the death facing him might not be moved or hindered." In the Ausbund (q.v.), No. 132, is a song of 46 stanzas commemorating his death. It begins "Ich hab ein schön neu Lied gemacht." NEFF.

C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich (Leipzig, 1916) 82 ff.; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 372 ff.; P. Kläui, "Hans Landis of Zürich," MQR XXII (1948) 203-11; idem, Geschichte der Gemeinde Horgen (Horgen, 1952); ML II, 612; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 865a.

Landis Valley, a town (pop. 1,200) on the Reading Road, four miles northeast of Lancaster, Pa., was started by "Schmidt Jacob" Landis (1780-1848), a blacksmith, a son of John of Dauphin, Pa. It is in Landis Valley, named for Benjamin Landis (1730-87), a grandson of the pioneer Jacob Landis (1667-1730), who moved on to the Snavely holdings in 1750. The Landises of this area are of the latter line. "Smith Jacob" Landis Jr. (1813-61) built the first hostelry in 1855, and when the post office was established in 1872, the older name was adopted and long after the post office of the stagecoach days, it is still Landis Valley. The Reading Road Mennonite meetinghouse (MC), now also called Landis Valley (q.v.), is in this village. I.D.L.

Landis Valley Mennonite Church (MC), Lancaster Co., Pa. The first Mennonites in this valley, who came about 1718, worshiped at first with their brethren at Lampeter, but by 1728 in the homes of John Jacob Snavely and John Long. The Benjamin Landis house, formerly the Snavely dwelling on the Reading Road, and Isaac Long's spacious buildings, were frequent meeting points. The latter was also the scene of the meeting in 1767 when the United Brethren Church originated. By 1814 there were four combined church-school houses at Lehn, Landis, Rudy, and Frick. Since these schools were functioning well, they opposed the 1834 Pennsylvania School Law. In fact the central meetinghouse was not built until 1847, leaving the former for school purposes. This church, called "Reading Road" for 60 years, was built of logs in the present cemetery near the Eden Road. In 1884 a brick meetinghouse, 40 x 60 ft., was built on the present site through the courtesy of Isaac S. Landis. This served the congregation until 1928, when the present 54 x 96 ft. church was built. Valentine Metzler (q.v.) was an early bishop. In 1832 it became a part of the Hammer Creek Bishop District, with Noah L. Landis (1857-1940), the only bishop ever chosen from the congregation. The first Sunday school, held in 1888, led to a Christian and Missionary Alliance schism in 1892. Amos S. Horst and Mahlon Zimmerman are the present bishops, Ira D. Landis and Levi M. Weaver ministers, and Norman L. Hess deacon. The 1953 membership was 256. Until the seventies, services were held every four weeks in the morning, then until three decades ago every two weeks, at first in the evenings, but for the last eleven years in the morning. The Sunday school started in the afternoon fortnightly (warmer months only), then in the morning before church, then weekly in the morning, whether "church Sunday" or not. Since the gas rationing of the early forties, both Sunday school and church services have been held weekly in the morning. I.D.L.

Landis, Verena, a daughter of the martyr Hans Landis (q.v.), was placed in house arrest in her home near Zürich, Switzerland, in 1643, at an advanced age, because she was too sick to be transported to prison. The shock and the rough treatment caused her death soon after. (Mart. Mir. D 822, E 1121.)

Landisville, Lancaster Co., Pa., is a small village, settled first by retired farmers. Jacob Minnich in 1798 built the first house on the Harrisburg Pike, six miles northwest of Lancaster, and in 1808 a hostelry. In 1809 his brother-in-law built the second dwelling near by, which John Landis (Jr.) purchased to be used as a store. The village was named Landisville in his honor; he also became the first postmaster. The town, in East Hempfield Township, has three meetinghouses—Mennonite (MC), Reformed Mennonite, and Church of God. I.D.L.

Landisville Mennonite Church (MC). Herman Long's home mentioned in a deed of 1787 had by about 1752 been the home of the Landisville congregation. This was on the south side of the town near the camp meeting woods. By 1790 a log meetinghouse, still extant as a dwelling, was built. The third church was built of brick near by in 1855, and was replaced in 1912 by the present 54 x 96 ft. structure, also of brick. The unrest of 1834 gave the Church of God a start. The congregation almost died out. Salunga became a preaching point also 1893-1953, but Landisville is now the only meetinghouse. It was a part of the Erisman-Hernley-Kraybill District since John Lehman's bishop district was organized, and since then its bishops always served here. Henry E. Lutz is (1954) the bishop, Christian Frank and Barton Gehman ministers, and Christian E. Charles deacon. The 1954 membership was 212. The Sunday school started in 1878, but it was not "evergreen" nor continuous at first. The young people's Bible meeting is in a four-week district circuit, with 350 in attendance. I.D.L.

Landisville (Pa.) Reformed Mennonite Church is located in Lancaster County. Its meetinghouse was erected in 1869. J.L.K.

Landless (Landlose). Among the Russian Mennonites the landowners and farmers were called Wirte in contrast to those who had no land and who were known as the Landlose or Anwohner (q.v.), but who lived in the villages alongside of the Wirte.

The plan of settlement in the Mennonite colonies in South Russia such as the Chortitza and Molotschna colonies was village (q.v.) settlement, rather than scattered individual farms. The government grants of 176 acres (65 dessiatines) to each settler (Wirt) were so located as to form compact village blocks, each block having a narrow frontage on the village street. Once the immediately available space was parceled out, new families formed by marriage had no land. These had to earn their livelihood as farm hands, by renting land, by trade, industry, etc. Small remnant parcels of land at the end of the village were sold by the landowners to these landless families, about one acre for 100 rubles ($50). Such families were called Anwohner. In the village organization, the landless Anwohner had no vote, but had to pay their share of the taxes, etc., which were levied per capita on the basis of population. And so it was very likely that in many cases a large landless family had to pay more than a farmer with 176 acres.

About 1865 there were in the Molotschna 1,384 landed families and 2,356 landless families (of whom 1,063 were Anwohner); besides these about 490 families were living on farms, owned or rented, outside the villages and in towns. The landowners therefore comprised less than one third of the population, but had all the rights, while the other two thirds had no rights. To rectify this condition a Committee for the Landless (Landlosen-Kommission, q.v.) was formed, consisting of both the landed and the landless. The landless worked for the right to vote, and for the division of the 43,000 acres which at that time belonged to the Molotschna but had not been parceled out, besides the 21,500 acres of unapportioned land attached to some of the villages. This would have been enough land to give 25-30 acres to each Anwohner. The landowners, on the other hand, wanted to lay out new villages with half farms of 88 acres, but this would not have helped all the families. The landless appealed to St. Petersburg, and after another investigation the government ordered that the available land should be distributed among the Anwohner, 40 acres to each family. After this was done there were in the villages owners of full farms (176 acres), half farms (88 acres), and small farms (40 acres), all having a voice in the government. Some of the "small farmers" of course had the inconvenience of owning land up to 12 miles from their homes.

But this expedient did not solve the problem permanently. It was therefore decided to establish a fund for the purchase of new land for the oncoming generations, into which an annual sum of 13 cents per acre (10 kopeks) was to be paid. In addition the large roads, "Tchumackonwege," which were originally a mile wide, were reduced; this yielded another 35,100 acres, which were, however, not apportioned to the landless, but remained the common property of the whole settlement. This land was rented out, and the proceeds put into a settlement fund from which new land could be bought again and again for the oncoming generation. In 1874, when universal military service was introduced in Russia, and as a result about 15,000 Mennonites emigrated to America, the settlement of new lands was discontinued for about ten years, since the land vacated by the emigrants was now available. The settlement fund, however, continued to grow since the 10 kopek tax was not suspended. After this interval new settlements were made more frequently than ever, financed largely by the fund.

The new settlers were granted five interest-free years of grace in making payments on their land purchases. During the next five years the purchase price was to be refunded with a little interest. Any land not paid for at the end of ten years was mortgaged. The payments flowed back into the settlement fund. In this manner some 45 daughter settlements had been formed by 1930 by the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement in conjunction with Chortitza (q.v.), Am Trakt (q.v.), and Alt-Samara (q.v.), the four original mother settlements. A.B.

A. Klaus, Unsere Kolonien (Russian) (St. Petersburg, 1869); Franz Isaak, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland von seiner Einwanderung bis zur Gegenwart. (Langensalza, 1932); ML II, 612 f.

Landlosen-Kommission or Kommission der Landlosen was a commission which originated in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in 1863 as the result of the fact that two thirds of the Mennonite population was without land (see Anwohner). After 150 of these landless (q.v.) Mennonites had appealed to the Fürsorge-Kommitee (q.v.) to remedy this situation, Franz Isaac, Johann Fast, Johann Dörksen, and Isaak Fast were appointed to the Landlosen-Kommission to represent the landless Mennonites in negotiations with the government and with the Mennonite civic authorities. On March 18, 1865, this commission presented a "project or proposal" as to how the surplus land was to be distributed among the landless. Considerable opposition had to be overcome on the part of the local Mennonite authorities and the prosperous Mennonite farmers who rented this land. Through the sympathetic understanding of the Russian government, the Fürsorge-Kommitee, and the Agricultural Association, the cause of the landless was given a hearing and the land was finally distributed among them. Franz Isaac (q.v.) was an outstanding champion of this cause. At the end of his life he could say, "The mother settlement, although it cannot solve all problems which are connected with the settlement of the landless, now recognizes its obligation and is purchasing land for growing families. Although the initial steps were difficult, conditions have improved, and the result is general welfare." He credited the general welfare to the fact that provision had been made for developing a system by which the landless were provided with land (p. 86). The Landlosen-Kommission played a significant role in this achievement. C.K.

Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908) 27-86.

Landon, Camp, Voluntary Service Unit, near Gulfport, Miss., sponsored by the Mennonite Central Committee Voluntary Service Section, had its beginning with Civilian Public Service Camp #141. The Civilian Public Service camp was opened in February 1945, to assist in the control of environmental diseases. In 1946 with the aid of a summer unit of eight girls and a number of year-round volunteers such additional projects as community recreation, Bible school, and home welfare were undertaken. The transition in March 1947 from CPS to Voluntary Service was therefore effected without difficulty. A few months following the close of CPS the unit was requested to vacate Camp Bernard, the CPS unit site. To provide a new site the Mennonite Central Committee secured a 25-year lease on six acres of land, purchased surplus government buildings, and moved them on this acreage. The unit was renamed Camp Landon because of its location in the Landon community.

Following the transition from CPS to VS additional projects undertaken included home, school, and church building and repair, and the building of church and Sunday-school equipment. About 60 families, 15 churches, and 15 schools received volunteer help. Shop and sewing classes were conducted for white and colored children for a number of summers. A program of weekly religious instruction and recreation was launched in most of the Negro schools of the county. The total enrollment in these classes in 1954 was approximately 1,000 pupils. The summer Bible school program was expanded, the enrollment in 1954 reaching over 1,200.

In the summer of 1953 the first retreat for Negro children was held, with 30 in attendance. In the fall a community center was opened for Negroes in the North Gulfport community.

The unit was well received by the community from the beginning. It has been able to maintain good community relationships while working with both white and colored people. The contribution to improved race relations is difficult to measure but has been appreciated by the Negroes. The summer Bible schools, which now are largely conducted in co-operation with existing churches, have been highly appreciated. The work with the young people in the retreat, the schools, and the community center has promise of making a significant contribution to the young people and youth organizations in the churches. O.K.

Landsdienaren, a name used by the Dutch Mennonites who were united in the Frisian Conference (Friesche Sociëteit) of the province of North Holland and given to the elders in charge of the conference. After the 18th century the name, sometimes also used in the Flemish groups, is no longer found. vdZ.

Landshut, a city (pop. 36,000) on the Isar in Bavaria, Germany, 1255-1504 the principal residence of the dukes of Lower Bavaria. In 1800-26 the Bavarian state university, previously at Ingolstadt and now at Munich, was located at Landshut.

In the spring of 1528 August Würzlburger (q.v.), the leader of the Regensburg Anabaptist congregation, preached and baptized in the territory of Landshut. In a brief visit he won a number of converts, among them Hans Sedlmaier with his wife and their sons Paul and Willibold and daughter Katharina, also Hans Frank, a weaver of Oberhain. Hans Sedlmaier and Hans Frank were soon discovered; Sedlmaier said he would remain in his faith, while Frank begged for mercy (Winter, p. 12 ff.). On May 26 the council of Regensburg wrote to the council of Augsburg, stating that a few days previously a man had been beheaded in Landshut, whom Würzlburger had baptized (Nestler, 74). This was probably Sedlmaier. Duke Louis wrote on June 2 that all other persons baptized by Würzlburger were put to death, regardless of willingness to recant—a total of nine persons (Nestler, 77).

Somewhat later the same lot befell some Hutterian Brethren. On April 2, 1560, Klaus Felbinger (q.v.), a Hutterite preacher, and Hans Leitner were seized in Neumarkt in Lower Bavaria, and put into the tower at Landshut on April 7. By this time Bavaria no longer simply inflicted the death penalty in spiritual matters, but first undertook to convert the heretics. Sometimes they held formal disputations; theologians from Landshut and Munich took pains to induce Felbinger to change his faith. In the course of 15 weeks, he was dealt with ten times on questions of faith; in addition he was given 18 articles to answer in writing. Detailed records of these conversations have been preserved, which Felbinger, in chains and with poor illumination, wrote out. They were published by J. Loserth, as an epistle to the brotherhood in Moravia in his book, Der Communismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer (Vienna, 1894) 292-310, and as an epistle to Leonhard Lanzenstiel (q.v.) in Ztscht für allgemeine Geschichte I (1884) 451-54. Since both Felbinger and Leitner remained steadfast in their faith they were beheaded on July 19, 1560. This execution raised the number of Anabaptist executions in Landshut to 12. HEGE.

H. Nestler, Die Wiedertäuferbewegung in Regensburg (Regensburg, 1926); V. A. Winter, Gesch. der baierischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1908); ML II, 613 f.

Landshut (Czech, Lanzhot), a town (pop. 3,000) in the jurisdiction of Lundenburg in Czechoslovakia, on the Moravian-Slovak border. Hutterian Brethren began to settle here in "the good time," establishing a Bruderhof in 1565. In 1608 the thriving community suffered badly at the hands of Hungarian troops, who burned down the Bruderhofs in Landshut and Bilowitz and killed four Brethren at Bilowitz. The brotherhood fared still worse in 1619, when Dampierre invaded Moravia. On Sept. 20 the Bruderhof in Landshut was plundered and burned, the rough soldiery tortured the provision master and another brother, and raped three sisters, tearing the child from the breast of one of them. In 1622 Landshut was evacuated. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Communismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 613.

Landskrone, a village name of the Molotschna settlement, Russia, was transplanted to Barnaul, Siberia; East Reserve, Man.; and Fernheim and Friesland, Paraguay. C.K.

Landskrone, a village of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, South Russia, founded in 1839 by Mennonites coming from Prussia. In 1869 Landskrone had 36 families with standard farms and 52 with smaller places or no land, with a total of nearly 10,000 acres. In 1914 it had a population of 600. The nearest railroad station was Stulnevo on the Tokmak line. Landskrone belonged to the Gnadenfeld district of the province Taurida. The principal occupation was farming and cattle raising. The village had a few business enterprises and an elementary school. For several years after World War I there was also an intermediate school (Fortbildungsschule). Some of the teachers were H. T. Janz (1913-24) and Heinrich Willms.

During and after the Revolution the village gradually disintegrated. Many of the men were sent to exile. When the German Army approached in 1941 all men of 16 to 60 were sent on foot to Kharkov and from there were shipped to Siberia. Soon all women and children were sent from Stulnevo to Siberia. Only a few individuals escaped and have found their way to America to tell the story of the tragic end of Landskrone.

Landskrone built a church in 1910, a subsidiary of the united Margenau-Alexanderwohl-Landskrone

Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1918 it was host to the General Conference, which convened here.
H.J., C.K.

A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer II (Abbotsford, 1954) 425; ML II, 614.

Landsmeer, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland. Anabaptists were found here at an early period. Jacob Claesz (Jacob van Wormer) and his wife Celi (Seli), executed as martyrs at Amsterdam in 1549, probably were natives of Landsmeer (Mart. Mir. D 61, E 464). In 1554-65 Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized here on several occasions a total of 27 persons. From then on a congregation must have existed here, which later sided with the Frisian Mennonites. Information concerning this congregation is scarce. In 1660 a member of this church, Gerrit Pieters Boon, who had been appointed sheriff of Landsmeer, was exempted from this appointment because he had religious scruples against holding a governmental office (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 449). The congregation of Landsmeer in 1673, during the war, contributed some 150 guilders to the general collection of the North Holland Mennonites, which the government had asked them to organize with the aim of providing the soldiers with good clothes. At least since the end of the 17th century the congregation of Landsmeer seems to have been served by the preachers of neighboring Den Ilp (q.v.). Gerrit Dirksz, preacher of Landsmeer, died in 1701. The Naamlijst of 1808 (82 f.) states that the congregation of Landsmeer no longer existed, only that of Den Ilp remaining.

The assertion of Hendrik Berends Hulshoff (Bezoekreis, 35) that a congregation of Huiskopers (i.e., Danzig Old Flemish, q.v.) existed at Landsmeer has not been proved.
vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 251; M. J. Harp, Lyk- en Pligt-predicatie op Gerrit Dirksz, leeraar tot Landsmeer (Amsterdam, n.d.—1701); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 357, 449; ML II, 614.

Landtsperger, Johannes, a Carmelite monk at the monastery of St. Anna in Augsburg, Germany, whose writings were of no slight influence during the Reformation. Of his origin and early life nothing is known, and his personality is still cloaked in mystery. He was often confused with the Carthusian monk, Johann Justus Lansperger in Cologne (d. 1539), and especially with the parson of Landshut, Johann Müller alias Landtsberger of Eggenfelden in Lower Bavaria (d. ca. 1544). This has been thoroughly proved by Max Martin in his book, Joh. Landtsperger, Die unter diesem Namen gehenden Schriften und ihre Verfasser (Augsburg, 1902). According to his study, Landtsperger was closely akin to the Anabaptists in Augsburg. When severe persecution broke upon them in 1527 Landtsperger went to Switzerland. He attended the great disputation of 1528 in Bern and died there probably at the end of 1529 or the beginning of the next year.

Ottius mentions his book, Ein wahrhafte, kurtze underwysung, wohär man zinsz und zehenden schuldig seye. Zur erhaltung des Christlichen fridens und ufrur zu vermyden (1528). From this inclusion it was inferred that Ottius considered him an Anabaptist. But this is no doubt an error, for Landtsperger attacks the Anabaptists in this book. V. A. Winter most definitely considered him an Anabaptist, confusing him with the city pastor of Landshut. Ludwig Keller took it for granted that he was an unusually "influential Anabaptist writer." S. Calvary, who lists eleven of Landtsperger's writings, four being given in full, says (p. 130): "We believe that he actually had Anabaptist inclinations, because in his booklet, Ein Christliche underrichtung wie die Göttlich geschrifft vergleycht soll werden, he confesses himself to be one." Dr. Martin has on valid grounds attributed this booklet to Hans Hut (q.v.); Johannes Landtsperger is the publisher. In his book, Eine kurtze erinnerung etlicher geschrifft, daraus man den kindertauff nit zimmlich sein beweisen will (1528), Landtsperger defends infant baptism and reveals himself to be a sharp opponent of the Anabaptists, as also in an earlier book, Ein gründtlicher Bericht: vom christlichen Tauff und seyner Kraft und notdürfftigkait (1526).

Although it is possible that there were connections between Landtsperger and the Anabaptists in Augsburg concerning which we are not informed, he cannot be considered one of them. At any rate he soon gave up these connections and championed Zwingli and Oecolampadius, as his books on communion show.
Neff.

J. H. Ottius, Annales anabaptistici (Basel, 1672) 47; V. A. Winter, Gesch. der Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1908) 54-56; Keller, Reformation, 434; Mitteilungen aus dem Antiquariat von S. Calvary & Co. in Berlin I (Berlin, 1869) 131-255; K. Schottenloher, Philipp Ulhart (Munich, 1921) 60-64; ML II, 614.

Lang, Jörg, an Anabaptist, one of the group of Swiss Brethren returning from Moravia who were seized at the border and put into the subterranean dungeons of the castle at Passau (q.v.). On Aug. 25, 1535, he was cross-examined with some others in the presence of Schröttinger, the cathedral preacher, and the pastor of St. Paul's. But he did not yield. He was probably one of those who "rotted" in these terrible holes in the earth. His wife Eva went the same road of suffering, remaining steadfast at her trial. Their son John presumably suffered the same fate, for the records say he did not give up his faith. (ML II, 615.)
W.W.

Lang, Laux, a citizen of Göggingen near Augsburg (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, in whose home Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.) stayed after being banished from Augsburg in October 1527, and where he was visited by many well-known Anabaptists. Here occurred the baptism of the wife of his servant Hermann Anwald, who always accompanied him on his journeys, and who had also joined the brotherhood in the autumn of 1527. All three of them, together with two other Anabaptists of Göggingen, Bernhard Zirgkendorffer and Hans Pfefferlein, fell into the hands of Diepold von Stein, the captain of the Swabian League (q.v.) on April 24, 1528, and were put to death at Leitheim on May 11, 1528, by the executioner of Memmingen. Laux Lang, at whose house Langenmantel moved so freely, was the brother of the Archbishop of Salzburg and Cardinal Matthäus Lang (q.v.), who had large numbers of Anabaptists in his bishopric put to death, and also communicated with Augsburg in November 1527 in the matter of prosecuting the Anabaptists. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins f. Schwaben und Neuburg, 1900 f.; ML II, 615.

Lang von Wellenberg, Matthäus (1468-1540), Cardinal and Archbishop of Salzburg, the son of poor Augsburg citizens, a Humanist, Master's degree from Tübingen in 1490, privy secretary of the imperial chancellor Berthold von Henneberg, who was the secretary of Emperor Maximilian II, and who won the emperor's highest favor. As archbishop of Salzburg he was unpopular because of his dictatorial, sometimes violent nature; nevertheless the country owed its increased prosperity to his rule.

Against the Anabaptists Lang was all harsh severity. Since he, as a temporal prince in Salzburg, combined the supreme temporal authority with the spiritual, he was able to conduct his struggle with Anabaptists with all his force. As early as 1523, before the Anabaptists had appeared, he charged his inspection commissioners to pay special attention to heretical maneuvers. There is no specific evidence of the presence of Anabaptists in Salzburg; the beginning of the movement here seems to have been Hans Hut's brief preaching. Hut had come from Linz, and when he departed from Salzburg he left behind him as apostles two men whom he had baptized in Steyer, namely, Hieronymus of Mansee, a former monk from the abbey Ranshofen, and Eucharius Binder, a cabinetmaker from Koburg. In Augsburg Hut kept up his connections with the Salzburg Anabaptists, who were at both places called "Gärtnerbrüder" (gardener brothers, but the real word was "Gartbrüder," from "gartenn"—wander).

In July 1527 Lang complained about the rapid growth of the movement in his territory and ordered his officials to proceed against them with all severity. A polemic leaflet appearing in 1528, the Newe Zeytung, gave information about the doctrines of the Anabaptists in Salzburg and comments that they assembled in homes or solitary places, that the members gave their money and possessions to the leaders and promised never again to enter the "temples of stone"; that they would consider the sacrament nothing but bread and wine. Naturally the slander was heard, that if there were a sufficient number of them, they would establish themselves by violent means.

On Oct. 18, 1527, Lang issued the first mandate against the Salzburg Anabaptists, forbidding their meetings and their doctrine in general, and ordering the pastors to bring the erring ones back into the church by indoctrination, but at the same time also ordering the officials to scout for Anabaptists, and report on the number they seized. Especially in his Tirol domain of Kitzbühel (q.v.) they were causing him trouble; on Nov. 28, 1527, the Austrian government reminded the cardinal to be on the lookout there and to commission his administrator Hans Finsterwalder to conduct the persecution. As evidence of their spread the government sent him on Dec. 12 the statements made by Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), who was a prisoner in Rattenberg.

A few days after the mandate was issued, five armed men managed to arrest a group of 32 Anabaptists in Salzburg, certainly including Hieronymus of Mansee and Carius Binder. Since none of them would desist, these two together with Wolfgang Winter, a tailor of Mistelbach, were burned at the stake on the Fornhof in Salzburg on Oct. 22, 1527. Then they beheaded five brethren "who had acknowledged their error" before committing their bodies to the flames. A woman and a beautiful girl of 16, the daughter of the goldsmith Georg Steiner, a friend of Hans Hut, who remained steadfast, were sentenced to death by drowning. When the executioner carried the girl to the watering trough in which her life was to end, she laughed at the water. . . . Both corpses were burned, as were also four others of persons beheaded, one of whom was the judge, one a nobleman, and one a boxmaker of Salzburg. A lacemaker and girdlemaker who would not recant were burned alive. "They lived a long time during the execution, and cried much to God, so that it was pitiful to listen to." In November Lang also sent the court records of ten Anabaptists to Augsburg, most of whom had been put to death; all but two confessed that they had been baptized by Hans Hut.

In the meantime Lang's police had the fortune of arresting a meeting of 11 women and 16 men, whose leader was a former priest. On Nov. 5, 1527, ten women and one man recanted and were expelled from the country. Six remained firm, including the preacher, the city scribe, and a girdlemaker, "a handsome fellow." These three and a locksmith were taken to his house near the park, in which they had held their meetings, and since they remained steadfast, they were burned together with the house. Two other houses which had served the same purpose were also reduced to ashes. In 1528, 41 Anabaptists lay in prison in Salzburg. The martyr list of the Hutterite chronicles lists 38 persons executed in Salzburg, two in Loser, one in Abtenau, and three in the Kucheltal, besides a few in the region now belonging to Bavaria.

In order to block the movement, Lang on Nov. 14, 1527, issued a charge to the priests at Hallein, Radstadt, Laufen, and Tittmoning, to win the erring ones back with convincing sermons, but to report obstinate ones at once. Several formularies were issued for the procedure in the cross-examinations. The questions asked were whether the accused had baptized adults, or had merely been recently baptized, whether voluntarily or through persuasion or force, what they thought of community of goods, of the government, the sacrament, of the deity of Christ, where they had held their meetings, how many persons had attended them, and who, etc.

In order to prevent any addition from without, Lang directed his magistrate in Salzburg to pay close attention to travelers to and through the city. On Jan. 24, 1528, a new police order was issued, which prohibited the employment of strangers in the trades; in the inns no conversations were permitted, especially with strangers, about Luther or the Anabaptists. To the administrator of Passau, Lang gave instructions for combating the Anabaptists. For his archdiocese he issued a severe "instruction" on April 18, 1528, defining the procedure from this time on: preachers, leaders, instigators, and propagators of Anabaptist doctrines, if they remained steadfast, were to be burned alive; if they recanted, they should be beheaded and their corpses burned. Misled ones and those who had sheltered Anabaptists should be drowned if they remained steadfast. The less guilty and the fellow travelers were to be punished with prison and whippings, particularly the servants and the young. To these punishments, which were already employed, there were added for the treasurers and the "announcers," the razing of their homes, fines, and exile. This procedure became a pattern for many a neighboring region. In 1529, for example, Scheurl recommended it to Nürnberg.

Under the pressure of this severe persecution the Anabaptist movement in Salzburg died relatively rapidly, many adherents emigrating to Tirol. Here Lang pursued them doggedly in his Kitzbühel domain; but since he confiscated the possessions of the victims into his own hands, he came in conflict with the Innsbruck chamberlains, who demanded them for King Ferdinand as the ruler of Tirol. In accord with the customary practice they wanted to grant Lang only as much of the property of the victims as was required to cover the costs of the trial and execution. Ferdinand ordered the Austrian government at Innsbruck on Nov. 27, 1530, to mediate between Lang and the councilors. The latter were annoyed because the church prince had already confiscated numerous estates without first coming to an agreement with them; the covetous cardinal insisted that since the territory was his possession and not a pledge, he was within his rights, comparing it to his practice in Salzburg. The dispute ran on for years; on Feb. 8, 1532, the council still held to its view (records in the archives of the court in Vienna, section court finance).

Nevertheless in June 1533, the king made a new appeal to the cardinal to take earnest steps against the Anabaptists in Kitzbühel, Kufstein (q.v.), and Rattenberg (q.v.). At the provincial synod held in Salzburg in May 1537, in preparation for the Council of Mantua, the pastors of Tirol complained again about the increase of the Anabaptists, whereas one hears nothing of the sort concerning Salzburg. Konrad Siebenbürger, who was charged two years later in St. Johann in the Pinzgau with Anabaptist sympathies, was declared innocent. P.De.

Newe Zeytung von den Wiedertauffern vnd yhrer Sect, newlich erwachsen im stifft zu Salzburg vnd an anderen enden mer etc., leaf 4, o. 10. (Salzburg, 1528, 2d ed., Dresden, 1528); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; F. A. Datterer, Des Kardinals und Erzbischofs von Salzburg, Matthäus Lang Verhalten zur Reformation (Freising, 1890); W. Hauthaler, "Kardinal Matthäus Lang und die religiöse und soziale Bewegung seiner Zeit," in Mitteilungen der Gesellschaft für Salzburgische Landeskunde XXXV (Salzburg, 1895); J. Schmid, "Des Kardinals und Erzb. von S. Matth. Lang Verhalten zur Reformation," in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für die Geschichte des Prot. in Oesterreich XIX (Vienna, 1898 ff.); J. Loserth, Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892); idem, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Salzburg," in Mitteilungen der Ges. für Salz. Landeskunde III (Salzburg, 1912); H. Widmann, "Zur Beurteilung d. Salzb. Eb. M. L." op. cit. LV (Salzburg, 1915); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; G. Loesche, Geschichte des Protestantismus im vormaligen und im neuen Oesterreich (3d ed., Vienna and Leipzig, 1930); ML II, 615-17.

Lange, de, a common Dutch family name, of which there is also a Mennonite branch. This is found at Zaandam from the late 18th century, although in the 19th century some of its members also lived at Alkmaar. Fourteen members of this family have served as deacons in the congregation of Zaandam-West. At Alkmaar Timon Henricus de Lange was 1849-81 a deacon and Jan de Lange Corn. Jzn (1852-1940) served as deacon and president of the church board 1877-1940, i.e., for nearly 63 years, 37 of which he was president of the church board. In commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Jan's service his historical study Beknopte Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Alkmaar was published by the church board in 1927.

R. C. de Lange (b. 1891) is a Mennonite minister, serving at Woudsend 1915-19, Leermens-Loppersum 1919-23, Krommenie ca. 1923-27, and Aalsmeer 1927-56. He is active in behalf of West Hill Sunday schools for children, editing a number of periodicals for instruction in Sunday-school matters. vdZ.

Lange Lillo (Langelille), a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation (Frisians), which was combined with the Frisian congregation of Heerenveen (q.v.), but must have died out about 1740. (Naamlijst 1731.) vdZ.

Lange, Friedrich Wilhelm, related to Wilhelm Lange (q.v.), became a member of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church, South Russia, in 1837 and was elected minister in 1838 and elder in 1841. Lange was an unusually successful teacher and had taught in Prussia. Heinrich Franz I (q.v.) was his pupil. Lange favored a warm piety and was a personal friend of Eduard Wüst (q.v.). Hermann Lenzmann related, "Wüst, who came to our church, was throughout his life in close brotherly contact with my father and his predecessor, Elder Fr. W. Lange, and frequently preached in their congregation just as they preached in his." Lange performed Wüst's marriage ceremony (Menn. Jahrbuch 1904-5, 78). He was a great promoter of evangelism, missions, abstinence, and music. Because of personal difficulties, he resigned in 1849 and accepted a position as teacher and assistant minister in the Swedish Lutheran Church at Schlangendorf on the Dnepr River, Ukraine. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 83 f.; ML II, 617.) C.K.

Lange, Johannes, a relative of Wilhelm Lange (q.v.), was sent by the Gnadenfeld Bruderschule (secondary school) of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, Russia, to the Kirschenhardthof school of Württemberg, Germany, to take a teacher training course. The brilliant young man not only received a very good training but also came under the influence of Christoph Hoffman and Christoph Paulus, the leaders of the Templer (q.v.) movement of the Friends of Jerusalem. After his return in 1861, he became a teacher in the Gnadenfeld Bruderschule. He was joined by his brother Friedrich who had received his training in the same school. Since the Langes not only exposed the children but also the adults in private meetings to the teachings of the Templer group, the matter was investigated by the authorities. When Johannes Lange began to advocate the cause of the landless (q.v.) his case became more complicated. For seven months he was kept in custody as the Halbstadt Gebietsamt after his arrest on Jan. 25, 1863. This was during the time that the Gnadenfeld Evangelische Mennonitengemeinde was founded (Friends of Jerusalem). In 1866 Johannes and Friedrich Lange went to St. Petersburg to defend the cause of their newly founded church. As a result in 1868 the group was permitted to settle on the estate of Orbelyani in the vicinity of Pyatigorsk in the Kuban River in the Caucasus where the Mennonite Brethren had settled. They established there the settlement Tempelhof (q.v.). Next to Nikolai Schmidt (q.v.), Johann Schmidt, and Isaak Fast (q.v.), Johannes Lange and his brothers Friedrich and Benjamin played a significant role in the founding of the Templer Church and in laying its religious and educational foundations. Their educational standards remained high. C.K.

Heinrich Sawatzky, Templer Mennonitischer Herkunft (Winnipeg, 1955); Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951).

Lange, Wilhelm, outstanding elder of the Mennonite Church at Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) and Gnadenfeld (q.v.), was a Lutheran from the Wartebruch near Landsberg, and came to Brenkenhoffswalde in 1790 (1788). Soon he was received into the Mennonite Church, and was elected minister in 1802 and elder in 1810 (1812). He was a very popular and successful minister, through whose efforts many non-Mennonites joined the congregation, including such names as Lenzmann, Klatt, and Johann Lange. Through him the congregation was in close touch with the Moravians of the community, who influenced the Mennonites very strongly.

Lange was a leader of the emigration from the Neumark to Russia in 1834. He obtained special permission from Czar Nicholas I for 40 families to settle at the Molotschna, South Russia, where they established the Gnadenfeld (q.v.) settlement and congregation. Here he died in 1840 at the age of 76. Wilhelm Lange's correspondence, dating back to the time of the immigration to Russia, presents a picture of the religious and cultural life of that day. (Found in BeCL.) C.K.

B. H. Unruh, "Die Mennoniten in der Neumark," Gem.-Kal., 1941; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 80 f.; ML II, 617.

Langedijk, De, a North Holland region north of Alkmaar, where there have been Anabaptists since at least 1535 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 101), has been the seat of a Mennonite congregation, until about 1800 called Langedijk and Koedijk, now called Broek op Langendijk (q.v.). vdZ.

Langedult, Pieter, b. 1640 at Haarlem, Holland, d. there 1677, was a physician and preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Haarlem. Langedult, who was a champion of Collegiant (q.v.) principles, wrote the following books: De Apostolice Outheyt van de Vryheyt van Spreken in de Vergaderingen der Christenen, tegens Ds A. van Dalens Alleen-spreken verdedigt (Haarlem, 1672) (Anton van Dale, q.v., his co-preacher of the Haarlem Flemish congregation, had published a book against the Collegiant practice of "free speaking" in the congregation), and De nietigheyd der Chiliastery (Haarlem, 1676), in which Langedult attacked the chiliastic ideas of the Collegiant leader Daniel de Breen (q.v.). He further published a Dutch translation of J. L. Wolzogen, De werelose Christen (Haarlem, 1676), a tragedy entitled Christus lydende en verheerlykt, het allerheylsaamste Treurspel (3 vv., Haarlem, 1684; 3d ed. Amsterdam, 1714), Christelyke Sedekonst ofte beoefeninge der Godsaligheyd (Leiden, 1684), and Aanteekeningen ofte Verklaaringen over de Klaagliederen van Jeremias (Amsterdam, 1687). The last three books were published by his friend after his early death. Laurens Klinkhammer (q.v.) edited his Sedekonst. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 537-39; N.N.B.Wb. V, 309; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs (Haarlem, 1900-2) I, 142; II, 105, 155; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1896) passim, see Index; ML II, 670.

Langegger (Langecker), Hans (Hans von der Reve), a weaver on the Ritten, an Anabaptist martyr of Tirol, Austria (now Italy). All that is known of him is that he accompanied Georg Blaurock (q.v.) on his wanderings in the Tirolean Alps, when he came into the Eisack Valley to take over the orphan congregation of Michael Kürschner (q.v.), who had been put to death at Innsbruck on June 2, 1529. Langegger assisted Blaurock, one of the founders of the Zürich brotherhood, with his knowledge of the rugged Tirolean terrain. It may have been due to his skill that Blaurock, who had a large following everywhere, was able to elude the authorities for nearly four months. On Aug. 14, 1529, both were discovered and arrested; and since they persisted in their faith they were burned at the stake at Klausen (q.v.) in the Eisack Valley. Hege.

J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 486; Mart. Mir. D 22, E 430-32; ML II, 617.

Langenbach, Velten, from Nieuwstadt near Sittard, now Dutch province of Limburg, author of the song written in the middle of the 16th century, "Von Herzen muss ich singen," which gives his name in acrostic. Nothing else is known of him. (Wolkan, Lieder, 100, 104; ML II, 617.)

Langendijk, Pieter, a Dutch poet, whose parents, Arent Pieters van Langedijk and Anneke Luykes Nieuwenhuysen, were Mennonites. He was born July 25, 1683, at Haarlem, died there July 9, 1756. He lost his father early. His mother opened a linen shop, but was unable to give her six-year-old son a proper education. Pieter learned some Latin and French in a school at Amsterdam conducted by a Quaker, but had to leave because of poverty. In The Hague he was employed as a designer in a weaving mill, and in 1722 he moved to Haarlem. On his deathbed he was baptized as a member of the Mennonite church. He acquired fame through his comedies. Besides these Langendijk published Levensloop der Aartsvaders, an illustrated rhymed version of the lives of the Patriarchs (Haarlem, 1740), some poems, Op de Afbeeldingen van Doopsgezinde Leeraars, and a remarkable poem, published in 1713 at Haarlem, entitled Zwitsersche Eenvoudigheid, klaagende over de bedroven zeden veeler Hollandse Doopsgezinden of Weerloze Christenen (Swiss plainness, lamenting the depraved morals of many Dutch Mennonites or defenseless Christians), in which he severely criticizes the worldliness of the Dutch Mennonites, interpreting the ideas of the Swiss Mennonites, who had emigrated to the Netherlands in 1711. With Claas Bruin he wrote Tafereelen der eerste Christenen. Kalff says Langendijk's opposition to ambitious clergymen as shown in his works is due to his Mennonite principles. F.H.K.

N.N.B.Wb. II, 764-68; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 162; Zondagsbode XLVI (July 23, 1933);DB 1897, 168, note 1; G. Kalff, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Letterkunde V (Groningen, 1910) 469-77; Irvin and Ava Horst, "Simplicity Laments Corrupted Manners," Menn. Life X (July 1955) 129; ML II, 617, 679.

Langenfeld, a village in Bavaria (Middle Franconia), Germany, located near Scheinfeld, between Würzburg and Nürnberg, where the Anabaptist movement found followers in the 16th century just as in the adjacent villages of the Steigerwald (Iphofen, Sulzfeld near Kitzingen, and Diespeck near Neustadt a.A.). Jörg von Passau (also called Nespitzer), who was sent out as an evangelist by the Anabaptist synod (see Martyr Synod) at Augsburg (Aug. 20, 1527), worked here as a preacher 1527-30. According to Jörg, he was not executed in Bamberg (ML I, 115), but recanted in Ansbach in the face of an expected death sentence. HEGE.

K. Schornbaum, TA II: Brandenburg, 112, 197; J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode 1526-1528 (Freiburg, 1851); ML II, 617.

Langenlonsheim, Philip of, an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded in 1529 in Kreuznach, a town not far from the village of Langenlonsheim. (Mart. Mir. D 30, E 438; ML II, 617.)

Langenmantel, Eitelhans (Hans), a member of the Anabaptist congregation of Augsburg (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, descended from the patrician Langenmantel family of Augsburg, called "vom Sparren" because of the chevron in their coat of arms. He was a son of Hans Langenmantel, who had held the office of mayor in Augsburg 14 times, had been captain of the Swabian League for many years, and died in 1505. One of his brothers was the gallant George Langenmantel, who fell in the battle of Pavia as the leader of the Black Knights in the service of France. Eitelhans ruined his health and squandered his money traveling through France and Italy.

Like his relative, councilor Christoph Langenmantel, Eitelhans favored the Reformation, but became an Anabaptist when he became acquainted with the nature of the movement. He associated with Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.); Hans Hut (q.v.) baptized him in the presence of Jakob Dachser (q.v.) and Eucharius (see Binder, Eucharius) of Koburg in March 1527 in the Langenmantel home, which became a place of meeting for the Augsburg Anabaptists. Langenmantel, as a "learned and well-read man," promoted their interests in word and deed. The council warned him to "keep clear of the Anabaptists," and ordered the expulsion of nonresistant Anabaptists.

On the basis of information given by the Anabaptists seized on Sept. 15, 1527, Eitelhans was arrested, but because of the influence of the family in the city he was treated much more leniently than the others; the preacher of the city held a disputation with him which resulted in his withdrawal from the Anabaptists and his recognition of infant baptism as "the Christian church teaches it." He was released from prison on Oct. 15 and banished from the city. He went first to Göggingen, but when the Anabaptists thronged about him, he went on to Langenneufnach and finally bought a house in Leutershofen.

On April 24, 1528, as Sender relates, he was seized at night by Diebold von Stein, captain of the Swabian League (q.v.), with his maid and a half-grown servant, and taken in chains to Weissenhorn. After several days Langenmantel and his servant boy were beheaded, and the maid was drowned. The captain "did all this without law, for . . . no sentence had been pronounced on them; the captain said the League had commanded it. For having previously been an Anabaptist he had been banished from Augsburg, and so he was tried twice for one offense, which is contrary to all law and reason."

But he seems after all to have remained an Anabaptist, for while his relatives offered 3,000 gilders for his release, the pastors of Weissenhorn, Oberhausen, and Wellenhausen tried to direct him on the right path. The pastor Johannes Schneid stood by him as he was executed by the executioner of Memmingen on May 11, 1528. On account of severe gout he was beheaded seated in his armchair.

Eitelhans Langenmantel is the author of the following tracts: (1) Ain kurtzer begriff von den Alten und Newen Papisten auch von den rechten und wahren Christen (1526, Weller, No. 3832); (2) Dies ist ain anzayg: ainem meynem, etwann vertrauten gesellen über seine hartte widerpart, des Sacrament und anders betreffend (Nürnberg, 1526; Weller, No. 3831); (3) Ain kurzer Anzayg, wie doctor M. Luther ain zayt hör hatt etliche schrifften lassen ausgeen vom Sacrament, die doch straks wider einander (January 1527); (4) Ott and Veesenmeyer credit him with Ein göttlich und gründlich offenbarung von dem warhaftigen Widertauffern mit gottlicher warheit anzaigt (1527), but Schottenloher (Philipp Ulhart) has shown that Jakob Dachser was the author. This is replied to in the book by Urban Rhegius, Notwendige Warnung wider den newen Tauforden an alle Christglaubigen durch die diener des Evangelii zu Augsburg (1527).

Among the manuscripts of the Anabaptists of Moravia and Hungary are two treatises by Eitelhans Langenmantel (Cod. VIII g. 27, Cod. VIII g. 25 at Budapest and Cod. Lyc. at Bratislava of 1618) which present the Swiss view of communion. They are (5) Von Nachtmahl des Herren durch den getreuen Zeugen Gottes Hannss Langenmantel, and (6) Ein ander prüff: vom Sakrament auch durch Hanns Langenmantel gemacht.

Langenmantel has also been considered the author of a hymn found in the Ausbund (q.v.), reprinted by Wackernagel. It has 16 stanzas and begins "Kom Gott Vatter vom Himmel mit der Kraft deines Geists"; but it is actually the work of Peter Riedemann, was written in 1529 at Gmünden, and was dedicated to the memory of Langenmantel by the publishers of the Ausbund. It is found in Codex VIIIc at Budapest with Riedemann's name.

A further writing ascribed by John Horsch to Langenmantel, Eine Auslegung des Vater Unser, is found in a booklet published by Horsch at Elkhart, Ind., in 1888, in combination with Hans Denk's Von der wahren Liebe. Horsch says the Vater Unser was written in 1527 and is found in manuscript form in the Hutterite Epistel-Buch of 1566 (Horsch, 21). Ludwig Keller states further that this Vater Unser had already been published in a booklet in 1527 together with a sermon presumably by Hans Denk, but gives no indication of the author of the Vater Unser. The codex which Horsch used is a copy done in 1888 by Elias Walter, now in the Pibrock Bruderhof in Alberta. It contains the Langenmantel tract, expressly ascribed to him, under the title Eine hüpsche Erklärung des Vater Unser. LOSERTH.

K. Schottenloher, Philipp Ulhart, ein Augsburger Winkeldrucker und Helfershelfer der "Schwärmer" und "Wiedertäufer" (Munich, 1921); Gasparii Annales in Menken S. S. Rerum Germ. I; Clemens Sender, O. S. B. Hist. Relatio; G. Veesenmeyer, "Nachricht von Eitelhanns Langenmantel, einem Augsburgischen Wiedertäufer," in Beiträge zur Gesch. der Literatur (Ulm, 1782); Die Weissenhorner Historie in Fr. L. Baumann, Quellen zur Geschichte des Bauernkrieges in Oberschwaben (Tübingen, 1876) 1-240; G. Uhlhorn, Urbanus Rhegius im Abendmahlsstreite (1861); L. Keller, Johann von Staupitz und die Anfänge der Reformation (Leipzig, 1888) 325; Fr. Dobel, Memmingen im Reformationszeitalter nach handschriftlichen und gleichzeitigen Quellen (Memmingen, 1874); Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte 1517-1527 (Munich, 1881); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 35 f.; Mart. Mir. D 20 f., E 429 f.; ML II, 618.

Langezwaag, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where there was formerly a Mennonite congregation of the Flemish branch. Probably a congregation existed here already in the 16th century. About 1620, at a meeting of Flemish leaders held at Langezwaag, a quarrel arose between the elders Jan Luies (q.v.) of Groningen and Jacques Outerman (q.v.) of Haarlem. Soon after this the congregation of Langezwaag joined the Groningen Old Flemish group. In 1648 Meinte Sjoerds and Cornelis Jeltes were preachers here. Though figures are not available, the membership must have been very small. Meetings were held in a private home "In de Wyngaart." It seems that about 1645 the congregation of Langezwaag was united with that of Knijpe (q.v.). After 1655 there is no further information. The congregation must have died out before 1710, because it is not found in a list of the Groningen Old Flemish congregations drawn up in this year. (DB 1879, 3, 90; N.N.B.Wb. III, 797.) vdZ.

Langham (Sask.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church was established in 1912. The church, rebuilt after it was totally destroyed by fire in 1929, seats 250. Its 1955 membership was 110. Jacob Hiebert has been the pastor of the church since 1954. M.G.

Langnau, a beautiful village in the Emmental (Emme Valley), the main village of the Signau district, the largest village (pop. 8,726) in the canton of Bern, Switzerland. It has a number of industries. It was once the center of pottery and linen weaving in the Emmental; in the 18th century it became the center of the "Emmentaler" cheese industry. The village is mentioned for the first time in A.D. 850.

On March 13, 1525, the preacher at Langnau was threatened by Bern, because his preaching "is producing discord, revolt, and disobedience" to the government. By a decision of the council of Feb. 28, 1527, two men of Langnau were put in "neck irons" for destroying an image. On Oct. 25, 1526, Bern demanded that "the priests at Langnau and elsewhere, who do not wish to hold Mass, must continue to hold Mass." Three days later Langnau replied, citing the mandates of Bern which ordered that the Word of God be taught on the basis of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments (Aktensammlung).

Thus the people of Langnau, even before the Reformation was introduced there, showed independence in religious thinking and religious life, as well as a desire for freedom. These traits are also responsible for the persistence of Anabaptism in the Emmental. Langnau was always an Anabaptist center and today has the oldest Mennonite congregation in the world. The local clergy often had to cope with the Swiss Brethren, as the baptismal registers of Langnau report. The Chorgerichtsmanuale of Langnau omitted the Anabaptist persecutions and showed that the populace was not hostile to the Swiss Brethren. On May 6, 1934, the citizens of Signau elected an Emmental Mennonite to the Great Council of the canton of Bern. The Mennonite meetinghouse is located at Kehr, on the outskirts of Langnau.

In Langnau Ernst Müller, the author of the authoritative history of the Mennonites of Bern, was the pastor of the state church from 1884 to 1927. Langnau is the meeting place of the Swiss Mennonite conference every fall. Here also the Zionspilger (q.v.) is published. (See Bern and Emmental.) A.-T.

Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Hs. Käser, "Ausserkirchliche christliche Versammlungen im Unteremmental in früherer Zeit," Brosamen, 1926, Nos. 1-9; idem, "Chorgericht und Landvogt in Behandlung der Täufergeschäfte," in Blätter für bernische Gesch. und Altertumskunde (1928, No. 2); D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953); ML II, 619.

Language Problem. Problems caused by language have repeatedly arisen among the Mennonites because of their migrations from one language-and-culture area to another, often because of persecution, but at times also of desire for economic betterment. The maintenance of the language of the motherland has aided in maintaining separation from the surrounding culture in the new homeland and thus strengthened the sense of nonconformity to the world. This has often made it easier to maintain the distinctive Mennonite principles and intensify the feeling of group solidarity. On the other hand, the language breach has usually prevented a program of active evangelism and outreach, and has imposed a necessary system of private or parochial schools. As long as the breach with the surrounding culture and language was complete and continuous, problems of adjustment, either of the group with the outside world, or of individuals to individuals within the group, seldom arose. However, when the breach has been only partial, or when individuals or a subgroup within the larger group become wholly or partially assimilated to the "outside" language, serious problems of internal adjustment have arisen. At times this has been a problem of adjustment between the generations, so that youth has come into conflict with age, and usually large numbers of the youth have been lost to the group and its faith and way of life. At other times factionalism has arisen, resulting in serious schisms. Conservative groups attempting to hold the language line have died out because of failure to adjust to the new environment. Successful maintenance of small language enclaves detached from any larger language culture body has resulted in cultural and intellectual impoverishment, frequently with attendant religious losses. The battle to maintain the language has usually been fought with religious sanctions which have at times gone to the extreme of claims of higher spiritual values for the mother tongue as compared with the new tongue and of forfeiture of group principles and even faith in God in case of surrender of the language. Usually the transition from one language to another has required two or more generations of confusion and turmoil with considerable loss of membership en route, as well as the diversion of much energy from constructive work. The effect in literary production and consumption by the group is also usually very detrimental.

The following cases of serious problems caused by language transition may be noted: (1) Dutch to German for the Anabaptist-Mennonite refugees from Holland settling in northwest Germany (Emden, Crefeld, Hamburg, Lübeck) and the area of East and West Prussia (Danzig, Elbing, Königsberg, Graudenz). The transition was completed everywhere but Emden by the end of the 19th century. (2) German to English for the Mennonite immigrants to Pennsylvania from Switzerland and the Palatinate, Germany, in the 18th century (including daughter settlements in Ontario, Virginia, western Pennsylvania, and Ohio). A similar problem faced the immigrants from Switzerland, Alsace, and South Germany to the area west of the Allegheny Mountains as far as Illinois. Both of these immigrant groups made the transition largely in the second half of the 19th century. The stress and strain of the transition, complicated with other factors of course, played a large role in the schisms among the Amish (Old Order Amish) 1850-80 and the Mennonites (Old Order or Wisler Mennonites 1870-1900). (3) The transition from German to English among the immigrants from Russia to the prairie states and provinces (1874-88). In the United States this transition occurred in the first quarter of the 20th century. In Canada it is still in progress, where it is delayed and intensified by the arrival of very large further contingents of immigrants from Russia in 1922-25, 1930-32, and 1947-50, and is now in its most intense phase.

Other cases of language problems are: (1) the Swiss Mennonite German-speaking enclaves in the French-speaking Jura area of the canton of Bern, Switzerland, which though small in quantity is just as serious as in other cases of larger extent. (2) The German-speaking Mennonite communities in inner France, and the less serious but similar situation in Alsace. (3) The German-speaking Mennonite communities established in Paraguay and Uruguay in Spanish language areas, and in Brazil in a Portuguese language area.

The case of the German-speaking Mennonite settlements in Russia is unique. Until after 1920 they, with other German immigrant groups, had been permitted linguistic and cultural as well as religious autonomy, and with the aid of large block settlements, foreign language schools, and cultural superiority, they successfully maintained the German language and avoided cultural deterioration. The attempt of the Czarist government in 1870-80 to russify these groups contributed heavily to the great emigration to North America at that time. The final destruction of the block settlements and the autonomous Mennonite educational and cultural institutions (1929-39) thrust Russian Mennonitism into a crisis. The present generation of Mennonites in Russia now faces the language problem in an acute form. The coming generation will perforce become Russian in language. This need not, however, be fatal to Mennonitism in Russia, any more than the transition to English has been in the United States.

A particular case of the language problem is that of the Old Colony Mennonites in Manitoba, who thought they had a governmental guarantee dating from the time of their settlement in 1874-77, of school and language autonomy. Losing this in the strenuous period of World War I, large blocks emigrated to Mexico and Paraguay, where they were promised school and language autonomy, and where they have recreated through block settlement and German schools the desired state of language maintenance. In both areas, however, the Old Colony groups suffer from considerable cultural deterioration.

The language problem has been further complicated for the Mennonites by the maintenance of dialects or sublanguages, e.g., the Plattdeutsch among the Russian Mennonite immigrants in North and South America and the Pennsylvania-Dutch among the Old Order Amish. In such groups where the dialect has displaced the High German, at least relatively, the people have lost almost all touch with the literary German language except Bible reading, and therefore have largely stopped reading serious literature of either religious or secular character, with resulting cultural and religious impoverishment.

Sometimes the theory of the cultural value of using two languages has been propounded to support retention of the "mother tongue." Actually it is probable that only highly intelligent persons who diligently pursue both languages on a literary level profit from this dualism. More common outcomes are the failure to master either language adequately, confusion of vocabulary and ideas, undesirable carry-over of idioms from one language to the other (Germanisms in English and Anglicisms in German), and undesirable foreign accents which handicap individuals in their speaking and other expression as they move in public life.

The language problem has often become acute in the pulpit. Without diligent effort few preachers acquire the ability to preach well in a second language after middle age is reached, and they may be unwilling to pay the necessary price to do so. Consequently congregations have suffered in pulpit leadership because of preachers able to use only the older language. With the older generation of members unable or unwilling to accept a new language in the pulpit, they have denied their children and youth the privilege of religious teaching and worship in the new language, the only one which the latter fully comprehend.

Language problems are characteristic of all immigrant religious groups who find themselves in a new and strange language-culture situation. But these problems have been intensified among Mennonites by their distinctive emphasis upon nonconformity and nonresistance. H.S.B.

Langweer, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, seat of a Mennonite circle (Kring) since 1950, whose members (28 in 1955) belong to the Joure (q.v.) congregation. During the winter services are held once a month by the pastor of Joure. vdZ.

Lansbergen (Lansberghe), Franciscus van (d. 1626), a native of Gent, a Reformed preacher successively at Kortrijk, Brugge, and Gent, fled to Leiden, and studied medicine there. In 1593 he was called to Rotterdam to preach for the Reformed Church; he joined the Remonstrants and gave up his position in 1619. Before coming to Rotterdam he had attacked the Waterlander idea, as presented by Hans de Ries and Jacob Jans Scheedemaker, that the institutions given by God in the Old Testament have no validity for the New. In 1596 he attended a sermon by Jan Jansz; then he wrote an attack on silent prayer in church in his books, Van de vremde en onschriftmatighe manieren der Wederdoopscher Leeraren heymelijcke ghebeden, and Een grondelijcke wederlegginghe van Jacob Jansz (Rotterdam, 1596). vdZ.

A Mennonite van Lansberge(n) family, found at Haarlem, Holland, in the 17th and 18th centuries, was apparently not related to this Franciscus van Lansbergen.

Biogr. Wb. V, 555 f.; N.N.B.Wb. II, 772 ff.; DB 1864, 34; 1897, 78-82, 88 f., 97-105; ML II, 619.

Lanoy, de, a Mennonite family, probably originally from Flanders, Belgium, or Northern France, which moved to Leiden in the Netherlands. Branches of this family were later found in Amsterdam, Holland, and Hamburg, Germany. In Hamburg Jan de Lanoy (b. ca. 1654 at Leiden, d. March 10, 1722, at Hamburg), a cloth-dealer, served the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite congregation as a preacher from 1681 until his death. He is said to have been in sympathy with the Lamist teachings of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), while his three fellow preachers were more conservative. This caused some discord in the congregation shortly after 1690, which ended only with Lanoy's death. He was a wealthy man; in 1717 he contributed 1250 Marks to the building of the new meetinghouse at Altona, while his son Jan de Lanoy, Jr., contributed 600 Marks. His daughter Ida was married to Ernst Govers, a Mennonite merchant, owner of whalers, and also a deacon.

At Amsterdam the de Lanoys were also merchants and often deacons of the (Lamist) Mennonite Church. Some of them sympathized with the Collegiants (q.v.) and were governors of the Oranjeappel (q.v.) Collegiant orphanage. Karel de Lanoy (b. 1827 at Amsterdam, d. 1918 at Haarlem) was a Mennonite pastor at Oldeboorn Nieuwe Huis 1852-56 and Haarlem 1856-90. For many years he was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) and a curator of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. vdZ.

B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Menn.-Gemeinde zu Hamburg-Altona I (Hamburg, 1886); II (1887) passim; church records of Leiden and Amsterdam.

Lansdale Mennonite Church (MC), in Lansdale, Pa., was established as a mission in 1935. It was under the direction of the Franconia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities until 1951, when it became a church. In 1954 it had a membership of 60, with Jacob Rittenhouse as pastor. M.G.

Lanzenstiel (Lantzenstiel; often called Seiler, i.e., ropemaker), Leonhard (d. 1565), a native of Bavaria, Germany. Little is known of his early life and conversion. In 1529 he was with the Anabaptist congregation at Kromau with Hans Amon (q.v.), and from there he went to Austerlitz in Moravia, where he was called to the ministry.

At the end of 1536, he and his companion Jörg Fasser (q.v.) left Austerlitz, arriving at Windorf in Lower Austria on April 27, where they found several sisters and "some other kindhearted people"; but in the inn there was a "very indecent Sodomitic group." They looked around for another inn and found it with the tollkeeper of the village. The gang from the inn followed them. "As far as we were concerned," they wrote to Hans Amon, "it was easy and slight. But when we heard them blaspheme the name of God, our hearts were greatly stirred to point out their sin and evil. Indeed, God has not without reason permitted this wicked, sinful people to be destroyed by the Turks; He will within a short time reveal Himself in a different way in grim anger."

The two were arrested and put into the local prison. On the next day they were taken to Mödling and questioned on the rack before the judge and the council. "We gave testimony to the truth in such a way that they were all terrified and didn't say a single word against it."

They were imprisoned "with many ungodly, shameful people," whose company was abhorrent to them. From May 8 to June 1 they wrote Hans Amon at least six letters, to which he replied with rich comfort. The first letter says a dear brother from Vienna was with them. In the second letter they say, "The town in which we are imprisoned belongs with the government of Vienna to the terrible Babylon, and the judge is now at the Landtag, so we think he will bring us a message which will not terrify us, for we desire with our whole hearts to be dissolved." The judge and the council had visited them and told them that all would end well. "As our dear brethren have complained that they lay in a prison into which all kinds of wickedness was thrown, so it also goes with us. But we have great joy in departing from this world and joining the multitude that rests and worships." Lanzenstiel warned the brethren in Moravia that they should be cautious, for some of their names were known to the government. With a fourth letter he sent Amon "Jakob's washcloth," apparently a possession of Hutter, concerning whose death Amon had told them. The fifth letter the prisoners thought would probably be the last; the judge and the council were urging them to desist and threatening exile and terrible torture.

In the next letter they say, "If we hadn't said that the men from Vienna were our brethren (viz., Jeronymus Käls and his companions), they would gladly have released us." But now they had to act in accord with the king's commands. An important man had been with them and had told them that if they wished to be freed they must desist from several articles; soon the priests from Vienna would be sent to them. Eight days previously (May 25) the wife of a wealthy merchant had visited them and told them of Hutter's death.

The news of the capture of two such valiant brethren caused sorrow in the brotherhood, since within a short period they had been deprived of their most capable men. Amon comforted the prisoners, "Fight to the end. For you are waiting in Paradise our beloved Jakob (Hutter) and Jeronymus (Käls) with a mighty host of the elect. Testify to the truth and warn men of the coming judgment."

In another letter Amon admonished the prisoners to remain true. "Think of dear Jakob. Did he not remain true in all torture, and was God not with him? Likewise Jeronymus, Michel, and Hänsel. Think of Peter Riedemann and Hans von Lichtenfels. Are they not faithful witnesses? I might name hundreds who are an example to us for honesty, piety, and faith."

After nearly a year in prison, facing death with the courage of "young lions," they were somehow released without violating their conscience. Particulars are not known. Scarcely released, Fasser assembled a congregation at Peckstal in Austria, was seized here in 1537 and executed. His followers escaped to Moravia.

Lanzenstiel had a great future before him. He went to Trässenhofen on the Moravian border in Lower Austria and then apparently on to Tirol. His wife Apollonia was seized in 1539 on the road toward Brixen and drowned.

In that year Lanzenstiel was chosen preacher and went to the Adige and from there to Switzerland. Although his journey had been betrayed to the authorities, spies had been posted, and notices had been issued against him, he managed to evade their pursuit.

Three years later (1542), after the death of Hans Amon, Lanzenstiel was entrusted with the leadership of the entire brotherhood. The chronicles say that he was a "pious, honorable man and faithfully looked after the church of God." His leadership began under the most favorable auspices. He had a very competent assistant in Peter Riedemann, "who helped him carry the burden of the church."

Year after year groups continued to come to Moravia from all sides. There was economic progress. Some of the later additions were weavers and developed a flourishing craft in Moravia. They seem to have imported from Hungary the wool they needed, for the Moravian estates, to protect the domestic market, issued an order in 1544 prohibiting the purchase of wool anywhere other than in the royal cities or the baronial estates. The Hutterites were all the more willing to obey, for the barons showed increasing interest in protecting them and in 1545 and 1546 granted them new households in Rackschitz, Kromau, Eibenschitz, Gobschitz, Bisentz, Bapayedl, Pawlowitz, Altenmarkt, Göding, Schaikowitz, Paraditz, Pochtisch, Bupschitz, Wesseli, Gurdau, Puslawitz, and Frätz.

This increase of Anabaptism brought great concern to the government and new tests and persecutions to the Anabaptists. In the spring of 1545 an order was issued in Prague that the Hutterites be expelled, and the estates complied to the extent that they required them to give up their communal life. Since the Landtag of this year also threatened them with expulsion, they presented a solemn protest to the barons. They give an account of their doctrines and institutions and defend themselves on all the charges raised against them. Only to serve God had they come to Moravia; for at other places they had not been able to do so. Since evil accusations were being raised against them by thoughtless people, they felt it necessary to explain that there must be governments, for they were instituted by God.

The following years of Lanzenstiel's direction are recorded in the chronicles as the time of the great persecution in Moravia, Austria, and Hungary. Repeatedly Ferdinand I requested the estates to expel them, threatening severe penalties. In addition the Bohemian revolt of 1547 and its suppression by Ferdinand gave him the opportunity he was looking for to increase the Catholic power in political as well as in religious affairs, and to carry out his intention to re-establish the religious status of 1526.

This was the beginning "of sorrow and tribulation, the time of the cross, and severe persecution" from one country to another. Fortunately the Hutterites found support in the Moravian barons, who insisted upon their right to improve their constitution according to their own custom, judgment, and conscience. The principle of imperialism did not succeed in Moravia as in Bohemia; and so better days came for the Hutterites. In 1550 and 1553 they set up three new households. And so the period of Lanzenstiel's direction also marked the beginning of the "good time of the brotherhood," which continued until his death, giving way then to a still better one, the "golden time."

Among the leaders of the brotherhood Lanzenstiel was not outstanding for his talents. The chronicles, however, say of him that he gave his brethren many wholesome teachings, comforting epistles, and explanations of the Holy Scriptures. To his credit is also the fact that he permitted a man to work beside him who far surpassed him in intellectual gifts, Peter Riedemann. His special field seems to have been economic organization. The Väterlied credits him with many beneficent regulations. Unfortunately, most of these have been lost, for the oldest regulations that have been preserved stem from the time of Klaus Braidl. Only the regulation for shoemakers dates back to Lanzenstiel (1561).

At any rate, under Lanzenstiel's careful guidance the brotherhood prospered; old Bruderhofs were provided for, new ones established, and missionary work carried on with vigor. New members were added and groups which had split off joined the brotherhood again. Their songs also commemorate the growth of the brotherhood under Lanzenstiel's guidance.

After a life rich in difficulty and endeavor Lanzenstiel died on March 3, 1565, at Klein-Nembschitz in Moravia. Of his writings there have come down to us the six letters which he wrote with Jörg Fasser in prison in Mödling, and his "Schusterordnung." The "Rechenschaft," which was written by Peter Riedemann, may also be in part a result of his influence.

LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 216 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 164 et passim; Loserth, Communismus; ML II, 619-21.

Lapine Civilian Public Service Camp No. 60 was located about 18 miles west of Lapine, Ore. It was opened in December 1942. A Bureau of Reclamation camp, its chief project was the building of an irrigation dam on the upper Deschutes River. Because of its excellent buildings capable of housing 600 men and the immensity of the project Selective Service changed it into a government-operated camp. The MCC ended its operation of CPS No. 60 on Dec. 31, 1943, the day before it became government camp No. 128.

M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949).

Lapp (Lappe, Lape, Lap), a Mennonite family name. The first settler by this name to come to America was Johannes (L) Lap, who arrived in Philadelphia on Sept. 29, 1733, on the Pink Mary, which sailed from Rotterdam via Plymouth. He settled in Bucks Co., Pa., and became the progenitor of the Lapp family in the Mennonite Church (MC). One of his descendants was Deacon Samuel W. Lapp of the Line Lexington, Pa., congregation, who moved to Nebraska in 1879 and is better known as the father of four sons who became bishops, and two of them foreign missionaries in the Mennonite Church. They are Daniel G. (1867-1952), who spent the greater part of his life at Roseland, Neb. He was a widely traveled and an outstanding bishop in the western part of the church in the United States and served on a number of church-wide committees and boards; Samuel G. (1869-1916), who served the South English, Iowa, congregation; Mahlon C. (1871-1923), who was a pioneer missionary to India 1901-23; and George J. (1879-1951), who served five terms as a missionary to India and was also a widely known and much-used speaker in the churches in America. Other descendants of this first settler include two deacons of the Line Lexington congregation, Abraham (1777-1855) and Henry B. (1853-1931); and John E. Lapp (1905-), bishop in the Plain congregation, Lansdale, Pa. John Lapp (1798-1878) was bishop at Clarence, N.Y.

The progenitor of the large Lapp family in the Old Order Amish Church is thought to have been Michael Lapp (b. April 6, 1737), who likely arrived in Philadelphia on Sept. 22, 1752. This family greatly outnumbers in size the family in the Mennonite Church. The Family Almanac (Scottdale, Pa., 1954) lists 17 ordained men by this name among the Amish, whereas the Mennonite Church lists but one.

J.E.L.

Perkiomen Region (Pennsburg, Pa.) X, No. 2 (April 1932); Ancestry of Abram Clemmer; C. L. Lapp, Genealogy of the Descendants of Isaac and Barbara Lapp (n.p., 1941).

Lapp, Daniel G., b. April 29, 1867, at Line Lexington, Pa., d. Dec. 15, 1951, at Sterling, Ill., a son of Samuel W. and Sarah Gross Lapp, a prominent bishop and general church leader in the Mennonite Church (MC), who spent 48 years as pastor of the Roseland, Neb., congregation of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference district. He was ordained preacher in 1903 and bishop in 1915. He was an active evangelist for 7 years, vice-president of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities for 16 years, vice-president of the Mennonite Board of Education for 10 years, and long a member of the Board. His last six years he spent as pastor of the West Sterling, Ill., congregation. He was married to Ida M. Good on Feb. 22, 1898. He had seven children, one of whom is Mrs. Wilbur J. Hostetler, a former missionary to India.

H.S.B.

Lapp, George Jay, b. May 26, 1879, at Juniata, Neb., one of the eight children of Samuel W. and Sarah Gross Lapp, d. Jan. 25, 1951, at Goshen, Ind., was an outstanding foreign missionary of the Mennonite Church (MC), having served nearly 40 years (1905-45) in the Central Provinces of India. He was ordained to the ministry in 1905, and as bishop in India in 1928. He served as interim president of Goshen College February 1918-June 1919. He attended Elkhart Institute one year in 1901, then Northwestern University two years 1901-3. His degrees were: B.A., Goshen College (1913); M.R.E., Bethany Biblical Seminary (1930); B.D., Goshen College Biblical Seminary (1947). He was married twice: (1) Esther Ebersole, June 25, 1905; (2) Fanny Hershey, April 14, 1920. Mrs. J. Lawrence Burkholder (Harriet) and Mrs. Ezra Camp (Lois) are daughters. In India he was the founder and director of the Mennonite Bible School from 1910 to its merger with the Dhamtari Christian Academy in 1931. He was a member of the National Christian Council of India and under its direction made a study of rural life, which was published as The Christian Church and Rural India (Calcutta, 1938). He wrote and published in Hindi Menno Simons and the Mennonite Church (Jubbulpore, 1929) and Fundamental Doctrines of the Bible (Jubbulpore, 1933).

H.S.B.

Lapp, Mahlon Cassius (1872-1923), a Mennonite (MC) missionary and bishop, was born in Line Lexington, Bucks Co., Pa., on Feb. 4, 1872, the son of Deacon Samuel Whistler and Sarah Gross Lapp, the eighth generation of the Lapp immigration from Europe. "Tradition has it that John Lapp, who landed in Philadelphia Sept. 29, 1733, was raised Amish, fell in love with and married a Mennonite girl, and they became the progenitors of Bucks County branch of the Lapp family" (Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary, p. 204). Mahlon was the fourth of five children in the Lapp family. The oldest child was the only girl. In February 1878, at the age of six years, he moved with his parents to Roseland, Neb., where he grew to manhood. As a boy he attended grade school at Roseland and later helped his father and brothers on the farm. For several years he worked as a constructionist in a bridge gang. After his conversion at the age of 21 he assisted Jacob Burkhard in conducting an extension Sunday school at Antioch, about 30 miles distant from their home, traveling the distance each week by horse and buggy.

In 1899 Mahlon went to Chicago to serve as a missionary in the Mennonite Home Mission located at that time on West 18th Street. His city mission service continued until 1901, during which time he took a short business course at the Elkhart Institute, Elkhart, Ind. On June 10, 1901, at the Home Mission he was united in marriage to Sarah Hahn of Clarence Center, N.Y. In the same month the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board (now the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities) appointed Mahlon and Sarah Lapp missionaries to India. Before they sailed Mahlon was ordained to the ministry and to the office of bishop by Bishop Albrecht Schiffler in the Mennonite church at Roseland. They arrived in India in October 1901. He resided in that country until his death in 1923. He had no children.

During his missionary service in the American Mennonite Mission at Dhamtari, Central Provinces (now Madhya Pradesh), India, Mahlon served as cobishop of the Mennonite Church with Bishop J. A. Ressler until the latter left India in 1908. Then he was the only bishop until the ordination of Peter A. Friesen on April 2, 1916. He continued his bishop responsibilities until his death. He also served for a short time as treasurer of the Mission and later as assistant superintendent until Ressler left in 1908, when he became superintendent and served in that capacity until about 1920. During his terms as superintendent he also served as agent of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. He was the first moderator of the India Mennonite Conference when it was organized in 1912 and was frequently elected to that office afterwards.

The missionary life of Mahlon Lapp "was busy and strenuous from the beginning. A many-sided, able man placed in a land of many and urgent needs, he was constantly sought out for help and advice by Europeans and Indians of all classes. He was farmer, doctor, builder, and minister. He became all things to all men that he might by all means save some. He loved the people and was loved by them" (annual report of the American Mennonite Mission, 1923). Although he was not a trained physician, one of his major contributions to India was along medical lines. Hundreds of people traveled many miles on foot and by cart to be treated at his clinic.

Mahlon Lapp's death occurred in Calcutta, India, on May 30, 1923. He was interred in the Sunderganj Mennonite cemetery at Dhamtari. (Gospel Herald, July 26, 1923; Christian Monitor, June 1932.) J.N.K.

L.A.R.A. (Licensed Agencies for Relief in Asia) was established in March 1946 by the American Council of Voluntary Agencies for Foreign Service, Inc., New York, N.Y., as special commission for conducting relief activities in Japan, Korea, and Okinawa. It is a federation of 13 U.S. relief agencies and was licensed by the U.S. government to ship relief supplies in bulk to Asia for distribution to the needy. It was the sole U.S. agency through which welfare shipments in bulk received exemptions and priorities provided by military government. The contract between L.A.R.A. and the Japanese government was not signed until March 23, 1950, and was to "be effective from April 1, 1950, until the activities of L.A.R.A. in Japan are fully terminated." Supplies began to arrive in Japan in November 1946.

The distribution of relief supplies was done through Japanese welfare agencies on the basis of need without respect to birth, religion, or political affiliation and at no cost to the recipient. Most of the supplies were distributed to individuals in institutions recommended by the prefectual departments of welfare. Three Americans served L.A.R.A. in Japan as liaison to the supreme commander for the Allied Powers. They also served as a central coordinating committee for the distribution of contributed supplies.

During the five and one-half years of L.A.R.A. operation in Japan a total of 33,477,122 pounds of food, clothing, soap, and medicine was channeled through the organization. In addition 2,036 goats and 45 milk cows were also among the L.A.R.A. gifts.

The Mennonite Central Committee became a member of L.A.R.A. in March 1947. J.N.B.

L.A.R.A.—A Friend in Need, published by the Ministry of Welfare of Tokyo, 1953 (a report on the activities in Japan); Thanks to L.A.R.A., published by the Social Bureau-Ministry of Welfare-Japanese Government (a pictorial report on the distribution of L.A.R.A. supplies); Minutes and Reports of L.A.R.A. meetings at the American Council of Voluntary Agencies for Foreign Service, Inc., New York, N.Y.

Laren-Blaricum, Dutch province of North Holland. Mennonites living here on Sept. 21, 1950, organized a Mennonite circle, which in 1956 numbered 70 baptized members. The pastor of the neighboring congregation of Hilversum, to which the members of the circle belong, is in charge of this group. vdZ.

Lark, The, a yearbook, first published as part of the Hesston Academy Journal in 1915. Occurring as the last issue of each school year, it was variously known as the "Commencement Issue" and the "Senior Number." In 1924, when it became a separate publication, the yearbook was named The Lark.

W.E.O.

Larslan Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Valley Co., Mont., a member of the Central District Conference, began as a subsidiary of the Lustre, Mont., congregation in 1917, when a number of families from Lustre located here. J. F. Thiessen was, therefore, their pastor until 1943. In 1945 the Larslan church was organized with 29 members. Other ministers who served the congregation were A. A. Dick, J. J. Toews, H. C. Quiring, and Karl Dick. In 1929 a basement was constructed and used as a church, and remodeled in 1945. Kathryn Lentzner, a missionary in Colombia, S.A., came from this church. In 1954 the membership was 38, with Walter Schlichting as pastor. A.A.D.

Las, Virgile de, translated some Dutch Mennonite writings into the French language: Théodore Philippe (i.e., Dirk Philips, q.v.), Enchiridion ou Manuel de la Religion Chrétienne (n.p., 1626). This work also contains a translation of Menno Simons' Van de nieue creature and some letters and confessions by the martyrs Jaques d'Auchy, Thys Joriaensz, Hans Alewijnsz, and Jacob de Rore. Las was a native of Lyon, France, and probably a Protestant clergyman. (DJ 1840, 64 f.) vdZ.

Lasco (Laski), John á (1499-1560), an important Reformation leader, was born at Lask, Poland (hence the name), studied in Rome 1514-17 and in Basel in 1524, where he was a pupil of Erasmus and bought the latter's library. In 1527 he became priest at Gnesen. In 1538 he went to Holland, where he joined the Reformation. In 1542, at the request of Countess Anna, ruler of East Friesland, he went to Emden and assumed the leadership of the church in that territory, using the Calvinist pattern. In 1548 he was compelled to give up his post because of the Interim and went to London, where he became the pastor of the Walloon congregation there. In 1553 he and his congregation were forced to flee to escape the persecution of "Bloody Mary," the new Catholic queen. He came to Warnemünde, but forced by Lutheran pressure from here as well as Rostock, Lübeck, and Hamburg, finally went to Frankfurt. In 1556 he returned to Poland, where he was active in the leadership of the Evangelical Reformation until his death in 1560.

Lasco's relationship to the Anabaptist movement and particularly to Menno Simons deserves attention, especially during his stay in Emden 1542-48. Until 1544 the Anabaptists had been tolerated by Countess Anna, but now as a result of imperial pressure, they were to be expelled. Lasco reports (in a letter of July 26, 1544, to Hardenberg, Opera II, 574) that the church was to be cleansed, not on God's account, but on the emperor's, and so harshly, the innocent along with the guilty, that he felt compelled to request the Countess not to expel all foreigners but only those who could be proved to be heretics after an examination by Lasco and his assistants. He probably hoped, like Calvin in Strasbourg, to win the Anabaptists to his side. Menno Simons and David Joris gladly accepted the invitation to a disputation, hoping thereby to win toleration, but with no thought of joining Lasco's church.

The disputation between Menno and Lasco, which took place at Emden Jan. 28-31, 1544, in the former Franciscan monastery, dealt with the following five points: (1) the incarnation of Christ, (2) infant baptism, (3) original sin, (4) sanctification, (5) the calling of preachers. Menno reports (Menno's Opera, 519) that he was treated in a friendly manner and was allowed to leave the city in peace, even though no agreement was reached on points (1), (2), and (5).

In accord with a promise which he had made, Menno delivered to Lasco three months later a written statement of faith covering points (1) and (5) and promised to send him later a treatise on point (2), which latter apparently never was done. The confession of faith bears the title: Een korte ende klare belydinge ende schriftelycke aenwysinge, Ten eersten: Van der Menschwerdinge onses lieven Heeren Jesu Christi; Ten tweeden: Hoe dat beyde de Leeraers ende Gemeynte Christi, nae Schrifts vermeldinge sullen ende moeten geaert zijn; Geschreven aen de Edele ende Hooghgelarde Heeren, H. Johan a Lasco, met t'samen sijne Mede-hulperen binnen Emden, Anno 1544. Door Menno Symons. Joan. 8, 31; I. Cor. 3, 11. (Opera, 517-42.) The confession was printed by Lasco and used as evidence against Menno and not for him, as Menno had expected. Menno denied Lasco's charge that he had first distributed the confession among his followers, saying that he had shown it only to a certain W. H. G., a burgomaster (Menno's Opera, 365a and 365b).

Lasco was disappointed in his hope of winning over the Anabaptists. With all his tolerance, he certainly did not intend to permit an Anabaptist church to exist beside his own. This is evident from an edict of the Countess Anna of 1545 (Kirchen- und Polizeiordnung) which Lasco certainly helped to draft. According to this edict, the "Davidian and Batenburger sects" were not to be examined by the superintendent (Lasco) but to be "executed by the neck" if they did not leave the country. The "Mennists," however, were to be examined first and then expelled from the country if they did not accept instruction from the Scriptures (Müller, 24 f.).

Soon after delivering the confession to Lasco, Menno left East Friesland, for Lasco says in the above-mentioned letter to Hardenberg, "I know that at present Menno is living mostly in the bishopric of Cologne and has led many astray there." Lasco did not let Menno rest, however, even in foreign parts. Although Menno had accepted invitations to disputations at Bonn and Wesel, Lasco and Hardenberg prevented him from attending, by means of charges which, though not mentioning Menno specifically, deeply offended him. The Wesel authorities wrote Menno that they would let the executioner debate with him (Menno's Opera, 515b, 235a). During Menno's residence in the Rhineland Lasco twice visited his friend Hardenberg as well as Hermann von Wied, the Archbishop of Cologne, who was friendly to the Reformation. It is possible that on these occasions he used his influence against Menno.

Lasco's polemical booklet against Menno's confession of faith was published at Bonn in 1545 under the title: Defensio verae semperque in ecclesia receptae doctrinae de Christi Domini incarnatione, adversus Mennonem Simonis (a Lasco, Opera, 1-60).

It was not until 1553, after Menno had been reminded of Lasco as a result of the latter's arrival there on his flight from London, that he replied to Lasco's Defensio. Lasco with his several shiploads of refugees (his London congregation) was stuck in the ice in Wismar harbor. The Anabaptists of Wismar, under Menno's leadership, rendered brotherly assistance to the Lasco refugees. Menno's reply of 1554 bears the title: Een klare onwederspreekelyke Bekentenisse en Aenwysinge, . . . dat de geheele Christus Jesus, Godt en Mensche, Mensche en Godt, Gods eengeboren en Eerstgeboren eygen Sone is, niet gedeylt noch gestuckt, maer een eenig ongedeylt Persoon, Soon ende Christus, Godts Woord in der tijd vleesch geworden. Met een grondelijke Confutation . . . van Johanne a Lasco . . . Door Menno Symons (Opera, 350-82). The unpleasant personal attacks which so often appear in the polemics of this time are absent in this booklet, since Menno's chief concern was to present once more before his death, which he expected soon, his doctrine of the incarnation (q.v.). C.K.

Johannis a Lasco, Opera tam edita, quam inedita rec., ed. A. Kuyper (Amsterdam, 1866); Menno Simons, Opera Omnia (Amsterdam, 1681); H. Dalton, Johannes a Lasco (Gotha, 1881); K. Hein, Die Sakramentslehre des Johannes a Lasko (Berlin, 1904); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland (Amsterdam, 1887); ML II, 621 f.

Latehar, Palamau District, Bihar Province, India, is the Latehar subdivision headquarters, and a station of the Bihar (q.v.) Mennonite Mission (MC). It is in the southwestern part of the field. It was first occupied in March 1947 by S. J. and Ida Hostetler, but was not finally acquired until Feb. 16, 1949. It had previously been occupied by the British Disciples of Christ Church who offered it to the Mennonites. The western part of the Bihar field extends over 5 of the 20 thanas of Palamau District, and the eastern part over 9 of the 32 thanas of Hazaribagh District. Kodarma (q.v.) was the headquarters of the work in the latter area.

In the Palamau field there are three stations: Latehar, Chandwa, 17 miles to the east, and Bathet, 20 miles north of Chandwa. In this Palamau area live over 30,000 Oraons and 3,000 Mundas. Several hundred thousand of these two tribes in the adjoining Ranchi District are Christians, and those in the Palamau area are also receptive to the Gospel. Since the opening of work Latehar has been occupied principally by the Henry D. Beckers, S. J. Hostetlers, and S. Allen Shirks; Chandwa by the John E. Beachys and the M. C. Vogts; and Bathet by the Paul Knisses. In 1955 there were 110 church members reported in the field. (We Enter Bihar, Elkhart, 1951.) S.J.Ho.

Latscha (Latschar, Lachat, Lörsch, Lörtscher, Latschaw, Leutscher, Lötscher), a Mennonite family name, originally Lötscher (q.v.), from Latterbach near Erlenbach in the Simmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The first member of this family known to have been an Anabaptist was Hans Lötscher, who was born at Latterbach in 1601. He wrote a hymn of 41 stanzas entitled "Ein schön new geistlich Lied." In 1633 he married Anna Kammerer from Latterbach. The three oldest of their five children, Hans, Melchior, and Anna, were brought before the Täuferkommission (q.v.) in Bern because of their Anabaptist beliefs. They remained true to their faith and were imprisoned. The brothers Hans and Melchior escaped in 1667 but were soon returned to prison. After four years in prison at Bern they were sentenced to galley service with four other Anabaptists in 1671-73. They returned to claim their inheritance from their father, who had died while they were away, but were refused it. In 1667, while imprisoned at Bern, Hans Lötscher wrote a letter which is preserved in the Martyrs' Mirror (E 1129-30), in which he lists some 40 persons who met death at Bern because of their Anabaptist faith. Abraham Lötscher, youngest brother of Hans and Melchior, emigrated to Holland in 1711, where the name soon became Leutscher (q.v.) A number of his descendants have been Mennonite leaders in that country.

The family name takes the form Latscha and Latschar in the Palatinate and America. About 1714 Hans Heinrich Lötscher emigrated from the Simmental to Alsace, and later to the Palatinate, Germany, where he settled on Kühbörncheshof near Katzweiler. His children settled in various Palatinate Mennonite communities. One son, Johannes Franz, emigrated to Pennsylvania. The chief homes of the family in America are Berks Co., Pa., and Waterloo Co., Ont. The Latschar Mennonite Church is located near Mannheim, Ont. Among the outstanding personalities bearing the name were: Jacob Latscha (1849-1912), a merchant in Frankfurt a. M., where he built a chain of 134 stores, and was active in YMCA work; and John B. Latschaw (1804-87) who served the Franconia Conference (MC) as minister for 44 years, including 15 as bishop. In 1940 there were still 37 members of the family in three Mennonite congregations in South Germany —Kaiserslautern, Sembach, and Ludwigshafen. D.L.G.

Adolf Fluri, "Die Lötscher von Latterbach," in Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912); J. Latscha, Der Mann und sein Werk (Frankfurt, 1932); ML II, 625, 694 f.

Lauber Hill Mennonite Church: see Archbold, Ohio, Reformed Mennonite Church.

Lauingen, a city on the Danube in Bavaria, Germany, where two Anabaptists were put to death for their faith, one before 1531 by beheading, the other before 1581. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 279, 310; ML II, 625.)

Laurelville Mennonite Camp (MC) is a 52-acre mountain tract on the western slope of the western range of the Allegheny Mountains, 42 miles east of Pittsburgh, 10 miles northeast of Scottdale, Pa. The 17 buildings include a tabernacle, dining room, large lounge, and cottages and dormitory facilities for about 250 guests. Recreational facilities include a large concrete swimming pool. The activities during July and August include eight to ten church camps and conferences of one week each designed for various ages from juniors to adults. The camp is owned by the Mennonite (MC) Campground Association, composed of 29 members from Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and incorporated under a charter in the state of Pennsylvania in 1944. The original site and part of the present facilities were purchased from the Methodists, which had earlier operated it as a camp. Additional improvements and facilities represent a total investment of approximately $80,000. A.J.M.

Lauren, Bartel: see Louwer, Bartel.

Laurens: see also Laureys, Lauwereyns, and Lourens.

Laurens (Lauwerens) Allaerts (Loys Alaert), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on July 16, 1562, with Pieter van Maldeghem, Jacques Bostijn, and Pieter van Maele. Laurens was a citizen of Gent, a maker of bags (taschmaker), and 30 years of age. His wife Kathelijne van Lokerhoute had suffered martyrdom at Gent on March 24, 1562. The names of Laurens and his three fellow martyrs are found in the song, "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the supplement to the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 1). vdZ.

Offer, 649; Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 86; ML I, 29.

Laurens van Gelder (Lauwereyns Cruwele or Cruele), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake (Mart. Mir. says beheaded) on May 22, 1557, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Jeronymus, Pieter de Meulenaer, Jacob van Yper, and Martin de Wael. Their names are found in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Laurens was a native of Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders. His trade is not mentioned. K.V., vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 434, 438; XIV, 22 f., No. 244; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML II, 47.

Laurens, Hendrik: see Hendriks, Laurens.

Laurens (Lauwerens) van der Leyen (Verleyen), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Nov. 9 (or 4?), 1559 at Steen Castle at Antwerp, together with Mattheus de Pottebakker and Andries Langedul. Their names are found in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader," No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, where Laurens is called Lauken. He was a native of Gent and probably belonged to the van der Leyen (q.v.) family, of which a number of members suffered martyrdom. Van Braght included in the Martyrs' Mirror four letters by Laurens van der Leyen, which he wrote in prison on May 25, July 10, undated, and Oct. 25. The first letter is addressed to the congregation at Emden, Germany, where two of his brothers lived; the second to the congregation of Antwerp, to which apparently also the third is written; the fourth to a brother of this congregation. These letters contain a number of important facts. Laurens was arrested on May 21, 1559. He was tried several times, but apparently not tortured. The inquisitors who interrogated him were a man named Claes, then the "Dean of Ronse," i.e., Inquisitor Titelmann (q.v.), and the margrave of Antwerp. Laurens defended his faith with a strong conviction and much ability. "When I used to gamble and get drunk, and to follow the world," Laurens said, "I was left unmolested; but now that I truly confess the name of God, I am persecuted." He had also been arrested some time before, because he had sung geestelycke Liedekens (spiritual hymns); why he then was released is not stated. The inquisitor threatened him several times with cruel death and said to him: "You certainly know . . . that I caused your sister (i.e., Tanneken van der Leyen, q.v.) to be thrown into the Scheldt River." But neither threats nor supplications could make Laurens renounce his faith, which he strongly confessed. He had not yet received his baptism on faith. "I was," he said, "not yet good enough." The Martyrs' Mirror also contains his confession of faith, delivered on July 4, 1559. In this confession he defends the doctrine of Incarnation as taught by Menno Simons. A number of members of the congregation of Antwerp were in prison with Laurens, the names of whom he gives in the third and fourth letters, and many of whom faithfully suffered martyrdom after Laurens had been put to death. They could observe how Laurens was executed and died as a true follower of his Lord. vdZ.

Offer, 567; Mart. Mir. D 262-70, E 633-40; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 5, 10; XIV, 26 f., No. 304; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; BRN VII, 158, 170; ML II, 648.

Laurens Pietersz (Lauwereins Peters), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on March 30, 1568, on the Veerle square at Gent, Belgium, with Jan van Parys, Pieter Aelbrechts (Pierken van Cleve), and Hendrik Maelschap. They were executed in a barbarous manner. They had not yet been baptized on their faith. Their names are found in a hymn, "Als men schreef duyst vijhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," No. 1 of the supplement to the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Laurens was (according to the records) a native of de Kempen, a region northwest of Antwerp. vdZ.

Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 367, E 723; Verheyden, Gent, 43, No. 139; ML III, 372.

Laurens de Schrijnwerker, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist leader, apparently from the Dutch province of Zeeland, was active in Middelburg, Zeeland, where he baptized in 1535. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 321.) vdZ.

Laurens Tiettyezoon, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Dec. 7, 1549, at Leeuwarden, capital of the Dutch province of Friesland, together with Tiyttye Douwes, because he had been rebaptized and "had a false opinion of our holy Christian faith." vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746.

Laurens Verkamer (Loureys van den Camere), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on April 26, 1569, at 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant. Verkamer, who was a citizen of Antwerp and well-to-do, had joined the local Mennonite congregation, but fled with many other Mennonites because of persecution. He intended to go to Nijmegen in the Dutch province of Gelderland, but en route was arrested at 's Hertogenbosch on Jan. 5, 1569, and loyally suffered martyrdom. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 386, E 740; Bibliographie II, No. 806; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 421, 424, 472, 478; XIV, 70 f., No. 789.

Laurens van de Walle (Lauwers van der Walle), an Anabaptist martyr, being a weaver by trade, was arrested at Ieper (Ypres) (q.v.) in Flanders and burned there at the stake in 1561 (exact date unknown) with Maeyken Kocx, Calleken Strings, and Anthonis Schoonvelt. They are celebrated in a hymn beginning, "Geroert ben ick van binnen" (Inwardly I am moved), found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 24. This hymn, slightly modified, is also found in Een Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562, and is given in Wackernagel, Lieder. From this song, which was the principal source of the later Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, it is known that this group, driven from their homes by persecution, had shortly before arrived in the neighborhood of Ieper, where they lived as artisans, apparently as weavers. They were surprised by the officials and all arrested but a few who escaped. In the hymn the name of Laurens van der Walle is not found. The song also names Kaerl (van Yperen), who apparently is identical with Laurens van de Walle. There are other martyrs named van de Walle (q.v.), to whom Laurens van de Walle may have been related. vdZ.

Offer, 603-7; Mart. Mir. D 285, E 652; Bibliographie II, No. 832; Wackernagel, Lieder, 141.

Laurensz, Hendrik (d. before 1770), a son of preacher Laurenz Hendriks (q.v.), was ca. 1714-59 a minister of the Mennonite congregation at Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland. In 1715 he was ordained as an elder by Jan Kroes (Crous) of Crefeld. He proved to be a good shepherd in the time the Nijmegen congregation had to endure many hardships. Together with his colleague Pieter Hendriks (Eger) he was the last untrained and unsalaried minister of Nijmegen. (DB 1875, 78 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2154.) vdZ.

Laurensz, Jan, a Mennonite from Rotterdam, Holland, a follower of Spener, who often visited in Pietistic circles at Frankfurt, Germany, together with Jacob van de Velde and Abraham Hazevoet, who were also Mennonites. Jan Laurensz in May 1683 bought a tract of land from William Penn with the intention of emigrating to Pennsylvania (DB 1884, 72). Laurensz and the other Mennonites are, however, not found among the early Mennonite immigrants to North America. vdZ.

Laurentie Jans, wife of Wouter Heyne, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Gapinge, Dutch province of Zeeland, was burned at the stake on Aug. 24, 1538, at Brugge, Belgium. Further particulars are not known except that she had been (re)baptized in 1536. (Verheyden, Brugge, 33, No. 9.) vdZ.

Laurents (Lauwerens) Andriesz (Andriessen), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Sept. 12 or 13, 1570, with Joost Verkindert. Van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror gives a letter Laurents wrote on Sept. 9, 1570, to Joost's wife, which contains an admirable testimonial to their faith: "It is still the purpose of us both to adhere to the eternal truth by the great help of the Lord, without whom we can do nothing, and to whom we must also constantly look for help and comfort." The Biblical references from the New Testament are excellently assembled and arranged. The letter closes with these words: "Hence, my dear Sister, be content and do not grieve immoderately . . . . We must part here once. Thus, hasten, that we may all meet together when men shall not be able to part us any more. May the good and almighty Lord full of grace and truth make us fit thereto." Laurents was unmarried. NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 509, 527, E 848, 863; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 11, 62; XIV, 76 f., No. 867; ML I, 71.

Laurents de Schoenmaker, an Anabaptist martyr: see Schuster, Lorenz.

Laus deo, salus populo (Glory to God, Salvation to the People) was the motto of a society that made a new and improved translation of the Psalms into Dutch verse in 1759 (here and there retaining the translation by Peter Dathenus), which was used in many Dutch Mennonite churches, first in the Zonist congregation at Amsterdam in 1762, in 1768 in the Lamist congregation. In a few congregations (Ameland, Beverwijk, Dantumawoude, Franeker, Koog-Zaandijk, Wormer-Jisp) it was in use until the early 20th century. There have been following editions of the Laus Deo version: 1760 without notes, 1761 with notes, 1765, 1883, and 1896 all at Amsterdam. (DB 1865, 72 f., 81-83; 1900, 99.)

The society (genootschap) Laus Deo Salus Populo was composed of eight Dutch poets, most of whom were Mennonites: Lucretia Wilhelmina van Merken and her husband Nicolaas Simon van Winter, Lucas Pater, Pieter Meyer, Bernardus de Bosch, Anthony Hartsen, Henry Jean Roullaud, and Hermanus Asschenberg. Thirty-nine Psalms were rhymed by van Merken, twenty-five by van Winter, nineteen by Pater, nineteen by Roullaud, sixteen by Hartsen, fifteen by Asschenberg, eleven by de Bosch, and six by Meyer. vdZ.

W. J. B. Serfontein, Die Psalm as Kerklied (Nijkerk, 1956) 67 f.; ML II, 625.

Lausoms-Gemeente, the name of the Flemish group on the Dutch island of Ameland, which was named for Laus Hendricks of Nes, one of its first elders, who served here 1683-*ca.*1745. It was also called the Foppe Ones (q.v.) congregation. It must have been originated in the early 1660's. The names of many of its preachers and elders have been handed down. In 1804 it joined with the Jan Jacobsz group, a group of Old Frisian Mennonites, but usually called Old Flemish. (DB 1889, 5, 12, 17, 20; ML II, 625.) vdZ.

Lautenbach (Lautenbacherhof) near Heilbronn, Germany: see Lobenbach.

Lauver Mennonite Church (MC), located between Richfield and Cocolamus in Juniata Co., Pa. The first church was built in 1867 on the farm of Jacob Lauver. This brick building served the congregation until 1928, when a larger brick church replaced it along the improved highway. The congregation is a part of the Juniata-Snyder Bishop District of the Lancaster Conference, with Boyd Kauffman and Jacob G. Brubaker, ministers. The membership for Cross Roads-Lauver in 1956 was 153. I.D.L.

Lauwereinse Huutgheers (Ootgheers), widow of Ancelmus Baers, an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested in February 1568 at Brugge, Belgium, with 13 other members of the Mennonite congregation in this town. She was one of the four who remained steadfast and was burned at the stake at Brugge between April 13 and July 28, the exact date being unknown. (Verheyden, Brugge, 53, No. 51.) vdZ.

Lauwereyns Claesz, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake with two other Anabaptists on June 28, 1553, at Leeuwarden, capital of the Dutch province of Friesland. Lauwereyns was sentenced to death because he was (re)baptized and persisted in his "heresy"; he was of the opinion "that all which is done in the (Catholic) Church is idolatry." vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746.

Lauwereys (Laurens) van Rentergem, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1569 with four other Anabaptists. The exact date and method of execution are not mentioned in the martyr books; Verheyden (Gent, 56) did not find this martyr in the official records. This martyr is named in the hymn "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer, ende twee en tsestich mede," in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 653; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759.) vdZ.

Lavater, Johann Caspar (1741-1801), a Reformed minister of Zürich, Switzerland, who attained a wide sphere of influence through his devotional sermons, his prolific writing, and his extensive pastoral correspondence. His keen ability to observe enabled him to find in a human profile the key to the character. He developed his system, founding the modern study of physiognomics. In his Physiognomische Fragmente III he has a picture of Menno Simons and describes it as follows: "Menno Simons —like his teaching and his brotherhood. Simple and sincere. Not hard; not soft; quietly searching with a thirst for the truth; quietly active with gentleness and loyalty. Calm, tinted with melancholy. Calm observation with devouring sympathy. In the outline of the nose, especially at the top—how much loyalty, wisdom, capability! Mouth and chin, as much as can be seen of them, faithfulness, humility, and silence" (Menn. Bl., 1910, 86). However, since the picture has no historical basis, the analysis, of course, had no significance.

With Basedow and Goethe he also visited the Mennonites in Neuwied on July 19, 1774. In his diary are these notes: "Visited the Mennonites Friedenreich (q.v.) and Kinzing(er)—splendid faces, full of simplicity and honor, and round about them—many boys, daughters, mothers, faces, equally noble, innocent, affectionate, went into their church without tower or bell, spoke of their worship, looked into their orthodox catechism—Basedow asked: would they accept one who did not believe in the Trinity? Got this reply: not to communion. Looked at their artistic musical clocks" (Menn. Bl., 1930, 107.) Neff.

J. C. Lavater, Physiognomische Fragmente zur Beförderung der Menschenkenntnis III (Leipzig, 1778) 267; Goethes Rheinreise mit Lavater und Basedow im Sommer 1774. Dokumente herausgegeben von Adolf Bach (Zürich, 1923) 119; ML II, 625 f.

Lawrence County (Pa.) Old Order Amish settlement. Lawrence County was organized in western Pennsylvania in 1849. A Mennonite (MC) congregation and an O.O.A. settlement of four church districts with 250 members (1954) are located in the county, near New Wilmington. The origin of the settlement dates back to 1847, when Amishmen from Mifflin Co., Pa., located there. Christian Yoder purchased 200 acres on April 1, 1847, and Abraham Zook purchased 200 acres on May 8, 1847. A large number of Beilers, including Jacob Byler, son of Hans Beiler, the first Amish bishop of Mifflin County, moved soon after the settlement began. The early settlers often traveled to and from Lawrence and Mifflin counties on foot. Other settlers who followed were Adam Hostetler, John Knepp, John Kanagy, Shem King, and Jonathan Lantz. The new settlers were without ministers until Dan, son of Jacob Byler, and Christ Byler were ordained with the help of outside ministers, probably from Holmes Co., Ohio. Christian Byler was the first resident bishop. He was succeeded by his son Jonas Byler, Yost J. Byler, and Gideon Wengerd, the present bishop.

There are three church districts (East, East North, South East) in the New Wilmington area with a membership of about 300. These three districts have a combined ordained ministry of 12 members. The East North district extends over the border into Mercer County. The original settlement was first divided into the East and West districts in 1916, and in 1947 the East was divided again, making a total of three districts.

About 1850 a number of families withdrew from the Amish Church. The new group with Preacher John Kanagy and Bishop Shem King as leaders worshiped in homes for 22 years (until 1872), when a meetinghouse, the present Maple Grove Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.), was built.

In 1924 about eight families moved from the New Wilmington settlement to the vicinity of Enon Valley, in the southwest part of Lawrence County. This group was led by Reuben Byler and son Jacob S. Byler, who organized a congregation. The Enon Valley settlement was supplemented by families from Mifflin Co., Pa., and from Ohio, so that the settlement now consists of 32 families. The Byler families outnumber by far all others. The Mausts are numerous also, having come from Holmes Co., Ohio. Other families who have lived there include Hostetler, Sommers, Detweiler, Plank, Knepp, Kurtz, Kaufman, King, Shetler, Swartzendruber, Kanagy, Miller, Yoder, Lantz, Petersheim, Spichear, Lapp, and Moose. J.A.H.

Lawrence County (Tenn.) Old Order Amish settlement was begun by settlers who came to Ethridge, Lawrence Co., Tenn., in January 1944. First settlers were Jacob P. Gingerich, Joe E. Yoder, and Dan M. Yoder from Lumberton, Miss. Others from Wayne Co., Ohio, joined the group in the fall of 1944. A congregation was started with Joseph F. Zook as the first preacher. Dan M. Yoder and Levi J. Hostetler have since been ordained preachers. Levi J. Swartzendruber of Wayne Co., Ohio, has bishop oversight of the two congregations here, which in 1954 had 84 members. S.E.Y.

Lawton View Mennonite Brethren Mission, located at Lawton, Okla., is an outgrowth of the Post Oak Indian and Mexican Mission at Indiahoma. Missionary A. J. Becker began this work among Mexicans in the eastern part of the city in 1935. A mission chapel was built and dedicated in 1937. The mission workers who have served at this location are Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Becker, Mrs. Anna Gomez, J. A. Gonzales, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Reimer, Salvador Rivera, and Walter Gomez. After a number of converts from the Mexicans and the white population had been baptized, a local church was organized.

In 1946 the mission was shifted to the southwestern part of the city, where it is located at present. Here the church continued to grow for some time; but later, due to migrations, the Mexican element of the congregation began to decrease. The congregation now consists mainly of the "poor whites." Becker has continued to assist in this work, and Harry Bartel has also been stationed here for a short time. The present mission workers are Mr. and Mrs. Frank P. Nickel. A new church building was erected in 1946. The Mission is under the supervision of the Foreign Mission Board of the M.B. Church. J.H.L.

Lay Preachers, the designation for preachers who without theological education are chosen out of the congregation to the office of preaching, and receive no fixed remuneration. In Holland and Germany they were called "love preachers" (Dutch Liefdepredikers, German Liebesprediger), i.e., those who preach for love's sake, or lay preachers (Dutch Leeken-predikers, German Laienprediger), which in the Netherlands meant men without special training, who nevertheless received some remuneration.

In the primitive church all the male members were "brethren"; each had the right to serve according to his gifts as evangelist, preacher, or teacher. Preaching was not yet attached to a special office. There was as yet no privilege for proclamation of the Gospel. Only as ecclesiastical offices became more sharply defined was this right reserved to the priest. Even as late as the third century laymen were permitted to preach occasionally, although it was considered improper to do so in the presence of the bishop without his express request. Soon afterward lay preaching ceased entirely; it was forbidden. Vainly did small groups such as the Cathars, Waldenses, and Lollards from time to time seek to re-establish lay preaching within the bounds of the Roman church of the Middle Ages. The Lateran Council of 1179 (Pope Alexander III) forbade the Waldenses to preach; but they continued their preaching with the greatest success and joyfully endured the bloodiest persecution and most inhuman suppression. This was also true of other groups such as the Cathars and the Lollards (q.v.).

During the Reformation lay preaching was revived. Luther at first granted the right of preaching to every Christian; but in his struggle with the Anabaptists he abandoned the principle, severely attacking "corner preaching." Zwingli, too, opposed the right of free preaching; preaching he considered a privilege of church office.

In Anabaptism, however, lay preaching attained its full right, and the principle is still firmly held in the Mennonite churches in various countries and continues to be widely practiced in more than one group. In fact in the first quarter of the 20th century at least three fourths of all Mennonite congregations were served by lay preachers, and in 1955 at least half.

In the earliest times the Mennonites were averse to theology, considering it unnecessary or actually harmful. God's Word was the only foundation to build upon. To understand and explain it, no learning or worldly wisdom was required, but only a faithful, honest, untiring seeking and searching in the Scriptures (Acts 17:11). Every Christian should know the Scriptures. Scriptural knowledge was in fact very comprehensive among the Anabaptists. It was said of them, "It seemed as if they had eaten the entire Bible," or "They had the Bible on their thumbs" (DJ I, 89; see Formantijn).

The change from lay preaching to a trained and salaried ministry began first in Holland. There the Mennonites began as early as the late 16th century to call educated men into the ministry; they were usually physicians, who in addition to their own vocation also preached, receiving little or no compensation for their preaching, and who had little formal theological education. There were important men among these preachers, especially in the first half of the 17th century and later, like Anthoni Jacobs Roscius (q.v.), Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.), Antonius van Dale (q.v.), Gerardus de Wind (q.v.), and Herman Schijn (q.v.). After the Mennonite Seminary was established in Amsterdam (q.v.) in 1735 theological study became the common custom in Holland. By 1830 nearly all the Dutch churches employed theologically trained preachers. Only a few churches like Ameland (q.v.) and Balk (q.v.) held to the old custom of lay preaching, until about the middle of the 19th century. The lay preachers supported themselves, receiving only some small remuneration for the time they could not work on their farms or in their business. In the country this system lasted until the early 19th century, but in most cities untrained preachers received a salary from 1680 on. The few untrained preachers (10 out of 114 in 1955) who still serve in Dutch congregations are salaried like those trained.

In Germany the city churches have all had trained and salaried preachers for a long time, whereas the country churches in West Prussia (extinct since 1945), Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria (Badischer Verband) faithfully retain the old practice. In the Palatinate and Rheinhessen the transition to a salaried ministry was made early in the 19th century.

A small circle of four congregations led by Johannes Galle (see Jakob Galle) vehemently attacked it as a ruinous innovation. But a scant generation later all opposition had disappeared. All of the six churches of the Palatinate-Hessian Conference have single salaried pastors. The Munich-Regensburg circuit also followed this practice about 1910-53, but has now reverted to the older practice. The two churches in the South Palatinate, Deutschhof and Branchweilerhof, and since 1945 also Berlin, have the lay ministry.

It is of interest to note that as recently as 1898 Eduard Dyck, the preacher of the Rosenort church near Elbing in West Prussia, was to be penalized for preaching a graveside sermon as a lay preacher, thereby breaking a police regulation of Feb. 13, 1852. But he was declared not guilty by the court at Tiegenhagen; the state attorney appealed, but the appeal was rejected (Menn. Bl., 1898, 67; 1899, 3).

In Russia the lay ministry was retained throughout the entire history of the Mennonite Church there, although a few men did secure theological training in Germany and Switzerland beginning about 1900. However, when such men became ordained preachers they usually also held a teaching position as a means of livelihood.

Among the French Mennonites the lay ministry is still universal, while in Switzerland three of the largest congregations now (1955) have trained and salaried ministers.

In North America the lay ministry has been maintained exclusively to the present (1955) in all the more culturally conservative groups, such as the Old Order Amish, Old Order Mennonites, Church of God in Christ Mennonites, Conservative Mennonites, Kleine Gemeinde, etc. In the largest of the American groups, the Mennonite Church (MC), only recently has there been any appreciable increase in the use of trained and fully salaried ministers. In 1955 not more than 10 per cent of these congregations employed pastors with training and salary. On the other hand practically all of the congregations of the remaining groups in the United States—General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, Evangelical Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and most of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren—employed trained and salaried pastors, though by no means did all of them have full seminary training, many having training only in Bible institutes or colleges. The General Conference Mennonite Church was the earliest to adopt the salaried ministry (quite general from 1900 on) and has the most universal practice. In Canada, however, the number of salaried (and trained) ministers is still very small in any of these conference groups. In Mexico and South America salaried ministers are unknown except in the indigenous Argentine Mennonite Church.

The reasons for the increasing surrender of the lay ministry in the United States are varied. In some cases it is the desire for better preaching and more effective pastoral service. The increasing pressure of the surrounding secular culture, and the competition of other religious groups, have called for more full-time religious leadership, which cannot well be had without paying salaries. Untrained men feel themselves increasingly inadequate and refuse to accept the call to the pastorate. Mechanized farming and urban living make it difficult for men to carry the dual load of a full secular occupation and the pastor-preacher assignment.

The demands for theologically and Biblically trained preachers have forced the larger Mennonite conferences and national groups to establish theological seminaries or Bible training schools. Where this has not been done because of the inability of the group to maintain a school because of small size, the preachers have secured their training in theological schools of other denominations. At times the outside influences channeled into the Mennonite brotherhood through such training have been significant and beneficial, but also at times harmful. The most notable case of this latter has been the incursion of theological liberalism and modernism into the Dutch and Northwest German churches in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. It is a general fact that those groups which have maintained the lay ministry have remained more theologically and traditionally conservative. On the other hand the lay ministry has at times not been strong enough to resist successfully the inroads of strange doctrines and certain influences hostile to the historic Mennonite faith. It is impossible to establish a general rule that the change from a lay ministry to a trained and supported ministry has always been harmful. It has been and can be a source of strength and progress. This change-over in the Palatine-Hessian congregations in the early part of the 19th century has been given credit for saving these congregations from serious decay and even extinction. (See also Ministry, Elder, and Bishop; ML II, 605.)

NEFF, H.S.B.

Le Heux, Jan Willem Nicolaas (1880-1952), was a professor of the Military Academy at Breda, Netherlands, and for many years a deacon of the Mennonite congregation of Breda. Under the pseudonym of David Tomkins he published a number of sketches and poems in various Dutch Mennonite periodicals. The drawing of the Old Menno Simons meetinghouse at Witmarsum, Friesland, found on the cover of the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje was made by Le Heux in 1931. vdZ.

Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad VI (1951-52) No. 39; DJ 1953, 10 f.

Le Poole, a Dutch Mennonite family: see Poole, le.

Leaman, Amos Hershey (1878-1950), a Mennonite (MC) city missionary, was born near Gordonville, Lancaster Co., Pa., on Feb. 18, 1878, the third of the eight children of Jacob B. and Anna Barbara Hershey Leaman. On June 22, 1902, he was married to Amanda Eby. They were the parents of four children.

Hershey was educated at the Millersville State Normal School, Moody Bible Institute, and Chicago Theological Seminary, receiving a degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1915. He attended the Mennonite Church at Paradise, Pa. In the fall of 1896 under the preaching of J. S. Coffman (q.v.) he was converted, and in November of that year he assisted the Chicago Mennonite Home Mission, then at 639 W. 18th Street, later becoming superintendent of the mission, serving until 1920. He was ordained to the ministry in the spring of 1902. As the work grew, Leaman raised funds for a new building, which was dedicated at 1907 S. Union Avenue on Jan. 5, 1919. In 1920-32 he served in Moody Bible Institute in Evangelism and Practical Work, for several years as Director of Practical Work. In 1930 he traveled to England and Scotland under the auspices of the Institute.

Leaman was a promoter of various city-wide Christian lay activities; he helped to institute the Chicago Easter Sunrise Service, the first of which was held at Soldier Field in 1933. He also led in the founding of the Christian Business Men's Committee of Chicago, which sponsored noonday services in a theater in the Loop and a related radio broadcast. In 1944 he became superintendent of the Lydia Children's Home in Chicago, helping to restore its finances and get its license renewed.

Leaman was active in the Illinois Mennonite Conference and Mission Board, serving as field worker of the latter for several years. He challenged many young people to Christian service.

Leaman served as pastor of the Mennonite Church (GCM) at 73rd and Laflin Streets for approximately ten years during the 1940's. He died in Chicago on May 27, 1950, and was laid to rest in Irving Park Cemetery, Chicago. H.Z.

Leamington Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Leamington, Essex Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized on Nov. 20, 1932, under the leadership of Isaak Tiessen, the first minister. The membership stood at 178, the majority of whom were rural people. For a number of years the congregation held its meetings in a rented hall, together with the members of the United Mennonite Church. Then a church was built by the Mennonite Brethren, which is still in use. The following ministers have served the church: I. Tiessen, G. Reimer, J. F. Dick, W. Toews, A. Huebert, J. Kroeker, and P. Friesen. The pastor (1956) is David Derksen. H.H.J.

Leatherman (Ledermann, Ledterman, Letherman), a Mennonite family which is represented chiefly though not exclusively in the Franconia Conference (MC) congregations, particularly of Bucks County, Pa. It has died out among the Mennonites of Germany. The progenitor of these Bucks County Leathermans was Jacob Ledterman, who came to America from Europe in 1741 (d. 1769) at the age of 32, with his wife and sons Jacob and Abraham. He settled at Deep Run in Bucks County, at which place the Mennonites built their first meetinghouse in 1746. Most of his children were born in America. Among the Leathermans who have served in the ministry of the Franconia Conference congregations were Samuel Leatherman (1815-1904), Line Lexington, ordained preacher in 1843 and bishop in 1876; John M. Leatherman (1845-1924), Deep Run, ordained preacher in 1889; John E. Leatherman (1909-), since 1936 a missionary in Tanganyika; Quintus Leatherman (1903-), since 1952 a missionary in London. In 1878 the Mennonite Publishing Co., of Elkhart, Ind., published a 32-page booklet for children entitled Bible Lessons, written by Daniel S. Leatherman. Many of the non-Mennonite Leathermans of North America are descended from other immigrants than the Jacob Ledterman described above. J.C.W.

John Letherman & Emma Leatherman Candler, All Leatherman Kin History (Nappanee, Ind., 1940).

Lebanon County, Pa. In 1729 Lebanon Township was a part of Lancaster County. In 1813 it united with a part of Dauphin County to form Lebanon County. Lebanon is its county seat. Numerous Mennonite families moved into the area. The United Brethren schism, again broken by the United Christian Church, preyed much upon them; others moved into Juniata County and communities farther west. The Church of the Brethren later absorbed them, so that most of the present membership is the result of 20th-century colonization. The earliest meetinghouse was built at Shirksville in 1775, the home of Caspar Shirk of Chestnut Hill. Other early houses of worship were located at the site of the present Gingrich, Krall, and Dohner churches, and also the Kauffman, Shirk, and Light (in Lebanon) churches. More recently Meckville, Miners Village, Royer, Texter, and North Lebanon were opened. The Mennonite membership in the ten congregations is 521; Krall with 77 is the highest. I.D.L.

Lebanon County Amish. A group of Old Order Amish families of Lancaster Co., Pa., moved to adjacent Lebanon County, in 1941, locating near Myerstown. In 1954 there were two congregations with three preachers and one deacon and a membership of 40. Bishop oversight is supplied by the Lancaster congregations. J.A.H.

Lebanon (Pa.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, organized in 1910, had 58 members in 1953, with E. J. Rutman as pastor.

Lechfeld, Bavaria, Germany, a Mennonite refugee camp and temporary settlement (1921-25), located on the former military drill ground of the same name about 10-12 miles directly south of Augsburg. The Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge (q.v., founded Nov. 12, 1920), a German Mennonite organization, sought in various ways to aid Mennonite refugees from Russia who had come to Germany before the major emigration movement from Russia to Canada in 1923-25. A small colonization attempt in Mecklenburg (q.v.) in 1921 had failed. A similar attempt at Camp Lechfeld, although on a much larger scale, beginning in April 1921, also failed and by 1926 was completely abandoned for lack of funds. In 1923 a separate transit refugee camp was established at Lechfeld for Russian Mennonites who were temporarily held back from emigration to Canada because of trachoma or other health reasons. From July 27 to Aug. 19, 1923, a total of 658 Mennonites were successfully treated. By Oct. 31, 1924, the camp had given a total of 85,000 days of nursing care. The remnant still at Lechfeld when the camp was closed were transferred to the Ueberseeheim, a refugee home in Hamburg.

The Lechfeld colonization scheme was an extensive one and failed in part because of lack of the necessary capital. The German government made

2,000 acres available, together with barracks and other buildings. The M.F.F., having little capital, could not handle the project alone, hence arranged a working agreement, whereby it (M.F.F.), the relief agency Christenpflicht (q.v.) of Ingolstadt, and the Conference of German Baptists were to cooperate in the plan. Loans were secured, an agricultural director was appointed—Michael Horsch of Hellmannsberg, then Philipp Lichti of Herrlehof, under whom Philipp Hege had the direct management. Place was to be provided for 60 families. By Christmas of 1921 there were 180 Mennonites present. Schools were established (Jakob Ewert was one of the teachers) and other religious and cultural activities undertaken. Home industry was established, particularly basket weaving and a small clothing factory. For three years, 1921-23, the farm was operated successfully, but the burden of supporting too many refugees who could not work became too great. The German government refugee commission had intended Lechfeld to be a temporary project of five years, while the Mennonites tried to make it a permanent settlement with the intent to sell the land in smaller parcels to the refugee families. However, the success of the great movement from Russia to Canada, the inflation in Germany, the lack of unity among the three relief agencies and with the German government, led to the abandonment of what had once been a promising venture. The only large attempt at a permanent Russian Mennonite settlement in Germany had failed. The M.F.F. changed its name on May, 1922, to "Deutsche Mennoniten-Hilfe" (q.v.). H.S.B.

Deutsche Mennoniten-Hilfe, ihre Entstehung und Arbeitsgebiete (Oberursel, 1924); ML III, 208, article Mennonitische Flüchtingsfürsorge; M. Horsch, "The Mennonite Colony on the Lechfeld," Gospel Herald XIV (July 7, 1921) 267 f.; J. Horsch, "A Mennonite Relief Work for Russian Fugitives," Gospel Herald XIV (June 9, 1921) 203 f.; "Das Lechfeld Siedlungsland," Menn. Bl., LXIX (1922) 12 f.; ML II, 626.

Lectureships. Two Mennonite scholarly lectureships have been est. in the United States, the Menno Simons Lectureship (q.v.) at Bethel College (GCM), est. in 1953, with a focus on Anabaptist-Mennonite history, and the Conrad Grebel Lectureship under the Mennonite Board of Education (MC), est. in 1952, with a scope including theology, ethics, and general church concerns and work. Holders of the latter lectureship have been Paul Mininger (1952), "Foundations for Christian Education"; Milo Kauffman (1953), *"Christian Stewardship in the Mennonite Church"; G. F. Hershberger (1954), "The Way of the Cross in Human Relations"; Paul Erb (1955), *"The Alpha and the Omega"; Gideon G. Yoder (1956), "The Evangelism and Nurture of Children"; C. K. Lehman (1957), "The Holy Spirit in Christian Experience"; J. D. Graber (1958), "A Philosophy of Missions"; H. S. Bender (1959), "This Is My Body." The lectures are to be published as books; those marked * having already appeared. H.S.B.

Lectuur, Godsdienstige, voor Doopsgezinden, verzameld, in the second and third volume called Doopsgezinde Lectuur tot bevordering van christelijke kennis en godzaligheid, is the title of a Dutch Mennonite periodical published by D. S. Gorter (q.v.) with several of his colleagues in 1854, 1856, 1858. It contains valuable devotional and historical articles. It was similar in spirit to the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (q.v.), which can be considered a continuation of the Lectuur. (Menn. Bl., 1856, 37-41; ML II, 635.) NEFF.

Lee County, Iowa. The first area in Iowa Territory to receive white settlers was Lee County, located in the southeastern tip of the territory along the Mississippi River. The first Mennonites to settle in Iowa were John C. Krehbiel, wife, and son, of Butler Co., Ohio, who arrived in Fort Madison, Lee County, on Nov. 1, 1839. The first Mennonite child to be born in Iowa was the Krehbiel daughter Johanna Maria (Jan. 26, 1840), who became the wife of Daniel Hertzler and the mother of the famous "Horse and Buggy Doctor" Arthur E. Hertzler. In 1849 Krehbiel was chosen minister of the West Point Mennonite Church (Bush Church), where he preached until his death in 1886. Mennonite settlers followed Hertzler, locating near his home a few miles south of West Point. In 1849 these settlers organized the West Point (q.v.) Mennonite Church and elected two ministers, Krehbiel and Jacob Ellenberger. They then built the first Mennonite church in Iowa, 1½ miles east of the present town of Franklin, and held their first service in it on Pentecost 1850. Eventually the Bush church was abandoned and a new building was constructed in West Point. In time this church was abandoned as most of the members moved to other communities.

In the early fifties Palatinate Mennonites moved to Franklin Twp., Lee County, about eight miles from West Point, and there organized a church. Their first church, built two miles northwest of Donnellson in 1855, came to be known as Zion (q.v.), and was rebuilt in 1880. In 1909 their third church was erected in the town of Donnellson (q.v.). The Mennonites decided that their two churches were too far apart and so they constructed a third one in the town of Franklin (q.v.) in 1868. This church began to decline a few years later when members moved away, and became extinct.

The West Point and Zion churches are important for the part they played in the organization of the General Conference Mennonite Church. In 1853 the two congregations had held a conference in which they agreed to work together in harmony, and in a second conference in 1859 they agreed to invite other Mennonite churches to join their union. As a result, the delegates of four churches met at West Point on May 28 and 29, 1860, in a meeting that is regarded to be the beginning of the General Conference Mennonite Church. In 1954 the Lee County G.C.M. membership was 233.

Probably the first Amish Mennonites to move to Iowa were the members of the Christian Raber family, who came to Lee County from Hamilton Co., Ohio, in 1840, and settled near Charleston. Christian is the ancestor of several Rabers who became ministers in the Mennonite church. The Rabers were joined by other families: Rogie, Kinsinger, Werey, Hauder, Reese, Fordemwalt, Augspurger, Goldsmith, Schwartzentruber, Plank, von Gunden, Wagler, Shantz, Lehman, Schrock, Musser, King, Klopfenstein, Miller, Schlotter, Bechler, and Roth.

The date of the organization of the church is uncertain, but since Christian Raber was an ordained Amish preacher, services may have been held in the early forties. Christian Schwarzentruber, an Amish bishop, moved to Lee County very likely in 1845. It is probable that the church was organized in the year of his arrival. The most influential Amish leader was Bishop Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.), who settled there in 1846. John Fordemwalt, another Amish preacher, located there in 1849. The largest membership of the church may have been 50. In 1855 the church began to decline as members moved to Davis and Henry counties and other places. This was caused in part by the faulty land titles held by some of the Amish settlers. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939); W. J. Krehbiel, History of One Branch of the Krehbiel Family (McPherson, 1950); Vernon Neufeld, "Mennonites Settle in Lee County, Iowa," Menn. Life VIII (October 1953) 170.

Leeghwater, Jan Adriaensz, b. 1575 at De Rijp, Dutch province of North Holland, d. February 1650 at Amsterdam, a Dutch architect noted for his mills and dikes. In the drainage and reclaiming of several lakes in North Holland between 1608 and 1635 he was an important figure. He engaged in similar work in Prussia, Denmark, France, and England. In his Haarlemmermeerboeck (1641) he published a plan for the drainage of this lake, which was carried out in 1845-52. One of his buildings was the beautiful little town hall of his native town. Leeghwater was also a clockmaker, cabinetmaker, and engraver. In 1605 he obtained a patent on a diving bell which he had invented, in which he could stay under water for some time. In 1642 (reprint Saerdam, 1688) he published Een cleyn chronycke ende voorbereydinge van de afkomst ende 't vergrooten van de dorpen van Graft en de Rijp. This book contains some information on the Mennonites of these villages. He was a Mennonite, probably a member of the Waterlander congregation. A Laurens Leegwater was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Koog-Zaandijk in the early 17th century. vdZ.

J. G. de Roever, J. A. Leeghwater, het leven en werk van een 17de eeuwse waterbouwkundige (Amsterdam, 1944); N.N.B.Wb. VI, 909-11; DB 1917, 12 f., 15; ML II, 626.

Leenaert van Antwerpen: see Lenaerdt (Lenart) Boeckbinder.

Leenaert Bouwens, an important early Dutch Anabaptist elder, was born in Sommeldyk in 1515 and died at Hoorn in 1582. He probably originally followed some trade or profession which involved ocean travel. In his youth he was a member of the "Rederyker" (a political oratory club).

After he had been an active Mennonite preacher for some time and as such had participated in the conference in Lübeck in 1546, he was ordained elder at Emden by Menno Simons in 1551. He lived in the neighboring village of 't Falder. He undertook various trips, at first in East Friesland, Groningen, and Friesland, visiting also the islands of the North Sea, in order to administer baptism and communion. His wife was dissatisfied because of the danger attending his journeys. In the 1681 edition of Menno's work there is a letter Menno wrote to Leenaert's wife, trying to persuade her to consent to her husband's trips.

Bouwens's activity extended farther and farther; he made a journey to North Holland and from there into Flanders (Belgium). He kept records of his trips and of the number he baptized at each place. He baptized in five distinct periods: in 1551-54, 869 persons; 1554-56, 693 persons; 1557-61, 808 persons; 1563-65, 4,499 persons; and 1568-82, 3,509 persons, making a total of 10,378 baptisms. There is perhaps an error in his report on Gent in the third period; if so, the number is decreased by 126, making a total of 10,252. This baptismal list was published (there are two extant copies) in the Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Historisch genootschap in Utrecht (XXXVI, 1915, 39-70). The beginnings of many congregations can be found by this list.

Bouwens played an important part in various important events in early Mennonite history. He was present at the meeting in Wismar in 1554, where several church regulations were passed by the assembled elders. In 1556 he was removed from his office for a while in consequence of the violent quarrel over the ban in Waterland and Emden, where Leenaert was the leader of the stricter party in the debate. With the aid of Dirk Philips by means of a threat he managed to win Menno to his side at a meeting in Harlingen. From this dissension a division ensued which began in Waterland, caused Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.) in Franeker to separate from the brotherhood, and brought about a complete division between Menno and the High Germans, whose leaders were the elders Zylis (q.v.) and Lemke (q.v.) in the lower Rhine area.

Immediately after Menno's death Leenaert Bouwens was accused by the church of (1) domineering ambition, (2) accepting 50 talers for spiritual services as elder, (3) wine drinking. On this account he was inactive for several years, even though he was not removed from office. But four years later (1565) Dirk Philips deposed him together with six fellow elders. This caused deep dissatisfaction in Friesland, where he had baptized thousands, and where the division was felt with bitterness. Then Bouwens settled in Harlingen. This event is one of the decisive factors in the great split which arose in 1566 in Franeker and Harlingen and led to the great division between the Flemish and Frisians in 1567. Right after the death of Dirk Philips in 1568 Bouwens resumed his office of preaching, now siding with the Frisians (q.v.). K.V.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 383, 416; II, 2, Nos. 9, 9a; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim; DB 1863, 94; 1864, 76 f.; 1873, 141; 1876, 22; 1878, 4, 6; 1881, 75; 1887, 116; 1889, 3 f.; 1890, 92; 1891, I, 42; 1893, 13-16, 75, 79 f.; 1894, 30-36, 40-46, 59; 1895, 106; 1896, 37, 40; 1899, 33, 35; 1900, 98; 1903, 3 f., 14, 146; 1905, 172; 1908, 61, 106; 1909, 31, 156; 1910, 123 f.; K. Vos, "De Dooplijst van Leenaert Bowens," Bijdr. en Mededeelingen v. h. Hist. Gen. (1915) 36, 39 ff.; Cornelius Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 39, 65, 79, 85, 117, 133, 156, 159, 164; ML I, 250 f.

Leendertz, an old Mennonite family which emigrated at the end of the 16th century from the Palatinate, Germany, to Cleve (q.v.) in the Lower Rhine territory. The first representative of this family found at Cleve was Pieter Leendertz (1609-83) whose son was Leendert Leendertz (d. 1691 at Cleve) who was married to Billeken Wilms. A son of Leendert Leendertz, Willem Leendertz, was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Cleve 1720-*ca.*45 (Naamlijst 1731); he may be identical with Willem Leendertz, who (Inv. Arch Amst. II, No. 2580) is said to have been voorlezer (reader) of that congregation and resigned in 1743 because of old age and illness.

In the early 17th century some members of this family moved to Rees (q.v.), where Jan Leendertz became the ancestor of the Rhineland branch of the Leendertz family, which still exists. Harmen Leendertz, a son of Jan Leendertz, was a preacher of the congregation at Rees 1707-*ca.*40 (Naamlijst 1731). Other members of the family in the 18th century moved to Emmerich (q.v.) and to the Netherlands, especially to Nijmegen and Haarlem. At Nijmegen Willem Leendertz (1721-1810), who had come from Cleve about 1738, was at first a baker and then a merchant. In 1757-1810 he was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation (DB 1875, 80 f.). He was married in 1750 to Elisabeth van Eger, a daughter of Petrus van Eger, preacher of the Nijmegen Mennonite congregation, and remarried twice; he had 17 children.

In the Netherlands a large number of members of this family were Mennonite preachers, all trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. Cornelis Leendertz, b. July 31, 1784, at Nijmegen, d. June 7, 1857, at Amsterdam, married to Antje Rotgans, served at Zuidveen 1808-10, Steenwijkerwold 1810-14, and Zaandam-West 1814-54. He published Leerrede bij de herdenking van mijn 25 jarige Predikdienst (Amsterdam, 1839) and together with his co-preacher B. van Geuns, Leerredenen (n.p., 1841). He also published some poems. His son Jacobus Leendertz, b. Jan. 30, 1809, at Zuidveen, d. June 5, 1877, at Leer, was married to Engelina Mesdag of Groningen and served at Mensingeweer 1832-37, and Leer, Germany, 1837-77. A son of this Jacobus Leendertz was Cornelis Leendertz, b. May 7, 1843, at Leer, d. Dec. 23, 1928, at Middelstum, pastor of Staveren 1866-73, Zwartsluis 1873-75, Noordhorn 1875-98, and Middelstum 1898-1908. Mennonite ministers were also Pieter Leendertz (1817-80) (q.v.) and Abraham Cornelis Leendertz, b. Nov. 4, 1822, at Kampen, d. Dec. 25, 1899, at Cleve, serving at Cleve 1850-95, whose son Willem Isaac Leendertz (q.v.) and grandsons Willem Leendertz (b. 1883) and Johannes Matthias Leendertz (b. 1885) were Mennonite ministers, as were two other sons of Abraham Cornelis Leendertz, one of whom was also called Abraham Cornelis Leendertz (q.v.), and Cornelis Abraham Leendertz, b. Oct. 19, 1861, at Cleve, d. May 1, 1939, at Norden, serving the congregation of Norden, Germany, 1889-1931.

Whether Jan Leendertz, about 1650 a Mennonite preacher at Zutphen, Dutch province of Gelderland (DB 1881, 46), belonged to this Leendertz family could not be ascertained. Tjepke Leendertz, d. 1816, preacher of Ameland from 1767, apparently did not. vdZ.

Stammbaum der Familie Leendertz, bearb. von Kommerzienrat Friedrich August Leendertz (n.p., 1907); Nederl. Patriciaat XIX (1930) 120-42, 290 f.; W. Niepoth, Zur Geschichte des Geschlechts Leendertz in Rees (1941); ML II, 626.

Leendertz, Abraham Cornelis, b. March 18, 1854, at Cleve, Germany, d. April 30, 1930, at Budel, Dutch province of North Brabant, a son of Pastor Abraham Cornelis Leendertz of Cleve, was a Mennonite minister, serving at Warns 1880-82. Then he resigned because of illness and resumed his ministry in 1886, serving the Holwerd congregation 1886-93. In this year he published Voor Hart en Huis, a guide for family worship (Leeuwarden, 1893). In the same year he left the Mennonites and became a Reformed Church minister, serving at Sappemeer 1893-99, Leiden 1899-1903, Stolwijk 1903-6, Coevorden 1906-14, St. Jacobi-Parochie 1914-17, and Budel 1917-30. (Biogr. Wb. V, 679 f.) vdZ.

Leendertz, Pieter, b. Nov. 17, 1817, at Amsterdam, d. Sept. 10, 1880, at Dortmund, Germany, on a vacation trip, married to Janke Wagenaar of IJlst, was a son of the Mennonite merchant Willem Leendertz (b. 1779 at Nijmegen, d. 1837 at Kampen). He was educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served as preacher at Woudsend 1840-55, Den Ilp 1855-64, and Medemblik 1864 until his death. He was very influential even beyond Mennonite circles. In addition he was an outstanding specialist in medieval literature and language. From 1864 he co-operated with his friend de Hoop Scheffer (q.v.) in editing the works of P. C. Hooft, which appeared in two volumes in 1875. In 1856 he and de Hoop Scheffer assumed the editorship of the genealogical paper De Navorscher, raising it to a high level. He owned a valuable library, specially rich in manuscripts and songbooks, and also a rare collection of works of music. Nearly everything, including his valuable notes, was destroyed in a fire on Feb. 5, 1863, which destroyed the church and parsonage of Den Ilp. He took this blow, which annihilated the work of a lifetime, with Christian composure, and preached on Job 2:10 in the school at Den Ilp on Feb. 15, 1863. In Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1861 he published a paper on "De Naam Doopschgezinden." (Biogr. Wb. V, 673-76; N.N.B.Wb. VI, 914-18; DB 1881, 122; ML II, 626.) vdZ.

Leendertz, Willem Isaac, b. Nov. 25, 1850, at Cleve, Germany, d. Oct. 19, 1917, at Amsterdam, married to Geertruida Kops of Utrecht. He was a son of Abraham Cornelis Leendertz, pastor at Cleve, and like his father a Mennonite preacher. He was educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, and served the congregations in Wormer-Jisp in 1875-78, Ouddorp 1878-81, Veenwouden 1881-88, De Rijp 1888-90, and Amsterdam 1890-1912. Urged by de Hoop Scheffer he wrote a treatise on Melchior Hofmann, which won a prize given by the Teyler Theological Society; it was published in 1883. He was closely attached to the Mennonite brotherhood, but also liked to work with other groups. From 1887 to 1914 he was editor of Geloof en Vrijheid, a Protestant quarterly, in which all kinds of articles from his pen appeared. The ministry in Amsterdam with its varied tasks, especially with his many hours of instruction (sometimes 24 in a week), did not leave him much time for historical studies. In Geloof en Vrijheid XXIII (1889) he published an important paper, "Johannes Deknatel, een piëtist onder de Doopsgezinden." Nevertheless he devoted much time and interest to the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, serving as its secretary 1895-1917, and in this capacity carried on an extensive correspondence with the missionaries in Java and Sumatra, his German education serving him well. In 1912 he resigned his ministry for reasons of health. J.M.L.

Biogr. Wb. V, 676-79; Zondagsbode XXX, 1916-17, No. 52; XXXI, 1917-18, No. 2; V. Loosjes Az, Levensbericht (Leiden, 1918); ML II, 627.

Leenhart Munsels, an Anabaptist elder, who about 1543 baptized Jan Schutte in Bocholt, Westphalia, Germany (DB 1909, 106, 117 f.), may be identical with Leonard Fälber (q.v.).

Leens, a town in the Dutch province of Groningen, in the Marne region, where since the 16th century there were numerous Mennonites who belonged to the very conservative Groningen Old Flemish branch. The congregation of Leens, of which Jacob Melles (b. 1649, d. February 1683) and Ary Aris were preachers in the 17th century, may have merged with a neighboring church, probably that of Rasquert (q.v.), at the close of the 17th century or in the early 18th. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 562; II, No. 2039; DB 1879, 4.) vdZ.

Leentgen, wife of Jan van Rheenen (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on May 21 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously May 15), 1535, at Amsterdam, with a number of other Anabaptist women, including her daughter Adriana Jans, while another daughter, Lysbeth Jans, had been put to death on May 15. Leentgen had been (re)baptized early in December 1534 in her own house at Amsterdam by "a man of Benschop," who is obviously Gerrit Ghysen of Benschop (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 67-70.) vdZ.

Leentgen, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death in 1564 in the Sint Pieters cloister at Gent, Belgium, together with her daughter Pieryntgen Ketels. Exact date and method of execution are unknown. The names of these martyrs are found in the hymn, "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (Supplement, No. 1). (Offer, 651; Mart. Mir. D 301, E 666; Verheyden, Gent, 30, No. 101.) vdZ.

Leentgen Hendricxdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant, was baptized at Dordrecht about May 1534 by Bartholomeus Boeckbinder (q.v.). She was arrested in Amsterdam in May 1535 and put to death with a large number of other Anabaptist women by drowning on May 21 (not May 15, as Mart. Mir. states), 1535. vdZ.

Mart Mir. D 413, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 67-70; Mellink, Wederdopers, 145, 229, 312; ML II, 282, 627.

Leer, a town (pop. 15,000) in East Friesland, in the province of Hannover, Germany, the seat of a Mennonite church which originated in the early years of the Anabaptist movement. Its founders were probably refugees from Holland and Flanders. It is known that the martyr Elisabeth (q.v.) found temporary asylum here. The family names van Hoorn and Bavink occur in the earliest period. Other Mennonite family names were Alringh, Lulofs, Vissering, Zytsama, and later also Rahusen. Covering the years 1635-1768 there is a Grootboek (financial record) which gives some information on the history of the period. The congregation did not attract much outside attention. It had only a lay minister; for communion, which was called "unity" after I Cor. 10, and baptism, the elder of Emden was called in. During the time of the difficulty with the government concerning letters of protection, etc., nothing is heard of the Mennonites at Leer, perhaps because they had nothing to be extorted from them.

The congregation was said to be Flemish, and as such presumably represented the moderately strict wing in church discipline. Besides this group, there was in Leer also a (Groningen) Old Flemish or Ukowallist congregation, concerning whose rise and historical development there is no information, but which was in existence by 1660. The two groups united on Aug. 24, 1767. The Old Flemish group had a church at the Kolleweg; this chapel, called "De Schollenberg," which had been the property of the deacon David Joosten (Vissering) was purchased in 1771. It was razed in 1825, and a new church erected with a pleasant garden on the Wörde. A wing was added to accommodate a sexton's apartment and rooms for the church council and for catechism. Two years later an organ was installed. Leer was probably one of the first German Mennonite churches to have an organ. For some years it accompanied only Dutch singing. In fact the services were conducted in Dutch until the 1870's. Untrained preachers of the Old Flemish congregation were Lubbert Alberts ca. 1680, Harmen Geerts ca. 1685, Jan Hendriks 1713-*ca.*40, Jan Warners 1721-*ca.*42, and Harmen Berentsz Alringh 1742-*ca.*58.

The last lay preacher of the Flemish congregation at Leer resigned in 1728. For a few years the church was served by Dutch preachers (DB 1896, 147). Then Cornelius van Campen, also an untrained preacher, was called and ordained as an elder. In the meantime the East Frisian churches centered more and more around Leer, especially in negotiating with the government in financial matters (Müller, 159 ff.). Van Campen introduced a church register, having received government permission to do so. At the same time Norden was also ordered to keep a church record (Müller, 1710). After van Campen (1729-63) the following served the congregation as pastor: Reinhard Rahusen of Hamburg 1763-85; P. Beets 1785-89; Hendrick Janssen 1789-1829; P. Feenstra 1829-36; J. Leendertz 1837-77; A. G. van Gilse 1878-90; and S. F. van der Ploeg 1891-1920.

The membership of both the Old Flemish and the Flemish congregations always was small. The Old Flemish congregation numbered about 50 baptized members in 1710, 40 in 1733, and 29 in 1754. Of the Flemish congregation there are no figures available before the merger of 1767. The united congregation numbered about 50 baptized members in 1780, 59 in 1840, 73 in 1861, 57 in 1898, ca. 20 in 1935, and 43 in 1955.

After 1920 the pulpit was not filled, and the congregation affiliated with the Mennonite church at Emden, A. Fast serving as pastor here as well as at Emden. After the destruction of Emden in World War II, Pastor Fast made his residence in Leer for a time. The Leer church was incorporated in 1908 and is a member of the Vereinigung. Earlier it had become a member of the Dutch A.D.S. and other Dutch Mennonite associations, and drew its preachers largely from Holland. vdZ.

J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland (Amsterdam, 1887); Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, passim, see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2794 f.; G. ten Cate, Geslachtslijst van de familie Vissering (n.p., 1903); DB 1879, 8; 1902, 226; DJ 1840, 46; Naamlijst 1731 ff.; ML II, 627 f.

Leermens, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen (q.v.), where there have always been Mennonites since the earliest times. Obbe Philips worked here and won many followers. A congregation was organized, which like most in this province later joined the Old Flemish branch. After a period of decline it united in 1783 with another small congregation at Loppersum. The church is now listed as the Leermens-Loppersum congregation. The membership was always small. Before the merging with Loppersum the baptized membership numbered about 75 in 1710, 70 in 1733, 50 in 1754, and 30 in 1767. It was long served by lay preachers: Klaas Tonnys until about 1754, Pieter Jans 1719 until his death in 1760, Sievert Pieters 1739 until his death in 1778, Pieter Klaassen 1752 until his death in 1760, Jacob Tietes (Huizinga) after 1763. After the union it was also served by lay preachers, Jacob Tietes of Leermens serving until his death July 29, 1821. Then the pulpit was vacant until 1836, when Claas Bakker, trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, became pastor. He served until his death in 1884 and was followed by Alje Muller 1888-1905, Frederik ten Cate 1907-12, L. G. Holtz 1914-18, R. C. de Lange 1919-23, A. P. van de Water 1925-28, F. J. de Holl 1929-34, Miss H. C. Leignes Bakhoven 1934-40, H. A. M. den Herder 1942-46, S. J. Bouma 1946-53, H. J. Witteveen since 1953.

The membership of the united Leermens-Loppersum congregation was about 35 when the two congregations merged in 1783, 42 in 1836, 91 in 1898, 90 in 1956. Originally meetings were held both in Leermens and Loppersum, later in Leermens only, where there was a simple meetinghouse. This was abandoned in 1848 after a new meetinghouse—improved in 1927 and still in use—had been built in Zeerijp, now the center of the congregation, where a parsonage was built in 1835. An organ was not installed until 1908. In 1834 the Leermens-Loppersum congregation received the property of the neighboring congregation of Appingedam (q.v.), which was then dissolved. In 1912 the female members were given the same rights as the male. Church activities now (1956) include a Sunday school for children. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, passim; see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2040 f.; Naamlijst 1829, 64; DJ 1837, 32 f.; 1840, 42; 1850, 58; DB 1877, 108; 1879, 4; ML II, 628.

Leetonia Mennonite Church (MC), in Leetonia, Columbiana Co. (q.v.), Ohio, is one of three Mennonite churches lying within a 7-mile radius and extending across the boundary line of Columbiana and Mahoning counties. All are members of the Ohio Mennonite and Eastern Conference (MC). For the first three quarters of a century the three meetinghouses—Metzler's or North Lima and Oberholser's or Midway three or four miles southwest, both in Mahoning County (q.v.), and Nold's or Leetonia three or four miles south of Midway—served as meeting places for church services for one congregation. This Mennonite settlement was one of the oldest as well as one of the largest in Ohio. Services were held at each church once a month. The fourth Sunday was kept open for visiting. Metzler's was erected in 1824, Oberholser's in 1825, and Leetonia in 1828. Jacob Oberholser, a Mennonite minister, and his family of 21 children were among the first settlers to arrive in 1807 from Bucks Co., Pa. He donated a plot of ground for the first log church. Jacob Nold, also from Bucks County, settled in the southern part of the settlement, organized services there in 1819, and donated the land on which Nold's was erected in 1828. Metzler and other settlers from Lancaster County settled in the northern part, where he donated a plot of ground for Metzler's near North Lima. Bishop Nold and his friends from eastern Pennsylvania were not accustomed to practice the ordinance of footwashing. But wishing to have fellowship with the other Ohio ministers, Nold made strenuous efforts to persuade his friends to practice the ordinance. He made many visits to the Mennonite settlements extending across northern Ohio and western Pennsylvania, preaching, ordaining ministers, and administering communion.

Beginning in 1892 services were held at Midway every other Sunday for the entire settlement and on the intervening Sundays at both North Lima and Leetonia. More recently for a number of years Leetonia had a separate Sunday-school organization and met every Sunday. North Lima and Midway each had its own Sunday-school officers but the entire Sunday school met at the two churches on alternate Sundays. Since about 1950 each of the three has been considered as a separate congregation with not only its own Sunday-school officers and its own ministers but also its own bishop. Following Jacob Nold, Joseph Bixler served as bishop, then John Burkholder, then for many years A. J. Steiner. In recent years he assisted in the ordination of Paul Yoder, bishop at Midway, his son David at North Lima, and Stephen A. Yoder at Leetonia. Communion services were customarily held at Midway in the fall but in 1946 by vote of the Leetonia congregation communion was held there for the first time. The present membership at Leetonia (1954) is 113, at Midway 159, and at North Lima 149. J.S.U.

Leeuw (Leeu, Leu), a Mennonite family, originally from the Rhineland, Germany, since the 17th century found as businessmen in Haarlem and Amsterdam, where they were members of the Flemish congregations and became quite wealthy. Members of this family married into the de Bosch, Rutgers, de Flines, Block, van Lennep, van der Heyden, and van Heyst families. Ameldonck Leeuw, a Mennonite preacher or elder at Cologne, signed the Concept of Cologne of 1591 for this congregation. Already in 1569 he seems to have been a preacher at Cologne (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 466). Some of his grandchildren lived at Emmerich, from where they moved to Haarlem, Holland. This family was also found in Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland, where Thomas Ameldonck Leeuw and his son Jan Ameldonck Leeuw were preachers, Thomas until his death in 1689, Jan 1690-ca. 1714. After the early 18th century the family name disappears from the Mennonite records, the descendants apparently having gone over to the Reformed Church. An Ameldonck Leeuw (d. after 1674) published in 1670 a musical tragedy entitled De Toveres Circe, treuerspel met Kunst en Vliegwerken, Nieuw muzyk en Baletten. vdZ.

Leeuwarden, capital (1953 pop. 79,960; 1,898 Mennonites in 1947) of the Dutch province of Friesland, is the seat of a large Mennonite congregation (1,020 baptized members in 1956), which is the oldest congregation of Friesland and one of the oldest in the Netherlands. This congregation can be traced back to Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), who preached here in 1532 among a group of adherents, among whom was Obbe Philips; Hofmann's followers mostly belonged to the middle classes. Undoubtedly the Anabaptist group at first led a hidden existence. In the fall of 1533 two apostles of Jan Matthijsz (q.v.) of Haarlem, viz., Bartel Boeckbinder (Bartholomeus van Halle) and Dirck Cuper (Kuiper), visited the group and baptized Obbe Philips and Hans Scheerder, 14 or 15 persons being present. The next day both Obbe and Hans were ordained as elders. In the following years there were at Leeuwarden only slight traces of Münsterism. Menno Simons often visited the congregation, the last time in 1557. Elder Leenaert Bouwens baptized here as follows: 1551-54, 26 persons; 1554-56, 34; 1563-65, 198; 1568-82, 247; a total of 505.

Both the first and the last Anabaptist martyr put to death in the Netherlands were executed at Leeuwarden. The first was Sicke Freerks Snyder on March 20, 1531, the last Reytse Aysesz on April 23, 1574. The martyr Elisabeth Dirks (q.v.), who was executed on May 27, 1549, was a member of the Leeuwarden congregation and is said "to have seduced many persons."

The congregation of Leeuwarden played a part in the Frisian-Flemish schism in 1566-67. About 1560 the elders, preachers, and deacons of four congregetions (Leeuwarden, Dokkum, Franeker, and Harlingen), without the knowledge of the members, made a secret agreement of 19 articles (Verbond der Vier Steden, see DB 1893), which was one of the causes of the Frisian-Flemish quarrel.

In Leeuwarden there were at the close of the 17th century at least three congregations:

(1) A Flemish congregation meeting near the "Waag" (municipal weigh-house). Of this congregation there is not much information; it is said to have numbered about 200 members in 1695, being at that time the largest Mennonite group in the city. On June 21, 1705, it merged with the Waterlander congregation.

(2) An Old Frisian (Janjacobsz group) congregation (in Naamlijst erroneously called Old Flemish), meeting at the "Zwitsers waltje"; it was founded about 1600, and greatly prospered in the early 17th century. (In 1603-12 Elder Jacob Theunisz baptized 97 persons here.) In 1695 its membership numbered only 21, and in 1758 the few remaining members joined the United Waterlander-Flemish congregation. Their last preachers were Jan Gerbens until about 1740, Siebrand Douwes 1715-*ca.*50, Hendrik Benedictus *ca.*1750, Meinert Daniels 1741-58, who still served the United congregation after the merger until he resigned in 1769, and Pieter Cornelis van 't Veer 1752-58.

(3) A Waterlander congregation, which met at the Wirdumerdijk, which had about 100 baptized members in 1695. The oldest meetinghouse has disappeared; a new frame meetinghouse was built in 1631; it was completely renovated in brick in 1760, rebuilt in 1760, and again rebuilt and enlarged in 1850 as may be seen by a commemorative stone tablet. Other renovations took place in 1889 and later. The old pulpit and organ of the Amsterdam Toren (q.v.) meetinghouse, which had been in the Amsterdam Zonist church, were bought by the Leeuwarden congregation and installed on June 20, 1813.

(4) There probably was also a Frisian congregation, although nothing is known about it.

(5) Of a High German congregation there is only one literary trace. It must have merged with the Waterlander congregation before 1647.

(6) A congregation of Pieter Jeltjes-volk (q.v.) is also mentioned here.

The Mennonites of Leeuwarden had much trouble with the city magistrates until the 18th century. In 1596 the Reformed preacher Ruardus Acronius (q.v.) obtained permission from the magistrates to enter the meetings of the Mennonites "op het Niewland" (i.e., of the Waterlanders on the Wirdumerdijk) to interrupt the preacher. This led to the Leeuwarden disputation (q.v.) of 1596. Especially Johannes Bogerman, who was a Reformed minister at Leeuwarden 1604-26 and professor at the Franeker University 1636-37, opposed the Mennonites. He succeeded in setting the magistrates against the Mennonites. In 1631 Lamberts Jacobs (q.v.), the Waterlander preacher, was fined twice because he had ventured to preach in the new church against the will of the government. Especially the Janjacobsz group occupied the attention of the authorities. They were exhorted by the magistrates in 1670 and 1675; perhaps their strict practices of banning and shunning gave the government a justifiable reason to take action. In 1687 Jacob Jansen Voogt, preacher of the Waterlander congregation, was banished because of Socinianism (q.v.), but residing in the city was permitted and even preaching, on condition that he be examined beforehand by the Reformed ministers. There is also evidence that the city government was kindly disposed to the Mennonites. Marcelis Goverts, a Mennonite, was appointed city architect and when he and his wife, Mayke Marcus, founded a Hofje (home for old women) on Dec. 11, 1658, which was presented to the deacons of the Waterlander congregation on Aug. 16, 1659, the Court of Friesland gave its approval notwithstanding the fact that the Reformed Church of Leeuwarden contested the right of the Mennonites to administer the old people's home.

Since 1758 there has been only one Mennonite congregation in Leeuwarden. In that year the baptized membership may have numbered about 370. In 1834 it had decreased to 270, but from then there has been a considerable growth: 533 in 1861, 941 in 1898, 1,020 in 1956.

In the 17th and 18th centuries Collegiantism (q.v.) had a rather strong influence on the Mennonite congregation. Arrien Jansen in 1682 disturbed the congregation by his ideas that baptism be administered only by immersion, and that the Lord's Supper should not be held in the morning, as was usual, but during the night. Those who favored baptism by immersion built a large stone tub in the floor of the meetinghouse, in which baptism was administered by immersion a few times. The appearance of the tub was a source of unrest in the congregation and a schism threatened. The provincial government of Friesland on Feb. 15, 1720, ordered the tub removed. However, this did not happen before 1850, although baptism by immersion had dropped out of use and peace had returned. But Arrien Jansen and his followers, who had separated from the main body in August 1720, were not reaccepted as members until January 1726.

During the years following the French Revolution there was another conflict in the congregation. Its preacher Abraham Staal, who served beginning 1788 (before this time he had been a Lutheran minister), and who was a fanatical Patriot (q.v.), was dismissed from his position in 1792 because the majority of the members did not share his views. On July 14, 1797, he was received again into the ministry on the order of the city government, but soon afterwards the congregation and Pastor Staal came to an agreement, the latter voluntarily resigning. Other ardent Patriots in this city were the Mennonites Oene K. Gorter and Dirk Zeper.

For a long time the Leeuwarden congregation was served by lay ministers. Among them were Claes Karsten Tigler 1680-1725, his son Djurre Clases Tigler (years of service unknown), Here Fedes 1716-*ca.*50, Dirk Uptes Oldersma 1726-*ca.*51, Uilke Wytzes de Vries 1726-62, Heert Michiels 1726-*ca.*80, and Claas Koopmans 1772-*ca.*1800. Usually there were four or five ministers. The first minister of the Leeuwarden congregation to be educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary was Klaas Tigler (q.v.), a grandson of Claes Karsten Tigler and son of Djurre Clases Tigler. He served 1750-85. In 1753 two other trained ministers were called; viz., Siebolt (van) Abbema 1753-66, and Jacobus Hesseling 1753-91. They were followed by Jan Menalda 1764-71 and Pieter Brouwer 1785-87.

Until about 1800 there were in the congregation, besides the trained preachers, also two or three lay preachers chosen from the congregation. Jan Brouwer, called in 1793, was the only preacher from 1805 until he resigned in 1822. He was followed by Cornelis S. van Geuns 1822-27, Jan Pol 1827-49, Abraham Allard Hulshoff 1845-70, Matthijs van Geuns Cornszn 1849-88, P .W. Feenstra 1870-97, P. K. Bijl 1888-92, P. Zondervan 1892-1924, M. L. Deenik 1897-1931, J. D. Dozy 1926-33, J. IJntema 1931-36, L. Bonga 1934-52, F. van der Wissel 1937-57, Th. van Veen 1953- , J. T. Nielsen 1957- . The congregation has an old people's home, called the Marcelis Goverts-gasthuis, and in 1925 acquired a room for youth meetings and other church activities in the Ruiterskwartier. In 1952 the room for the church board, in which are found three beautiful paintings by the artist Lambert Jacobsz, who was preacher of the Leeuwarden congregation until 1636, and also the rooms for catechetical classes were rebuilt. Church activities in 1956 included a choir, women's circle, men's circle, young members' group of the 18-30 years, youth group, and Sunday school for children. In 1954 two stained glass windows by Joep Nicolas were installed in the church, representing the miraculous draught of fish (John 21) and the footwashing incident (John 13). J.Y., vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim, see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 5, 237, 241 f., 356, 375, 493; II, Nos. 99, 2042-47; II, 2 No. 252; Naamlijst 1815, 97 f.; DJ 1850, 44; DB 1861, 138; 1874, 59-76; 1893, 1 ff., passim; 1900, 90; 1917, 125; 1918, 110, note I; W. Eekhoff, Geschiedkundige beschrijving van Leeuwarden II, 111; ML II, 628-30.

Leeuwarden Disputation. By 1572 the northern Netherlands had in large part cast off the Spanish yoke. This event opened a new chapter in Mennonite history. The time of blood-witnessing was past. The last martyr in the northern Netherlands, Reytse Aysesz (q.v.), died on April 23, 1574, in Leeuwarden.

The epoch of tolerance gradually opened. The government usually closed an eye and permitted the Mennonies to meet unmolested. This tolerance is to a great extent the merit of William of Orange, who had learned to know the Mennonites as industrious citizens and several times came to their defense (see Middelburg). His son, Prince Maurice, followed his father's example. This attitude also accorded with the Utrecht Union (1579), which stipulated that "every one shall be free in his religion, no one shall be arrested or examined on account of his faith."

Nonetheless this position was not everywhere adhered to. Calvinism, which had grown powerful in its resistance of Spain, was by nature intolerant. The Reformed Synod of Dordrecht had already in 1574 taken up the struggle with the Anabaptists; they decided to request the government not to tolerate anyone who would not swear to obey the government and to demand that all children be baptized; that the Reformed preachers should be permitted to attend the meetings of the sectarians in order to convert them. Marnix van St. Aldegonde (q.v.) even favored capital punishment for them.

The Mennonites suffered much at the hands of the Reformed clergy. The resolutions of synods against them are innumerable. Even in Friesland, where the census of 1586 revealed that one fourth of the population was Mennonite, the Reformed Church created many difficulties for them. The government edict of Harlingen (April 7, 1581), that no religion should be practiced except the Reformed, gave them a certain right to suppress the Anabaptists. The government was little inclined to yield to the demands of the preachers to close the Mennonite meetinghouses. Peter van Coelen (q.v.) confesses in the Leeuwarden disputation, that "this praiseworthy government has hitherto granted us religious liberty in all kindness and courtesy" (Protocol, p. 17), and that "we may live in liberty according to our conscience under our praiseworthy government" (Protocol, p. 438).

Nevertheless the provincial States of Friesland had consented in 1584 that all ministers should have free entry into the meetings of the sects, and the sectarian preacher was obliged to reply to everything that was refuted with God's Word.

Ruardus Acronius (q.v.), Reformed preacher in Cornjum and assistant preacher in Leeuwarden, a hothead, acrimonious and implacable, who was often in conflict with his own party, made use of the edict mentioned above. In 1594 he entered a Mennonite meeting at Nieuwland near Leeuwarden to dispute with them but the congregation rose and left. Then he tried it in Cornjum. He entered the house of Jelmer Simons, where the brewer Isbrand Isbrands of Leeuwarden was preaching. This time derisive words met him. Acronius, thoroughly angered, complained openly that the Mennonites were rapidly expanding and would not dispute. Isbrand Isbrands, called to account, replied that he was not capable of disputing, and did not expect any results from it anyway.

Thereupon Acronius published a report on this meeting (July 1, 1595). His charges were answered by Peter van Coelen in writing (Aug. 19, 1595), who although he was nearly 70 years old, offered himself for a disputation.

The disputation was held in the Galilean church at Leeuwarden (q.v.) Aug. 16-Nov. 17, 1596 (see article Disputations, where the eleven points of debate are given). The two speakers officially had equal rights; Peter was permitted to state his terms, and some of them were accepted. He was permitted to choose a secretary. Only his request that some Mennonites should be among the chairmen was refused.

The manner in which the debate was carried on by both sides was rude. The request of the chair to avoid all acrimoniousness was not observed. Acronius began to speak of Münsterite descent and paid little attention to Peter's ideas. Peter spun his speeches out much too long, and his tone was usually hostile. In the 54th session the chair limited the speeches on both sides, and in the 107th he urged them to refrain from unfriendly words. But especially Acronius continued to speak with great bitterness. Nor was the chair quite neutral, although Peter in his thanks at the conclusion of the disputation said the chairmen conducted themselves properly and not like those parties (the Reformed). The outcome was that each was still of the same opinion as before. But the Reformed proclaimed themselves the victors.

The Protocol, a stately volume of 502 pages, was printed by Gillis van den Rade (Aegidius Radaeus) at Franeker. It was provided with a foreword of 52 pages, in which the Stadholder and the Frisian States expressed their opinion about the debate and its results. This foreword is a very biased and libelous piece of writing. Acronius is called " our dear, valued, and very faithful servant of the Word of God," and Peter's speeches are "long-winded discourses." Peter was "completely, faithfully on the basis of God's Word" refuted. The foreword closes thus:

"Because it is well known that the Anabaptists plant and cherish nothing but shameful and terrible errors, which overthrow the foundation of our eternal salvation and destroy the well-being of the churches, we wish to ask each of our dear and faithful subjects and other lovers of the truth . . . that they be on their guard against the sect and doctrine of the Anabaptists as a ruinous evil. Even though they are everywhere tolerated for special reasons, they are still like those who in hypocrisy speak lies (I Tim. 4:2), whose doctrine eats like a cancer (II Tim. 2:17)."

An immediate consequence of the debate was the decision by the Frisian States that Mennonite religious services were forbidden in Friesland. When the prohibition was violated in Leeuwarden, the Mennonite preachers were severely fined and many were forbidden to engage in business. Jan Jacobsz of Harlingen was banished from Friesland in 1600.

In the following period, however, the Mennonites were tolerated in spite of many complaints by the synods. Early in the 17th century many Mennonite churches were built. Now and then the spirit of persecution flared up. But with few exceptions, the government no longer interfered. An official disputation like that at Leeuwarden was not held in Holland again. (ML II, 630 f.) vdZ.

Leeuwe (Leeuwen), Claes van, was a rector of the Latin school at Zutphen, Dutch province of Gelderland, where he died in 1549. When it became known that he had been a Mennonite, having been baptized upon his faith, his corpse was exhumed and buried in unconsecrated earth. His wife Cornelia (q.v.) died as a martyr. (DB 1881, 42, note 1.) vdZ.

Legal Status. The legal right of Mennonites to the free exercise of their religion as expressed in decrees of rulers, or legislation by the political units in which they lived, is treated in the article Religious Liberty. The following discussion relates solely to the legal rights of the Mennonites as ecclesiastical bodies to hold property and function under the law as legal persons. The discussion as it relates to Mennonites in Europe is based on the article Körperschaftsrechte in the Mennonitisches Lexikon. In that article Christian Hege reports the historical development of the legal status of Mennonite churches in Prussia on the basis of the pamphlet by Gustav Reimer, Sind die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Preussen und in der freien Stadt Danzig Körperschaften des öffentlichen Rechts? (Heubuden, 1920), while J. Yntema reports only briefly on the situation in the Netherlands.

Since the Anabaptists never enjoyed full legal toleration anywhere in Europe there never was any possibility for their congregations to have a juridical legal status or to hold property. The Mennonites did not enjoy full legal toleration and a corresponding legal status in any country in Europe until the turn of the 18th-19th century. This came first in Holland in 1795 as a result of the French Revolution when the state church was disestablished and all religious groups were given equal rights. Since then every Dutch Mennonite congregation can become a legal entity. At first, permission and approval of the congregation's constitution was necessary, but now only the delivery of a declaration to the proper governmental office is necessary. The congregations are autonomous and have full power to hold property, to receive and administer all funds including legacies, and in general to function as juridical persons. The A.D.S. (q.v.) and other conferences, though not incorporated, have the rights of a legal person.

In Switzerland and France the development was similar to that in the Netherlands. The French Revolution finally brought a large measure of freedom although full legal status did not come until later in the 19th century.

In Germany the legal status of Mennonite congregations was long confused. In practice the grants and permissions given to Mennonite congregations by rulers or state authorities meant that the congregations could in reality hold property (own meetinghouses) and receive legacies, etc., as the fully recognized state churches did. However, full legal recognition did not come until quite late, for instance, in Prussia in 1874 when a special law was passed, called "The Law of June 12, 1874, Pertaining to the Conditions of the Mennonites." Even here incorporation was not a right, but could be "granted by joint agreement of the Minister of Justice, the Minister of the Interior, and the Minister of Religious Affairs"; and certain conditions had to be met. In the other German states the granting of full legal status, including the right of incorporaton, proceeded in a variable fashion, some earlier and some later than in Prussia. The right to become a registered association (Eingetragener Verein), which carried much the same privileges as the incorporated body (Körperschaft des öffentlichen Rechts) enjoyed, including ownership of property, came earlier and more easily than the right of incorporation. A basic change was brought about by the Constitution of the Republic of 1919, which placed all religious bodies on the same legal footing. Basically in Germany today only an associated group of congregations can become an incorporated body, while individual congregations remain registered associations. The conference known as the Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden (formerly Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im Deutschen Reich) was the first German Mennonite incorporated body (Nov. 8, 1922, in Hamburg). The Bavarian Mennonite congregations were incorporated as a Vereinigung Aug. 31, 1926, and each separate congregation received the right to incorporate on March 16, 1928. All did this except Ingolstadt. The South German Conference called the Badisch-Württ.-Bayerischer Gemeindeverband has remained a registered association.

In the United States and Canada the legal status of churches is regulated by the laws of the several states and provinces, not by national federal legislation. The common practice has been for such congregations not to become incorporated. Congregational property and money are usually held by trustees (commonly three in number) who can usually act as a legal person. On the other hand church boards (mission, education, publication, etc.) and institutions (schools, homes for the aged, hospitals, etc.) are usually incorporated with boards of trustees. The general conferences of the separate branches are sometimes incorporated, e.g., those of the General Conference Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren Church, but not that of the Mennonite Church (MC). The Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) was not incorporated until 1937 (in Pennsylvania) and then chiefly in order to hold property.

In the United States and Canada churches, church boards, and institutions of the nonprofit type, whether corporated or unincorporated, are exempt from taxation, and are usually incorporated under nonprofit corporation acts. H.S.B.

Legeder, Mathes, an Anabaptist of Tirol, Austria (perhaps from Klausen; a citizen of Klausen named Martin Ledeger migrated to Moravia in 1542), who was chosen deacon at Steinabrunn in 1537. Probably on his way to Tirol with a message from Moravia, he was seized and imprisoned in Sterzing in 1541. In December 1542 he was sentenced to galley service; but he had already escaped and returned to Moravia. In 1551 he was ordained preacher at Schackwitz. He wrote two songs in prison with Christel Lissner (q.v.). One begins, "Nun hört, ich will euch singen, wie es vor Augen ist," 22 stanzas (Die Lieder, 303-5); the other begins, "Nun hert, was ich euch singen will, die Frommen miessen leiden viel," 24 stanzas (Wolkan, Lieder, 229; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 313-18). Legeder died in 1552 at Bergen near Nikolsburg. He is said to have foretold his death a week before. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 181, 227, 340, 342; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); ML II, 631 f.

Legemeer, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, not far from Joure, where Elder Jakob Theunis baptized 14 persons in 1603-18. The minutes of the Frisian Sociëteit show that in 1700 there were 33 members here not in need of support. In 1726 Legemeer was still giving a small annual sum for foreign relief. About 1725, after the pulpit had been vacant for nearly half a century, partial union was made with the neighboring congregation of Sloten (q.v.); about 1755 this union was dissolved, the preacher of Legemeer then also serving at Sloten. A merger of the two congregations was brought about in 1775, but in 1789 the few remaining members of the Sloten-Legemeer congregation joined the Balk (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 164, 189, 306; Naamlijst 1808, 83; DB 1895, 12, 20; ML II, 632.

Lehigh, a town (pop. 200) in Marion Co., Kan., where State Highway 15 crosses U.S. Highway N. 50. About 80 per cent of the population are Mennonites, belonging to the G.C.M., M.B., and K.M.B. branches. The Seventh-Day Adventist, Lutheran, and M.B. churches have discontinued in recent years, leaving only the Lehigh Mennonite Church (GCM) in town. Lehigh is in the midst of Mennonite settlements, with M.B. headquarters (Hillsboro) 6 miles to the east and G.C.M. headquarters (Newton) 23 miles to the south. Unique in Lehigh are its streets, which were laid out according to early wagon trails and the Santa Fe Railroad. P.W.G.

Lehigh County (pop. 198,207), located in eastern Pennsylvania, has approximately 1,400 Mennonites, who live mainly in the southern part of the county. The settlement extends into Northampton and Bucks counties. Two thirds of the Mennonites (Allentown, 2 congregations, Coopersburg, Emmaus, Macungie, and Zionsville) are members of the six congregatons of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, the rest being members of the three congregations (Allentown, Saucon, Upper Milford) of the Eastern District Conference (GCM), and of one congregation of the Franconia Conference (MC), the Allentown Mission.

The first settlers arrived sometime before 1735, building a church near Coopersburg in 1738 and one near Zionsville in 1740. The first M.B.C. church was built near Zionsville in 1858. The M.B.C. Church maintains a home for the aged in Center Valley, the Berean Bible School in Allentown, and Mizpah Grove, a campmeeting grounds. M.S.

D. K. Cassel, Geschichte der Mennoniten (Philadelphia, 1890) 126-28; J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, 1920) 68 f.; E. R. Storms, Mennonite Brethren in Christ Handbook (Kitchener, 1948); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 20, 224, 337.

Lehigh Mennonite Brethren Church at Lehigh, Marion Co., Kan., a member of the Southern District Conference, was organized Aug. 27, 1884, under the leadership of David Dick. The membership fluctuated from 100 in 1890, 23 in 1892, 42 in 1897, 100 in 1928, to 52 in 1953. Miss Anna Enns, a missionary to Africa, was ordained in 1945. Ministers who have served the congregation are Jacob B. Wiens, Cornelius Knaak, Jacob J. Harder, A. J. Boese, Gerhard Bartel, John A. Nickel, John A. Harder, Jacob J. Kroeker, G. A. Flaming, William Neufeld, and P. R. Lange.

In 1955 the Lehigh congregation was amalgamated with the Gnadenau congregation of the K.M.B. Conference; the combined congregation is now operating as the Gnadenau Mennonite Brethren Church, with a membership of about 200. Franklin Jost is the pastor. P.C.H.

Lehigh (Kan.) Mennonite Church (GCM) is a member of the Western District Conference. There were a few Mennonite families living in and around Lehigh before 1890, who met for worship in an old frame school building. On Dec. 12, 1900, the congregation was organized, and in 1906 the first church was built. In 1901 evangelists P. J. Krause and C. C. Heidebrecht were ordained as ministers. The latter resigned soon afterward; Krause served until his death in 1917. He was followed by F. G. Pankratz, who served until 1925, Gustav Frey, who served for six years, Gerhard Friesen, and B. H. Janzen. In 1947 the present pastor, Peter W. Goering, accepted the charge. The church was enlarged in 1926, remodeled in 1945. The 1954 membership is 227. P.W.G.

Lehighton Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, located in Carbon Co., Pa., was organized in 1895. In 1953 the congregation had 68 members with J. B. Layne serving as pastor. E.W.B.

Lehman (Lehmann, Layman, Leemann, Leeman, Leaman), a Mennonite family name originating in the Emmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The name means a person living on a gentle slope (Lehn). Near Langnau, the original home of most of the Mennonite Lehman families, there is a farm named Lehn, because of its topography. Wilhelm Lehman of Affterleen near Hassli in the Emmental is the earliest Anabaptist of this family of whom we have record. He was imprisoned in October 1566 because he refused to take the oath of allegiance. He testified to his faith when questioned as did also his wife. He was sentenced to death by the sword. After eleven days of anxious waiting for his execution he did take the oath and was pardoned. During the difficult times of the first two decades of the 18th century most of the Lehmans left their Emmental home. Some went to the Palatinate, others to Alsace or the Bishopric of Basel, and some to Pennsylvania. Felix Lehman, a peasant of Hirslanden-Zürich, Switzerland, was rebaptized by Heinrich Winckler as early as 1526 (TA Zürich, 134).

The Dutch Naamlijst names Hans Lehmann, preacher from 1761, elder from 1772, and Peter Lehmann, preacher from 1750, both in Switzerland, Jacob Lehmann (d. ca. 1780), preacher of the Schafbusch congregation in Lower Alsace, Johannes Lehmann, preacher 1745-ca. 80, and Ulrich Lehmann, preacher 1783 until after 1802, both of the Freudenberg congregation in the duchy of Zweibrücken, and Johannes Lehmann, elder of the Heppenheim congregation (Palatinate) from 1782 until after 1802.

Hans Lehman landed in Philadelphia on Sept. 27, 1727, and settled near Lititz, Lancaster Co., Pa. His descendants are numerous in Lancaster County and adjoining counties and have representatives in many of the Mennonite congregations in the eastern United States and Canada. Many of his descendants have served as leaders in the church.

As early as 1718 a Lehman family found its way to the Jura from the Emmental settling near Münster, and a short time later members of this family settled at Vion on the Sonnenberg, where descendants live to this day. Hans Lehmann, a bishop in the Jura from 1772 on, with four other Jura bishops journeyed to the Palatinate in 1782 to bring peace to the divided church there.

In 1819 Peter Lehmann (1776-1843) came to America to help form the first 19th-century Swiss Mennonite settlement in this country in Wayne Co., Ohio, naming it Sonnenberg after the old home in the Jura. Two years later a bishop, Hans Lehman, came to join this settlement. In the following years many others of this family came to this community. The family came to be found in the other Swiss Mennonite communities, especially Berne, Ind., where it is today one of the most numerous families of that community.

Daniel Lehman (1742-1801) was the first Mennonite (GCM) minister and bishop in Franklin Co., Pa. Joseph S. Lehman (1847-1936) was business manager for the Mennonite Publishing Company, Elkhart, Ind., and also served as an evangelist. Peter Y. Lehman (1847-1925) was a minister and bishop at the Clinton Brick and Shore congregations (MC) in Indiana. He was influential in the Indiana-Michigan (MC) Conference. Peter S. Lehmann (1821-99) was a minister in Jura, Switzerland, who came with a large portion of his congregation to found Berne, Ind., in 1853. He later lived in Hickory Co., Mo., where he shepherded a small flock of Swiss Mennonites (GCM). When this community dissolved he returned to the Berne community, where he spent his last days. A. H. Leaman (1878-1950) was a mission worker (MC) and evangelist in Chicago. Daniel N. Lehman (1852-1925) was a minister and bishop at the Millersville Mennonite (MC) Church, Lancaster Co., Pa., and an energetic worker in the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference. The following three ministers were his sons. Christian K. Lehman (1881-) has been a minister since 1917 and a bishop since 1938 in the Millersville district of the Lancaster Conference (MC). Chester Kindig Lehman (1895-) is a minister (MC), dean of Eastern Mennonite College 1922-56, and the author of several books and pamphlets on the Christian faith. Daniel Webster Lehman (1893-) is professor of education and psychology at Eastern Mennonite College since 1921 and a bishop in the Virginia Conference (MC) since 1947. Japhet F. Lehman (q.v., 1860-1932), of Berne, Ind., was a prominent layman in the General Conference Mennonite Church, a leader in conference publication activities, for 34 years manager of the Mennonite Book Concern of Berne. His son Gustav Adolf Lehman (1886-) taught music and directed choirs at Bluffton College and Colgate-Rochester Divinity School. Martin Clifford Lehman (1883-) was a minister (MC) and missionary to India for 24 years. J. Irvin Lehman (1895-) has been a minister since 1922 in the Marion, Pa., Mennonite (MC) Church.

In 1940 there were still 55 persons in Mennonite families in Germany, all in the south, bearing the name Lehmann. They were found in the congregations Dühren, Ernstweiler, Frankfurt, Friedelsheim, Kaiserslautern, Deutschhof, Kühbörncheshof, Möckmühl, Monsheim, and Sembach, with 23 of them in Ernstweiler. (ML II, 632.) D.L.G.

Lehman, Japhet F. (1860-1932), a Mennonite (GCM) leader, was born June 8, 1860, at Berne, Ind., the only son and fifth of the eight children of Peter S. and Verena Sprunger Lehman, who were of Swiss birth. In February 1883 he married Elizabeth Neuenschwander of Berne. They were the parents of six children. Though Lehman's formal education was limited to 18 months in the subscription schools in Hickory Co., Mo., and three months at Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, he rendered outstanding service in many offices on church, Sunday-school, and educational boards. He was a leading member of the First Mennonite Church of Berne, and very active in the "saloon fight" at Berne. For 34 years he was the manager of the Mennonite Book Concern which was located at Berne, developing it into an important servant of the Conference. For 30 years he served on the Board of Publication of the General Conference Mennonite Church. He was always actively interested in the education of young people. In 1900 he was elected to the first Board of Trustees of Bluffton College, and remained on the Board until his death. From 1868 to 1880 the family lived in Hickory Co., Mo. He died at Berne on Nov. 13, 1932, and was buried in the M.R.E. cemetery west of Berne. A.H.S.

Lehman, a "preaching appointment" (MC) in Ellice Twp., Perth Co., Ont., named for Jacob Lehman, a Mennonite who immigrated with his family from Alsace about 1850 and settled in Ellice Twp., southwest of the Wallace Mennonite Church (MC) at Kurtzville (q.v.). At first services were held here at three-month intervals. From 1865 appointments were every eight weeks, then later alternated with Wallace. Ministers were supplied. Communion was served from the earliest date until the membership decreased. The community consisted of Jacob's family and in-laws by the name of Weber and Shellenberger. Jacob and his wife, a Showalter, were buried at Martin's meetinghouse south of St. Jacobs; his son Christian at Wallace, and his wife, Mary Graybill, at Geiger's in Wilmot township. Cheaper land attracted these pioneers to Ellice. The close of the Mennonite testimony was due to intermarriage and some returning to organized congregations. J.C.F.

Lehner (Leener, Leenert, Leenders, Leenderts, Lienders), Peter, b. 1677 in Switzerland, d. 1755 at Sappemeer, Dutch province of Groningen, married to Elisabeth Rustener (or Rogener), was a farmer at Oberhofen, north of Lake Thun, Switzerland, and a preacher of the congregation. In July 1711 he was forced to emigrate to the Netherlands, where he settled on a small farm near Sappemeer. Here too he was a preacher, serving the Swiss Mennonites and after the schism of 1720 the New Swiss Brethren until his death in 1755. Poverty-stricken because of the cattle plague and other calamities, too weak by old age to administer the farm, he left it to his oldest son Christian, who succeeded in keeping his head above water by extra earning from weaving. Peter Lehner's grandson, Pieter Pieters Leenerts (Sappemeer 1750-1807), adopted the family name of van Calcar (van Calker). This Pieter van Calcar was also a preacher of the Swiss Brethren congregation (years of serving unknown). He founded a distillery at Hoogezand. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 155; introduction to the Stamboek, 61, 115.

Lehrdienst, derived from Lehre (teaching) and Dienst (service), was a term used to designate the body of ministers of a congregation, particularly by the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia. The origin of this designation very likely goes back to the Netherlands. The chairman of the Lehrdienst was the elder (Aeltester, Oudste), who was assisted by the other ministers of the congregation. The Lehrdienst was not only responsible for the preaching in the various meetinghouses of the congregation but also in matters of discipline and business functions which are now in America taken care of primarily by the church council. The Lehrdienst of a number of congregations of one settlement was sometimes organized in the Kirchenkonvent (q.v.). At times the name Kirchenkonvent seems to have carried the same meaning as Lehrdienst. In America, where the congregations of Prusso-Russian background have adopted the one-minister system, the functions and the term Lehrdienst have become obsolete. (See also Elder, Minister.) C.K.

Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908).

Lehrer (Dutch, Leraar), translated "teacher," the name commonly used for minister or preacher in the earlier days of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement in Europe, and on down well into the 19th century. Its use is based on Eph. 4:11, and came into currency among the pre-Reformation sects. It was probably intended to clearly repudiate the sacerdotal and clerical concept of priest (Catholic) or official pastor (Protestant) and to emphasize the basic teaching function of the minister, who was also commonly called Diener des Wortes (servant of the Word), and who was not primarily to administer sacraments but to expound, interpret, and apply the message of God's Word. H.S.B.

Lehrerkonferenz: see Mennonite Teachers' Association.

Lehrerleut, one of the Hutterite kinship groups, so named because their founder, Jacob Wipf, was a teacher in Russia and also in South Dakota. His group of thirteen families (a few joined the other two groups in South Dakota on arrival) was the last to come from Russia to South Dakota, arriving in 1877, the other two, the Dariusleut (q.v.) and the Schmiedeleut (q.v.), having come in 1874-75. The Lehrerleut families all came from the village of Johannisruh, Molotschna, where they had not lived in community. In South Dakota they founded the Old Elmspring Bruderhof near Parkston, which they occupied until 1932. From this original single Bruderhof twenty-two colonies had sprung by 1950, for which statistics are given below. Although the Lehrerleut are organized as a unit with their own leader (Vorsteher), they differ from the other two kinship groups only in very minor points, such as the wearing of buttons by the men in place of hooks and eyes. H.S.B.

Census of Lehrerleut Bruderhofs—July 1, 1957

Lehrerleut Bruderhofs in Alberta

Name of Colony	Address	Founded	Population	Head Preacher
Acadia Valley	Oyen	1952	86	Peter J. Entz
Big Bend	Woolford	1920	127	John J. Waldner
Crystal spring	Magrath	1937	97	Peter A. Entz
Elmspring	Warner	1929	122	Michael J. Mändel
Handhill	Hanna	1956	85	Samuel S. Kleinsasser
Hutterville	Magrath	1932	115	John J. Waldner
MacMillan	Cayley	1937	84	Jacob J. Wipf
Miami	New Dayton	1924	128	Peter P. Hofer
Milford	Raymond	1918	95	John P. Wipf
New Dale	Queenstown	1950	92	Samuel S. Decker
New Elmspring	Magrath	1918	85	John J. Entz
New Milford	Winfred	1951	99	John J. Hofer
New Rockport	New Dayton	1932	102	John J. Wipf
O. K. Colony	Raymond	1934	153	Jacob J. Waldner
Old Elmspring	Magrath	1918	98	Andrew J. Wurz
Rockport	Magrath	1918	125	John D. Hofer
Rocklake	Wrentham	1935	115	John A. Gross
Rosedale	Etzekom	1952	89	Michael M. Hofer
Springside	Duchess	1955	100	Joseph J. Waldner
Sunnyside	Warner	1935	135	Jacob M. Hofer
		Total	2132

Lehrerleut Bruderhofs in Saskatchewan

Benck	Shaunavan	1949	95	Jacob J. Wipf
Cypress	Maple Creek	1950	50	Jacob J. Entz
Slade	Tompkins	1952	80	Andrew A. Wipf
		Total	225

Lehrerleut Bruderhofs in Montana

Name of Colony	Address	Founded	Population	Head Preacher
Birch Creek	Valier	1947	125	Jacob A. Waldner
Glacier	Cut Bank	1950	115	Michael J. Entz
Hillside	Sweet Grass	1950	129	Andrew A. Wurz
Miami	Pendroy	1948	145	John P. Wipf
Milford	Augusta	1945	150	Joseph Kleinsasser
Miller Ranch	Choteau	1949	162	David D. Hofer
New Rockport	Choteau	1948	90	Peter D. Hofer
Rockport	Pendroy	1948	127	Joseph J. Waldner
		TOTAL	1043	Overall Total pop. 3,400

Thus the present (1957) total of Lehrerleut Bruderhofs is 31, and the total population is 3,400. The elder of the Lehrerleut is (1957) Peter D. Hofer.

Lehrerverein (Russia): see Mennonite Teachers' Association.

Leiden, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland (1953 pop. 91,632, with 626 Mennonites), where Anabaptists have been found since the earliest period, who apparently at first mostly belonged to the revolutionary branch. Unemployment and poverty among the weavers, who were numerous in this city, were a fertile matrix for revolutionary teachings, which the Anabaptist elder Cornelis Pieters of den Briel (q.v.) proclaimed here soon after 1530. He was active in Leiden at several times. Pieter Pietersz, alias Borrekieck, tried and executed at Amsterdam in July 1535, reports a number of names of Anabaptists at Leiden in 1534 who had been baptized by Cornelis Pietersz. In 1533 Jan Beuckelszoon (Jan van Leyden, q.v.) lived here. In April 1534 an attack on the city was contrived but not carried out and in January 1535 a new attack was planned but prevented by treason. At that time a number of Anabaptists were apprehended and put to death. After Münster had fallen (July 25, 1535) there were still some traces of Münsterism at Leiden, but gradually this declined and after a number of followers of Batenburg (q.v.) had been arrested in May 1544 the revolutionary Anabaptists disappeared. Apparently at that time a congregation of peaceful Anabaptists already existed, of whose earliest history not much is known. In 1544 Reyer Willemsz of Leiden is said to have circulated books by Menno Simons. There were some martyrs in 1552, and Leenaert Bouwens baptized 27 persons here in 1563-65. About this time or shortly thereafter a number of Mennonites came from Flanders. About the circumstances of the Mennonites during the siege of the city by Spanish soldiers in 1574, no information is available.

In the last decades of the 16th century the schisms among the Dutch Mennonites caused a number of different branches at Leiden also. About 1600 there existed four congregations: Flemish, Waterlander, Frisian, and High German. Perhaps there was also a French-speaking Waterlander congregation. Only about the Waterlander and the Flemish is there adequate information. In both the Flemish and the Waterlander congregations a number of names are found which show that its members were refugees from Flanders and especially from French Flanders: Christian names, such as Jacques, Gilles, François, family names like Hennebo, Marville (Marvilje), Tavenne, des Mulliers, du Forest, Casier (Cesaer), Le Poole, van de Walle, de Pla (le Pla), Viane, Calvaert, Bossu, le Leu, and Roynaert.

Although no figures are available, it is known that the Flemish congregation was rather small. In 1626 its preachers Francois van Achterson, Joost Cassier, and Hendrick Ongena signed the Outerman confession, while in 1632 Christiaan de Koninck and Jan Weyns of Leiden signed the Dordrecht confession. This caused a schism in the Leiden Flemish congregation. A small number, following Elder Jan Rose (q.v.), separated from the main body and did not return before 1663, after Rose had died. In 1639 the Frisian congregation, which had been joined by a number of High German Mennonites, merged with the Flemish church. In 1660 an old people's home, called De Hoeksteen, and intended for aged women of the congregations, was founded on Het Levendael. The congregation was conservative and a champion of strict Mennonitism. In 1660 together with the congregations of Rotterdam, Dordrecht, and Gouda, it arranged a meeting of Flemish elders and preachers, held at Leiden, June 18-23, presided over by Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v.), in which a number of church regulations were made and a strict attitude was stipulated against Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and his followers. And after the Lammerenkrijg (q.v.) the Leiden Flemish congregations took the side of the Zonists (q.v.). On Feb. 13, 1701, it merged with the Waterlander congregation. At this time the conservative views seem to have disappeared, since in the stipulations of the union a clause is found in the formula of "benodiging" (q.v.) (invitation to the Lord's Supper) which is rather liberal, also admitting non-members to the communion service. The Flemish meetinghouse in the Boogaardsteeg was sold in 1726.

Of the history of the Waterlander congregation, always numbering a larger membership than the Flemish, there is more detailed information. In the early 17th century it was usually called "Duitsche en Walsche Gemeente," i.e., Dutch and Walloon congregation. It is not clear whether there was an independent Walloon (French-speaking) Waterlander congregation at Leiden; a document of 1613 was signed in French by Jean (Jan) de Mortier as bishop of the congregation of the "Valons" at Leiden, by Jan des Mulliers as preacher, and by Joost Cesaer as deacon. Possibly the French-speaking did not form an independent church, but met separately as long as the French-speaking refugees did not understand the Dutch language. There is a nearly complete list of elders, preachers, and deacons of the Leiden Waterlander congregation from 1613. Figures about the number of members are not available, except those of 1675, when the number of baptized members was 165. After that year there was a considerable decrease of membership. Most members were rather well-to-do, as is proved from legacies made to the congregation. In 1630 one of the members, Gerrit van Hoogmade, a deacon, founded an old people's home, the "Hofje" called Bethlehem. This institution, located on the Levendaal, consisted of 16 small houses facing a court, in which the inmates had separate residences. These houses and also the old gate of 1631 are still standing. The congregation was represented in 1647 at the large Waterlander meeting at Amsterdam. Since 1638 it had its meetinghouse in the Pieterskerkstraat, which, though totally rebuilt, is still in use by the Leiden congregation. From 1675 the congregation, which had joined the Lamist conference of South Holland, insisted on thorough training of ministers. When the Waterlander and Flemish congregations had merged in 1701, the total membership numbered about 300. The hoped-for growth expected from the union was not realized. In 1737 the membership was 201, in 1799, 105, and in 1847 only 43. From then on there was a considerable increase: 115 in 1861, 455 in 1902, 442 in 1934, 500 in 1955.

The two old people's homes, De Hoeksteen and Bethlehem, were merged and in 1811 the Bethlehem house was sold. The Hoeksteen-hofje was henceforth called Bethlehem. Formerly the church board was supreme in governing the church. From 1701 until about 1914 only two congregational meetings (in 1810 and 1882) were held in which the brethren of the congregation were called to give advice to the church board. The preachers were chosen by the church board, while the board, assisted by the "Groote Kerkeraad," was self-perpetuating.

In 1774 a pipe organ was built in the meetinghouse, one of the first in a Dutch Mennonite church. In 1859 the meetinghouse was completely rebuilt. In 1752 the congregation took over the care of the property of the dissolved Mennonite congregation of The Hague, administering it and caring for Mennonites living at The Hague until a new congregation was formed there in 1882. Pastor Sepp of Leiden, who had given catechetical instruction at The Hague from October 1879, also preached from then until the new congregation called its own pastor in 1883.

In 1777-87 François Adriaan van der Kemp (q.v.) was preacher at Leiden. By his patriotic sympathies and his aversion to nonresistance he caused some dissension in the congregation. He was followed by Jan Kops 1788-1800, Jan van Geuns 1789-1814, Abr. de Vries 1801-3, Matthijs Siegenbeek (at the same time professor at the University of Leiden) 1804-29, Isaac Molenaar 1814-18, Anthony Doyer Thz. 1818-53, Christiaan Sepp 1854-82, Aemilius W. Wybrands 1882-86, Salvus Kutsch Lojenga 1887-1904, W. J. Kühler 1905-12, J. Wuite 1912-25, L. Bonga 1926-34, F. ten Cate 1935-43, A. J. Snaayer 1944-54, and S. L. Verheus from 1955. The members of the Leiden congregations are found in the city of Leiden and surrounding towns Oegstgeest, Leiderdorp, Voorschoten, Katwijk, Noordwijk, Sassenheim, Rijnsburg, and Alphen aan de Rijn. Church activities include a ladies' circle, young members group, Sunday school for children. The Leiden church has four large silver communion cups of 1705 and three pewter communion pitchers of about 1750. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 82, 104, 162, 257, 261, 269, 288, 372, 613, 708, 781, 827, 907, 1081, 1126, 1415, 1562; II, Nos. 2048-72; II, 2, Nos. 253-58; Mellink, Wederdopers, 186-207; L. Knappert, De opkomst van het Protestantisme in eene Noord-Nederlandsche stad, 1908, passim; Offer, 195, 526, 578 f.; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van het Kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905); Verhaal van 't gene verhandelt ende besloten is in de By-eenkomste tot Leyden (Amsterdam, 1661); Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim, see Index; DB 1875, 27-31; 1876, 62; 1892, 103-27; 1896, 60 f., 71; 1900, 15-19; 1907, 114, 116-20, 128-33; 1917, 149; 1918, 49, 53 f.; ML II, 634.

Leiden, een Liedeken van IIIJ vrienden, van, a Dutch hymn composed by Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.), commemorating the martyrdom of Willem (Willem Matthijsz), Mariken (Marijtgen Adriaens) Dieuwertgen Jans, and Mariken Jans. These four martyrs were executed at Leiden (q.v.) in the Dutch province of South Holland. They were not put to death in 1550, as is stated in Groot Offerboek of 1615 and van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, but in the fall of 1552. The song beginning "Eylaes ick mach wel suchten, dat nu buert so groot ellent" (Alas, I should sigh because now occurs such great misery) is found in the oldest edition of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1562-63, of the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562, and later Dutch hymnbooks. It has been republished by Wackernagel. A prose version of this hymn is found in the 17th-century Dutch martyrbook, including the Martyrs' Mirror. vdZ.

Offer, 578-80; Wackernagel, Lieder, 194; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 70 f.; F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 107.

Leidsche Bundel, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, which took its name from Leiden where it has been printed. The official name was Liederen ten gebruike in doopsgezinde gemeenten. It was compiled by two Dutch Mennonite ministers, J. Sepp of Beverwijk and H. Boetje of Hengelo, who in this hymnbook published 198 hymns from other hymnaries. The first edition appeared October 1897, followed by four other editions, 1899, 1903, 1911, 1919. In 1900 an anthology of Psalms, according to the version of the Dutch Reformed Church, was added, reprinted in 1906. Besides a few old Mennonite hymnals and the hymnal of the Dutch Protestant Union (see Protestantenbond) the Leidsche Bundel was the most used hymnal until 1944. In 1900 the Leidsche Bundel was used by 14, in 1925 by 53 congregations. DB 1897, 249; 1902, 15-22.) vdZ.

Leidsche Synode (Synod of Leiden), a name sometimes used for a meeting of Flemish Mennonite elders, preachers, and deacons held June 18-23, 1660, at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland. Of this meeting, for which the congregations of Rotterdam, Dordrecht, Gouda, and Leiden had taken the initiative, T. J. van Braght (q.v.) of Dordrecht was moderator and Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.) of Rotterdam secretary. Forty-two men, representing twenty-two congregations, were present. It decided that vacant pulpits should be cared for by neighboring congregations; a plan was made to compose one confession to replace the collection of Algemeene Belijdenissen (this plan was never carried out), and measures were taken against progressive preachers such as Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) who were judged to have forsaken the basic doctrines of the church. The account and the resolutions of this meeting are found in Verhaal van 't gene verhandelt ende besloten is in de Bij-eenkomste tot Leyden door eenige Doops-gezinde Leeraren en Diaconen, die men Vlamingen noemt, published at Amsterdam, 1661. vdZ.

Leiningen, a family of the Palatinate, Germany, which is mentioned already in the Carolingian period. From the 12th to the 19th century it controlled a large part of the Palatinate. Emich II founded the Augustinian monastery of Höningen, where Mennonites settled after the Thirty Years' War, whose descendants (Hirstein) still live there. Frederick I, progenitor of the Altleiningen line, built the castle Neuleiningen and Battenberg; Battenberg is the home of several Mennonite families (Hartmetz, Rings, Hirstein). He lived in Altleiningen castle, today a stately ruin on top of a mountain, at the foot of which the Altleiningen Mennonite church stands. Ibersheim was also for a time in the possession of the counts of Leiningen. The Friedelsheim (q.v.) castle, today the Mennonite parsonage, was loaned to the counts of Leiningen by the abbey of Limburg. Philip I, founder of the Leiningen-Leiningen line, introduced the Reformation in 1555. On Dec. 1, 1565, he and his brothers issued a Lutheran liturgy. The Mennonites under the rule of the counts of Leiningen enjoyed undisturbed tolerance. They were not burdened by oppression, and were not obligated to pay the protection fee required of them in the electorate. (ML II, 635.) NEFF.

Leisy, Isaac, August, and Henry, all Mennonites and brothers from Friedelsheim, Palatinate, Germany, who came to the United States in 1852, founded the Leisy Brewery in Keokuk, Iowa, in 1862. In 1872 the family purchased the brewery of Fred Haltnorth in Cleveland and transferred operations to that city. In 1935 after the repeal of prohibition, the Leisy Brewing Company was reorganized and Herbert F. Leisy, grandson of Isaac Leisy, became and still is its president. The family has not been Mennonite for several generations. C.K.

Leisy Orphan Aid Society was incorporated in 1884 as the result of a $5,000 bequest by Jacob and Mary Strohm Leisy, of Halstead, Kan. The Society is under the control of four G.C.M. churches—First Mennonite Church (Halstead), First Mennonite Church of Christian (Moundridge), West Zion Mennonite Church (Moundridge), and Garden Township Mennonite Church. Leisy bought the present "Orphan Farm" for $3,000, one and a half miles south of Halstead. Christian Krehbiel (q.v.), under whose council the bequest was made and the foundation created, was in charge of handling the benefaction. The income from the Leisy Foundation was to be used to support orphan children within the confines of home missions. The orphans were not to be over 13 years old and were to be placed with Christian families.

In order to offer a wider circle of opportunities to share in this Christian service to children and to extend the aid to homeless children, another auxiliary organization, The Mennonite Orphan and Children's Aid Society (q.v.), was incorporated on Oct. 4, 1893, with 35 individuals and congregations in seven states as members who contributed $5 or $100 annually, which entitled them to vote and to life membership. Membership certificates to the number of 426 were issued. Later the two societies united. In addition a Mennonite Charité (q.v.) was incorporated at Halstead in 1908.

There were always 12-20 children in the Society Home coming from Chicago, Kansas City, and the state of Kansas, who were gradually distributed primarily in Mennonite homes. In the 20 years, 1914-34, $8,789.60 was expended in aiding orphans. After World War I the Leisy Orphan Aid Society aided Mennonite orphans in Russia and Canada, and after World War II help was extended to Mennonite orphans in South America. The Society is still active. Most of the files have been preserved in the BeCL. C.K.

C. E. Krehbiel and P. P. Wedel, Fiftieth Anniversary of Leisy Orphan Aid Society (Halstead, 1934).

Leitfaden zum Gebrauch bei gottesdienstlichen Handlungen zunächst für die Aeltesten und Prediger der Gesamt-Mennoniten-Gemeinde in Baden und anderer mit ihr verbundenen Gemeinden (Sinsheim, 1921). This is the title of the Minister's Manual (q.v.) now in use in the Mennonite churches of Baden and Württemberg. It is an almost unchanged new edition of the formulary compiled by Ulrich Hege (q.v.) and published in 1876 (Sinsheim), for which the Palatine formulary and the manuscript notes of Elder Christian Schmutz (q.v.) were used. The first part of the book contains the Apostles' Creed, Biblical benedictions, and greatly abbreviated prayers for public worship. The first section of the second part deals with the choosing and ordination of a preacher with or without the lot, the second section with the choice and dedication of a deacon, the third with baptism, including the case of persons transferring their membership from another denomination, the fourth with visiting preachers, the fifth with church discipline, the sixth with communion, the seventh with marriage, the eighth with funerals and funeral prayers. A brief appendix gives the forms of the oath valid in the German states of Prussia, Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria. (ML II, 635.) NEFF.

Leitgen, a Mennonite elder, active in the Dutch province of Limburg, who died about 1545. He is named in the trial of Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.). In the beginning, about 1535, he had some leaning toward Münsterite (q.v.) principles, but later he was a peaceful Anabaptist. He was probably a native of the city of Jülich (q.v.). (DB 1890, 58; 1909, 120; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 390.) vdZ.

Leitner (Leutner), Hans, a Hutterite martyr, was captured with Klaus Felbinger (q.v.) on April 2, 1560, at Neumarkt, Lower Bavaria, Germany, and imprisoned at Landshut (q.v.), where they were repeatedly cross-examined and terribly tortured. When all these attempts to convert them proved futile, they were beheaded on July 19, 1560. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 234-36; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 304-6; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 400-2; Mart. Mir. D 274, E 643; ML II, 635.

Leitstern, Der, a 4-page monthly periodical, 8 x 11 in., is the official organ of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church, published at Altona, Man., and edited by the elder, W. H. Falk. The first number appeared in January 1943. H.S.B.

Lely, a Dutch Mennonite family of Hoorn, where Cornelis Tymons Lely in 1686 and his brother Gerrit Tymons Lely in 1689 were called to the ministry of the Frisian congregation (DB 1867, 81, 84), and of Amsterdam, where its members were found in several Mennonite congregations. To this family belonged the preacher Cornelis Lely (q.v.), while Cornelis Lely (q.v.) is also a descendant of this family. vdZ.

Lely, Cornelis, b. 1686 at Hoorn, d. 1758 at Amsterdam, married to Maria Salm of Amsterdam, was a son of Pieter Tymonsz Lely of Hoorn. He was a surgeon in Amsterdam and in 1718-52 a preacher and elder of the Old Frisian congregation (Arke Noachs) at Amsterdam. He published a sermon to commemorate his late co-preacher Jan Dirksz Schotvanger (d. 1735), entitled Paulus leven en zalige verwagting (Haarlem, 1735). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 727; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1411; DB 1881, 107.

Lely, Cornelis, b. Sept. 23, 1854, at Amsterdam, d. Jan. 14, 1929, at The Hague, was a Dutch engineer and a member of the Second, and later of the First Chamber of the Dutch States-General, governor of Surinam 1902-5, and three times Minister of Public Works (1891-94, 1897-1901, 1913-18). In 1918 a law was passed to reclaim the Zuiderzee. To this gigantic task, which has proved to be of great national importance and which was begun in 1923 and by now (1955) not yet entirely finished, Lely had given both the impulse and the plans by his Nota's over de afsluiting en droogmaking van de Zuiderzee (Leiden, 1887-91). Lely stemmed from an old Mennonite family and was a member of the church, being for some time also a member of the church board at The Hague. vdZ.

K. Jansma, Lely, de bedwinger der Zuiderzee (Amsterdam, 1948).

Lembach, a government district and village in the Rohrbach area, Upper Austria. Anabaptist meetings are mentioned here in 1527. Matthias Dorsauer, who was arrested in 1528 at Passau, baptized here. Then there is no further mention of Anabaptists. Probably none of the three places in Lower Austria having this name is meant in the Hutterite records, but rather (Neu) Lengbach (q.v.) in the Vienna Woods (Wienerwald). (ML II, 636.) P.DE.

Ritter, Geograph.-statistisches Lexikon II (Leipzig, 1895); A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden (Berlin, 1893); ML II, 636.

Lembach, a village west of Wissembourg in Lower Alsace, near the border of the Palatinate. The region is mountainous and picturesque with many old ruins. There were once many Mennonite families here. At the close of the Thirty Years' War Swiss Mennonite refugees settled here, welcomed by the barons of Fleckenstein to rebuild their extensive lands in Lower Alsace. They held their meetings on the Froensburg, an estate at the foot of Froensburg castle; some of the Palatine Mennonites met with them. The membership steadily declined. Emigration to Bavaria, Poland, and America took large numbers; the fact that they lived widely scattered hastened the decline. When Froensburg passed into other hands the congregation met in a rented hall at Hirschtal in the Palatinate, and finally on the Fleckensteinerhof (q.v.) in Alsace. When this farm also passed into non-Mennonite hands the members no longer met. There were only a few families left. The Palatine families went to Ixheim (q.v.) (Zweibrücken), the Alsatians to Geisberg (q.v.). The last elders of Lembach were Peter Jordy of the Fleckensteinerhof and Joseph Guth of the Bärenbrunnerhof near Busenberg. (ML II, 636.) P.So.

Lemberg (Lvov), a city (pop. 330,000) formerly in Poland, now in Russia. In the 15th century Lemberg had a strongly German stamp. Decrees were issued in the German language and German was the language of church services. In the next century the awakening nationalistic spirit made Lemberg a bulwark of Polish thought. After the first division of Poland in 1772 Lemberg was ceded to Austria. In spite of the attempt to Germanize it Lemberg remained Polish, with a strong Ruthenian element.

The Mennonite community in Galicia (q.v.), which had been established in 1784, was located at first in three villages about three miles southwest of Lemberg, the capital of the province, with Einsiedel as the center and the seat of one of the congregations. In 1830 a subsidiary settlement (Neuhof) was made in a village about 10 miles northwest of the villages, which also became a daughter congregation. Further settlements were made on scattered larger estates, of which Kiernica—5 miles east of Grodek, 10 miles west of Lemberg—became (1860) the seat of a congregation. Gradually the older settlements dissolved and the families scattered, so that by 1914 the 400 baptized members were living in over 100 places. In 1909 the previous congregations were united in one and the name Kiernica-Lemberg given to it, with Lemberg the seat. In 1936 only 57 (souls) Mennonites were living in the city of Lemberg.

In 1911 a one-story building at 23 Koshanovski Street was purchased in which a chapel, a parsonage, a council room, and a janitor's apartment were housed. In 1925 a second floor was built to furnish quarters for students and houseparents, called a Schülerheim.

In 1939-40, as a result of an agreement between Germany and Russia, all Germans were evacuated from this region and the Galician Mennonites were resettled in the region of Thorn and Posen. Thus the Lemberg congregation came to an end. Lemberg became Russian. H.S.B.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (Lemberg, 1934); ML II, 636 f.

Lemke (Lemken, Lemmeken), an elder in the High German Anabaptist congregation, probably a native of Upper Gelre. He was married to Fyken Gerlacx van Megen. He was a deacon at Illikhoven about 1550 and after the martyrdom of Theunis van Hastenrath in 1551 took over the eldership in Jülich. He is apparently identical with a man called Lemken Bruerren, a maker of bags, also called Cremers (peddler), who was a resident of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, and arrested there in March 1533 because he had received "Lutherans," i.e., heretics, obviously Anabaptists, in his house. Lemken then was pardoned and did penance. In 1538 he is said to have left the city. In 1545 he was present at the baptism of the martyr Liisken (q.v.) at Visschersweert; he then lived in this hamlet until 1547, when his house was razed by the officials of the duchy of Jülich because it was the house of a heretic and had harbored forbidden meetings. He then moved to the neighboring hamlet of Illikhoven. About this time Menno Simons stayed at his home in Illikhoven. He was very active in both preaching and baptizing; e.g., at Lichterwald in 1553, Susteren 1557, Born 1558, and also at Aachen, where he had a number of followers.

With Zylis, Herman van Tielt, and Hans Sikken he went to Wüstenfelde, in May 1556, and held a two-day discussion with Menno Simons and other elders on the application of the ban in marriage. After the others had left, Lemke remained and explained to Menno Simons that he was in complete agreement with him, but did not wish to admit this in the presence of the brethren, because he was afraid of losing his influence. But he made up his mind to conquer the resistance of his brethren against the ban in marriage, and if he succeeded he wanted one or two Dutch elders to come to them, and introduce the ban among them. But this did not take place; Lemke sided entirely with Zylis, who rejected the ban in marriage as an abomination.

Menno Simons complained that Lemke denied having ever "fraternised" with him, and that he answered all the pleas of the elders with the "very unfriendly and stubborn words," that he "had not come for their sake."

After the Strasbourg conference in 1557 Zylis and Lemke wrote a friendly letter urging peace and unity (DB 1894, 47-53). Menno Simons replied on June 11, 1558, in a pamphlet, Grondelijk Onderwijs ofte bericht van de excommunicatie, rejecting their plea. Thereupon Zylis and Lemke wrote an extremely violent reply, in which Lemke boasted that aside from the doctrine of church discipline he differed from Menno in three or four additional articles, and that he would rather be excommunicated by the Dutch elders than to grant that they were right. Then Menno put the High German preachers under the ban and published his Antwoort aan Zylis und Lemmeken, in which he repudiated brotherhood with them. Nothing more is known of Lemke. In a letter found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 329, E 690) written by Matthias Servaes (q.v.) to Heinrich Krufft, Servaes warns him of a brother named "L." If this brother is Elder Lemken, as Bax supposes, he was still living in 1565. NEFF.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 142, 302; DB 1890, 55, 61; 1894, 36 f., 42, 44 f., 51 f., 58, 60 f.; BRN VII, 56, 61, 87, 207, 222; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) passim, see Index; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 323-25, 327; C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 94-97; ML II, 637.

Lemlin, Konrad, of Sintelfingen (called Angelfingen in the Passau records), an Anabaptist martyr, had baptized the wife of Michel (Khumbauf) of Bruchsal, Baden, Germany, at Barnbach in 1530 and Hans Steuber (Stöber) of Durlach, Baden, in 1531. At the end of 1531 he was seized with his wife Ursula Spanner of Gmünd and put into the prison in Vaihingen on the Enz, Württemberg, because of his Anabaptist convictions. Because he would not recant he was burned at the stake. His wife, who also remained true to her faith, was also to have been executed, but because of her unborn child she was spared; she had to swear that she would leave Württemberg and never return. (TA Württemberg, 256; ML II, 637.) G.Bo.

Lemmer, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens in 1551-54 baptized 4 persons and in 1563-65, 22 more. There must have been a congregation here at that time, of which, however, nothing is known. In the 18th century it was still in existence, though very small in membership. In 1748 the few remaining members joined the neighboring congregation of Sloten (q.v.). vdZ.

H. J. Busé, "De verdwenen Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland," reprint from De Vrije Fries XXII, 14.

Lenaerdt (Lenart) Boeckbinder (Leenaert van Antwerpen), a Dutch Anabaptist sent out as an apostle in the fall of 1533 by Jan Matthysz (q.v.) of Haarlem. He was a native of Antwerp, Belgium, and was active in preaching and baptizing in a number of towns; in early 1534 at Gorichem; in the fall of 1534 at Zierikzee and Schiedam; in December 1534 at Delft and Rotterdam, and shortly thereafter in Antwerp. He is likely identical both with the Lenaert van Kampen, who is said to have been the leader of a congregation of 400 members in the town of Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, and with Lenaert van Emden. He must have been an influential member of the revolutionary branch of Anabaptism. After December 1534 all trace of him is lost. (DB 1917, 100, No. 104; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.) vdZ.

Lenaert Aerntsz, an Anabaptist from Naaldwijk in the Dutch province of South Holland, who was arrested at Poeldijk (q.v.) and beheaded and broken on a wheel at The Hague on March 14, 1536. Lenaert belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 220 f.) vdZ.

Lenaert van Emden, a Dutch Anabaptist leader: see Lenaerdt (Lenart) Boeckbinder.

Lenaert van Kampen is identical with Lenaerdt (Lenart) Boeckbinder (q.v.).

Lenaert Plovier (Plouvier, Pluvier, Plumer), an Anabaptist martyr, who on April 4, 1560 (Offer 1559, but this means by the old calendar), was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, with Janneken Eghels and Maeyken de Hont. They were put in a sack and drowned in a wine cask at the Steen castle at Antwerp. The Offer contains his testament, a letter to his children, and a hymn, "Testament van Lenaert Plovier." The Groot Offerboek of 1615 and following martyrsbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, give a number of particulars, procured by his son. Lenaert was a native of Meenen (Menin) in Flanders (according to the records of Antwerp he was born at Wervik, Flanders). Living in Meenen, he was a well-to-do cloth merchant. In 1555 he united with the Mennonite congregation of Meenen (q.v.); he refused his reappointment as assayer of cloth, because the office required him to take an oath. Shortly after, he moved from Meenen to Antwerp, where he started a silk business. Knowing that persecution also threatened him in Antwerp he intended to move to the Netherlands. He had already sent his wife Maeyken with their four little children to the Dutch province of Friesland and had put his property in safety, when he was arrested, and being unwilling to deny his faith, was put to death. In vain his parents tried to have him released. During the night of execution two friends, Kerstine van Damme and Joost Noe, who later lived at Franeker, Dutch province of Friesland, had secretly listened at the wall of the castle, that they might hear some last word of Lenaert. The name of this martyr is also found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. In prison he wrote six letters, but only one of these has been preserved. It is found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. In the 17th and 18th centuries a number of Ploviers were members of the Flemish congregation at Haarlem, Holland. Their relationship with Lenaert Plovier could not be ascertained. vdZ.

Offer, 367-73, 567, 667; Mart. Mir. D 270-72, E. 641-43; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 7, 11; XIV, 28 f., No. 315; Wolkan, Lieder, 67; ML III, 379.

Lenaert de Schoolmeester (i.e., schoolteacher, because he formerly had been a schoolteacher at Alken in the territory of Liége, Belgium) was a Mennonite elder. The Dutch martyr Jater (q.v.) told during her trial in 1550 that she had heard him preach in 1540 at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. He impressed upon his hearers that they should live "after the way and doctrines of the apostles" and that they would be persecuted because of the name of God. Lenaert had also baptized Jater. He may have been identical with Lenhard van Maastricht, Leenaert van Yzenbroek, and Leonhard Fälber (q.v.). (DB 1890, 57; 1909, 117 f.) vdZ.

Lenaert Willemsz and his wife Beatrix Jansdochter, from Terheide near The Hague, Dutch province of South Holland, Anabaptist martyrs, drowned on March 17, 1535, probably at The Hague. Particulars are lacking. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 217.) vdZ.

Lenart Kerstenzoon, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 1, 1569, at Utrecht in the Netherlands. Lenart, a native of Venlo, confessed during trial that he had often attended Anabaptist meetings; he and his wife Trijntgen (q.v.) had been (re)baptized; he was not willing to recant his faith, and died steadfast. vdZ.

I. M. J. Hoog, "Onze martelaren," in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis I (1902) No. 118; DB 1903, 5.

Lenart Ketelbueter: see Ketelbueter family.

Lenart van Ysenbroeck (Lenhart van Yzenbroek, Eschenbroich, Eyssenbrouk), also called Leonhard van Tongeren and Leonhard van Maastricht, an Anabaptist elder, whose activity can be traced in a number of towns in what is now the Dutch province of Limburg (Born, Dieteren, Maastricht, Sittard) beginning in 1535. He baptized the martyrs Mente Heynen and Jater. He was still active in the Dutch Limburg area in 1561; his meetings were attended by people from near and far; sometimes 200 or 300 persons are said to have been present. Rembert considers him to be identical with Leonhard Fälber. For particulars see the article Fälber. vdZ.

DB 1909, 117 f.; 1917, 119, No. 106; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 72 f., 349 f.; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 450-53; Mellink, Wederdopers, 306.

Lengbach, Austria, located in the Wienerwald. The first mention of Lengbach appears in an apology of the government councilors to an accusation made by the king, dated March 4, 1528, which says that they were holding several Anabaptists in Lengbach, awaiting instructions from the king on what was to be done with them. Persecution in Moravia was bringing many Anabaptists to Lower Austria, where the marshal Dietrich von Hartitsch (q.v.) was hunting them down. It was, however, not the marshal but the clerk of Neulengbach, the knight Blasius Notlitsch (d. 1547; his tombstone is still near the altar of St. Sebastian in the Ansbach church) who succeeded in capturing them. On June 3, 1528, he reported to the government that with the aid of Gryss, master of the hunt, he had brought to Lengbach 33 newly baptized persons, who had been living for three weeks in the forest "on a high mountain," 16 men and 17 girls and women. Most of them were very young; only four were past 40. There was among them a furrier who had assumed the priestly role of baptizing. As much as he had been able to understand "in haste," none would desist from his error. In conclusion the knight requested, "Since other people draw a salary for annihilating and crushing the new sect," he should also be rewarded.

The king decided that the cost must be borne by the magistracy, but the prisoners must be turned over to Hartitsch, who soon afterward executed 18 men and women. Although the court records are silent on this point, there must have been other Anabaptists here, for the chronicles list 45 executions in Lengbach, of a total of 105 for all of Lower Austria, Vienna included. P.DE.

J. Loserth, "Die Wiedertaufe in Niederösterreich von ihren Anfängen bis zum Tode Hubmaiers (1525-28)," in Blätter des Vereins für Landeskunde von Oesterreich XXXIII (1899) 417-35; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 232; ML II, 636.

Lengua Indian Mission in the Paraguayan Chaco was considered by the Mennonite immigrants to the Chaco in 1932, two years after their arrival there; the project was, however, prevented for two years by the war between Paraguay and Bolivia. In 1935 a missionary association called Licht den Indianern (q.v.) was organized by 48 members of the various Mennonite groups (G.C., E.M.B., and M.B.). The first missionaries sent to the field were Abraham Unger, Abraham and Anna Ratzlaff, and Gerhard and Katharina Giesbrecht. The first convert, Sepe Thama (i.e., a son), was baptized after ten years of work. In 1951 the congregation had 28 members, of whom 15 were baptized on Jan. 22, 1950.

The language of the Lengua Indians is a very difficult one to learn; there was at first no written matter in the dialect used at the station. The language consists of only 17 letters, the sounds of which include a peculiar lisp which is very difficult to acquire. Besides receiving spiritual service, the Indians are also encouraged to give up their nomadic way of life and make permanent settlements. As yet the Catholic Church has put no obstacles in the way of the work.

In 1946 the Mennonite Brethren Mission Board (Hillsboro, Kan.), by agreement with the missionary society, took over the Chaco Mission Field. The missionary society continues to serve as the representative of the Chaco Mennonites and shares in the operation of the Mission by counseling with the M.B. Board, also raising funds in Paraguay. However the administrative and financial responsibility remains in the hands of the North American Board, which furnishes most of the finances. In 1949 the name of the Chaco Mission was officially changed to "Chaco Amerikanische Mennonitenbrüder Mission Licht den Indianern." (See Paraguay Mennonite Brethren Mission.) G.B.G.

Survey of the Mission Fields of the Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America Located in India, Africa, Brazil, Paraguay, and Colombia, made by A. E. Janzen, Executive Secretary and Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions During December 1948 to June 10, 1949 (Hillsboro, April 1950) 86-116; ML II, 637 f.

Lenhard van Maastricht, a Dutch Anabaptist leader, apparently identical with Lenart van Ysenbroeck (q.v.) and Leonhard Fälber (q.v.). VDZ.

Lenhart (Leonhard) von Fritzlar: see Fälber, Leonhard.

Lenige, Dirk Pieters (1722-98), a Mennonite merchant at Makkum, Dutch province of Friesland, a friend of the Mennonite ministers J. Stijl and Matthias van Geuns, and had a keen interest in Mennonite church matters. In 1778-92 he wrote a number of poems in the Frisian language, some of which were published by G. A. Wumkes in the periodical Yn ús eigen Tael (1915), 61-74. His daughter Cynthia (Kynke) Lenige (1755-80) was an artist; she did some remarkably good drawings. A volume of her poems in the Dutch language entitled Mengeldichten was published in Amsterdam in 1782 after her death. VDZ.

N.N.B.Wb. IV, 901 f.; G. A. Wumkes, Bodders yn de Fryske striid (Boalsert, 1926) 377-83; DJ 1943, 68-78.

Lennep, van, a very old family, mentioned already about 1000 and at that time living at the country seat of Linepe (Lennepe) near Düsseldorf, Germany. In the Middle Ages a branch of this family produced a number of magistrates at Emmerich, Germany. From this branch proceeded the Dutch Mennonite van Lennep family, whose ancestor was Warner van Lennep, a merchant, born in 1597 or 1598 at Emmerich and died in 1644 at Amsterdam. He moved from Emmerich to Amsterdam, where he married Sara van Halmael. His son Jacob van Lennep (1631-1704) and his grandson Aernout van Lennep (1658-1728), a son of Jacob, were both deacons of the Amsterdam Mennonite Lam-en-Toren congregation. Both were silk merchants and were appointed by the burgomasters of Amsterdam as directors of the silk market at Amsterdam. The van Lennep family, by their excellent commercial ability —they mostly traded with the Levant, especially Smyrna—by their wealth and their reliability, were highly respected and were among the influential citizens of Amsterdam. By marriage they became related to a number of other well-known Amsterdam Mennonite families, such as van Halmael, van der Meersch, Block, Leeuw, Rutgers, de Veer, Looten, de Neufville, Roeters, de Wolff, and Bierens.

The aforementioned Jacob van Lennep, a silk merchant and manufacturer of a famous gold and silver cloth and of linen damask, had built a splendid house on the Herengracht, where the mercantile aristocracy of Amsterdam at that time lived; he moreover owned the country home "Roosenberg" in Watergraafsmeer. His son and successor Aernout van Lennep in 1699 bought the country home "Het Paradijs" at Heemstede near Haarlem.

In the 18th century some members of this family went over to the Reformed Church, probably because they wished to hold high state offices, from which the Dutch Mennonites were excluded until 1795, or to enter the army. The first of this family to leave the Mennonite Church was David van Lennep (1721-71), who joined the Reformed Church in 1745. Other branches of the family remained Mennonite and served the Amsterdam congregation as deacons until recent times, among whom was Jacob Abraham van Lennep, who in 1775 took the initiative in building a pipe organ in the Amsterdam Singel church. There is only one Mennonite minister from the family, viz., Egbert David van Lennep, b. Jan. 2, 1787, at Almelo, d. June 1, 1851, at Doetichem, a son of Jacob Roeters van Lennep and Catharina Coster, who, after studying at the Amsterdam Seminary, served the congregations of Zutphen 1810-11 and Almelo 1811-38. To this family also belonged H. S. van Lennep (q.v.). VDZ.

F. K. van Lennep, Verzameling van oorkonden betrekking hebbende op het geslacht van Lennep I (Amsterdam, 1900); Ned. Patriciaat IX (1918) 232-52; Jaarboek Amstelodamum XXXIX (1942) 45 ff.; DB 1863, 22; 1912, 105; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 131, note 2.

Lennep, Henrick Samuel van, b. Feb. 10, 1832, at Amsterdam, d. Oct. 24, 1914, at Heemstede, a jurist and well-known legal authority in Amsterdam and director of the Vesta Life Insurance Company. He served the A.D.S. as a trustee from 1869 until his death, and as treasurer from 1872 until his death. He was elected chairman of this conference (A.D.S.) three times. He also served for a long time as chairman of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, and for 12 years as a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation. He was married to Anna Cecilia van Eeghen. NEFF.

DB 1903, 132-35; 1911, 133; Zondagsbode XXVI (1911-12) No. 15; XXVIII (1914-15) No. 1; ML II, 638.

Lenoir, North Carolina, the center of Krimmer Mennonite Brethren work among the Negroes. In 1951 Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Siemens reported that the following churches had been built in North Carolina and Tennessee since the time they arrived on the field: Beach Bottom (1926), Heaton (1928), Shell Creek (1931), Bushtown (first church 1932, second church 1936), Cove Creek (1939), Elk Park (1939), Laytown (1940), Lenoir (1945), Boone (1948), and Darley (1950). A 1952 report indicated that a five-month Bible school had an average attendance of 90; the daily vacation Bible school held two weeks in each church had an enrollment of over 300 children; child evangelism classes were conducted; the Pioneer Boys, the Home Builders, and the men's Bible Club met regularly; revival meetings were held in all of the churches, resulting in nine conversions. The membership in 1955 was 235, with four ordained ministers. M.G.

Lensen, Jan, was the head of one of the 13 Crefeld families (Mennonite and Quaker) who immigrated to Pennsylvania, arriving in Philadelphia on Oct. 6, 1683, on the "Concord" (q.v.), who were therefore the forerunners of German immigration to America. He came from Rheydt, was a linen weaver by trade and settled in Germantown, where he was naturalized as a citizen in 1691. His family was (according to Hull) the only one of the 13 original settler families to be and remain Mennonite. HEGE.

Wm. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore College, 1935); ML II, 638.

Lenz, Paul, was one of the judges in Tirol, Austria, who in 1561 had to pronounce sentence against Hans Mändl (q.v.), Eustachius Kotter (q.v.), and Jörg Rack (q.v.). He was a native of Götzens and as a representative of the Sonnenburg district had been called with three others from this diocese to Innsbruck. The jurors refused the request of the government to be put under oath again and because it was a religious matter put the responsibility for the trial on the spiritual authorities, refusing to have anything to do with it. In spite of all the pressure they produced a written "excuse."

In order to find the perpetrators of this refusal, which was considered disobedience, the Innsbruck regents required everyone to declare whether he would or would not obey the will of the prince and his mandates. All the jurors yielded except Lenz and two others. The emperor favored lenience, and suggested that the trial be dropped and the three prisoners sent to the galleys. But the local government of Tirol disagreed and begged him to act in accord with the mandates; they finally carried out the decisions against the Anabaptists passed in Speyer in 1529. Under the threat of removal from office, imprisonment, and loss of citizenship, Lenz and the two others yielded and pronounced the death sentence. Though they were not punished, they were put under police supervision.

The valiant martyrdom of the three executed Anabaptists moved Lenz to join the Anabaptists himself and win others in Götzens. When the magistrate at the request of the government began to investigate this matter, Lenz had already gone to Moravia; his estate was confiscated. (Loserth, Anabaptismus 119-210; ML II, 638.) P.DE.

Lenzburg, a district (Amt) in the Swiss canton of Aargau (q.v.), where soon after its rise Anabaptism seems to have spread quietly. In the public discussion with some Protestant preachers, held at Bern, March 11-17, 1538, two Anabaptists of the Lenzburg district were present. Soon after more rigorous measures were adopted, which caused most Anabaptists of Lenzburg to move to Moravia (q.v.). vdZ.

Lenzes (Lensens), Goitze, author of a private songbook entitled Nuttige tytkortinge of Stichtelyke gezangen (Leeuwarden, 1757). Lenzes was an untrained preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Drachten, Dutch province of Friesland, 1744-*ca.*83. vdZ.

Lenzi, Michel, an Anabaptist martyr of whom nothing is known except that on May 21, 1527, a few hours after the execution of Michael Sattler (q.v.) at Rottenburg, Germany, he also died as a martyr, having refused to return to the Catholic Church. At the same time Mathis Kürssner, Stoffel Schuhmacher, and "the aged Geiger" were also put to death. Fourteen other Anabaptists saved their lives by recanting. HEGE.

W. Köhler, Brüderlich Vereinigung etzlicher Kinder Gottes (1527) in Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation II (Leipzig, 1908) 303; ML II, 638.

Lenzmann, August (1823-77), an influential Mennonite leader and elder at Gnadenfeld, Russia, was born Jan. 29, 1823, in Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.), Prussia, Germany, of Lutheran parents, but joined the local Mennonite congregation before it emigrated to Gnadenfeld under the leadership of Elder Wilhelm Lange (q.v.). Lenzmann was baptized on May 27, 1834, chosen as minister in 1851 and as elder in 1854. He was a cofounder of the Gnadenfeld Bruderschule (q.v.) and an intimate friend of Eduard Wüst (q.v.), of whom he says, "The memories of the brotherly fellowship which he enjoyed with the dear Pastor Wüst until his departure from the struggling to the triumphant church will always remain a blessing for me" (Friesen, 171). Hermann Lenzmann, his son, also speaks of the close and fraternal contact between his father and Wüst (Menn. Jahrbuch 1904-5, 78).

Lenzmann was the elder of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church at the time when the Mennonite Brethren Church originated. He was the one whom the brethren approached before their separation with the request that he administer the Lord's Supper to them privately; but he refused to do this because he considered it contrary to Mennonite practice and likely to disturb the unity within the brotherhood (Friesen, 319). Lenzmann tried to direct those favoring a separatist movement. Johann Claassen, the leader of this group, was a member of his church and had been the cofounder of the Bruderschule. The experience of failing to reconcile various extremes within his congregation and the entire Molotschna Mennonite settlement disappointed Lenzmann. His later relationship with the Mennonite Brethren and also the Friends of Jerusalem was somewhat influenced by these bitter experiences, which are also reflected in the account which he published in the Mennonitische Blätter (No. 6, 1863). He states that it was a falsification of facts to claim that "the brethren who had left the church were the real and genuine children and followers of Pastor Wüst and that they were persecuted primarily because of this; a rude blasphemy against the deceased who cannot defend himself. . . . Wüst did not hesitate to admonish them according to Scripture and asked them to give up their pride and to humble themselves before the Lord" because they had emphasized the "free grace" of God in a wrong manner (Friesen, 318). Many of the official communications (published by Isaac) bear Lenzmann's signature. Lenzmann objected particularly to the Mennonite Brethren claims that before Wüst there had been "neither a vital religious life nor any mission festivals" among the Mennonites, for such activities had been an old practice at Gnadenfeld and Rudnerweide.

Lenzmann also had to deal with another controversial question pertaining to the Friends of Jerusalem, when Johann Lange (q.v.), who taught at the Bruderschule, spread views of this group to which Lenzmann objected. Lenzmann was an outstanding leader promoting an active and vital Christianity among the Mennonites of the Molotschna. It was unfortunate that he and others did not manage to keep all forces and movements in one fold. He probably suffered more under it than anyone else. His account and role in the religious developments of 1850-60 is very significant and deserves careful study and analysis, particularly since he and his congregation were by background and development related most closely to the revivalistic and pietistic views emphasized by Wüst. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 171, 317 ff., 743; Menn. Blätter, March 16, 1863; Menn. Jahrbuch 1904-5, 78; Fr. Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); ML II, 638 f.

Lenzmann, Hermann A., the son of August Lenzmann, an outstanding educator and printer. He received his secondary education under Heinrich Franz, whose daughter he married, taught elementary school at Berdyansk, and attended the Theological Seminary at Barmen, Germany, in 1868-72, after which he spent some time at the Normal School of Neuwied. In 1873-81, with the exception of 1875, he taught at the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule. In 1875 Lenzmann studied at the University of Tübingen under J. T. Beck. During the years 1881-98 he taught at the Halbstadt Zentralschule. For 1898-1907 he returned to the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule.

In 1907 Lenzmann established a printing press at Gross-Tokmak, Molotschna, where numerous Mennonite books were published. The first issues of Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (1903-6) were printed and published by Lenzmann. In the issue of 1903-4 he published an appeal for support of the Jahrbuch. During the following years (1904-5 and 1906-7) he presented a lengthy biography of Johann Tobias Beck in the Jahrbuch. Görz says of him that he was "one of our best educated teachers" (p. 163). C.K.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951); H. Dirks, "Aus der Gnadenfelder Gemeindechronik," Menn. Jahrbuch 1911-12, 28 f.; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 602.

Leo Mennonite Church (MC), located in Leo, Ind., a small rural town eleven miles northeast of Ft. Wayne, Ind. The first meetinghouse, built on the bank of the St. Joseph River about 1½ miles southeast of Leo in 1887, was used until 1917, when a church was purchased in the town of Leo. This congregation was without conference affiliation until 1905, when it united with the Indiana-Michigan Conference, and Jonathan Kurtz of Topeka, Ind., was given bishop charge. From 1906 to 1910 this church had no local minister. In 1910 Andrew S. Miller was ordained minister, and John Lugbill was deacon. In 1944 S. J. Miller was appointed pastor, and in 1947 the church was remodeled. The baptized membership in 1954 was 237, with S. J. Miller (ordained 1950) as bishop and Ben Graber as deacon. S.J.M.

Leoben, the "iron city" (pop. 12,000) of Styria, Austria, in the upper Mur Valley. The first emissaries of the Anabaptists arrived here in the autumn of 1528 and at once found followers. On Sept. 18, the magistrate Siegmund von Dietrichstein (q.v.), one of the most notable names among the Lutherans in Styria, gave orders to the mayor, judge, and council of Leoben to arrest Peter Schuster, who was suspected of being an Anabaptist, with his wife and children, and to make an inventory of his property. Three days later came an order to look for other Anabaptists. On Sept. 27 the command was issued to question him, if necessary on the rack, to learn who preached for them, who had taken part in their meetings, and in whose houses they had met. All those reported should be arrested at once. The examination apparently brought nothing important to light, for Dietrichstein gave instructions on Oct. 20 to release Schuster and his family, and to return their property to them, but only in exchange for an oath to be on call at all times.

Schuster, however, was actually at that time an Anabaptist, for on New Year's Day of 1529 the viceregent of Styria, Seifried von Windischgrätz, issued an order to the authorities of Leoben to apprehend the fugitive brethren Grinzinger and Schuster, if they had not already done so. The importance of quick action is indicated by the thrice repeated cito! (quickly). Meanwhile both had escaped.

On the other hand, Dietrichstein reported to the king on Jan. 7 that his magistrate in Kammerstein had arrested an Anabaptist fugitive from Upper Austria en route via Krems (q.v.) to Leoben, where 30 to 40 Anabaptists, among them many peasants, had met weekly. He had the prisoner taken to Graz. In order to cope with the constantly spreading movement toward adult baptism, the Vienna government in the name of the king delegated the provost Hieronymus Wüst to take special charge of the situation in Bruck and Leoben.

Dietrichstein also asked his brother-in-law, Wolf von Stubenberg auf Kapfenberg, to see to the arrest of the "many bad fellows" who wandered secretly about Bruck and Leoben and in the Kapfenberg jurisdiction, "persuading the poor populace to Anabaptism." Two days later the king himself authorized Dietrichstein to have the Anabaptists hunted by secret spies, and to seize all who were suspect. He also informed Dietrichstein that he had asked the archbishop to send skilled and competent preachers to the regions most seriously threatened. By the end of January the council of Leoben reported that eight Anabaptists had been seized, and asked for instructions in handling both those who would recant and those who would be obstinate. Dietrichstein put the case into the hands of the provost, and commissioned him to be lenient to the penitent.

